In a word, then, Mr. Paur played on an instrument yesterday afternoon that was inferior to the one on which he had formerly been heard. His mastery of that instrument, however, was quite amazing, and argues splendidly for the future.

His readings of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture and the eight symphony were altogether satisfying, and his accompaniment of the second Brahms concerto remarkably discreet and effective. The man should learn to desist from using his head as if it were a metronome. Those gyrations of the cranium do not add to the listener's enjoyment.

Miss Aus der Ohe is no longer addicted to that famous braid, but now affects a coiffure a la Defregger. Perhaps this was a concession to Brahms the Severe, whose second concerto she plays better than she does the Schumann, and not so well as she performs the first one by Liszt. It was a virile, sweeping performance, but one that was lacking in delicacy of coloring and in rhythmic precision.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 7, 1898.

Rosenthal—Straus's "Don Juan"—Brahms's Third Symphony.

A Varied Programme at the Symphony Concert.

The Symphony came first in the programme of Saturday, for Brahms' third symphony (which was given) does not suit to the end of a concert because of its gentle ending.

It is probably the least played of Brahms' four symphonies, yet it is as characteristic as any of the set. Hans Richter once called it the "Heroic Symphony" and it presents enough of strife and conflict to justify the title, yet it stops short of tragedy; Beethoven in his "Eroica," Tschaikowsky in his "Pathetique," both land their hero in the tomb; Brahms' is more phlegmatic and ends with a few sighs that by no means suggest an undertaker.

Yet the work is beautified even in its combats, and its "alarums and excursions" never interfere with its shapeliness; Brahms is certainly the tonic for these unhealthy musical times.

In the second movement the dialogue between strings and wind instruments was admirably played. The "Poco Allegretto" was full of tenderness, the violoncellos doing especially fine work. The simplicity of scoring in this is remarkable, yet the movement contains more than Richard Strauss could say with a brass cyclone,. fine harps and a regiment of piccolos.

It is very far removed from the style of a Scherzo, which movement it replaces, but Schumann and Brahms were ever serious in their scherzo movements, the latter wisely leaving the name and form altogether.

The finale was virile and combative and its earnest contents lost nothing in the performance. Altogether it was a performance of Brahms that was thoroughly satisfying, full of dignity, contrast and power. The audience applauded heartily and it is evident that the Boston Brahmins are Brahmsites as well.

But it was not Brahms that had caused the audience to overflow into every available inch of standing room; it was the return of a wonderful pianist, or rather, not a pianist but a fortissimist; Rosenthal entirely purged of typhoid germs, in most muscular health, was to play Xaver Scharwenka's B flat minor piano concerto.

In choosing this work for his rentree Mr. Rosenthal deliberately calls attention to his technique rather than to his poetic feeling; the concerto is "Clavier-maessig," well suited to display the piano, but that is about all; it tells its tale of passion about as ably as Christian recites his devotion to Roxane in "Cyrano de Bergerac;" but it is full of difficulties and has bravura enough to daunt any one but such a second Tausig.

Viewed then from the standpoint of virtuosity one must pay great tribute to the pianist; if he did not charm he certainly astonished and overwhelmed, and, after all, such fiery power is at times a great relief from the sickly sentimentalism which is inundating the modern concert room.

There are no difficulties remaining for such an Alexander to conquer, he possesses a technique that throws other pianists in the shade. Yet one may well decline to give a verdict upon the hearing of this one-sided work; after Rosenthal has given his recitals here we can form a fairer estimate.

The bravura and force of the last movement of the concerto was phenomenal; it was no longer a matter of fingers and ivory, it was Jupiter Tonans playing with thunderbolts. The public naturally became excited and the recalls showed that virtuosity also has its reward.

Brahms' symphony had shown the auditor how well-balanced a composer could remain even in the expression of stress and storm; now Richard Strauss showed him how distorted and hysterical it was possible to become and still call the result "Music." After the Brahms work one could only regard Strauss's "Don Juan" as awarning example. The pain one feels at such an exhibition is only intensified by the constant evidence that the composer is a genius, as absolute in his way as Berlioz himself, a genius wandering in the pseudo-Wagnerian labyrinth!

There are moments of great beauty in "Don Juan," passages where the horn woos the oboe with the utmost tenderness and expression, nor is the portrayal of the vehement nature of the hero without its charm, but the work, even at a second hearing, is but an affair of shreds and patches, nothing is carried to a conclusion and even the beautiful phrases seem like "Sweet bells jangled out of tune."

Trombones and tuba thundered out their threatening passages with resolute power, a dissonant crash and a mysterious roll of kettledrums seemed to indicate that Don Juan had got into trouble of some kind, the violins plunged boldly into high positions that once were deemed impossible in orchestral playing (they scolded Beethoven royally for using four-lined C in the "Egmont Overture") the harp gave its glissando and other effects with tinkling sweetness and the battle of orchestral virtuosity was brilliantly won by Gen. Gericke and his brave men, but, like young Peterkin, anent the Battle of Blenheim, we feel like asking—"Now tell us what 'twas all about?"

After this draught of musical absinthe there followed a more legitimate frenzy in the concert arrangement from "Tristan and Isolde." By stitching the beginning and the end of this great opera together one obtains a very effective work for orchestral performance, although the suggestions of the leit-motiven do not tell a very clear story in this abridged version, for Tristan and Isolde are no sooner indicated by their intertwined motive than they are slaughtered in the figure portraying the "Love death."

Spite of a few slight aberrations in attack the performance seemed to us one of the most glorious that we have heard; there was a breadth and nobility in Mr. Gericke's reading that held one mightily and the orchestra seemed to catch the fire which animated the conductor.

In this concert Mr. Gericke showed very distinctly that he has not been standing still since he left Boston; one may doubt whether he possessed such abandon in former years; he has gained in this and yet has not lost an iota of his finished style and elegance. The concert was a triumph for him and for his men.

The crescendo beginning with the introduction of the "Love-death" motif, pianissimo, and ending with the triumphant figure of ecstasy, was given in a thrilling manner and brought the widely contrasted programme to a worthy end.

This week there will be no concert as our orchestra will be plucking at the laurel-bushes of New York, Philadelphia and other of our musical suburbs.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.—Rosenthal, Soloist.—He is Welcomed With Enthusiasm.—Cambridge Concert.—Notes, Etc.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth symphony concert was heard by a large and enthusiastic audience. The programme was:

Symphony No. 3, F major, op. 90	Brahms
Concerto for Pianforte No. 1, B flat minor	Scharwenka
Lone Poem, "Don Juan," op. 90	R. Strauss
Vorspiel and Isoldes "Love-Death"	Wagner

Soloist, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal.

The Brahms symphony was given with elaborate care and finish, with exactitude and with the most pronounced indications of careful study. It made but little impression on the audience, however, that was eagerly waiting for the soloist and greeted him in the heartiest manner. The concerto is not very exhilerating on the high art side, and easily shows that its composer was more intent on bringing the piano into prominence than in writing a connected and enduring work of art. It is a brilliant piece of manufactured work, that already shows the corroding marks of time, and stands in the shadow of antiquity itself.

It was brilliantly and wonderfully played and demonstrated on the side of technique, at least, Mr. Rosenthal is a marvel. He has fingers of iron and of silk as occasion requires, they fall as light as down on the keys, or with the weight of granite. His beautiful work in pianissimo passages is a thing to be remembered, and he is less inclned to the habit of "pounding" than when he was last bered, and he is less inclined to the habit his caressing touch, or vibrates to the last molecule of its structure when the full strength of his fingers is felt. It was exquisite and most beautifully finished work throughout, large in style, massive in finish, and in the way of finger agility unsurpassed. There is no doubt that in the matter of technique Mr. Rosenthal stands alone among living pianists; the cleanness, clearness and equality of tone in the rapid passages that he plays, the wonderful gradations of tone that he produces, the magic of his touch, his dazzling brilliancy are things to be remembered. The concerto did not give him the opportunity to show his talents on the interpretative side, but it thoroughly settled the fact that on the side of technique he is a phenomenon. He roused his audience into the wildest enthusiasm and was called out again and again to bow his acknowledgements. There will be no rehearsal or concert next week: for the evening of November 19 the programme will be: Barber of Bagdad, Peter Cornelius; concerto for violincello in A minor, op. 33, Saint sky; symphony in D minor, Volkmann. Saens; Mozartina, rst time Tscharkou-The solist will be, Mr. Almin Schrveder.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1898.

ROSENTHAL.

The Roumanian Pianist Thunders and Lightens at the Fourth Symphony Concert—Xaver Scharwenka's First Concerto the Stalking-Horse for His Technic.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in F major	Brahms
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor	Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan"	Richard Strauss
Prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner

Scharwenka's concerto is not much over 20 years of age, and yet it has gray hair and the tiresome elegance of an old beau. When it was first played throughout Germany and in London, it made a sensation, and Von Bülow did not hesitate to say that it was equal to either of the concertos by Chopin in musical thought, and superior to either in orchestration; but Von Bülow was a mad wag, never to be taken seriously, not even in his commentaries on Beethoven, Mendelssohn and others.

The first movement suggests too plainly the E flat concerto of Liszt, which is, by the way, as fresh as though it had been written last spring; in the second movement, which is by far the best, we hear Liszt improvising on a Viennese waltz; and the last movement is a mixture of Chopin, Rubinstein and again Liszt. The elegance, the salon-elegance of this concerto is the only feature of the work that is tolerable and to be endured. Scharwenka's passion is swollen, turgid, unreal; and the pathos is like unto a conversation in which the lover, desiring to wring the heart of the adored one, says the wrong thing, steps on the pet dog and knocks over a vase of flowers.

I regret, therefore, that Mr. Rosenthal chose this concerto for his first appearance at a Symphony concert. In it he appeared frankly as a bravura-player, and while his bravura is wonderful, we have now all reached the age when we are no longer stunned by the athletic exhibition of a formidable pianist or dazzled to blindness by incredible and at the same time elegant velocity.

When you say that Mr. Rosenthal last night gave a remarkable exhibition of technical proficiency; when you add that in fortissimo he pounded—yes, pounded is the word, you have then said all that can be truly said, and thereby you do injustice to a pianist who is something more than a mere virtuoso. For outside of the opportunity for the display of strength, brilliance and velocity there is nothing in the concerto that appeals to either pianist or hearer; there is nothing that tests the mind or the soul of an interpreter. Mr. Rosenthal will give two recitals here this month. His performance then will show the true stuff of which he is made. It is enough now to add that his playing of the scherzo was marvelous for its ease and elegance, and that he was heartily applauded.

⁂

Nor is there much to be said about the orchestral numbers of the program. The third movement of the symphony was played delightfully, and the finale was unusually effective. It seemed to me that in the first movement continuity of thought was sometimes weakened by over-attention to detail. There was a brilliant performance of the Wagnerian excerpts, and Mr. Gericke prepared and gained his climaxes in masterly fashion.

And what will the future generations say concerning Richard Strauss's "Don Juan?" Is it the barren result of one-sided study of orchestration? Is it an attempt of a man with a fine ear for orchestral color to go beyond his masters, Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner? Is he a composer who thinks orchestrally rather than musically? A composer who prefers to put anything or everything into a musical frame except music itself? Or is he the inventor of a new art, the originator of a new scheme, in which literature and instruments are to be combined to move the hearer by other means than by music as it is now understood?

It is easy to ask these questions; it is not easy to answer them, when you remember how that which once was regarded as madness and ugliness in music is now accepted generally. Wagner's music last night had the simplicity of an old and respected composer with worked slippers and long pipe, after the "Don Juan" of the adventurous and neurotic Strauss.

⁂

The performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was often extremely impressive, both in brilliance, beauty in phrasing, strength in contrasts, tonal color, and individual display. On the other hand, there were one or two disturbing slips, and the attack of the wood-wind and brass was not always as precise as we expect under the stick held by Mr. Gericke.

⁂

There will be no concert Friday or Saturday. The program for Nov. 18-19 will be as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"	Cornelius
Concerto for 'Cello in A minor	Saint-Saëns
Mr. Schroeder.
Mozartiana	Tschaikowsky
(First time.)
Symphony in D minor	Volkmann

Philip Hale.

HERALD.

EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIV., NO. 129.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Rosenthal, the Pianist, Was Recalled Several Times.

Gigantic Exhibition of Technique—Artist's Success with Audience Was Overwhelming—Work of the Orchestra Throughout Was Above and Beyond Praise.

The programme for the fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening was:

Symphony No. 3, in F major............Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte, B flat minor......
X. Scharwenka
Tone Poem, "Don Juan"............R. Strauss
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"..............................Wagner

Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist.

The auditorium was packed, standing room and all, and it was evident that the interest of the huge assemblage centred in the pianist of whom so much had been said. That he realized all that was expected of him can scarcely be doubted; but the work in which he elected to show his skill was, in a large part, answerable for that.

With the exception of the scherzo there is little in it that is attractive. There is exacting finger work enough and to spare, but there is little else. The composition is empty, and for the most part made up of pretentious noise and blustering bravura, and it was difficult to feel any special interest in it.

It would be wholly unjust to attempt to form any judgment regarding the finer powers of the artist from his rendering of this work. One thing he made perfectly clear, however, and that is his possession of a fairly astounding technique. His virtuosity is bewildering in its amplitude, its tireless energy and its incomparable fluency. He has fingers of steel, and they do to perfection whatever he demands of them; at least, in music of the character of that he performed on this occasion.

Nothing could have been more wonderful than his playing of the brilliant coda of the scherzo, with its prolonged succession of bristling difficulties, which he gave at a pace and rendered with a clearness that was enough to take one's breath away; but this was all, except the almost stunning volume of tone he hammered from the piano.

Of cantabile playing, of delicacy, of the more peacefully emotional side of his art there was nothing, because the concerto gave him no opportunities for the display of these. Everything appealed to one's wonderment, little or nothing of importance to one's finer intelligence. It was gigantic as an exhibition of technique without soul, and that was all. Therefore is it more just to the artist and to his fame to await an opportunity more favorable to an exemplification of his skill in a larger and more aesthetic way than was afforded last evening. His success with his audience was overwhelming. The applause was thundering, and he was recalled excitedly some half-dozen times.

The work of the orchestra throughout the whole concert was above and beyond praise, its splendid virtuosity being shown with the most brilliant results in the Strauss tone poem. Mr. Gericke had set himself an arduous task in the trying programme he had selected, and acquitted himself of it with his best ability and with a spirit that dominated his orchestra unfailingly to the precision and finish that he always seeks so successfully.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Barber of Bagdad," Cornelius; concerto for 'cello in A minor, Saint-Saens; "Mozartiana," Tschaikowsky (first time); and symphony, D minor, Volkmann. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

Last week's rehearsal drew out the largest audience of the season, and the reception given Rosenthal on his entrance was very hearty. He was recalled six times at the close of his masterly performance of Scharwenka's concerto. In the audience were the Hon. Robert Treat Paine, Dr. W. S. Bigelow, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mr. Charles T. White, Mrs. D. Webster King, Miss King, Mrs. R. C. Heaton, Mrs. William Hooper, Miss Bush, Mr. John W. Saxe, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mr. Lyman B. Greenleaf, Mr. Richard H. Stearns, Jr., Mrs. Aaron H. Latham, the Rev. Reuen Thomas, Miss Snow, Prof. John Orth, Mr. H. G. Tucker and Mr. Ernest Perabo.

Rosenthal, who had another great reception last night at the Symphony concert, will be heard at his own recitals Nov. 16 and 23 at the Music Hall, under the management of Mr. Mudgett.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 30, 1898.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY.—THE HANDEL AND HAYDN, ETC.

Probably few people in the audience would deny that the chief matter of interest in the fourth Symphony concert was the re-entrance of the pianist Rosenthal, which was effected in Xaver Scharwenka's concerto in B-flat minor, written some twenty years ago and still commanding attention among modern works of its kind, even though the stir which its brilliancy, skill and effectiveness created at first has subsided into a quieter appreciation. There is some originality in the scheme, which contains no entire slow movement, and the disposition of the various parts shows consideration for all the elements of the orchestra, scarcely less than for the piano as the solo instrument. Probably there is no error in placing Mr. Rosenthal at the head of the list of piano virtuosi, even when all the wonderful qualities of Joseffy, D'Albert, Siloti, Paderewski and others are remembered and weighed. His technique seems actually marvellous at times because of its forcefulness, its clarity, its speed, its delicacy, its proportion, and its unerring exactitude. If we were to find a fault or flaw in it, this would be that in cantabile the touch, in spite of its pearly, lucent and equable tone, lacks something of the velvety, caressing sympathy which goes to the heart. It brings out rather a quality akin to the flute's cool voice than to any richer and warmer vocality. As art, the delivery of the concerto was entirely fine in its distinction of the values of the several themes and movements, its regard for the proper mutual relations of the piano and the band its intellectual shaping and its emphatic coloring. The broad bold cadenza came as a true tour de force and the plain melodies had simple, graceful ease. The performance created great enthusiasm and recalls were many.

The concert began with an expressive reading of Brahms's third symphony; the middle movements have so much tender sweetness and its finale so much sturdy animation, while the first seems to impress precise folk mainly by its queer little antagonism between a major and a minor key. And yet some of them do not think that there is anything but the wisdom of the spheres in Wagner when he does some similar thing—turns a theme upside down, or hind end to, or distorts it generally! Later there was played Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem, out of the vast and sonorous combinations of which Mr. Gericke let his men get all the volume and the vehemence they could desire and compass. Really if the music had been set down to represent an exciting day in the tropics, with an occasional typhoon and a nightfall upon exhaustion, composer and players could hardly have been more correspondent. The last number was that ever-familiar death-scene of Tristan and Isolde, which was well rendered, but did not persuade all the audience to stay and listen.

The next programme, which is set for a fortnight hence, is this: Cornelius, Barber of Bagdad overture; Saint-Saens, Concerto for violoncello in A minor, Op. 33, Mr. Schroeder; Tschaikowsky, Mozartiana, (first time); Volkman, Symphony in D minor.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV 6, 1898.

Rosenthal at the Symphony.

Although a considerable period has elapsed since the distinguished Roumanian pianist, Moriz Rosenthal, was last heard in Boston, it is pleasantly evident that his past successes here have not been forgotten, for Music hall has seldom held more people than on the occasion of the artist's reentrance at the fourth "Symphony." However high expectation may have risen regarding the ability of Rosenthal, it was certainly amply justified. The pianist has unquestionably gained in skill and power of expression since he last played here, and we are inclined to think in force also, though force was recognized as one of his marked characteristics during his earlier visit to America.

Scharwenka's great concerto for pianoforte, opus 32, gave Rosenthal his opportunity, and he established himself in the highest favor as an executant. It is not too much to say, indeed, that his interpretation surpassed in more respects than one the performance which was given by the noted composer himself during the Nikisch regime of 1891. If it must be conceded that, at rare moments, overmuch vigor was displayed, praise can scarcely go too far in commending the singular effectiveness of the performance as a whole. The second movement of the concerto—the scherzo—was given with a delicacy, sureness and wonderful skill in technique that won the heartiest applause that the gloved hands of a Symphony rehearsal audience could evoke. At the close of the concerto, Rosenthal was recalled not less than five times, Mr Gericke and the orchestra cordially joining in the plaudits. Theirs was no slight share in the success of the soloist, and well merits recognition. Never was artist accompanied by an orchestra gifted with keener appreciation for the varied beauties of the work in hand.

Brahms' third symphony in F major opened the program and found admirable interpretation from first to last. By way of successor to Scharwenka's concerto, Mr Gericke provided Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," which makes demands upon nearly every department of a grand orchestra—demands which were fully met by our players. As the closing number the prelude and Isolde's "love death," from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," were performed with as much care, skill and appreciation as if the selection came at the opening of the Symphony offering, instead of following three sufficiently exacting musical tasks.

Mr Gericke's orchestra will be absent from the city this week. On the occasion of their return, a fortnight hence, they will present Cornelius' "Barber of Bagdad," Tschaikowsky's "Mozartiana" (first time) and Volkmann's symphony in D minor. Mr Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist, and will perform, with orchestral cooperation, Saint-Saens' concerto for violoncello in D minor.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Pape
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 6, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening in Music Hall, was a notable one, inasmuch as it marked the reappearance of Moritz Rosenthal after an absence from this city of several years. The announcement of his appearance, together with an admirable orchestral programme, was the cause of one of the largest audiences ever assembled at a symphony concert. It is so many years since Mr. Rosenthal was last heard here that probably most of those who were present heard him for the first time.

The work selected for performance was Scharwenka's concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor, a work which was introduced here by Mme. Madeline Schiller some twenty years ago, and later performed by the composer himself at a symphony concert under Arthur Nikisch in 1891.

It is a work which exhibits a pianist on the technical side rather than the artistic, and is in fact a "show piece," lacking in most of the artistic excellences noticeable in such concerts as those of Brahms and Tschaikowsky. Mr. Rosenthal played the work superbly, the second and last movements showing him at his very best. He is no doubt able to accomplish anything in the way of technic, his mastery over difficulties and powers of endurance being wonderful and not easy to describe.

The concerto did not give him much opportunity to show his powers in the higher artistic sense—those will doubtless be shown in his recitals which he is soon to give here. Mr. Rosenthal created unbounded enthusiasm, and he was recalled again and again for his masterly work.

The orchestral numbers of the programme were Brahms's third symphony in F, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" and prelude, and Isolde's "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."

The work of the orchestra in these numbers, especially the symphony, was admirable in every way; in the accompaniment to the pianoforte concerto, however, there were times when less power would have seemed desirable.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

The recitals to be given at Music Hall by Rosenthal on Wednesday afternoons, Nov. 1 6and 23, are attracting widespread attention. The sale of seats for these events opens at Music Hall box office on Monday morning, and orders for seats will be filled as they are received.

THE SUN, SUNDAY

NOVEMBER 6, 1898.

TWO VIOLINISTS.

Titled Woman Player Popular in England and a German Praised Abroad.

Willy Burmester, one of the violinists to be heard here for the first time during the present season, is, like Emil Sauer, a native of Hamburg. He was born there thirty years ago, and began to study as a child with his father. When he was 12 years old he went to Berlin and became a pupil of Joachim. Under his instruction for four years Burmester lived and worked in Berlin. There he became acquainted with Hans von Bülow, who had always a great admiration for his talent. He astonished the young violinist one day by inviting him to play a duet with him. Soon that became a familiar compliment, and von Bülow devoted many hours to playing duets with the young man for whose talents he had so much admiration. Whether or not it was on von Bülow's advice has not been told, but after his Berlin studies and the promise of a career had made itself felt, Burmester retired for three years to Helsingfors, in Finland. There he remained and devoted from eight to ten hours of every day to practice. When he made his reappearance after this retirement his work of preparation showed itself in the technique he had acquired—"a technique," wrote one critic in Berlin, "with which even Sarasate cannot keep step." He has played in all of the German cities, and his position as a violinist is at the head of his associates. His is one of the big names that in Europe ranks with such as César Thompson and Ysaye.

Lady Hallé will be an interesting figure in the musical world next winter. She comes here under the shadow of a sorrow, as her son was killed on the mountains of Austria only a few weeks ago. He was an experienced mountain climber, and had made the same ascent five times before that which ended in his death. Lady Hallé is an Austrian herself, although her musical career is associated almost entirely with England. Her husband was Sir Charles Hallé, who was for many years the conductor of the Hallé concerts at Manchester. She had been married before her meeting with Charles Hallé. He was a pianist who had studied in France and was compelled to leave Paris during the revolution of 1848. His orchestra played regularly in London as well as in Manchester. Lady Hallé's father was the organist of the cathedral in the town of Brünn, which has produced so many musicians. She is now 58 years old. Her first studies were made with Jansa in Vienna, and her début was made there in 1846. Her first appearance was made in London when she was only 8 years old. Her name then was Wilhelmine Neruda. She travelled through the European countries, playing with particular success in Russia, and when she was 24 years old was heard at the Pasdeloup concerts and at the Conservatoire. In that year—1864—she met Ludwig Norman, a Swedish musician, and they were married soon after. In the spring of 1869 she made her reappearance in London, and since that time not a season has passed without Mme. Norman-Neruda as an active figure in its music. She became in that time a great favorite. She is known socially and is said to enjoy the acquaintance of the Princess of Wales, who has consented to take tea at her house on many occasions. Only ten years ago, after Sir Charles Hallé was knighted by the Queen, he married Mme. Norman-Neruda. New York has never before heard a musician with an English title, or indeed any titled singer outside of the music halls.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening of this week, when Wilhelm Gericke, its distinguished conductor, will renew his acquaintance with the New-York public, after an absence of ten years. Moris Rosenthal will be the solo performer on both occasions. Following are the programmes:

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture, "Euryanthe"..............................Weber
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, No. 1..........Chopin
Mr. Rosenthal.
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56..........Brahms
Symphony in C minor, No. 5......................Beethoven

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in C major, No. 2......................Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in B flat minor, Op. 32...................................Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Tone poem, "Don Juan"..................Richard Strauss
Prelude and Isolde's Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"...................................Wagner

Mr. Paur has found a backer for his orchestral undertaking—a shrewd guess would be the Knabe firm of pianoforte manufacturers—and a new manager—Victor Thrane; and an attempt will be made to carry out, at least in part, the programme laid down by Mr. Loewenstein. The Sunday popular concerts in Carnegie Hall will begin this evening. The programme is as follows:

Overture, "William Tell"..............................Rossini
Polonaise Brillante, op. 22 (for piano, with orchestra accompaniment)..............................Chopin
Eugenia Castellano.
(a) Hymn, "St. Cécilie"..............................Gounod
(b) Prelude to Part III of "The Cricket on the Hearth"..............................Goldmark
Mad scene, "Lucia"..............................Donizetti
Charlotte Maconda.
Capriccio Espagnol, op. 34..............Rimski-Korsakow
Overture, "Tannhäuser"..............................Wagner
(a) "Frühlingsnacht"..............................Liszt
(b) "Etude de Concert"..............................F. Martucci
Eugenia Castellano.
"Nymphes et Sylvains"..............................Bemberg
Charlotte Maconda.
(a) "Kol Nidrei"..............................Bruch
(b) "Elfentanz"..............................Popper
Leo Schulz.
Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2..............................Liszt

THE WORLD: SUNDAY

NOVEMBER 6, 1898.

The event of the week in musical affairs will be the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the first of its eighteenth New York season. The fact that they will reintroduce Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor to this city adds to the interest felt in these functions. Both of the concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall, and Mr. Mauritz Rosenthal will be the soloist. The programmes are as follows: Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 9—Weber's "Euryanthe" overture; Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in E minor No. 1; Brahms's variations on a theme by Josef Haydn (Chorale Sancti Antoni),, op. 56 A, and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor No. 5; and Thursday evening, Nov. 10—Schumann's Symphony in C major No. 2; Scharwenka's Concerto for pianoforte No. 1; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan," and the prelude, and "Liebestod," from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

NEW YORK TIMES,

NOVEMBER 6. 1

At the concerts in Carnegie Hall next Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will make his reappearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Rosenthal will be the soloist on both occasions. At the afternoon concert he will play the concerto for pianoforte in E minor, No. 1, Chopin, and the orchestral numbers will be the overture "Euryanthe," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms; and the Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows: Symphony in C major, No. 2, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor, No. 1, Scharwenka; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; prelude and Love's Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Pape
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 13, 1898.

The first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York this season were given in Carnegie Hall Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening of the past week. Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist in both concerts, playing the Chopin E minor concerto in the afternoon concert and the Scharwenka concerto in the evening concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIV., NO. 129.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Rosenthal, the Pianist, Was Recalled Several Times.

Gigantic Exhibition of Technique —Artist's Success with Audience Was Overwhelming—Work of the Orchestra Throughout Was Above and Beyond Praise.

The programme for the fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening was:

Symphony No. 3, in F major...........Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte, B flat minor......X. Scharwenka
Tone Poem, "Don Juan"............R. Strauss
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"...............................Wagner

Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist.

The auditorium was packed, standing room and all, and it was evident that the interest of the huge assemblage centred in the pianist of whom so much has been said. That he realized all that was expected of him can scarcely be conceded; but the work in which he elected to show his skill was, in a large part, answerable for that.

With the exception of the scherzo there is little in it that is attractive. There is exacting finger work enough and to spare, but there is little else. The composition is empty, and for the most part made up of pretentious noise and blustering bravura, and it was difficult to feel any special interest in it.

It would be wholly unjust to attempt to form any judgment regarding the finer powers of the artist from his rendering of this work. One thing he made perfectly clear, however, and that is his possession of a fairly astounding technique. His virtuosity is bewildering in its amplitude, its tireless energy and its incomparable fluency. He has fingers of steel, and they do to perfection whatever he demands of them; at least, in music of the character of that he performed on this occasion.

Nothing could have been more wonderful than his playing of the brilliant coda of the scherzo, w th its prolonged succession of bristling difficulties, which he gave at a pace and rendered with a clearness that was enough to take one's breath away; but this was all, except the almost stunning volume of tone he hammered from the piano.

Of cantabile playing, of delicacy, of the more peacefully emotional side of his art there was nothing, because the concerto gave him no opportunities for the display of these. Everything appealed to one's wonderment, little or nothing of importance to one's finer intelligence. It was gigantic as an exhibition of technique without soul, and that was all. Therefore is it more just to the artist and to his fame to await an opportunity more favorable to an exemplification of his skill in a larger and more aesthetic way than was afforded last evening. His success with his audience was overwhelming. The applause was thundering, and he was recalled excitedly some half-dozen times.

The work of the orchestra throughout the whole concert was above and beyond praise, its splendid virtuosity being shown with the most brilliant results in the Strauss tone poem. Mr. Gericke had set himself an arduous task in the trying programme he had selected, and acquitted himself of it with his best ability and with a spirit that dominated his orchestra unfailingly to the precision and finish that he always seeks so successfully.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Barber of Bagdad," Cornelius; concerto for 'cello in A minor, Saint-Saens; "Mozartiana," Tschaikowsky (first time); and symphony, D minor, Volkmann. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

Last week's rehearsal drew out the largest audience of the season, and the reception given Rosenthal on his entrance was very hearty. He was recalled six times at the close of his masterly performance of Scharwenka's concerto. In the audience were the Hon. Robert Treat Paine, Dr. W. S. Bigelow, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mr. Charles T. White, Mrs. D. Webster King, Miss King, Mrs. R. C. Heaton, Mrs. William Hooper, Miss Bush, Mr. John W. Saxe, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mr. Lyman B. Greenleaf, Mr. Richard H. Stearns, Jr., Mrs. Aaron H. Latham, the Rev. Reuen Thomas, Miss Snow, Prof. John Orth, Mr. H. G. Tucker and Mr. Ernest Perabo.

Rosenthal, who had another great reception last night at the Symphony concert, will be heard at his own recitals Nov. 16 and 23 at the Music Hall, under the management of Mr. Mudgett.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 30, 1898.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY.—THE HANDEL AND HAYDN, ETC.

Probably few people in the audience would deny that the chief matter of interest in the fourth Symphony concert was the re-entrance of the pianist Rosenthal, which was effected in Xaver Scharwenka's concerto in B-flat minor, written some twenty years ago and still commanding attention among modern works of its kind, even though the stir which its brilliancy, skill and effectiveness created at first has subsided into a quieter appreciation. There is some originality in the scheme, which contains no entire slow movement, and the disposition of the various parts shows consideration for all the elements of the orchestra, scarcely less than for the piano as the solo instrument. Probably there is no error in setting Mr. Rosenthal at the head of the list of piano virtuosi, even when all the wonderful qualities of Joseffy, D'Albert, Siloti, Paderewsky and others are remembered and weighed. His technique seems actually marvellous at times because of its forcefulness, its clarity, its speed, its delicacy, its proportion, and its unerring exactitude. If we were to find a fault or flaw in it, this would be that in cantabile the touch, in spite of its pearly, lucent and equable tone, lacks something of the velvety, caressing sympathy which goes to the heart. It brings out rather a quality akin to the flute's cool voice than to any richer and warmer vocality. As art, the delivery of the concerto was entirely fine in its distinction of the values of the several themes and movements, its regard for the proper mutual relations of the piano and the band, its intellectual shaping and its emphatic coloring. The broad bold cadenza came as a true tours de force and the plain melodies had simple, graceful ease. The performance created great enthusiasm and recalls were many.

The concert began with an expressive reading of Brahms's third symphony; the middle movements have so much tender sweetness and its finale so much sturdy animation, while the first seems to impress precise folk mainly by its queer little antagonism between a major and a minor key. And yet some of them do not think that there is anything but the wisdom of the spheres in Wagner when he does some similar thing—turns a theme upside down, or hind end to, or distorts it generally! Later there was played Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem, out of the vast and sensuous combinations of which Mr. Gericke let his men get all the volume and the vehemence they could desire and compass. Really if the music had been set down to represent an exciting day in the tropics, with an occasional typhoon and a nightfall upon exhaustion, composer and players could hardly have been more correspondent. The last number was that ever-familiar death-scene of Tristan and Isolde, which was well rendered, but did not persuade all the audience to stay and listen.

The next programme, which is set for a fortnight hence, is this: Cornelius, Barber of Bagdad overture; Saint-Saens, Concerto for violoncello in A minor, Op. 33, Mr. Schroeder; Tschaikowsky, Mozartiana, (first time); Volkman, Symphony in D minor.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV 6, 1898.

Rosenthal at the Symphony.

Although a considerable period has elapsed since the distinguished Roumanian pianist, Moriz Rosenthal, was last heard in Boston, it is pleasantly evident that his past successes here have not been forgotten, for Music hall has seldom held more people than on the occasion of the artist's reentrance at the fourth "Symphony." However high expectation may have risen regarding the ability of Rosenthal, it was certainly amply justified. The pianist has unquestionably gained in skill and power of expression since he last played here, and we are inclined to think in force also, though force was recognized as one of his marked characteristics during his earlier visit to America.

Scharwenka's great concerto for pianoforte, opus 32, gave Rosenthal his opportunity, and he established himself in the highest favor as an executant. It is not too much to say, indeed, that his interpretation surpassed in more respects than one the performance which was given by the noted composer himself during the Nikisch regime of 1891. If it must be conceded that, at rare moments, overmuch vigor was displayed, praise can scarcely go too far in commending the singular effectiveness of the performance as a whole. The second movement of the concerto—the scherzo—was given with a delicacy, sureness and wonderful skill in technique that won the heartiest applause that the gloved hands of a Symphony rehearsal audience could evoke. At the close of the concerto, Rosenthal was recalled not less than five times, Mr Gericke and the orchestra cordially joining in the plaudits. Theirs was no slight share in the success of the soloist, and well merits recognition. Never was artist accompanied by an orchestra gifted with keener appreciation for the varied beauties of the work in hand.

Brahms' third symphony in F major opened the program and found admirable interpretation from first to last. By way of successor to Scharwenka's concerto, Mr Gericke provided Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," which makes demands upon nearly every department of a grand orchestra—demands which were fully met by our players. As the closing number the prelude and Isolde's "love death," from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," were performed with as much care, skill and appreciation as if the selection came at the opening of the Symphony offering, instead of following three sufficiently exacting musical tasks.

Mr Gericke's orchestra will be absent from the city this week. On the occasion of their return, a fortnight hence, they will present Cornelius' "Barber of Bagdad," Tschaikowsky's "Mozartiana" (first time) and Volkmann's symphony in D minor. Mr Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist, and will perform, with orchestral cooperation, Saint-Saens' concerto for violoncello in D minor.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 6, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening in Music Hall, was a notable one, inasmuch as it marked the reappearance of Moritz Rosenthal after an absence from this city of several years. The announcement of his appearance, together with an admirable orchestral programme, was the cause of one of the largest audiences ever assembled at a symphony concert. It is so many years since Mr. Rosenthal was last heard here that probably most of those who were present heard him for the first time.

The work selected for performance was Scharwenka's concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor, a work which was introduced here by Mme. Madeline Schiller some twenty years ago, and later performed by the composer himself at a symphony concert under Arthur Nikisch in 1891.

It is a work which exhibits a pianist on the technical side rather than the artistic, and is in fact a "show piece," lacking in most of the artistic excellences noticeable in such concerts as those of Brahms and Tschaikowsky. Mr. Rosenthal played the work superbly, the second and last movements showing him at his very best. He is no doubt able to accomplish anything in the way of technic, his mastery over difficulties and powers of endurance being wonderful and not easy to describe.

The concerto did not give him much opportunity to show his powers in the higher artistic sense—those will doubtless be shown in his recitals which he is soon to give here. Mr. Rosenthal created unbounded enthusiasm, and he was recalled again and again for his masterly work.

The orchestral numbers of the programme were Brahms's third symphony in F, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" and prelude, and Isolde's "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."

The work of the orchestra in these numbers, especially the symphony, was admirable in every way; in the accompaniment to the pianoforte concerto, however, there were times when less power would have seemed desirable.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

The recitals to be given at Music Hall by Rosenthal on Wednesday afternoons, Nov. 1 6and 23, are attracting widespread attention. The sale of seats for these events opens at Music Hall box office on Monday morning, and orders for seats will be filled as they are received.

THE SUN, SUNDAY
NOVEMBER 6, 1898.,

TWO VIOLINISTS.

Titled Woman Player Popular in England and a German Praised Abroad.

Willy Burmester, one of the violinists to be heard here for the first time during the present season, is, like Emil Sauer, a native of Hamburg. He was born there thirty years ago, and began to study as a child with his father. When he was 12 years old he went to Berlin and became a pupil of Joachim. Under his instruction for four years Burmester lived and worked in Berlin. There he became acquainted with Hans von Bülow, who had always a great admiration for his talent. He astonished the young violinist one day by inviting him to play a duet with him. Soon that became a familiar compliment, and von Bülow devoted many hours to playing duets with the young man for whose talents he had so much admiration. Whether or not it was on von Bülow's advice has not been told, but after his Berlin studies and the promise of a career had made itself felt, Burmester retired for three years to Helsingfors, in Finland. There he remained and devoted from eight to ten hours of every day to practice. When he made his reappearance after this retirement his work of preparation showed itself in the technique he had acquired—"a technique," wrote one critic in Berlin, "with which even Sarasate cannot keep step." He has played in all of the German cities, and his position as a violinist is at the head of his associates. His is one of the big names that in Europe ranks with such as César Thompson and Ysaye.

Lady Hallé will be an interesting figure in the musical world next winter. She comes here under the shadow of a sorrow, as her son was killed on the mountains of Austria only a few weeks ago. He was an experienced mountain climber, and had made the same ascent five times before that which ended in his death. Lady Hallé is an Austrian herself, although her musical career is associated almost entirely with England. Her husband was Sir Charles Hallé, who was for many years the conductor of the Hallé concerts at Manchester. She had been married before her meeting with Charles Hallé. He was a pianist who had studied in France and was compelled to leave Paris during the revolution of 1848. His orchestra played regularly in London as well as in Manchester. Lady Hallé's father was the organist of the cathedral in the town of Brünn, which has produced so many musicians. She is now 58 years old. Her first studies were made with Jansa in Vienna, and her début was made there in 1846. Her first appearance was made in London when she was only 8 years old. Her name then was Wilhelmine Neruda. She travelled through the European countries, playing with particular success in Russia, and when she was 24 years old was heard at the Pasdeloup concerts and at the Conservatoire. In that year—1864—she met Ludwig Norman, a Swedish musician, and they were married soon after. In the spring of 1869 she made her reappearance in London, and since that time not a season has passed without Mme. Norman-Neruda as an active figure in its music. She became in that time a great favorite. She is known socially and is said to enjoy the acquaintance of the Princess of Wales, who has consented to take tea at her house on many occasions. Only ten years ago, after Sir Charles Hallé was knighted by the Queen, he married Mme. Norman-Neruda. New York has never before heard a musician with an English title, or indeed any titled singer outside of the music halls.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening of this week, when Wilhelm Gericke, its distinguished conductor, will renew his acquaintance with the New-York public, after an absence of ten years. Moriz Rosenthal will be the solo performer on both occasions. Following are the programmes:

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture, "Euryanthe"..............................Weber
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, No. 1..........Chopin
Mr. Rosenthal.
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56.........Brahms
Symphony in C minor, No. 5....................Beethoven

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in C major, No. 2....................Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in B flat minor, Op. 32...............................Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Tone poem, "Don Juan"..................Richard Strauss
Prelude and Isolde's Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"..............................Wagner

Mr. Paur has found a backer for his orchestral undertaking—a shrewd guess would be the Knabe firm of pianoforte manufacturers—and a new manager—Victor Thrane; and an attempt will be made to carry out, at least in part, the programme laid down by Mr. Loewenstein. The Sunday popular concerts in Carnegie Hall will begin this evening. The programme is as follows:

Overture, "William Tell"..........................Rossini
Polonaise Brillante, op. 22 (for piano, with orchestra accompaniment)..........................Chopin
Eugenia Castellano.
(a) Hymn, "St. Cécilie"..........................Gounod
(b) Prelude to Part III of "The Cricket on the Hearth"..............................Goldmark
Mad scene, "Lucia"..........................Donizetti
Charlotte Maconda.
Capriccio Espagnol, op. 34...............Rimski-Korsakow
Overture, "Tannhäuser"............................Wagner
(a) "Frühlingsnacht"..............................Liszt
(b) "Etude de Concert"........................F. Martucci
Eugenia Castellano.
"Nymphes et Sylvains"..........................Bemberg
Charlotte Maconda.
(a) "Kol Nidrei"...............................Bruch
(b) "Elfentanz"................................Popper
Leo Schulz.
Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2..........................Liszt

THE WORLD: SUNDAY
NOVEMBER 6, 1898.

The event of the week in musical affairs will be the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the first of its eighteenth New York season. The fact that they will reintroduce Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor to this city adds to the interest felt in these functions. Both of the concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall, and Mr. Mauritz Rosenthal will be the soloist. The programmes are as follows: Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 9—Weber's "Euryanthe" overture; Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in E minor No. 1; Brahms's variations on a theme by Josef Haydn (Chorale Sancti Antoni),, op. 56 A, and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor No. 5; and Thursday evening, Nov. 10—Schumann's Symphony in C major No. 2; Scherwenka's Concerto for pianoforte No. 1; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan," and the prelude, and "Liebestod," from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

* * *

NEW YORK TIMES,
NOVEMBER 6. 1

At the concerts in Carnegie Hall next Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will make his reappearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Rosenthal will be the soloist on both occasions. At the afternoon concert he will play the concerto for pianoforte in E minor, No. 1, Chopin, and the orchestral numbers will be the overture "Euryanthe," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms; and the Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows: Symphony in C major, No. 2, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor, No. 1, Scharwenka; tone poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; prelude and Love's Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 13, 1898.

The first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York this season were given in Carnegie Hall Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening of the past week. Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist in both concerts, playing the Chopin E minor concerto in the afternoon concert and the Scharwenka concerto in the evening concert.

PASTE OVER

THE BALTIMORE NEWS

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 2, 1898.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sale of Single Seats to Open Tomorrow—Mme. Gadski the Soloist.

The sale of single seats for the first concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night will open tomorrow. The programme has aroused much interest, and the first concert will be additionally attractive from the fact that it will be the first appearance in this city of the new conductor, Mr. William Gericke, since his re-engagement with the orchestra and from the fact also that Mme. Gadski will be the soloist. It is hoped, for the musical reputation of the city, that these concerts will be better patronized than they were last winter. A gentleman interested in the matter said today:

"The sale for season tickets opened a week or more ago, and up to the present time the sale does not amount to half the expense. It seems to me that the newspapers of this city, and The News in particular, should take up this matter, with a view to educating the people to the opportunity they have for enjoying the very best music by attending the concerts of this orchestra. I think you will agree with me that it is not alone from this standpoint that the matter should be viewed, but of Baltimore appreciating so lightly the opportunities it has in the line of listening to good music.

"Now, for instance, in Boston, the home of this orchestra, at the time the sale opened for this season a large number of the choicest orchestra seats sold for a premium of several hundreds of dollars; in Philadelphia the whole auditorium was sold out shortly after the box office opened, and so it goes, but in Baltimore, I am sorry to relate, the interest does not appear to be as great in this particular organization as it was two or three years ago, and it cannot be charged that this condition of affairs comes about because Baltimore has not been treated as well as other cities. If the concerts this year are not a financial success it will mean that the Boston Symphony will simply omit Baltimore in future and employ the evening now devoted to this city in Washington, Philadelphia, New York or Boston, where their efforts will be appreciated in a more tangible form."

A MUSICAL PRIVILEGE.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced, last spring, that it would give no concerts in Baltimore this season, there was a general feeling of keen regret, on the part not only of special lovers of music but of all who are interested in the possession by Baltimore of public opportunities which are prized by other cities, and which in a great measure constitute their attractiveness as places of residence. Some time afterward, it was announced that the Orchestra Company had reconsidered its determination, and would give its usual series of concerts this winter. This result was brought about by the earnest and energetic efforts of several gentlemen in this city who are lovers of music and who are also public-spirited citizens; and it is not too much to say that in inducing the Boston Orchestra to come here again they did the community a very important service.

But this will be of little avail if the people of the city do not respond liberally, and avail themselves in abundant measure of the opportunity offered to them of hearing music of the highest order presented by a company unsurpassed in the world, and unapproached in excellence in this country. The number of concerts is only five, and the price is moderate; so that a very large part of the house ought to be taken up in the sale of season tickets. In Boston, where the number of concerts given is far greater, all the seats are eagerly taken up long before the time for the concerts, and the choicest seats are always sold (at auction) at very large premiums; and in other cities the whole house is taken very soon after the sale of tickets opens. If Baltimore shows itself indifferent, the company cannot be expected to continue its visits here, in spite of the hearty appreciation with which it has always ne[illegible] more's music-lovers.

Those who appreciate the value of such a musical opportunity as is furnished by the Boston Symphony Concerts should hasten to buy their tickets, and thus help to settle the question of the retention by Baltimore of this privilege. The first concert of the series is to be given next Tuesday, and the programme is most attractive. Moreover, this performance will mark the return of Mr. William Gericke as director, and his reappearance should be welcomed with enthusiasm, in memory of the delightful concerts which he presented in our city in the early seasons of the Boston Orchestra. There ought to be a rush for seats, both season tickets and single tickets, in the next two or three days, and the gentlemen who worked in so creditable a way for the retention of this musical opportunity by Baltimore should be made to feel that their work was not fruitless.

"This Country with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."

Nov 10

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

TO BUILD.

New Music Hall Subscribers Asked

For Full Payment at Once.

The committee having in charge the securing of subscriptions for the building of a new Music Hall on the property purchased corner of Massachusetts ave. and Huntington ave. has called for the full payment of subscriptions.

Total subscriptions for a new Music Hall in 1893 amounted to $402,500 from 406 subscribers. 364 subscribers have already paid in $208,750.

As the old Music Hall corporation has recently sold its property to the Boston Real Estate Trust the directors of the new Boston Music Hall have decided that a new hall should be built as soon as possible.

The committee, Messrs. E. W. Hooper, H. F. Sears and H. L. Higginson, ask that subscribers to the $500,000 capital stock make full payment in order that new stock may be issued therefor before the building contracts are to be signed.

As there still remains $98,500 stock of the $500,000 capital unsubscribed for, the committee is desirous of securing new subscriptions.

The Boston Traveler

Nov 7

Seventy-sixth Year—Vol. LIV. No. 186.

THE SYMPHONY

Rosenthal Gives a Fine Exhibition of Virtuosity as the Soloist of the Occasion.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fourth concert. Moritz Rosenthal, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90..... Johannes Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, B-flat minor, Op. 32..............Xaver Scharwenka
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20.Richard Strauss
Prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde" ....Richard Wagner

Of course the reappearance in Boston of Rosenthal after ten years' absence was the thing that filled the public mind. In person, the great pianist has changed somewhat. He is heavier of figure, and there is altogether less romantic charm about his face for those who are affected by that sort of qualification. As a player, however—and it is extremely difficult to bear a man in the consciousness for a decade and compare the past with the present with any real accuracy—as a technicist, as a force at the piano, he seems to have grown very appreciably. He was surprising before; now he compels you to believe that there is nothing too complex, too difficult for him to overcome with the utmost surety. He is one of those pianists in whom you have such perfect faith that you fail to marvel at his work as much as it, perhaps, deserves.

But—and it is a pity that there should be a "but" in such a case as this—the Scharwenka concerto which Mr. Rosenthal played was not at all adapted to bring out the player's best. It never reaches greatness anywhere; it displays not much of the beauty of the piano's tone; it does not even offer any extraordinary difficulties for virtuosity to overcome. Such as it was, it was played in masterly fashion, but we must wait for the recitals, that are to come later, to guage the full depth of Rosenthal's power, his virtuosity and his musicianship. He was recalled with great enthusiasm time after time.

Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" certainly grows better-looking with more acquaintance. When we were introduced to him some years ago by Mr. Nikisch, I thought him a wild-eyed lunatic who raved incoherently of love and his own importance therein. But now he really appears to be a fellow of considerable charm. Perhaps it is because we have since met the same composer's hideously bellowing "Zarathustra." At any rate, to drop figures of speech, the orchestration of "Don Juan" is so virile and rich, and the working out of that one great theme for the brasses so skilful that the whole thing is dazzling. The performance was magnificent, and effectively disposed of the old-time suspicion that Mr. Gericke lacked emotional force. Splendidly vivid, too, was the playing of the "Tristan" selections. And, on the other hand, the Brahms symphony was given with the reverent classicism that befitted it.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90.
Xaver Scharwenka: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, opus 32.
Richard Strauss: Tone-Poem, "Don Juan," opus 20.
Wagner: Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."

Mr. Rosenthal was the pianist.

The performance of the Brahms symphony was simply superb at every point. The nicest, the most minute attention to matters of detail, the most perfect technical execution, served only to throw into due relief the larger constructive outlines and the higher psychical gist of the work—which latter may be succinctly described as great intensity of feeling, coupled with a noble reserve in expression. It would take too long to note all the fine points made in this wonderful performance; let us only mention the admirable way in which the counter-theme in the first movement was always distinctly brought out, and always with just the right expression, according to the momentary changes of character this protean theme undergoes—owing to shifting position in the scale, or subtle changes in harmonization—in the course of its long conflict with the first theme of the movement. Let us note also the beautifully apposite tempo Mr. Gericke took in the third movement, Poco Allegretto; the wondrously beautiful phrasing of the first wood-wind players, and their fine security, in that dangerous sudden outburst into F major in the coda of the finale, as well as the clearness with which that "ghost of the first theme" was made manifest to the ear, just before the close. And how all this completeness of conception and perfection of execution brought out the intrinsic greatness and beauty of the work! Never has Brahms seemed more surely great, more profoundly human in his inspiration. One felt that the symphony had immortality in it.

From Brahms to Richard Strauss is a long leap; and none the less so for Scharwenka's coming between them; for the Scharwenka concerto was no bridge, leading from the symphony over to the "Don Juan," but rather an episodic excursion on a side-track. As for ourselves, we must still be content to look upon this "Don Juan" as a puzzling work; save for the vivid picturesqueness of suggestion of "cold and dark on the hearth" in the last few measures—a passage of genuinely tragic power—we can find little in the music to suggest Lenau's poem, on which it is based, nor vice versa. We can find nothing expressive, or even suggestive of the Don Juan idea. Lenau seems to have conceived his hero somewhat on the lines of the late John S. Dwight's summing up of the character, in his analysis of Mozart's very different "Don Giovanni." Dwight says:

"Don Juan is one of the permanent traditional types of character; and Mozart's music, sympathetically, instinctively, rather than with any conscious philosophical purpose, brings out the essence of it. The gay, gallant, magnetic disturber of every woman's peace that comes within his sphere, is not intended for that vulgar sensualist, that swaggering street-rake, that caricatures the part in most performances we have seen. The true conception of Mozart's Don Juan is that of a gentleman, to say the least, and more than that, a man of genius; a being naturally full of glorious passion, large sympathies, and irrepressible energies; noble in mind, in person and in fortune; a large, imposing, generous, fascinating creature. Dramatically he is made a little more than human, yet in a purely human direction. He is such as we all are, 'only more so,' to borrow an expressive vulgarism. Remarkably is he such as Mozart himself was. He is a sort of ideal impersonation of two qualities, or springs of character, raised as it were to the highest power, projected into supernatural dimensions—which is only the poet's and musician's way of truly recognizing the element of infinity in every passion of the human soul, since not one ever finds its perfect satisfaction. Mozart in his own life knew them too well, these two springs or sources of excitement!"

Lenau, to be sure, does not get as high up as this; but one feels that something of the sort hovered vaguely before his mind. Yet we can find no reflection of anything of the kind in Strauss's music; perhaps because we as yet fail utterly to grasp the music itself, as such. Richard Strauss is still largely a mystery to us; the only distinct impression we have ever got from any of his tone poems is that of a strong, individual and commanding personality. Outrageous though he be, we have always felt that there was something in him that made pooh-poohing out of place. But somehow we felt this less last Saturday evening in listening to his "Don Juan" than ever before. The performance was technically admirable; of its higher qualities we are too much out of touch with the music to be able to judge.

The performance of the Wagner selections was exhaustive, overwhelmingly complete and fine.

Scharwenka's B-flat minor concerto has gone the way of all flesh! We well remember the stir it made in the musical world when it first came out; there was rather a dearth of fine modern concertos at the time, and this one was hailed with joy, as a work that was at once "modern" and especially musical; one that was, at any rate, something better than mere "pianist's" or Kapellmeister music. But times have changed, and it now seems very "kapellmeisterhaft" indeed. Why a pianist like Mr. Rosenthal should have thought it worth while to pick it up, where he found it stranded on the shores of time, and try to breathe new life into it is not easy to fancy. It was never a very solid work, and now there is not even effectiveness in it. Mr. Rosenthal's playing was a thing of wonder; such technique as his hides itself, and you hardly notice its perfection, its well-nigh limitless scope. His tone, phrasing, brilliance, [illegible] strength, that of the gentle giant. Of his deeper quality of feeling, and his higher, of imagination, one could hardly judge; there was nothing in the concerto to call these forth; in playing such a thing even the greatest artist can shine only by the negative virtue of impeccability—and Mr. Rosenthal showed himself as distinctly impeccable. He was enthusiastically recalled, as well he deserved to be, several times after the playing was over. But we await his recitals to judge of his present status as an artist.

The next programme, to be given on Friday afternoon, Nov. 18, and Saturday evening, Nov. 19,—there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week—is: Peter Cornelius, overture to "Der Barbier von Bagdad"; Saint-Saëns, concerto for violoncello, in A minor, opus 33; Tchaikovsky, "Mozartiana" (first time); Volkmann, symphony No. 1, in D minor, opus 44. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the solo 'cellist.

[46]

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

New York, November 12, 1898.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

BOSTON, MASS., Nov. 7, 1898.

Rosenthal was the attraction at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday evening, Music Hall being crowded to the doors by an audience that was immensely enthusiastic over the Titanic performance of this wonderful player. Rosenthal selected Scharwenka's B flat minor concerto, a work of musical merit, if not strikingly original or particularly adapted to exhibit the powers of the player in a variety of artistic lights. To be sure there is a brilliancy and grace to the scherzo that received an exquisite interpretation, but otherwise than that the composition calls principally for bravura work, and Rosenthal accomplished the task in a stupendous manner. He was recalled several times.

The programme selected by Rosenthal for his coming recital here will serve better in a display of the artistic elements, as well as those of virtuosity, as it embraces Sonata, Op. 109, Beethoven; Schumann's Carnival; four pieces by Chopin, including the player's study on the D flat waltz; pieces by other composers, and as a finale his "Carneval de Vienne," a combination that will offer his marvelous ability the widest scope, and thereby enable the critical listener to better judge of his standing as an interpreter in its highest artistic sense.

The orchestra, under Gericke's firm hand, accompanied Rosenthal in a faultless manner. The orchestral numbers of the programme were Symphony No. 3, Brahms; "Don Juan," tone-poem by Richard Strauss; and Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner. Gericke was at his best, and the playing of the orchestra was superb, other than that the wood-wind is not yet sufficiently subdued in the softer passages, and that the principal flute and clarinet could improve both their tone and intonation to advantage.

Mr. Emil Sauer will make his first appearances in Boston on January 13 and 14, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will probably give a recital on Friday afternoon of the following week. Sauer's reputation having preceded his advent, one is obliged to regard him as a natural rival of Rosenthal, and so the town is agog over his anticipated appearance.

It is seldom that two such world-famed artists are heard in approximate conjunction. It will be interesting to observe the opinions that will be evoked in a comparison of the relative merits of these great players.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Carnegie Hall was filled very comfortably last Wednesday afternoon, when the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its New York season. The interest of the public naturally centered in the new-old conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, who had been chosen by Colonel Higginson to succeed Emil Paur. As Mr. Gericke has once before been the conductor of this orchestra, he is now one of his own successors.

It is furthermore a strange coincidence that both Nikisch and Paur, the younger men, years ago in Vienna used to play under the baton of Mr. Gericke, their predecessor and successor in Boston.

During the concert it became evident that Mr. Gericke has not changed the least little bit since he left us some nine or ten years ago. Even in appearance he has hadly grown older. He is the same reliable, solid conductor, whose highest aim seems to be a smooth, delicate and polished performance. To be sure it was Gericke who in former years gave the orchestra that wonderful training which made its execution the joy of every musician and layman. To a great extent Gericke is responsible for the eminent artistic standard this orchestra of master players achieved. And it seems that he is willing and able to hold up this standard in the future as far as mechanical perfection of execution goes.

But do not people expect something more? Gericke has remained the same man while the taste of our public has changed considerably. Men like Nikisch and Seidl, for instance, have given us a different idea about the conductor's power; they have taught us to look for individuality in conception and for emotionality in execution. And as far as the New York public in particular is concerned, it has fairly outgrown the conventionalism of a Theodore Thomas. It is, therefore, eminently doubtful whether it will be delighted over the conventionalism of Gericke.

To be sure, the programme of last Wednesday's concert did not call for much individuality on the part of the conductor. However, there was noticeable a certain reserve in expression, a lack of temperament in the performance which cannot be said to be in accord with, for instance, the spirit of the last movement of Beethoven's C minor symphony. Subdued vigor is all well enough where it belongs, but it cannot be accepted in places where the composer himself has given way to his full passion. Reserve may be taken as an indication of an aristocratic mind, but it is certainly not artistic to employ it constantly and everywhere.

However, as said before, the programme did not offer much occasion for the display of temperament and originality, and as Mr. Gericke's reading of the "Euryanthe" overture really showed more vigor and energy than the other numbers, one may hope that in works of the romantic and modern school he will drop his aristocratic reserve. Though he should have dropped it before the thoroughly democratic Beethoven too.

The reading of the Fifth Symphony, while excellent in detail, lacked grandeur. The Brahms' variations on that quaint old theme by Haydn—with the odd symmetry of five-bar periods—were neatly played. Here subdued emotion really was called for, because the composer never was very emotional himself.

Much curiosity was felt as to the new wood-wind players who had been chosen to replace the unfortunate Porteau, Jacquet and Weiss that were drowned with the Bourgogne. It seemed that the selection has been a good one in every case, the oboe player especially doing some delightful work in the symphony. The clarionet player also, if perhaps, not quite ranking with the late Porteau, is certainly a competent artist, and the flute player is likewise very satisfactory, except that one missed again the far preferable tone of a wooden instrument. Those silver flutes are altogether too brilliant.

It was a delight to listen once more to the marvelous tone quality of this standard orchestra of the world, all the more so as Carnegie Hall possesses better acoustics than the Metropolitan Opera House, where the orchestra had been playing during the last four seasons.

The soloist was Moriz Rosenthal, who created a sensation by his wonderful rendition of Chopin's E minor concerto. Everybody knows that he plays this work divinely, but on Wednesday he surpassed himself. He simply entranced the audience by the sublime tenderness with which he rendered the beautiful romanza, and the grace and brilliancy with which he treated the last movement was bewildering. He certainly could not have played like that if he were not deeply in love with the great Polish composer. Oh, yes, Rosenthal is not only a technician and an intellectual interpreter of piano music; he is a great musician indeed, with a heart full of feeling. Before such performance criticism seems impertinent. After he had finished the applause became tumultuous, and he was recalled again and again. Though he would not yield to an encore, and, to quiet the audience, the piano had to be removed. The orchestral accompaniment was not all that could be desired. AUGUST SPANUTH.

* * *

MUSICAL PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 3, 1898.

The musical season in this city may be said to have been fairly and formally inaugurated with the initial concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series at Infantry Hall last evening. The audience was large for the opening concert, and for a Providence auditory, proverbially chary of applause and enthusiasm, its greeting to Conductor Gericke and his men was of unusual fervency.

The chief interest centered in Mr. Gericke himself, and the unanimous verdict was that time has in no way impaired his marvelous skill as an orchestral director. The methods employed with such distinguished success when at the head of this same organization in the eighties were again in reassuring evidence. The programme was a well-balanced one and of a nature to please a diversity of tastes. The soloist, Mme. Gadski, was a distinct success in her several numbers, and was recalled several times.

Eight concerts will be given by the Boston organization here this season, the next one to be on Wednesday, November 30.

MUSICAL PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 7, 1898.

The only music in the city about which I can write you this time is the concert given last Monday evening in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, and Moriz Rosenthal, pianist. The latter displayed his stupendous technique in Scharwenka's Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor op. 32. It proved to be a splendid vehicle for an illustration of what Rosenthal can do with his five hundred fingers, and he led us all into wonderland. But I would much rather hear the artist in something else, and have at least the "scherzo" of this composition relegated to an "entr'acte" in some (underserving) comic opera.

The orchestra was sublime. Gericke is the only rival of Thomas. His dignity of phrase and subtleness of climax approach perfection, and the band which he conducts will once again distribute its musical morceaux and its classics with the generous hand of great artistic and scholarly opulence.

MUSICAL BROOKLYN.

BROOKLYN, Nov. 8, 1898.

Rosenthal and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make this an eventful week in Brooklyn. We are to have two concerts, with Rosenthal the soloist for both—a matinee on Friday, November 11, and a concert Saturday night (November 12). There has been a great demand for tickets from students in the private and public high schools. The Brooklyn Institute, under whose auspices the concerts are given, has fixed a special price for students' tickets—$2 for five concerts. Your impractical philanthropists who advocate free music for the masses will hardly murmur at an arrangement through which young people will have an opportunity to hear Rosenthal and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 40 cents.

MUSICAL BALTIMORE.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 7, 1898.

To-morrow night the curtain goes up on what is the regular Baltimore musical year. It is the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. What has been given up to this time must be regarded as a "curtain-raiser."

The programme is a bit motley, but we will see whether Mr. Gericke has lost any of his old-time cunning. It is the fourteenth season of the Boston Orchestra in this city.

HERALD, BALTIMORE, OCTOBER 16, 1898.

choruses, united in support of the principal voice. The choruses continue divided into from 10 to 12 voice parts, while the words already given are antiphoned from one body of singers to the other in a way that makes the ancient church modes seem light and easy.

Most of the work is in 12-8 time, and with the violins and double bassos giving a full bow to each note, and each wood and brass instrument doing its level best, the multitudinous effect of this great operatic work can be better imagined than described. If Moscogni had written nothing but this choral number and his beautiful intermezzo for orchestra, his name would have been immortal.

Church Music Society.

Steps have been taken by a number of Baltimore musicians to organize a federation of church choirs, such as made the festivals of the northern cities, particularly that of Worcester, Mass., possible.

The Church Music Society of Baltimore has already been incorporated, and with Mr. W. H. Thomas as president and Herr Joseph Pache as director, it undoubtedly will meet with success.

The society has set itself the task of bringing out of oblivion a wonderful treasury of religious music by reproducing it for the public. The church choirs of our city will heartily indorse this undertaking and cherish a branch of musical art which is an eternally important factor in local musical development.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Much interest is being manifested in the announcement of the list of soloists for the concerts to be given in Baltimore this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is gratifying to learn that this city is to be favored in the continuance of these concerts at the Music Hall, and special arrangements have been made to insure the attendance of the Washington patrons.

Of the soloists who will be heard in Baltimore this season three will make their first appearance here. These are Lady Halle, better known as Norman Nernda; Emil Sauer and Willy Burmester. Lady Halle, the violinist, has never before visited America. She was born at Brunn on March 23, 1859. Her father was a church organist. Jansa was her master, and she made her first appearance in public with her sister Amalie, a pianist, in Vienna at the early age of 7 years. She played at a philharmonic concert in London when 10 years old, and first appeared in Paris in 1864. For a number of years she made London her home, playing at chamber and orchestral concerts. She married Sir Charles Halle in 1888, and he left her a widow three years ago.

EMIL SAUER,
The Eminent Pianist.

Herr Emil Sauer, pianist, also visits America for the first time. He was born October 8, 1862, at Hamburg. When Rubenstein heard him he recommended him to his brother Nikolaus, and he was also for a time with the great Liszt. He has played throughout Europe with great success. Willy Burmester, violinist, was also born at Hamburg in 1869. He studied four years with Joachim, and made his first appearance in Berlin in November, 1891.

In addition to these there will come the accomplished operatic artist Madame Godski and the world-renowned pianist Madame Teresa Carreno.

It is expected that the demand for choice seats will be unusually heavy, the hall being divided between Baltimore and Washington patrons, and it being understood that whether Baltimore is to continue among the cities of the organization's itinerary will be determined by the support accorded the concerts this year.

Germania Maennerchor.

Tomorrow evening the Germania Maennerchor will observe its 42d anniversary at the clubhouse on West Lombard street in an appropriate manner. The programme for the occasion, under the direction of Prof. Edward Boeckner, will be as follows: :

Overture. Orchestra.
"Venetian Night" (Rheinberger). Male chorus a capella.
Address of the president of the society, Mr. Jacob Klein.
Oration. Rev. J. Hofmann.
"Spring Greeting" (Meyer-Olbersleben). Female chorus a capella.
Scenes from "Tannheuser" (Wagner).

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening this season at Boston, was a decided success, according to the accounts published concerning it in the Boston papers. The most notable feature was the return of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor, after an absence of nine years. There is a slight change in the personnel of the orchestra, which is said to have improved it.

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its series of five concerts here this season at Music Hall tonight. Much interest is taken in this initial concert, as it will mark the return to the conductor's desk of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. The programme for this evening will open with Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring." The symphony will be Schumann's No. 2, one of the most popular works of this renowned composer.

With that deference to his audience which has always characterized Mr. Gericke, the soloist of the first Baltimore concert will be Madame Gadski, the German opera prima donna. Her numbers will be "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and "Elizabeth's Greeting," from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

MUSICAL AMERICA
Edited by John C. Freund
Published at 27 Union Square

New York, November 12, 1898.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

BOSTON, MASS., Nov. 7, 1898.

Rosenthal was the attraction at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday evening, Music Hall being crowded to the doors by an audience that was immensely enthusiastic over the Titanic performance of this wonderful player. Rosenthal selected Scharwenka's B flat minor concerto, a work of musical merit, if not strikingly original or particularly adapted to exhibit the powers of the player in a variety of artistic lights. To be sure there is a brilliancy and grace to the scherzo that received an exquisite interpretation, but otherwise than that the composition calls principally for bravura work, and Rosenthal accomplished the task in a stupendous manner. He was recalled several times.

The programme selected by Rosenthal for his coming recital here will serve better in a display of the artistic elements, as well as those of virtuosity, as it embraces Sonata, Op. 109, Beethoven; Schumann's Carnival; four pieces by Chopin, including the player's study on the D flat waltz; pieces by other composers, and as a finale his "Carneval de Vienne," a combination that will offer his marvelous ability the widest scope, and thereby enable the critical listener to better judge of his standing as an interpreter in its highest artistic sense.

The orchestra, under Gericke's firm hand, accompanied Rosenthal in a faultless manner. The orchestral numbers of the programme were Symphony No. 3, Brahms; "Don Juan," tone-poem by Richard Strauss; and Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner. Gericke was at his best, and the playing of the orchestra was superb, other than that the wood-wind is not yet sufficiently subdued in the softer passages, and that the principal flute and clarinet could improve both their tone and intonation to advantage.

Mr. Emil Sauer will make his first appearances in Boston on January 13 and 14, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will probably give a recital on Friday afternoon of the following week. Sauer's reputation having preceded his advent, one is obliged to regard him as a natural rival of Rosenthal, and so the town is agog over his anticipated appearance.

It is seldom that two such world-famed artists are heard in approximate conjunction. It will be interesting to observe the opinions that will be evoked in a comparison of the relative merits of these great players.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Carnegie Hall was filled very comfortably last Wednesday afternoon, when the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its New York season. The interest of the public naturally centered in the new-old conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, who had been chosen by Colonel Higginson to succeed Emil Paur. As Mr. Gericke has once before been the conductor of this orchestra, he is now one of his own successors.

It is furthermore a strange coincidence that both Nikisch and Paur, the younger men, years ago in Vienna used to play under the baton of Mr. Gericke, their predecessor and successor in Boston.

During the concert it became evident that Mr. Gericke has not changed the least little bit since he left us some nine or ten years ago. Even in appearance he has hadly grown older. He is the same reliable, solid conductor, whose highest aim seems to be a smooth, delicate and polished performance. To be sure it was Gericke who in former years gave the orchestra that wonderful training which made its execution the joy of every musician and layman. To a great extent Gericke is responsible for the eminent artistic standard this orchestra of master players achieved. And it seems that he is willing and able to hold up this standard in the future as far as mechanical perfection of execution goes.

But do not people expect something more? Gericke has remained the same man while the taste of our public has changed considerably. Men like Nikisch and Seidl, for instance, have given us a different idea about the conductor's power; they have taught us to look for individuality in conception and for emotionality in execution. And as far as the New York public in particular is concerned, it has fairly outgrown the conventionalism of a Theodore Thomas. It is, therefore, eminently doubtful whether it will be delighted over the conventionalism of Gericke.

To be sure, the programme of last Wednesday's concert did not call for much individuality on the part of the conductor. However, there was noticeable a certain reserve in expression, a lack of temperament in the performance which cannot be said to be in accord with, for instance, the spirit of the last movement of Beethoven's C minor symphony. Subdued vigor is all well enough where it belongs, but it cannot be accepted in places where the composer himself has given way to his full passion. Reserve may be taken as an indication of an aristocratic mind, but it is certainly not artistic to employ it constantly and everywhere.

However, as said before, the programme did not offer much occasion for the display of temperament and originality, and as Mr. Gericke's reading of the "Euryanthe" overture really showed more vigor and energy than the other numbers, one may hope that in works of the romantic and modern school he will drop his aristocratic reserve. Though he should have dropped it before the thoroughly democratic Beethoven too.

The reading of the Fifth Symphony, while excellent in detail, lacked grandeur. The Brahms' variations on that quaint old theme by Haydn—with the odd symmetry of five-bar periods—were neatly played. Here subdued emotion really was called for, because the composer never was very emotional himself.

Much curiosity was felt as to the new wood-wind players who had been chosen to replace the unfortunate Porteau, Jacquet and Weiss that were drowned with the Bourgogne. It seemed that the selection has been a good one in every case, the oboe player especially doing some delightful work in the symphony. The clarionet player also, if perhaps, not quite ranking with the late Porteau, is certainly a competent artist, and the flute player is likewise very satisfactory, except that one missed again the far preferable tone of a wooden instrument. Those silver flutes are altogether too brilliant.

It was a delight to listen once more to the marvelous tone quality of this standard orchestra of the world, all the more so as Carnegie Hall possesses better acoustics than the Metropolitan Opera House, where the orchestra had been playing during the last four seasons.

The soloist was Moriz Rosenthal, who created a sensation by his wonderful rendition of Chopin's E minor concerto. Everybody knows that he plays this work divinely, but on Wednesday he surpassed himself. He simply entranced the audience by the sublime tenderness with which he rendered the beautiful romanza, and the grace and brilliancy with which he treated the last movement was bewildering. He certainly could not have played like that if he were not deeply in love with the great Polish composer. Oh, yes, Rosenthal is not only a technician and an intellectual interpreter of piano music; he is a great musician indeed, with a heart full of feeling. Before such performance criticism seems impertinent. After he had finished the applause became tumultuous, and he was recalled again and again. Though he would not yield to an encore, and, to quiet the audience, the piano had to be removed. The orchestral accompaniment was not all that could be desired. AUGUST SPANUTH.

MUSICAL PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 3, 1898.

The musical season in this city may be said to have been fairly and formally inaugurated with the initial concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series at Infantry Hall last evening. The audience was large for the opening concert, and for a Providence auditory, proverbially chary of applause and enthusiasm, its greeting to Conductor Gericke and his men was of unusual fervency.

The chief interest centered in Mr. Gericke himself, and the unanimous verdict was that time has in no way impaired his marvelous skill as an orchestral director. The methods employed with such distinguished success when at the head of this same organization in the eighties were again in reassuring evidence. The programme was a well-balanced one and of a nature to please a diversity of tastes. The soloist, Mme. Gadski, was a distinct success in her several numbers, and was recalled several times.

Eight concerts will be given by the Boston organization here this season, the next one to be on Wednesday, November 30.

MUSICAL PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 7, 1898.

The only music in the city about which I can write you this time is the concert given last Monday evening in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, and Moriz Rosenthal, pianist. The latter displayed his stupendous technique in Scharwenka's Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor op. 32. It proved to be a splendid vehicle for an illustration of what Rosenthal can do with his five hundred fingers, and he led us all into wonderland. But I would much rather hear the artist in something else, and have at least the "scherzo" of this composition relegated to an "entr'acte" in some (underserving) comic opera.

The orchestra was sublime. Gericke is the only rival of Thomas. His dignity of phrase and subtleness of climax approach perfection, and the band which he conducts will once again distribute its musical morceaux and its classics with the generous hand of great artistic and scholarly opulence.

MUSICAL BROOKLYN.

BROOKLYN, Nov. 8, 1898.

Rosenthal and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make this an eventful week in Brooklyn. We are to have two concerts, with Rosenthal the soloist for both—a matinee on Friday, November 11, and a concert Saturday night (November 12). There has been a great demand for tickets from students in the private and public high schools. The Brooklyn Institute, under whose auspices the concerts are given, has fixed a special price for students' tickets—$2 for five concerts. Your impractical philanthropists who advocate free music for the masses will hardly murmur at an arrangement through which young people will have an opportunity to hear Rosenthal and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 40 cents.

MUSICAL BALTIMORE.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 7, 1898.

To-morrow night the curtain goes up on what is the regular Baltimore musical year. It is the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. What has been given up to this time must be regarded as a "curtain-raiser."

The programme is a bit motley, but we will see whether Mr. Gericke has lost any of his old-time cunning. It is the fourteenth season of the Boston Orchestra in this city.

HERALD, BALTIMORE, OCTOBER 16, 1898.

choruses, united in support of the principal voice. The choruses continue divided into from 10 to 12 voice parts, while the words already given are antiphoned from one body of singers to the other in a way that makes the ancient church modes seem light and easy.

Most of the work is in 12-8 time, and with the violins and double bassos giving a full bow to each note, and each wood and brass instrument doing its level best, the multitudinous effect of visited America. She was born at Brunn on March 23, 1859. Her father was a church organist. Jansa was her master, and she made her first appearance in public with her sister Amalie, a pianist, in Vienna at the early age of 7 years. She played at a philharmonic concert in London when 10 years old, and first appeared in Paris in 1864. For a number of years she made London her home, playing at chamber and orchestral concerts. She

EMIL SAUER,
The Eminent Pianist.

this great operatic work can be better imagined than described. If Moscogni had written nothing but this choral number and his beautiful intermezzo for orchestra, his name would have been immortal.

Church Music Society.

Steps have been taken by a number of Baltimore musicians to organize a federation of church choirs, such as made the festivals of the northern cities, particularly that of Worcester, Mass., possible.

The Church Music Society of Baltimore has already been incorporated, and with Mr. W. H. Thomas as president and Herr Joseph Pache as director, it undoubtedly will meet with success.

The society has set itself the task of bringing out of oblivion a wonderful treasury of religious music by reproducing it for the public. The church choirs of our city will heartily indorse this undertaking and cherish a branch of musical art which is an eternally important factor in local musical development.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Much interest is being manifested in the announcement of the list of soloists for the concerts to be given in Baltimore this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is gratifying to learn that this city is to be favored in the continuance of these concerts at the Music Hall, and special arrangements have been made to insure the attendance of the Washington patrons.

Of the soloists who will be heard in Baltimore this season three will make their first appearance here. These are Lady Halle, better known as Norman Nernda; Emil Sauer and Willy Burmester. Lady Halle, the violinist, has never before married Sir Charles Halle in 1888, and he left her a widow three years ago.

Herr Emil Sauer, pianist, also visits America for the first time. He was born October 8, 1862, at Hamburg. When Rubenstein heard him he recommended him to his brother Nikolaus, and he was also for a time with the great Liszt. He has played throughout Europe with great success. Willy Burmester, violinist, was also born at Hamburg in 1869. He studied four years with Joachim, and made his first appearance in Berlin in November, 1891.

In addition to these there will come the accomplished operatic artist Madame Godski and the world-renowned pianist Madame Teresa Carreno.

It is expected that the demand for choice seats will be unusually heavy, the hall being divided between Baltimore and Washington patrons, and it being understood that whether Baltimore is to continue among the cities of the organization's itinerary will be determined by the support accorded the concerts this year.

Germania Maennerchor.

Tomorrow evening the Germania Maennerchor will observe its 42d anniversary at the clubhouse on West Lombard street in an appropriate manner. The programme for the occasion, under the direction of Prof. Edward Boeckner, will be as follows: :

Overture. Orchestra.

"Venetian Night" (Rheinberger). Male chorus a capella.

Address of the president of the society, Mr. Jacob Klein.

Oration. Rev. J. Hofmann.

"Spring Greeting" (Meyer-Olbersleben). Female chorus a capella.

Scenes from "Tannheuser" (Wagner).

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening this season at Boston, was a decided success, according to the accounts published concerning it in the Boston papers. The most notable feature was the return of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor, after an absence of nine years. There is a slight change in the personnel of the orchestra, which is said to have improved it.

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its series of five concerts here this season at Music Hall tonight. Much interest is taken in this initial concert, as it will mark the return to the conductor's desk of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. The programme for this evening will open with Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring." The symphony will be Schumann's No. 2, one of the most popular works of this renowned composer.

With that deference to his audience which has always characterized Mr. Gericke, the soloist of the first Baltimore concert will be Madame Gadski, the German opera prima donna. Her numbers will be "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and "Elizabeth's Greeting," from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1898.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening attracted an enormous audience. Rosenthal was the soloist. The program was:

Symphony No. 3, in F major....................Brahms
Concerto for piano, No. 1, in B flat minor...Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Tone Poem, Don Juan..................Richard Strauss
Prelude and Isolde's Love-Death, from Tristan and Isolde..............................Wagner

It is a cause for lamenting that Mr. Rosenthal should have chosen the Scharwenka concerto for his first appearance here after his long absence. Since it was last heard here, some seventeen years ago, in the full flush of its then reputation as worthy to rank with the greatest of modern works in its kind, it has qualified itself to take its final place among the countless concertos that have appeared above the musical horizon with a dazzling blaze and then burned out. On a rehearing of the work after the lapse of nearly two decades one is perplexed to account for the jubilant acclaim with which it was originally received. The second movement is not without the charm of graceful melodiousness and piquant brilliancy, but the other movements are perfunctorily bombastic, pompously blatant, and above all insincere. The composer seems to have been inspired by no higher aim than to keep the soloist busy with exacting finger work and embroideries subordinate to the orchestral portions of the score. In his selection of this concerto he appealed boldly and only to the wonder and admiration he could excite in his audience by his marvelous skill in piano pyrotechnics. In this regard he fairly astounded them.

It would not be just to the artist nor to his fame to form any final judgment of the scope of his finger powers from his performance of this work. The one point, however, about which there cannot be the shadow of a doubt is the amazing, perhaps unparalleled extent of his technic. It was almost bewildering to contemplate. His playing of the brilliant coda of the second movement was in its rapidity, its clearness, its tireless endurance and its fluent ease little short of incredible. The rendering of the concerto throughout was colossal as a display of technic, but this was all except the tremendous tone he hammered from the piano. His hands rose above his head and fell with blacksmith force on the keyboard. Of soulfulness, of the more quietly emotional aspect of his art, of æsthetic appeal to the hearts of his hearers there was nothing, because the concerto gave no opportunities for the artist to make such appeal. It was technic, still technic, always technic. We have had so much of this in a constantly increasing ratio that we no longer value it beyond a certain point as we once did. Some of us are even of the mind that there can be no more of it than is necessary, and that the superfluity counts for nothing except a gratuity of no practical worth.

Let me hasten to add that Mr. Rosenthal's success with his audience was complete. He was rewarded with a furious storm of plaudits and recalled again and again with wild enthusiasm. He is to give two recitals here later in the month, and from these it will be possible to form a higher and a broader estimate of him as an artist than could be derived from his efforts on this occasion.

Of the orchestral selections there is nothing new to be said. They are all familiar. Strauss' flamboyant "Dqn Juan" becomes no more edifying on a closer acquaintance with it. It is a magnificent tour de force as a feat of orchestration in which the composer has been merciless in his demands on the players. To find any more in it is difficult. Color is dashed on the canvas in profuse gorgeousness and with a fine sense of contrasts, but it puzzles one to disentangle the design from the heavy impasto and the remorseless vigor of the brush play. Perhaps some day it may all be as clear as crystal; its present seeming madness may be considered sanity unimpeachable and its repellant ugliness beauty supreme. Who shall say? Twenty years ago it would have been deemed jocosely venturesome to prophesy that the time would come when Wagner, under any conditions, could sound comparatively as lucid, as naïve and as graceful as Haydn, and yet this is exactly what happened last evening when his "Tristan and Isolde" prelude and "Love Death" were heard after Strauss' tohu bohu.

The Brahms symphony, especially its third movement and finale, had a thoughtful and masterly interpretation from Mr. Gericke, and his reading of the "Don Juan" and its performance by the orchestra were of splendid brilliancy and effectiveness. Beautifully colored and played also were the Wagner selections. * * *

Mr. Apthorp has given the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony a terrible black eye. In his thoughtful and searching review of the recent performance of the work under Mr. Gericke, he is led to consider why the estimable and able conductor was not at his very best in his reading of it. The critic says: "Every now and then one felt it in his bones that Mr. Gericke could not bring himself to give Tschaikowsky's expression, his musical dialect its full swing, but found himself inexorably forced by his own nature, his innate sense of musical decency, as it were, to tone down the savage violence of this expression and civilize it."

This explanation is scarcely convincing, for the question arises why Mr. Gericke should have placed on the program a work that outraged his innate sense of musical decency, and, having placed it there, why he should not have left the composer to bear the full brunt of responsibility for his offenses against the polite proprieties. This charge of prudery against Mr. Gericke is not to be entertained for a moment. A more reasonable solution is given by the critic later, when he says, "It was too plainly a case of sheer incompatability of musical temper" on the part of the conductor.

The symphony not only offends against an innate sense of musical dignity, but it "threads all the foul ditches and sewers of human despair; it is profoundly and convincingly human, but as unclean as music well can be." The first movement might be called "Zola's 'Confession de Claude,' set to music." Its second theme is "unspeakable," if you please, "the impotent, senile remembrance of calf love." Only Tschaikowsky could have made "the vulgar, obscene phrase powerful." The second movement, "with its strabismal rhythm," comes in for a heavy whack in the charge that it is "sheer billingsgate." Worse remains behind, for "in the finale blear-eyed paresis meets us face to face, and that solemn closing epitaph of the trombones might begin with, 'Here continues to rot;' 'in what foul straw has genius here made its bed'"! With its "foul ditches and sewers," its "impotent, senile remembrances," its "vulgar and obscene phrase," its "sheer billingsgate," its "blear-eyed paresis," its "rot," "foul straw" and extreme uncleanliness generally, the performance of this symphony is clearly not so much a case for the critic as it is for the police or the Society for the Suppression of Vice. What a dreadful thing to play before the unsophisticated, pure-minded Caramelias and other innocent girls who flock to the symphony matinee, especially after its brutal filthiness has been so uncompromisingly unmasked. Musical decency shocked, forsooth! Every variety of decency that is really decent should be shocked by such things.

This discovery of the capacity of music to give vivid expression to nastiness is a valuable contribution to the æsthetics of the art. It raises a new interest in much of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walküre,' which—but no! Speaking Kiplingally, that is another story.

* * *

Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE first of the season's two performances of this organization are down for this afternoon and tomorrow night at Carnegie Hall. Rosenthal is the soloist on both occasions.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 9.

Overture to Euryanthe...........................Weber
Piano Concerto, No. 1, in E minor...............Chopin
Mr. Rosenthal.
Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn...........Brahms
(Chorale Sancti Antoni), op. 56 A.
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67...........Beethoven

THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10.

Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61..........Schumann
Concerto for piano, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 32.................................Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Tone Poem, Don Juan.........................R. Strauss
Prelude and Isolde's Love Death, frcm Tristan and Isolde..................................Wagner

---

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night in Music Hall, to a large audience. It was the first appearance of Mr. William Gericke, the new leader, in Baltimore, in about ten years. The program was: Goldmark's overture, 'In the Spring;" Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn; Weber's scene and air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and "Elizabeth's Greeting," from Tannhauser, sung by Madame Gadski, and Schumann's Second Symphony.

Mr. Gericke was most cordially received. His style of conducting is in sharp contrast to that of his predecessor, Mr. Paur, being much less emphatic and nervous. He leads with dignity and ease, and is free from mannerisms that sometimes detract from the enjoyment of listeners. Mr. Gericke has been the leader of the orchestra before.

Madame Gadski was in fine voice. Her singing of the Weber air aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and she was recalled again and again. No encore was, however, permitted. Her voice was clear and true, of splendid quality, and the air was delivered in an impressive, dramatic style suited to the music. Madame Gadski was handsomely gowned, and made a fine appearance on the stage. The Tannhauser air was also very effectively sung.

The Goldmark overture is a brilliant highly colored work, buoyant in spirit and sunshiny, as becomes the theme.

Brahms' variations are characterized by the skill and finish with which he writes, exhibiting his scholarly, not to say his sometimes intricate, manner.

The Schumann symphony is not the most attractive in the repertoire of orchestras of the grade of the Boston, but it is interesting. The first two movements are of a lively, somewhat nervous, temperament. The third is the finest, and the playing of it last night served to show what a splendid body of performers the orchestra is. It is a splendidly balanced organization. The orchestra is substantially the same as last year. The places of the players lost on the ill-fated Bourgogne last summer have been acceptably filled.

Mr. Kneisel is the indispensable concert master. american

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

—FIRST CONCERT,—
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8, 1898,
AT 8:15 PRECISELY.

PROGRAM:

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Weber—Aria from "Oberon."
Brahms—Variations on a Theme by Haydn.
Wagner—"Elizabeth's Greeting," from "Tannhauser."
Schumann—Symphony No. 2.

SOLOIST—MME. GADSKI.

Season tickets, $7 and $5, and single tickets, $1.50 and $1.00. Now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street. n3-d&Stn8

Boston
Symphony Orchestra
Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIRST CONCERT,
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8, 1898,
AT 8.15 PRECISELY.

—PROGRAMME:—
Goldmark..........Overture, "In the Spring."
Weber......................Aria from "Oberon."
Brahms......Variations on a Theme by Haydn.
Wagner.."Elisabeth's Greeting," From "Tannhauser."
Schumann......................Symphony No. 2.
Soloist, MME. GADSKI.

Season Tickets, $7 and $5, and Single Tickets, $1.50 and $1.00, now on sale at Albert's.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme of the first concert in the 14th season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which is a most attractive one, is as follows:

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."

Weber—Aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon;" Mme. Gadski.

Brahms—Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

Wagner—Elizabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhauser;" Mme. Gadski.

Schumann—Symphony No. 2, in C major.

The overture is scored in Goldmark's usual brilliant style, and is a most fascinating illustration of modern composition. Goldmark is still living in Vienna, which is, in a way, rather significant, as he is the only living composer whose name appears upon the programme. The eight Brahms variations on a chorale, by Haydn, are rich and beautiful in coloring, and so full of trickery in their composition as to require an orchestra of almost virtuosi to give them a satisfactory presentation. Those who find Brahms ultra-classical will still welcome him when pleasantly tempered with the breezy music of Haydn.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2 might, from its make-up, be called "heroic," for it is as full of combat as Beethoven's E-flat Symphony, which it excels in its finale. In speaking of a recent performance of this symphony in Boston, one of the ablest critics in that city said: "The symphony was given with magnificent spirit, especially the scherzo and the finale. The strings were heard at their highest perfection and brilliancy. Mr. Gericke's reading of the work was faultless. It would be difficult to conceive and unreasonable to expect a more satisfactory interpretation than he accorded it."

The soloist, Mme. Gadski, so well and favorable known in the field of opera, has appeared with the orchestra in Boston and other cities in the past two weeks with the most gratifying success everywhere. The announcement of her name as soloist resulted in the sale of every seat, and even the limit of standing tickets, three days in advance of the Boston concerts. Another critic said of Mme. Gadski's singing that she "declaimed the exacting aria from 'Oberon' in a large and thoroughly artistic style. She showed a vigorous and intelligent conception of the composer's meaning and drew forth a great outburst of applause and several recalls. In the Wagner aria the artist again met with the heartiest favor of her hearers."

It will be very gratifying to those who have watched with the keenest interest the outcome of these concerts to learn that the sale of season tickets has greatly exceeded the sale of last season, and there is every indication that the coming series of five concerts will be the most successful ever held in this city. It is worthy of note that the concerts are to be given this season on Tuesday evenings, instead of Wednesday evenings, as heretofore.

The sale of single tickets for the first concert opens at Albert's on Thursday morning, where season tickets can also be secured.

MUSIC HALL.
Eighteenth Season, 1898-99.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra.

(87 Performers.)
Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 13.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 17.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 21.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 21.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:
Mme. GADSKI
Mr. WILLY BURMESTER
Mr. EMIL SAUER
LADY HALLÉ (Norman Neruda)
Mme. TERESA CARRENO

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 17, at Albert's, 13 N. Charles street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Eighteenth Season, 1898-99.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
(87 Performers.)
Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

FIVE CONCERTS.
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 13.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 17.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 21.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 21.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:
MME. GADSKI,
MR. WILLY BURMESTER,
MR. EMIL SAUER,
LADY HALLE (Norman Neruda)
MME. TERESA CARRENO.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 17, at Albert's, 13 North Carles street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr.; C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The local musical season may be said to commence with the initial concert by the renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given this year on the evening of Tuesday, November 8, at Music Hall, Maryland and Mount Royal avenues.

In this connection it may be as well to state that whether or not the concerts of this pre-eminent organization are to continue a noteworthy feature of the musical season here depends entirely on the support accorded the management this year. With great difficulty the officials of the association have been prevailed upon to include Baltimore in their itinerary.

During the coming season the concerts will be under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who held the position of conductor of the orchestra for five years, from 1884 to 1889, and proved himself a very capable leader. The vacancies which have occurred have been filled by the engagement of several well-known musicians from the Lamoreux Orchestra, including Messrs. Maquarre, flute, and Selmer, clarinet. M. Longy, who plays the oboe, comes from the Colonne Orchestra, and there is a new first violin, Mr. Theodorowicz, from the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. There have also been engaged from the New York Symphony Orchestra the following: Messrs. Kloepfel, trumpet; Mausebach, trombone; Thomas, tuba, and Rettberg, tympani.

The following will be the Baltimore soloists: Mme. Gadski, Lady Halle (Norman Nernda), Mme. Teresa Carreno, and Messrs. Willy Burmeister and Emil Sauer.

Boston Symphony Season.

The return of Director Gericke to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as is well known, filled the musical people of the Hub with keen delight, and on last Saturday, at the first concert of the 18th season, he was given an ovation. One writer spoke of tne occasion as follows:

"It is just that Mr. Gericke should be thus heartily welcomed back to the field of his labors; the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in a peculiar sense his own; he planted the seeds that have given us our musical harvest; as one gazes over the ranks and sees Kneisel, Svecenski, Roth, Sautet, Muller, &c., &c., one is forcibly reminded that the personnel of the orchestra dates chiefly from the time when this firm ruler took the reins of government. He rooted up the weeds in the garden so thoroughly that subsequent directors found the orchestra an instrument ready made to their hands, and few subsequent changes were necessary.

"There was also a tinge of sorrow in looking at the orchestra on Saturday, for some unavoidable changes had been made, and new faces brought to mind how much the disaster of the steamship La Bourgogne had cost us."

After a critical resume of the concert in which the praise is divided between the director and the men under him, the article closes as follows:

"Altogether, the concert was a keen enjoyment from first to last, and our old conductor (who has scarcely grown old at all) has resumed his sway over musical Boston in a most auspicious manner."

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS—Tuesday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, at 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists—Mme. GADSKI, Mr. WILLY BURMEISTER, Mr. EMIL SAUER, LADY HALLE (Norman Neruda), Mme. TERESA CARRENO.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchaser of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 8it
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for this eminent organization is progressing very favorably, and indicates an increased attendance, although, to insure their indefinite visits, Baltimore music lovers will have to patronize them more liberally than heretofore. The orchestra began their season last Friday at Music Hall, Boston, and Mr. William Gericke, the new conductor, carried the public by storm. At the first concert, which takes place in Baltimore on Tuesday, November 8, Mme. Gadski, the famous dramatic soprano, will be the soloist. The subscription sale will continue until November 2, and on November 3 the single sale will begin.

[48]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1898.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening attracted an enormous audience. Rosenthal was the soloist. The program was:

Symphony No. 3, in F major....................Brahms
Concerto for piano, No. 1, in B flat minor...Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Tone Poem, Don Juan....................Richard Strauss
Prelude and Isolde's Love-Death, from Tristan and Isolde..............................Wagner

It is a cause for lamenting that Mr. Rosenthal should have chosen the Scharwenka concerto for his first appearance here after his long absence. Since it was last heard here, some seventeen years ago, in the full flush of its then reputation as worthy to rank with the greatest of modern works in its kind, it has qualified itself to take its final place among the countless concertos that have appeared above the musical horizon with a dazzling blaze and then burned out. On a rehearing of the work after the lapse of nearly two decades one is perplexed to account for the jubilant acclaim with which it was originally received. The second movement is not without the charm of graceful melodiousness and piquant brilliancy, but the other movements are perfunctorily bombastic, pompously blatant, and above all insincere. The composer seems to have been inspired by no higher aim than to keep the soloist busy with exacting finger work and embroideries subordinate to the orchestral portions of the score. In his selection of this concerto he appealed boldly and only to the wonder and admiration he could excite in his audience by his marvelous skill in piano pyrotechnics. In this regard he fairly astounded them.

It would not be just to the artist nor to his fame to form any final judgment of the scope of his finger powers from his performance of this work. The one point, however, about which there cannot be the shadow of a doubt is the amazing, perhaps unparalleled extent of his technic. It was almost bewildering to contemplate. His playing of the brilliant coda of the second movement was in its rapidity, its clearness, its tireless endurance and its fluent ease little short of incredible. The rendering of the concerto throughout was colossal as a display of technic, but this was all except the tremendous tone he hammered from the piano. His hands rose above his head and fell with blacksmith force on the keyboard. Of soulfulness, of the more quietly emotional aspect of his art, of æsthetic appeal to the hearts of his hearers there was nothing, because the concerto gave no opportunities for the artist to make such appeal. It was technic, still technic, always technic. We have had so much of this in a constantly increasing ratio that we no longer value it beyond a certain point as we once did. Some of us are even of the mind that there can be no more of it than is necessary, and that the superfluity counts for nothing except a gratuity of no practical worth.

Let me hasten to add that Mr. Rosenthal's success with his audience was complete. He was rewarded with a furious storm of plaudits and recalled again and again with wild enthusiasm. He is to give two recitals here later in the month, and from these it will be possible to form a higher and a broader estimate of him as an artist than could be derived from his efforts on this occasion.

Of the orchestral selections there is nothing new to be said. They are all familiar. Strauss' flamboyant "Don Juan" becomes no more edifying on a closer acquaintance with it. It is a magnificent tour de force as a feat of orchestration in which the composer has been merciless in his demands on the players. To find any more in it is difficult. Color is dashed on the canvas in profuse gorgeousness and with a fine sense of contrasts, but it puzzles one to disentangle the design from the heavy impasto and the remorseless vigor of the brush play. Perhaps some day it may all be as clear as crystal; its present seeming madness may be considered sanity unimpeachable and its repellant ugliness beauty supreme. Who shall say? Twenty years ago it would have been deemed jocosely venturesome to prophesy that the time would come when Wagner, under any conditions, could sound comparatively as lucid, as naïve and as graceful as Haydn, and yet this is exactly what happened last evening when his "Tristan and Isolde" prelude and "Love Death" were heard after Strauss' tohu bohu.

The Brahms symphony, especially its third movement and finale, had a thoughtful and masterly interpretation from Mr. Gericke, and his reading of the "Don Juan" and its performance by the orchestra were of splendid brilliancy and effectiveness. Beautifully colored and played also were the Wagner selections.

* * *

Mr. Apthorp has given the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony a terrible black eye. In his thoughtful and searching review of the recent performance of the work under Mr. Gericke, he is led to consider why the estimable and able conductor was not at his very best in his reading of it. The critic says: "Every now and then one felt it in his bones that Mr. Gericke could not bring himself to give Tschaikowsky's expression, his musical dialect its full swing, but found himself inexorably forced by his own nature, his innate sense of musical decency, as it were, to tone down the savage violence of this expression and civilize it."

This explanation is scarcely convincing, for the question arises why Mr. Gericke should have placed on the program a work that outraged his innate sense of musical decency, and, having placed it there, why he should not have left the composer to bear the full brunt of responsibility for his offenses against the polite proprieties. This charge of prudery against Mr. Gericke is not to be entertained for a moment. A more reasonable solution is given by the critic later, when he says, "It was too plainly a case of sheer incompatability of musical temper" on the part of the conductor.

The symphony not only offends against an innate sense of musical dignity, but it "threads all the foul ditches and sewers of human despair; it is profoundly and convincingly human, but as unclean as music well can be." The first movement might be called "Zola's 'Confession de Claude,' set to music." Its second theme is "unspeakable," if you please, "the impotent, senile remembrance of calf love." Only Tschaikowsky could have made "the vulgar, obscene phrase powerful." The second movement, "with its strabismal rhythm," comes in for a heavy whack in the charge that it is "sheer billingsgate." Worse remains behind, for "in the finale blear-eyed paresis meets us face to face, and that solemn closing epitaph of the trombones might begin with, 'Here continues to rot;' 'in what foul straw has genius here made its bed'"! With its "foul ditches and sewers," its "impotent, senile remembrances," its "vulgar and obscene phrase," its "sheer billingsgate," its "blear-eyed paresis," its "rot," "foul straw" and extreme uncleanliness generally, the performance of this symphony is clearly not so much a case for the critic as it is for the police or the Society for the Suppression of Vice. What a dreadful thing to play before the unsophisticated, pure-minded Caramelias and other innocent girls who flock to the symphony matinee, especially after its brutal filthiness has been so uncompromisingly unmasked. Musical decency shocked, forsooth! Every variety of decency that is really decent should be shocked by such things.

This discovery of the capacity of music to give vivid expression to nastiness is a valuable contribution to the æsthetics of the art. It raises a new interest in much of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walküre,' which—but no! Speaking Kiplingally, that is another story.

* * *

Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE first of the season's two performances of this organization are down for this afternoon and tomorrow night at Carnegie Hall. Rosenthal is the soloist on both occasions.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 9.

Overture to Euryanthe..........................Weber
Piano Concerto, No. 1, in E minor...............Chopin
Mr. Rosenthal.
Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn...........Brahms
(Chorale Sancti Antoni), op. 56 A.
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67...........Beethoven

THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10.

Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61...........Schumann
Concerto for piano, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 32..............................Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Tone Poem, Don Juan......................R. Strauss
Prelude and Isolde's Love Death, from Tristan and Isolde..............................Wagner

---

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night in Music Hall, to a large audience. It was the first appearance of Mr. William Gericke, the new leader, in Baltimore, in about ten years. The program was: Goldmark's overture, 'In the Spring;" Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn; Weber's scene and air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and "Elizabeth's Greeting," from Tannhauser, sung by Madame Gadski, and Schumann's Second Symphony.

Mr. Gericke was most cordially received. His style of conducting is in sharp contrast to that of his predecessor, Mr. Paur, being much less emphatic and nervous. He leads with dignity and ease, and is free from mannerisms that sometimes detract from the enjoyment of listeners. Mr. Gericke has been the leader of the orchestra before.

Madame Gadski was in fine voice. Her singing of the Weber air aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and she was recalled again and again. No encore was, however, permitted. Her voice was clear and true, of splendid quality, and the air was delivered in an impressive, dramatic style suited to the music. Madame Gadski was handsomely gowned, and made a fine appearance on the stage. The Tannhauser air was also very effectively sung.

The Goldmark overture is a brilliant highly colored work, buoyant in spirit and sunshiny, as becomes the theme.

Brahms' variations are characterized by the skill and finish with which he writes, exhibiting his scholarly, not to say his sometimes intricate, manner.

The Schumann symphony is not the most attractive in the repertoire of orchestras of the grade of the Boston, but it is interesting. The first two movements are of a lively, somewhat nervous, temperament. The third is the finest, and the playing of it last night served to show what a splendid body of performers the orchestra is. It is a splendidly balanced organization. The orchestra is substantially the same as last year. The places of the players lost on the ill-fated Bourgogne last summer have been acceptably filled.

Mr. Kneisel is the indispensable concert master.

american

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

—FIRST CONCERT,—
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8, 1898,
AT 8:15 PRECISELY.

PROGRAM:
Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Weber—Aria from "Oberon."
Brahms—Variations on a Theme by Haydn.
Wagner—"Elizabeth's Greeting," from "Tannhauser."
Schumann—Symphony No. 2.

SOLOIST—MME. GADSKI.

Season tickets, $7 and $5, and single tickets, $1.50 and $1.00. Now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.
n3-d&Stn8

MUSIC HALL.

Boston
Symphony Orchestra

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIRST CONCERT,
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8, 1898,
AT 8.15 PRECISELY.

—PROGRAMME:—
Goldmark..........Overture, "In the Spring."
Weber.....................Aria from "Oberon."
Brahms......Variations on a Theme by Haydn.
Wagner..."Elisabeth's Greeting," From "Tannhauser."
Schumann.....................Symphony No. 2.
Soloist, MME. GADSKI.

Season Tickets, $7 and $5, and Single Tickets, $1.50 and $1.00, now on sale at Albert's.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme of the first concert in the 14th season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which is a most attractive one, is as follows:

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."

Weber—Aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon;" Mme. Gadski.

Brahms—Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

Wagner—Elizabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhauser;" Mme. Gadski.

Schumann—Symphony No. 2, in C major.

The overture is scored in Goldmark's usual brilliant style, and is a most fascinating illustration of modern composition. Goldmark is still living in Vienna, which is, in a way, rather significant, as he is the only living composer whose name appears upon the programme. The eight Brahms variations on a chorale, by Haydn, are rich and beautiful in coloring, and so full of trickery in their composition as to require an orchestra of almost virtuosi to give them a satisfactory presentation. Those who find Brahms ultra-classical will still welcome him when pleasantly tempered with the breezy music of Haydn.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2 might, from its make-up, be called "heroic," for it is as full of combat as Beethoven's E-flat Symphony, which it excels in its finale. In speaking of a recent performance of this symphony in Boston, one of the ablest critics in that city said: "The symphony was given with magnificent spirit, especially the scherzo and the finale. The strings were heard at their highest perfection and brilliancy. Mr. Gericke's reading of the work was faultless. It would be difficult to conceive and unreasonable to expect a more satisfactory interpretation than he accorded it."

The soloist, Mme. Gadski, so well and favorable known in the field of opera, has appeared with the orchestra in Boston and other cities in the past two weeks with the most gratifying success everywhere. The announcement of her name as soloist resulted in the sale of every seat, and even the limit of standing tickets, three days in advance of the Boston concerts. Another critic said of Mme. Gadski's singing that she "declaimed the exacting aria from 'Oberon' in a large and thoroughly artistic style. She showed a vigorous and intelligent conception of the composer's meaning and drew forth a great outburst of applause and several recalls. In the Wagner aria the artist again met with the heartiest favor of her hearers."

It will be very gratifying to those who have watched with the keenest interest the outcome of these concerts to learn that the sale of season tickets has greatly exceeded the sale of last season, and there is every indication that the coming series of five concerts will be the most successful ever held in this city. It is worthy of note that the concerts are to be given this season on Tuesday evenings, instead of Wednesday evenings, as heretofore.

The sale of single tickets for the first concert opens at Albert's on Thursday morning, where season tickets can also be secured.

MUSIC HALL.
Eighteenth Season, 1898-99.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra.

(87 Performers.)
Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 13.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 17.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 21.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 21.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:
Mme. GADSKI
Mr. WILLY BURMESTER
Mr. EMIL SAUER
LADY HALLE (Norman Neruda)
Mme. TERESA CARRENO

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 17, at Albert's, 13 N. Charles street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

MUSIC HALL.
Eighteenth Season, 1898-99.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

(87 Performers.)
Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 13.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 17.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 21.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 21.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:
MME. GADSKI,
MR. WILLY BURMESTER,
MR. EMIL SAUER,
LADY HALLE (Norman Neruda)
MME. TERESA CARRENO.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 17, at Albert's, 13 North Carles street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr.; C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The local musical season may be said to commence with the initial concert by the renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given this year on the evening of Tuesday, November 8, at Music Hall, Maryland and Mount Royal avenues.

In this connection it may be as well to state that whether or not the concerts of this pre-eminent organization are to continue a noteworthy feature of the musical season here depends entirely on the support accorded the management this year. With great difficulty the officials of the association have been prevailed upon to include Baltimore in their itinerary.

During the coming season the concerts will be under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who held the position of conductor of the orchestra for five years, from 1884 to 1889, and proved himself a very capable leader. The vacancies which have occurred have been filled by the engagement of several well-known musicians from the Lamoreux Orchestra, including Messrs. Maquarre, flute, and Selmer, clarinet. M. Longy, who plays the oboe, comes from the Colonne Orchestra, and there is a new first violin, Mr. Theodorowicz, from the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. There have also been engaged from the New York Symphony Orchestra the following: Messrs. Kloepfel, trumpet; Mausebach, trombone; Thomas, tuba, and Rettberg, tympani.

The following will be the Baltimore soloists: Mme. Gadski, Lady Halle (Norman Neruda), Mme. Teresa Carreno, and Messrs. Willy Burmeister and Emil Sauer.

Boston Symphony Season.

The return of Director Gericke to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as is well known, filled the musical people of the Hub with keen delight, and on last Saturday, at the first concert of the 18th season, he was given an ovation. One writer spoke of the occasion as follows:

"It is just that Mr. Gericke should be thus heartily welcomed back to the field of his labors; the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in a peculiar sense his own; he planted the seeds that have given us our musical harvest; as one gazes over the ranks and sees Kneisel, Svecenski, Roth, Sautet, Muller, &c., &c., one is forcibly reminded that the personnel of the orchestra dates chiefly from the time when this firm ruler took the reins of government. He rooted up the weeds in the garden so thoroughly that subsequent directors found the orchestra an instrument ready made to their hands, and few subsequent changes were necessary.

"There was also a tinge of sorrow in looking at the orchestra on Saturday, for some unavoidable changes had been made, and new faces brought to mind how much the disaster of the steamship La Bourgogne had cost us."

After a critical resume of the concert, in which the praise is divided between the director and the men under him, the article closes as follows:

"Altogether, the concert was a keen enjoyment from first to last, and our old conductor (who has scarcely grown old at all) has resumed his sway over musical Boston in a most auspicious manner."

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS—Tuesday Evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, at 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists—Mme. GADSKI, Mr. WILLY BURMEISTER, Mr. EMIL SAUER, LADY HALLE (Norman Neruda), Mme. TERESA CARRENO.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for this eminent organization is progressing very favorably, and indicates an increased attendance, although, to insure their indefinite visits, Baltimore music lovers will have to patronize them more liberally than heretofore. The orchestra began their season last Friday at Music Hall, Boston, and Mr. William Gericke, the new conductor, carried the public by storm. At the first concert, which takes place in Baltimore on Tuesday, November 8, Mme. Gadski, the famous dramatic soprano, will be the soloist. The subscription sale will continue until November 2, and on November 3 the single sale will begin.

HALL
Eighteenth Season, 1898-'99

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(87 Performers.)
MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS:
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 8,
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 13,
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 17,
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 21,
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 21.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:
MME. GADSKI,
MR. WILLY BURMESTER,
MR. EMIL SAUER,
LADY HALLE (Norman Neruda),
MME. TERESA CARRENO.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 17, at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. Comee, Ass't Mgr. C. A. Ellis, Mgr

SYMPHONY SALE MONDAY.

Concert Evening Changed From Wednesday to Tuesday.

The sale of the season tickets for the Boston Sympony Orchestra will open on Monday morning. As has been previously published the concerts, heretofore given on Wednesday evenings, have this season been fixed for Tuesday evenings November 8, December 13, January 17, February 21 and March 21.

The new director, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, who was the conductor of the orchestra between 1884 and 1889, promises that the series of concerts to be given here will fully maintain the reputation of the orchestra. His programmes will have a wide range. The soloists include Madame Gadski, Madame Teresa Carreno, Lady Halle (Norman Nernda), Herr Emil Sauer and Mr. Willy Burmeister.

The orchestra has given up its concerts in Washington and is making special arrangements to bring Washington patrons each month to attend the concerts in Baltimore. A large delegation will come over each time, and a reduced railroad rate has been secured over the Baltimore and Ohio so that patrons can be landed at Mt. Royal Station, just across from Music Hall.

Music Hall……………………Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY GADSKI.
ORCHESTRA,

MR. WILLIAM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIRST CONCERT TUESDAY EVE, NOV. 8, AT 8.

PROGRAMME:

GOLDMARK,	Overture, "In the Spring."
WEBER,	Aria from "Oberon," "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster."
	MME. GADSKI.
BRAHMS,	Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, (Chorale Sancti Antoni,) Op. 56 A.
WAGNER,	Elizabeth's Aria from Act II, "Tannhauser."
	MME. GADSKI.
SCHUMANN.	Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61.

The season ticket sale will close Wednesday, Nov. 2. The sale for the first Concert begins Thursday, Nov. 3, at Albert's, 13 North Charles street. C. A. ELLIS,
F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Mgr. Mgr.

Music Hall.

During the existence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now in its eighteenth year, only four musical directors have presided over its work. In the opinion of competent judges Mr. William Gericke was the greatest of them all. His reappearance in Baltimore after an absence of nine years will occur at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, November 8, at Music Hall. An interesting programme has been arranged, and Mme. Gadski, one of the foremost dramatic sopranos, will be the soloist. She will sing the aria from Weber's "Oberan," "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Elizabeth's aria from act II, "Tannhauser." The orchestra will perform the overture, "In the Spring," by Goldmark; Brahm's variations on a theme, by Soref Haydn, (Chorale Sancti Antoni,) op. 56 A, and Schuman's Symphony No. 2 in C major, op. 61.

MUSIC HALL……………………MT. ROYAL AVE.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY GADSKI.
ORCHESTRA,

MR WILLIAM GERICKE, Conductor.

First Concert TUESDAY EVE, Nov. 8, at 8.

PROGRAM:

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Weber—Aria from "Oberon," "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster."
MME. GADSKI.
Brahms—Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn (Chorale Sancti Antoni), Op. 56 A.
Wagner—Elizabeth's Aria from Act II, "Tannhauser."
MME. GADSKI.
Schumann—Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61.

The season ticket sale will close Wednesday, November 2. The sale for the first concert begins Thursday, November 3, at ALBERT'S, 13 N. Charles street.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager. Slt

SYMPHONY AND SONG

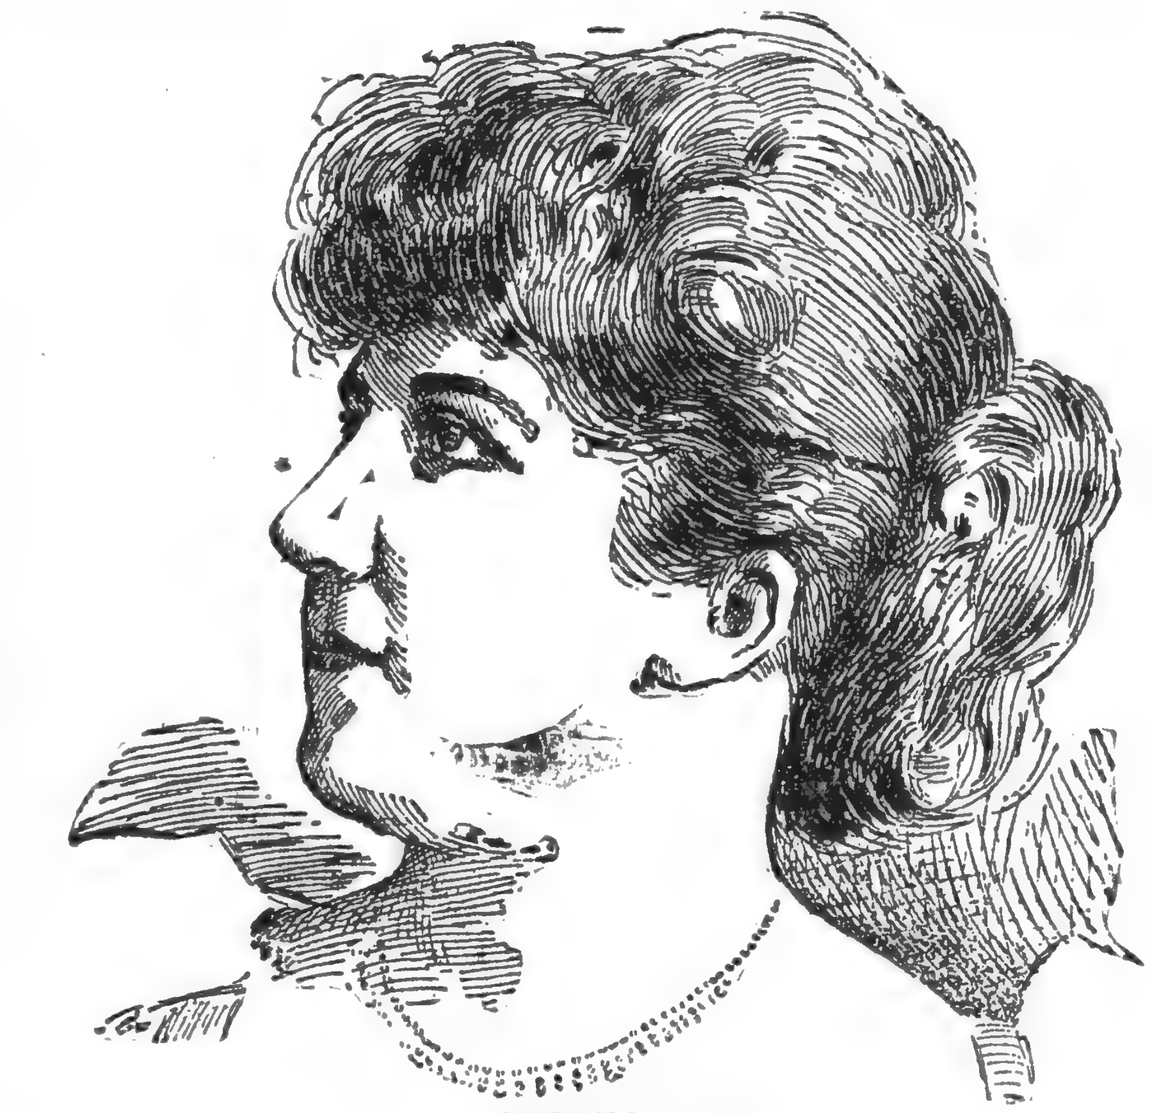
"Herald"

Enjoyable Concert by the Boston Orchestra.

MME. GADSKI'S SUCCESS

The Famous Cantatrice in Excellent Voice—Splendid Programme Given—A Large and Cultured Audience Present.

The large, fashionable and musical audience which opened the season at Music Hall with a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was a complete refutation of the idea that good music is not to be patronized in Baltimore. The fine organization of artists which holds its own from year to year throughout all changes of leaders, a most excellent programme, and a soloist of the first class were naturally attractive, and the Baltimore people responded as they always do when they are sure that everything will be up to a high standard.



MADAME GADSKI.

About the only change the audience could see in Mr. Gericke, since his first appearance here a dozen years ago, was a slight increase in his bald spot. In other respects he is the same leader who brought the fine orchestra South soon after his success in Boston. He differs greatly, however, both from Nikish, who followed him, and still further from Pauer, who came after Nikish. The contrast between Pauer and Gericke is very greatly in favor of the latter. Pauer's hold on the orchestra was that of a schoolmaster who felt that his position entitled him to lead his school, whether his talents did or not. He was a drillmaster, who believed in the omnipotence of practice. Genuine love of music for its own sake was never his inspiration or his forte. He directed mainly to show what he could do with a thoroughly skilled body of musicians. He was satisfied when he could credit all of his pupils with good marks, whether enthusiasm was evoked or not.

Gericke, however, rather presides over than dominates an orchestra, and seems to be a wise father caring for a large family, which he really leads in the common cause and purpose of a feast of music and a flow of soul. His years of experience have dealt kindly with him. He ages only as good wine does, and is a demonstration of the fact that even the best conductors can improve. He directs with less physical effort and more grace than formerly, and his few motions are as instructive to the audience as to the orchestra. It is safe to say that as an orchestra leader his superior is hardly to be found. He exemplifies fully the best possible accomplishment of any conductor, that he leads the attention of the listener away from himself and toward the inmost meaning of the composer.

As to the programme, it was agreed beforehand that the Boston Orchestra has never presented a better one. The Goldmark overture was excellent as an opening number, a kind of corridor, leading the mind from the world at large to the world of art. It is a showy piece—presenting old subjects in new guises of treatment and instrumentation.

The Brahms-Haydn variations were a somewhat unexpected treat. The partnership in the work between the classic and modern schools represented by these typical masters was profitable to both. Haydn's melody was glorified by the Brahms treatment, while the latter gave from Haydn the melodic element in which nearly all modern composers choose to be lacking. But melody is natural, and while men may make gods out of mud, and fads out of anything, nature rises up and destroys them, smiling afterward as serenely as the ocean does after a storm, which has sent many a man-made craft to the bottom. The audience appreciated nature, and enjoyed the antiquated musical form of variations immensely.

Madam Gadski was in splendid voice. Naturally, she preferred to sing first the Tannhauser aria, "O Sacred Hall of Song, I Give Thee Greeting." The aria is much more effective in the opera than out of it, as Wagner's arias generally are not as readily detachable as are the arias from other works. But in the great Weber aria from Oberon she had a grand triumph. She was recalled many times, the encore fiends fondly hoping she would spoil its effect by adding something in lighter vein. Her stage presence is impressive, and her magnificent robe a poem in the dialect of dress.

When the Schumann Symphony No. 2, in C major, was reached, the audience had gradually warmed up to genuine musical feeling, and the work was enjoyed much more than it could have been if it had come earlier on the programme. Undoubtedly, it is either the best, or equal to the best, of Schumann's works. It was written after he had some experience in instrumentation, and today it sounds more modern than it really is. It has abundant volume, without the blare and noise of more modern compositions. It has measures as crisp and dainty as those in his exquisite A minor piano concerto, which alone would have made Schumann's name immortal. The symphony was enjoyed throughout, and genuine excellence was demonstrated by the fact that even the casual listener understood it, the audience giving its approbation with nice discrimination.

Altogether it is doubtful whether the Boston Orchestra has ever given a more successful concert in Baltimore.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Nov. 8, 1898

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—"The Fortune Teller"—The Bostonians in "The Serenade"—Hall Caine's Recital.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Academy of Music was filled last night with an audience eager to welcome once again the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and not a little curious, perhaps, to see what, if any, difference, the change in leadership would have. Many, no doubt, regretted the absence of Mr. Paur, to whom we owe in past seasons much that was beautiful. It did not, however, prevent them from extending a hearty welcome to Mr. Gericke on his readvent as the orchestra's conductor.

The programme was as follows:

Karl Goldmark, overture in A major, "In the Spring," op. 36; Scharwenka, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 32; soloist, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal; John Sebastian Bach, Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte en Rondeau (arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich); Ludwig van Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

Of the three numbers for the orchestra alone it is almost impossible to say that any one was better rendered than another. The playing of the orchestra is at all times so instinct with musicianly feeling, so graceful, so intellectual that it is seldom anything comes amiss to it, certainly nothing did in this particular programme. The C minor symphony was played in masterly style, the Bach prelude, adagio and gavotte were given with that dainty precision which is one of the orchestra's most delightful achievements, and last to mention, though first on the programme, that dainty morsel, Goldmark's overture "In the Spring," with its suggestion of purling brooks, fitful gusts of showers and sunshine and all the bursting loveliness of the budding year, was given to perfection. Broadly speaking the orchestra cannot be said to have played either better or worse than it has done before on other occasions.

The remaining number was devoted to Mr. Moritz Rosenthal's interpretation of Scharwenka's concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor. If—and this is a very big if—if this was a fair test of Mr. Rosenthal's right to stand on that pinnacle where some enthusiastic critics would place him, above all contemporary level, we should have to beg leave to differ. Mr. Rosenthal's technique is marvellous; at ties, in the allegro molto e passionato, it was as if a score of hands were sweeping the keys and tearing the music out of the vitals of the instrument, but while one could look on in wonder the heart remained unresponsive.

Not once did this otherwise masterful spirit touch the secret sources of the soul.

But after all, let us be frank, one's thoughts turn to Paderewski. What would he have done? The probabilities are that Paderewski would never have played this composition at all, except for purposes of practice. It is a hard, cold, glittering thing, just such a showy composition as Scharwenka, with his iron muscles and fingers of steel, would have delighted in himself.

Probably no one could have wrung either feeling or emition from it; but be that as it may, it cannot be said that Mr. Rosenthal's playing last night showed anything more than a consummate mastefry of technique.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, November 8, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concert—Academy of Music.

The appearance of Moritz Rosenthal as soloist, and the reassumption of the conductor's baton by Wilhelm Gericke, were the notable features of the first of this year's series of the Boston Symphony concerts which was given at the Academy of Music last evening. It is over three years since Mr. Rosenthal has been heard in Philadelphia, and to many he came as an artist whose work was entirely new. Mr. Gericke's welcome was a hearty one, but the pianist received a veritable ovation, and one that was well deserved. Not only is his technique marvelous, but he plays with the heart quite as much as with the fingers. The selection chosen by him for last evening's concert was a concerto by Scharwenka in B flat minor, a composition requiring unusual technical ability. A noticeable feature of Mr. Rosenthal's rendition of this selection was the beautiful manner in which he introduced his themes and the masterly way in which he blended the piano with the orchestral accompaniment. It was an exquisite piece of work, to which it was a delight to listen. The programme, although a good one, was not remarkable for its novelties. In addition to the concerto mentioned, it comprised Goldmark's well-known overture, "In the Spring;" a prelude, adagio and gavotte by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich and the celebrated Fifth Symphony. Something untoward happened to the horns in the opening of Beethoven's masterpiece, otherwise the orchestral work was thoroughly satisfactory.

[47]

NEWEST HAIR, MUSIC AND MESMERIC IDOL---PADEREWSKI HAS FALLEN!

Emil Sauer, of Germany, Enthralls Women With His Marvelous Skill and Hypnotizes Them by His Magnetic Personality.

A NEW idol of the piano has arisen. In genius, and in hair, he is as far ahead of Paderewski as that fiery Pole distances an ordinary bald-headed key-banger.

So potent is the spell he casts over his audiences, so rapt in ecstasy are the women who sit spellbound by the magic of his music and the waving of his mane that he has been charged with being a musical hypnotist.

European critics pronounce him the greatest genius of the day, and the raving of the women for him puts Paderewski in the shade.

The name of this new genius is Emil Sauer.

To the unprofessional American the name is unknown, but in musical circles it is a household word. In Europe Sauer is not only the best known pianist, but the most popular, his playing being of a style suited to please all listeners.

No wonder Sauer pleases the women! He is tall, handsome and athletic-looking, and has about him a dreamy, poetic look, as if he were dwelling amid things ethereal. His life is devoted to music, and his playing is of the most inspired kind, and it is easy for a lady to imagine him a being endowed with more than earthly gifts. As soon as he sits down at the piano schoolgirls are convinced that his soul must dwell among the spirits.

But Sauer Is a Business Man.

Those who have come in contact with Sauer in a business way have found that in the matter of money the pianist is a material being.

The price which he has set upon his services has made him for years the despair of American managers. Mr. R. E. Johnston, who brought to these shores Ysaye, Plancon, Gerardy and Nordica, has, however, secured him. He says Sauer will reach New York this fall and will make his American debut at the Metropolitan Opera House at the commencement of the musical season.

The life of the great pianist has been a series of successes.

He was born in Hamburg, in 1862. He received his first piano training from his mother, herself a professional musician. When he was about 14 he played at a concert before Anton Rubinstein, who was so struck that he immediately offered to instruct him free of charge. Later, when he left the country, Rubinstein recommended him to his brother Nikolous, who completed his musical education.

In 1884 he received his last artistic consecration in Wiemar from Liszt.

Sauer's Success With the Ladies.

Sauer's conquest of the feminine world dates from his appearance in Berlin in 1885, at the hall of the Singakademie in the presence of the royal family. Nobility was in full force to hear him and the impression he left will be long remembered.

Dames and debutantes showered him with flowers. Women kissed him. Germany was at his feet. The sensation can best be seen from an extract published in Das Kleine Journal at the time:

> He possesses God's gift to the artist—a fiery temperament. He hits apparently without aiming; he attacks everything with the courage of youth. * * * The applause became enthusiastic, the audience more and more agitated, until finally they rose in a body, and leaving their seats, jumped upon the stage, while men shook his hands and women fell upon his neck. The player's coat was literally torn off his back.

As Sauer sits at the instrument, his whole soul wrapped up in his music, every touch of his fingers bringing forth new harmonies, every look, every muscle of his face expressive of the wonderful poetic genius within him, he presents a picture to stir the most unpoetical and unimaginative of beings. The fiery passions of his music will make men who look as though nothing could stir their placidity jump upon their seats and shout their bravos with a vehemence that surprises themselves. And when the player falls back upon quiet, subdued and poetic music the audience will sit almost enraptured.

Will Impressionable Women, When He Comes to New York, Worship at His Shrine As They Did at Paderewski's?

It seems as though no woman can hear Sauer play without worshiping him. Many are the ruses they employ to have a word with him. "Mash notes" he receives daily, not singly, but by the hundreds. Every time he plays he makes new conquests, and in Germany the scenes as he walks through the streets have become subjects for humorous illustrations.

Sauer has never married, certainly not from lack of opportunities. Like other bachelor musicians, he says he is wedded to his art. But next to his art the pianist loves the women. Whenever he is separated from his piano he can generally be found in their company. His attentions are fickle, as many a hopeful maiden has found out. Sauer admits he loves attention, and says women are the sources of most artists' inspirations. But he also says that after his fingers have once touched the keys of the piano he becomes oblivious to everything but his music.

In America there is but one man whose appearance ever had the same effect as that of Sauer. That was Paderewski. It was conceded that it was not the Russian player's music that drew the women toward him so much as his eccentricity. Especially his mode of wearing his hair.

If this is so, then Sauer's popularity should be more than double that of the Russian. He wears his hair in the same manner, but his crop far exceeds Paderewski's. And if the Russian had that "divine look," then Sauer has more of it, for his eyes almost burn with fiery genius.

Sauer and Paderewski.

While Paderewski loves a quiet, domestic life, Sauer loves exactly the opposite. This difference in temperament shows in their music. While the Russian loves quiet, babbling music, Sauer is at his best in noisy, Wagnerian and pyrotechnic display.

And in his life Sauer has always been of a roving and impetuous disposition. But while music is his life and women his affection, there is nothing effeminate about him. He is an athlete and a boxer. He has whipped many men who were supposed to nave exceptional abilities in that line and he is an accomplished skater.

In the selection of his friends Sauer is careful. He is seldom found in the company of musicians, but literary men and women he numbers among his best friends.

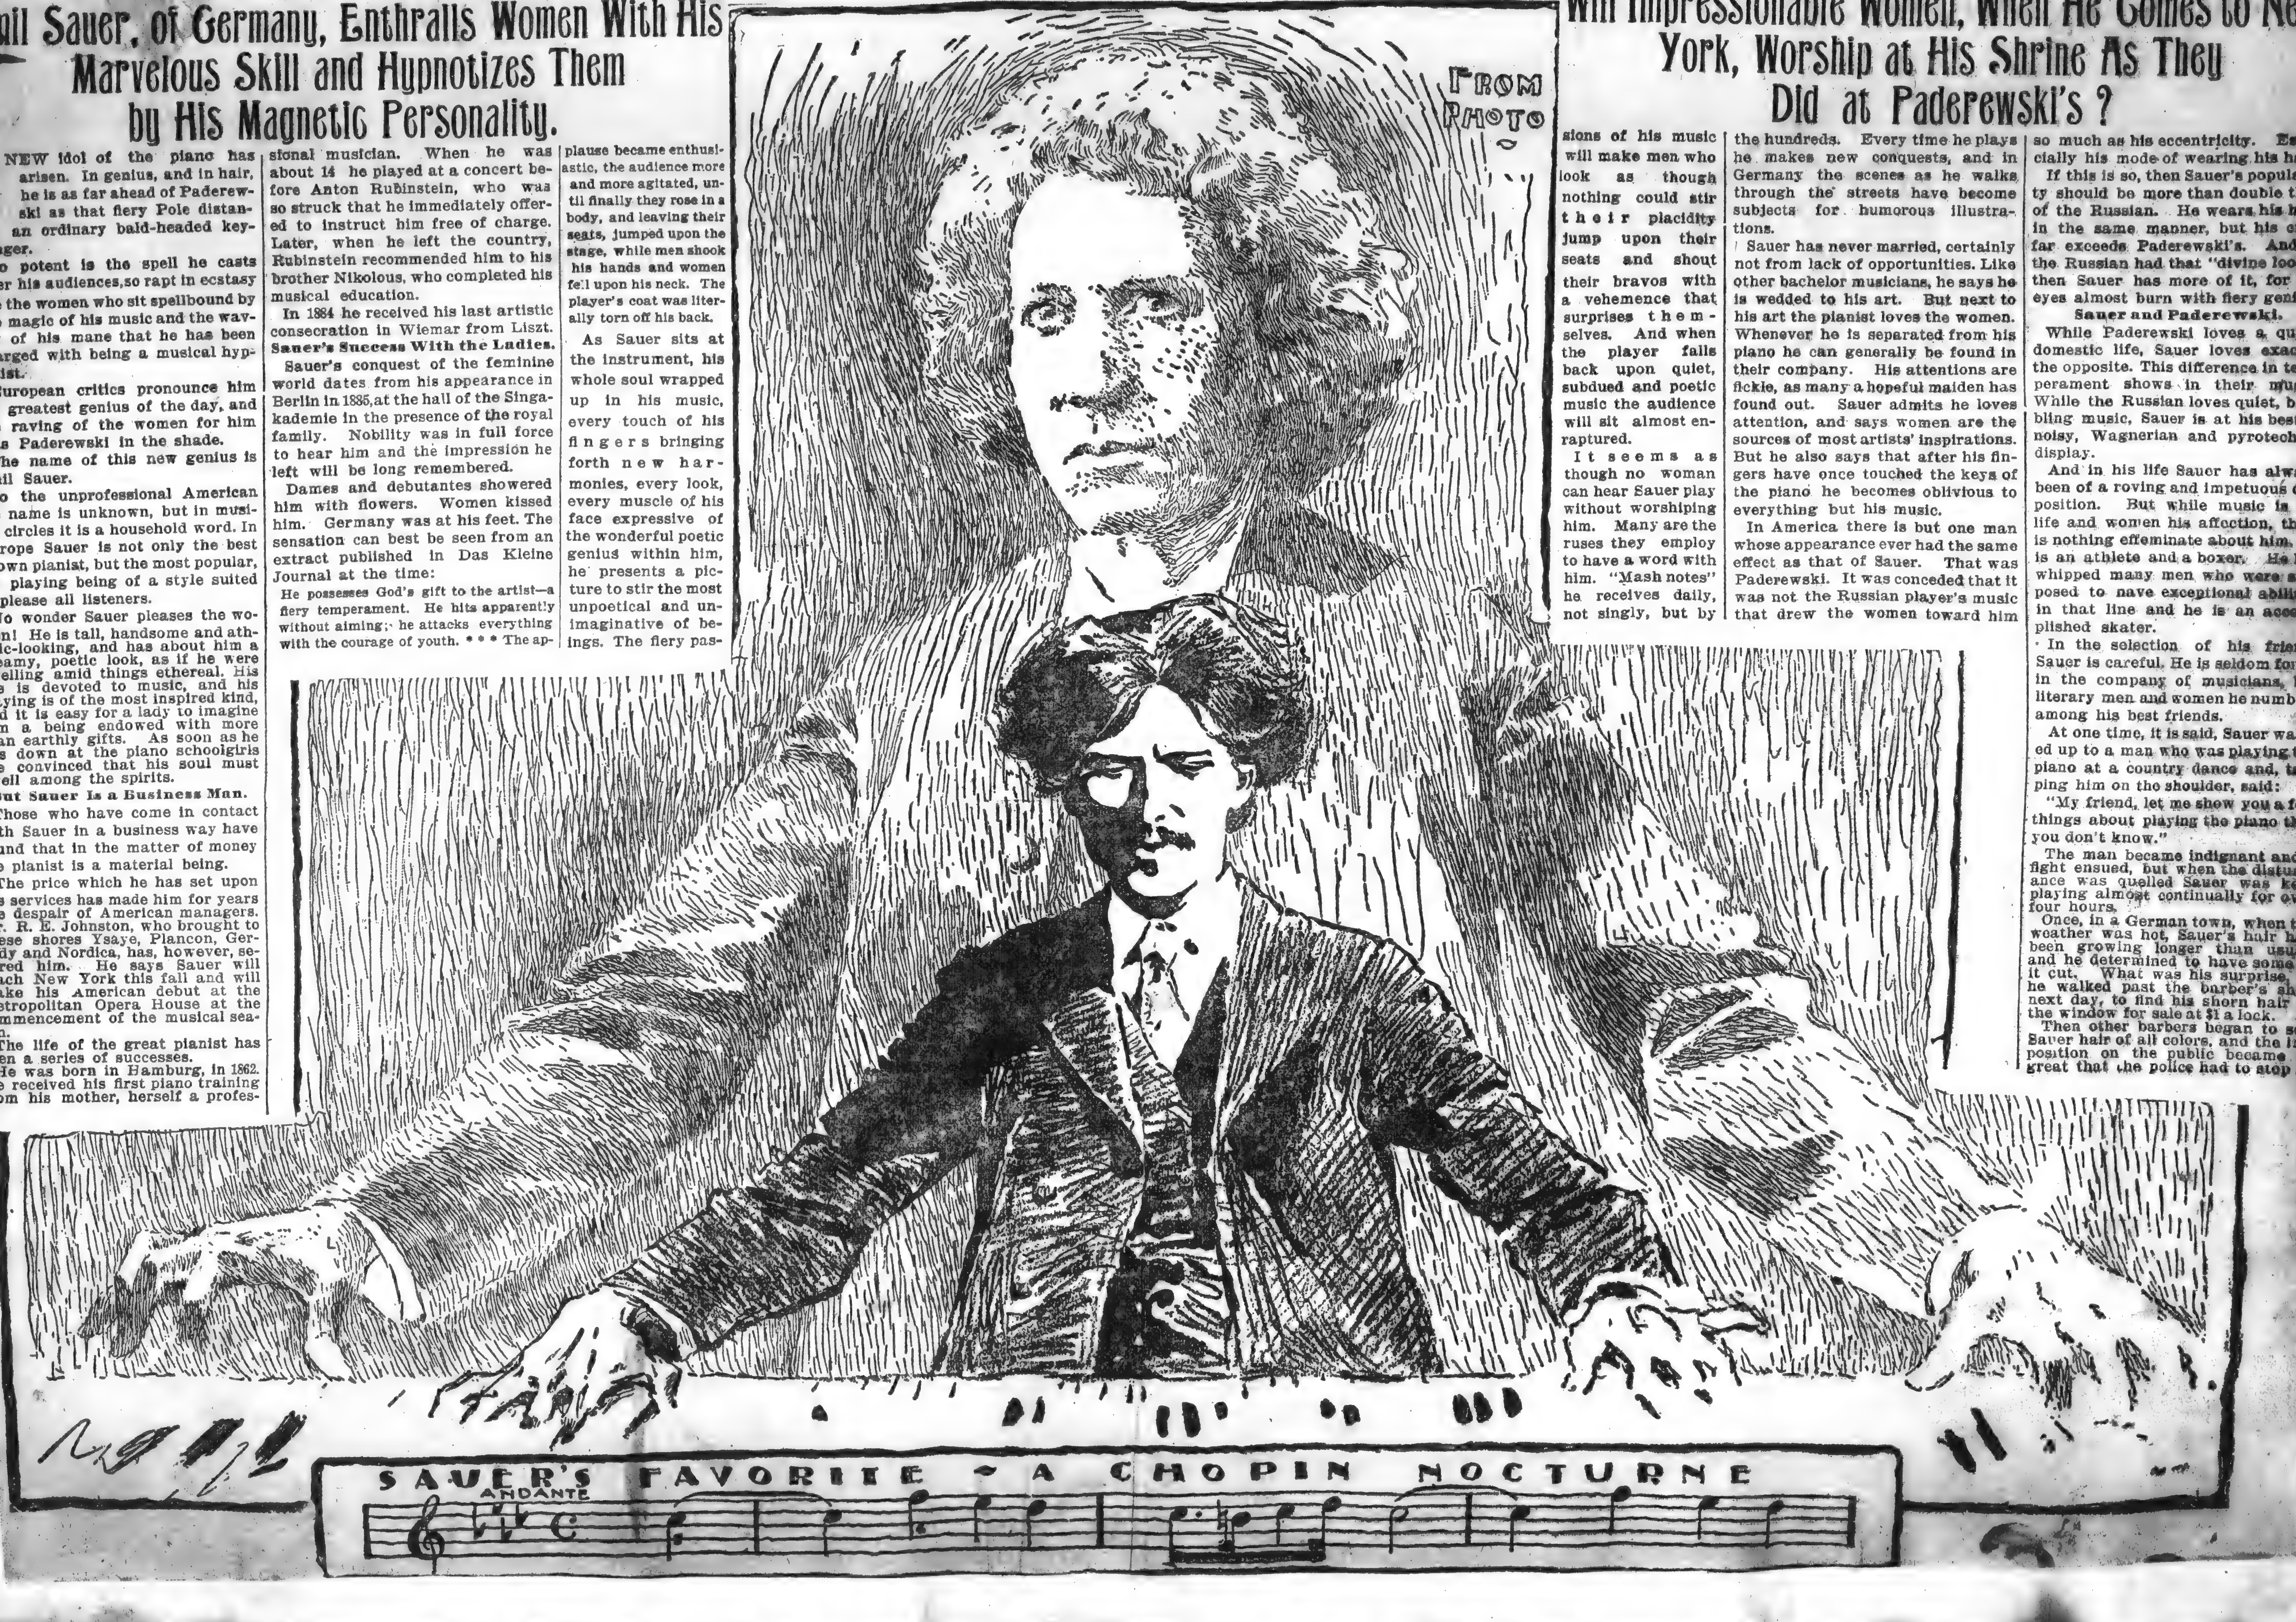
At one time, it is said, Sauer walked up to a man who was playing the piano at a country dance and, tapping him on the shoulder, said:

"My friend, let me show you a few things about playing the piano that you don't know."

The man became indignant and a fight ensued, but when the disturbance was quelled Sauer was kept playing almost continually for over four hours.

Once, in a German town, when the weather was hot, Sauer's hair had been growing longer than usual, and he determined to have some of it cut. What was his surprise, as he walked past the barber's shop next day, to find his shorn hair in the window for sale at $1 a lock.

Then other barbers began to sell Sauer hair of all colors, and the imposition on the public became so great that the police had to stop it.



FROM PHOTO
SAUER'S FAVORITE ~ A CHOPIN NOCTURNE ANDANTE

hiladelphia Inquirer
DAY - - - - NOVEMBER 8, 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Gericke's Return Made the Occasion of a Veritable Ovation

It is now ten years since Director Gericke bade farewell to America, and gave up of his own free will, on account of his health, the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he had almost created, and had in fact brought to its high standard. There were differences between this orchestra and that of Mr. Thomas', the ranking organization in this country, due to temperament of conductors, musical methods and composition of the orchestra on an instrumental basis. It was characteristic of Mr. Gericke that he exalted the strings. To him succeeded Mr. Nickish, who re-enfarced the wood-wind, and tempered the volume of the whole orchestra almost to the basis of chamber music. Mr. Nickish was an accomplished artist, but he lacked breadth, he almost banished brass, and he refined his volume almost to the vanishing point. To him succeeded Mr. Paur, a sturdy conductor, devoid of temperament, but full of vigor. His conducting lacked enthusiasm, while his programs were often a trial to the flesh. His lack of enthusiasm had often a depressing effect on the audience.

When it was announced that Mr. Gericke, restored to health, would return to the direction of the orchestra, there was genuine enthusiasm in this country. One of the evidences was that in this city on the day the sale of seats for the season was opened every seat in the house was sold so that "standing room only" is the sign for the whole season.

There were those who said that in ten years there had grown up an exaggerated idea of Mr. Gericke's powers as a conductor, and that we were doomed to disappointment. Well, he has come, he has played and he has conquered. He is all that we remember him to have been and more. He has grown in his art and he is a great conductor. Indeed, it would be useless to cavil or make comparisons after the magnificent concert last night. The program was short and good: Goldmark's "Spring" overture Scharawenka's concerto for the pianoforte No. 1 in B flat minor; Bach's prelude, adagio and Rondeau for strings, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. This was a treat to the music lover. It was varied and in every particular delightful. After Goldmark's overture had been played it was felt at once that the conductor had that immense swing, that breadth of conception and love of full tone that has characterized the greatest of the world's conductors. The orchestra responded nobly to the baton, and the florid music of Goldmark filled the Academy with its richness and beauty. Mr. Gericke received an ovation that was genuine.

The soloist, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal, has not been heard here for some years and there was great interest to hear the much-heralded "pyrotechnic pianist." The Scharawenka concerto is suited to his style. It is brilliant throughout, lacking in sentiment, but requiring the most accomplished virtuosity. The pianist rose to the occasion. He is no sentimentalist and has no interpretations, but he can play a score with absolute perfection and dazzling brilliancy without any personal agitation. It was a remarkably skillful production of a work wherein the orchestration is an integral part of the score and not a background merely. The soloist was recalled nine times, but Mr. Gericke is as inexorable as ever and the encore was not permitted.

Of the delicious suite by Bach that was almost miraculously saved from destruction or of the glorious fifth symphony it is impossible to speak of here as their merits deserve. The point to be made is that the orchestra has come to its own again and that its conductor is a man of breadth, comprehension and enthusiasm. It is the latter quality that has been so long missing. The orchestra has grown in numbers in the absence of Mr. Gericke, but almost two-thirds of the original members remain. Three, alas, of the best players went down last summer in the ill-fated La Bourgogne.

The symphony, which probably is the best loved of all, was played as it has not been in spirit since the days of Theodore Thomas, and in fact much more adequately by reason of the strength of the organization. It was a delightful concert, and Mr. Gericke achieved a personal triumph that is as gratifying to musical people here as it must be to himself.

New-York Daily Tribune.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were gladly welcomed to New-York at the first of their concerts this season, yesterday afternoon. They deserved the reception, which could surprise nobody, for both the conductor and his men stand high in the opinion and affection of the music-lovers of the metropolis. In the judgment of many entitled to pronounce a judgment, the credit of having made the Boston Orchestra the finest band in the United States and the peer of any in the world—and that is its rank—belongs to Mr. Gericke. It was he who called to its service many of the men who have given it distinction, and it was also he who introduced a discipline among its forces, the result of which has maintained itself in all the vicissitudes through which the organization has passed since he has been away. Yet his return has already been felt even in that virtuoso band. The precision and the toned balance which distinguished yesterday's concerts have not been heard for several years, nor have the public been treated within the same time to so gentle, so finished, so caressing an accompaniment as Mr. Gericke and his men gave Mr. Rosenthal in the Chopin E minor concerto. The performance of the concerto was, indeed, a thing to be remembered, even in this day of pianistic perfection. As for the specific performances of the orchestra, let it be said now—we shall have the orchestra with us all week, and can discuss it at our leisure—that their euphony was admirable, and that all that there was to regret was the tameness of Mr. Gericke's reading of the C minor symphony of Beethoven.

The North American
Daily Advertiser and United States Gazette.
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1898.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

First Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of the usual crowded and brilliant audience. Especial eclat was given to the occasion by the return, after ten years of absence, of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor, and his appearance was the signal for an outburst of applause which meant how glad people were to see him again and how much they expected from him. The expectation was not disappointed, for the concert that followed was in the highest degree admirable and satisfying. It became apparent before the opening number, Goldmark's graceful and poetic overture, "In the Spring," had ended that Mr. Gericke had come back an even better musician than when he left us; that he had greatly gained in breadth of view, in power of expression, in freedom of movement, and this impression was later on fully confirmed and deepened by his noble rendering of Beethoven's C minor symphony.

Always a strict disciplinarian and unrivalled as a drillmaster, Mr. Gericke used to be something of a martinet, with ideals which were rather those of a virtuoso than of a broad-minded lover of music, for the sake of the feeling which it expresses and the meaning which it conveys. He seemed to regard music exclusively as an art having no message except to the instructed, and to interpret a score like a mathematician working out a problem. The result was a wonderful clarity, brilliancy and refinement of execution and an almost total lack of emotion. There was no lack of emotion last night. The symphony was played with as faultless a perfection of technique as ever, but to that technique something before wanting had been added, and that something was the one thing needful to make a performance truly great. It was the touch of human nature by which art and science are distinguished, and under its influence such a performance was given of Beethoven's immortal music as in passion, pathos and every kind of eloquence could not imaginably be surpassed. It was one of those performances—how few there are!—the memory of which is an enduring pleasure and a standard of comparison for all time to come. It was so strong, so broad, so free, so appreciatively sympathetic, so free from affectation, so splendidly symmetrical, so absolutely sane. Only a great conductor arrived at the full maturity of his talents and wielding an instrument of incomparable excellence could have produced the impression it conveyed.

The soloist was Moritz Rosenthal, the pianoforte virtuoso, who was heard in the B flat minor concerto of Xaver Scharwenka, a beautiful work in the romantic school which is well adapted to display an executant's virtuosity. Mr. Rosenthal made light of its difficulties, playing throughout with an astounding digital dexterity which was not disassociated from the higher qualities of intelligence and feeling. He is an executant of the very first order, who has made a great advance since he was heard here before, eight or nine years ago. The astonished and delighted audience inconsiderately, but persistently, demanded an encore, which Mr. Gericke very properly disallowed.

NEW YORK JOURNAL,
NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

WILHELM GERICKE A GREAT LEADER,

His Baton and Rosenthal Make the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert a Great Success.

Moriz Rosenthal has caught the popular ear. He was distinctly the feature at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. And it must be said that his way of playing the Chopin concerto merited all the applause it received. Rosenthal consistently refuses encores, but it was not until the piano had been wheeled away that the audience gave up its efforts to have him play again.

But the applause of the afternoon should have been reserved for the splendid Beethoven Symphony (No. 5 in C Minor). In this Wilhelm Gericke, who has succeeded Paur as leader of the orchestra, demonstrated that he is a worthy successor to Nikisch in his best days. His manner of conducting is calm and emotionless, but he rules the orchestra as a brain rules a body. The exuberant brilliance of the "Euryanthe" overture, the aerial melody of the Chopin concerto, the complex technical subtleties of the Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn" and the dramatic changes of the Beethoven Symphony were handled with a finish that could not be surpassed.

Nikisch said in Berlin last year that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the finest in the world. Yesterday's concert proved that what was true then has not since become false.

NEW YORK HERALD.
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. A large audience warmly welcomed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who made his reappearance here as conductor of the orchestra after an absence of many years in Europe.

Mr. Gericke has lost nothing of his force as a conductor, though he appears to have become a trifle more conservative—at least in his reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony, which rather dragged and did not close the concert as brilliantly as might have been expected.

The "Euryanthe" overture of Weber and the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme—the other orchestral numbers—were admirably rendered.

Mr. Moritz Rosenthal played Chopin's first concerto, not only with a masterful technique, but also with full appreciation of its subtle, poetical meaning.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.
THURSDAY EVENING, NOV. 10, 1898.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its thirteenth season in New York yesterday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, under auspicious conditions. Heretofore this organization has not given afternoon concerts in this city, but the large audience of yesterday must have encouraged those who had arranged the plan. The band will give its first evening concert, with a different programme, to-night at Carnegie Hall. The important new factor at the concert yesterday was the reappearance of Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston orchestra.

Mr. Gericke returned to the leadership of the band this fall after a nine years' absence in German cities. He found the orchestra even better than when he left it, his predecessor, Emil Paur, having worked it to a high pitch of perfection. A few changes in the membership have been made since last season, partly owing to the loss of three distinguished players in the wreck of La Bourgogne. In zeal, in enthusiasm, in its perfect obedience to the baton of the conductor, the organization is the same splendid band to which New Yorkers have become attached. Its playing yesterday was superbly broad, and yet every detail seemed note-perfect.

Mr. Gericke had chosen a programme of solid and well-tried music. The Weber "Euryanthe" overture began the concert, followed by the E minor Chopin piano concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist; the eight Brahms variations on the Haydn St. Anthony chorale, and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The concert showed both Mr. Gericke's powers as a technician and his strong emotional sense in fortunate aspects. More than most conductors who have exceptional ability as drillmasters, Mr. Gericke possesses the romantic spirit. His readings are not only those of one who knows, but of one who feels.

Mr. Gericke's conducting gives a conviction of reserve power and of vitality. It indicates that he has searched out and found for himself the designs of composers, and that he understands and to a degree, at least, experiences personally the emotions which they represent to his mind.

These qualities and others were evinced in their most convincing manner in the performance of the Beethoven fifth symphony. Rarely has Beethoven's romantic spirit, tempered by the classic, been more eloquently proclaimed in a New York concert hall. The beauty and majesty of the themes, the dignity, the subtleness of that monumental symphony were unfolded with reverent hand and respectful enthusiasm. The first movement, especially, was played with the fullest and most enlightened appreciation. The Brahms variations, with their nobility of style, received an appropriate rendering. In the "Euryanthe" overture, Mr. Gericke achieved admirable effects.

With all due recognition of Mr. Rosenthal's powers, he seemed out of touch with the afternoon's music. His playing of the Chopin E minor concerto was technically flawless, yet very unsatisfying. It was not infused, so far as at least a few hearers could discern, with vital sympathy for ideas as well as for the technique of their expression. The real Chopin did not often speak from the performance. The majority of the audience found Mr. Rosenthal's work entertaining, but the same majority found little to call for applause in the splendid reading of the Beethoven symphony.

NEW YORK JOURNAL
NOVEMBER 12, 1898.

BROOKLYN GLAD TO WELCOME GERICKE.

First Concert of the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a Great Success.

Brooklyn's "Welcome to Wilhelm Gericke," as the two November concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Brooklyn Harmonic Society, were called, was emphatic and enthusiastic at the first of the concerts yesterday afternoon.

The programme was almost the same as at the matinee in Carnegie Hall, the addition being Bach's "Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte en Rondeau," arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich.

Moriz Rosenthal again played the pianoforte parts of Chopin's Concerto No. 1, in E minor with a rare appreciation of the soul of the music and a marvellous exhibition of faultless technique, which was especially noticeable in the rondo vivace.

The second of the series is to be given to-night, when Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, Scharwenka's concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in B flat minor, with Mr. Rosenthal as soloist; Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehral (No. 1 of the cyclus, "My Country"), and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique," are to be given.

The New York Times
"All the News That's Fit to Print."
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOV. 10, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The first concert of the thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The fact that the orchestra has deserted the Metropolitan Opera House for the only hall in the city thoroughly suited to the performance of a concert orchestra is something on which music lovers are to be congratulated. The acoustics of Carnegie Hall are much more favorable to a display of the tonal power and quality of an orchestra than those of the Opera House, and hence yesterday afternoon there was a noticeable gain in solidity and smoothness, not all of which by any means could be attributed to the new conductor. Carnegie Hall proved to be especially favorable to the strings, and if the brass did not seem to give out such a body of tone as we have been accustomed to hear from it, every one should remember that the conductor who now wields the baton over Boston's pet musical body is one of the most successful tamers of trumpets and trombones now before the public.

The change in the habitation of the orchestra had no evil effect upon the attendance. On the contrary, the house was well filled by an audience which in appearance and in close attention to the music resembled that which honors the concerts of our Philharmonic Society. It was an audience chiefly composed of ladies, and its applause was neither loud nor long, except when a combination of the woman's favorite piano composer and one of his most popular exponents aroused an excitement which defied even the muting agency of kid gloves.

There have been changes in the constitution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the rapacious sea swallowed up some of its most artistic lives with the ill-fated Bourgogne, and others who have not passed away have sought other spheres of usefulness. There are a new first flute, a new first oboe, a new first clarinet, and a new tympanist. Of the clarinetist little can be said, as yesterday's programme gave him scant opportunity for display of his powers, but what little was distinguishable was characterized by most delicious smoothness and mellowness of tone, and perfect phrase. The first flute is a competent artist, and the first oboe revealed himself in the famous fermata of the C minor symphony as a player who sings with a noble tone and exquisite style. The tympanist is a modest, unpresuming gentleman. He may possibly have a desire to treat a kettle drum with rudeness at times, but such doings are not permitted "in the Consulship of Plancus." It must be added that the wood wind, as a body, is beautiful in tone and in the finish of its work.

Wilhelm Gericke, who now conducts the orchestra, introduced it to New York twelve years ago, so that he is no stranger to those whose musical memories have not begun within that period. He has had two successors—Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur—and he himself now succeeds the latter. When Mr. Gericke went away the Boston Symphony Orchestra was noted for the extreme precision and accuracy of its work and for the polished, elegant, and—it is only fair to add—somewhat icy classicism of its style. Nikisch was romantic in all his readings, and Paur strenuous and eager in his analytical phrasing. The virility and boldness, the brilliancy and the tonal power of the orchestra were developed at the expense of its old repose and smoothness.

In the performance of the three orchestral numbers played yesterday—Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Brahms's variations on Haydn's "Chorale St. Anthony," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—there was no lack of evidence of the presence of the old familiar mastership. It was evident throughout that hereafter we shall be asked to accept, in the place of the highly colored, palpitating, pulsating, insistent force of the Nikisch and Paur styles, a minor-like smoothness of translucent yet solid and closely knit tone, a perfect precision and unanimity, a legato as polished as that of a great singer, and an elegant daintiness of utterance in all those minor details which have aforetime been proclaimed in elaborate articulation. Mr. Gericke's readings yesterday were not lacking in strength, but no one could have accused them of heated utterance. Nevertheless the refined style and technical flawlessness of the performance evoked and deserved hearty applause. Because Mr. Gericke's style is different from that of his predecessors, it does not follow that it is inferior to it. There are admirable reasons for praising and enjoying both.

The soloist yesterday was Moriz Rosenthal, the eminent pianist, and for his first appearance this season with orchestra he chose Chopin's E minor concerto. Ten years ago, when Mr. Rosenthal first played this concerto here, THE TIMES awarded him the most enthusiastic praise. A reprint of the article published then would almost fulfill all the demands of a complete commentary on yesterday's performance. It was a triumphantly masterful demonstration of the fact that such colossal technic as Rosenthal's, when applied with the full exercise of artistic intellectuality backed by genuine sympathy, can do things that touch as well as amaze. In the last movement alone the pianist was not great, because he insisted on using an original accentuation of a distorting kind.

But in the first and second movements he played superbly. He showed that he could sing a lovely and tender cantilena, when he felt one, and that he could handle the lovely exfoliations of Chopin's melodic embroidery with unsurpassable delicacy and that charming touch of intimacy which comes only when a pianist is touched by music under his fingers. The second movement in particular Mr. Rosenthal played with wonderfully beautiful tone and touch. He aroused great enthusiasm, and he did it by legitimate and artistic piano playing.

The orchestra will give its first evening concert to-night, when the programme will consist of Schumann's symphony in C, Scharwenka's B flat minor piano concerto, with Rosenthal as soloist; Strauss's "Don Juan," and the vorspiel and "liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.
FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 11, 1898.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

It was a programme of the modern romantic school that Wilhelm Gericke had prepared for last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall. Schumann's C major symphony was the opening number, and it was followed by Xaver Scharwenka's first piano concerto, with Mr. Rosenthal as soloist, the latter half of the programme comprising the Richard Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" and the prelude and finale of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." Curiously enough, although the concert of the day before had revealed anew Mr. Gericke's appreciation of the romantic in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, last night's doings marked clearly the limits, apparently voluntary, to which Mr. Gericke was willing to go in his leaning toward romanticism.

In the Schumann symphony, the conductor's interpretation of the composer's splendid inspirations and his charming waywardness was that of a man who had sounded the music's depths and explored its shallows, and having made up his mind as to the relative beauty and interest of all he had found, was prepared to take the audience with him in a repetition of the experience. All dangers had been provided against, and all pitfalls carefully labelled. One felt that although he was making the veritable journey, a little of its spice and zest had been taken away. Yet Mr. Gericke was not without his enthusiasm, and in the last movement, especially, there was a slowly cumulative, yet irresistible vim and power in the performance. The scherzo, with its two trios, was also played with remarkable delicacy and crispness. Through all, however, one felt the touch of the classicist, whose romanticism could inspire a warm, palpitating performance of a Beethoven symphony, but could not do absolute justice to Schumann's glowing score.

Most noticeable was Mr. Gericke's conservatism and showness to be aroused, in the "Tristan" and prelude and finale. While it is hardly fair to contrast the Wagnerian readings of any other conductor now in America with those of Anton Seidl, the fact remains that New Yorkers, at least, have had their standard fixed by constant hearing of the interpretations of the dead Wagnerian apostle. In spite of the justness and correctness of Mr. Gericke's performance last night, it must have seemed as though King Mark were directing the play of emotions, instead of the hot-blooded Tristan who was wont to take his hearers with him through all the love and life and death that the prelude and "Liebestod" proclaim.

Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," which Theodore Thomas and the Chicago Orchestra played here last March, was performed last night with great intelligence and a heed for detail that did not clog the spirit. Strauss is strongest at the beginning and end of his tone poems. The middle parts grow tenuous and often tedious. The "Don Juan" is an example of this, and a more striking one is "Thus Spake Zarathustra," with its broad organ pedal opening. As Mr. Gericke played it last evening, "Don Juan" was nearly always understandable and interesting. This was written in 1889, before the composer had arrived at the point of producting "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Zarathustra." The influence of Wagner is noticeable, especially toward the end, where the chromatic progressions remind one of Siegfried's scenes with Brunnhile in "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung."

The Scharwenka piano concerto, in B flat minor, was played with extraordinary brlliancy by both the orchestra and Mr. Rosenthal. The score is a rich one, perhaps too highly colored for the comparatively few ideas contained in it. It demands tremendous technic from all its interpreters, from solo pianist to bass viol player. Although Mr. Roseuthal and the orchestra were not always unanimous as to the beginning of a phrase, and did invariably pull together, the performance was eminently satisfactory. Such a composition suits Mr. Rosenthal exactly.

The dash and brilliancy of the first and third movements were made as overpowering as the composer could have wished. In the scherzo, which requires daintiness and good phrasing, the pianist did as satisfactory work as his present tour has disclosed. It was a pleasure to hear such playing. The insistent demands of the very large audience for an encore number finally induced Mr. Rosenthal to play the Chopin "Berceuse."

The World.
by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1898.

THE SECOND BOSTON CONCERT.

Rosenthal and Gericke's Players Rouse the Audience to Intense Enthusiasm.

The orchestra from Boston, the highest exponent of orchestral work in the country, played for the second time yesterday. The audience, which comprised every musician and music-lover of note in the city, filled Carnegie Hall from parquet to gallery.

The programme was a mixture of romantic, dramatic and eccentric music. Romanticism was represented by Schumann's Second Symphony, with its multitude of exquisite melodic phrases, its brilliant fantasias and its nervous rhythms. The Prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," with its polyphonic web of two dramatic and passionate motives, illustrated the music of human expressiveness. Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," with its audacious orchestration—a sequence of technical trials for all of the instruments—furnished an example of the methods of the modern extremists.

The orchestra played the Schumann opus in a perfect manner—with superlative precision, absolute tonal balance, smoothness and refinement. The rapid passages were given with limpidity and clarity. In the third movement the new oboe player exhibited his superb, resonant and sweet tone.

In the Strauss composition the virtuosity of the orchestra was triumphantly manifested. The French horns negotiated with success the very difficult phrase which the composer—perhaps with malice—has written for them.

If the Wagner excerpt had been interpreted as New York has been taught to expect it to be, the concert would have been one to remember, without reservation, as one of the best ever given here. But Mr. Gericke's reading is not to the taste of an audience accustomed to Seidl's virility and emphasis. The climax was superbly worked up, but the several phrases were tamely formulated, with little accentuation and a super-refining of the elemental emotions which they express. The soloist was Mr. Moritz Rosenthal. He played Scharwenka's brilliant first concerto with extraordinary bravura. The first movement lacked breadth, but the scherzo was executed with such a degree of dash and the final allegro with so much pianistic fury that he excited the audience to intense enthusiasm.

The Sun.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its First Concert of the Season—Return of Wilhelm Gericke.

Introductory salaams from all the principal orchestral organizations are just now being made in the musical world. The "Boston Symphony Society" comes to us at the present moment with a double claim upon the attention of New Yorkers in the shape of two concerts instead of one, as has heretofore been the rule. These concerts have entirely differing programmes, and, therefore, there is no connection between them of rehearsal and performance, such as formerly obtained in old Philharmonic days, when there were three preparatory public performances before the last and finished concert, or such as is still the rule with our ancient and honored society, where the Friday afternoon is as much like the Saturday evening as historic Tweedledum of "Wonderland" is like his beloved brother Tweedledee. The Boston Symphony will give us ten concerts in all this winter, soloists to be Mr. Willy Burmester, pianist, who will, on Dec. 14 and 15, make his first appearance in New York; Lady Hallé (Mme. Norman Neruda), pianist, also her first appearance here; Fräulein Ternina, soprano, and Mme. Teresa Carreno.

The concert yesterday afternoon was full of new interest, not only because of a removal from the Metropolitan to Carnegie, but chiefly on account of the reappearance of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who, in spite of the fact that he had not been in New York for nine years, yet possesses many warm and true adherents among the musicians and music-lovers of the city. Gericke has in the last decade grown a trifle stouter than before, and is perhaps a bit slower and quieter in his motions. His manner on the conducter's stand is quite a model of ease and decorum. He indicates everything that he desires to communicate to his men absolutely without any of those superfluous gestures which are so annoying to an audience, and in which younger and less competent leaders are often too prone to indulge. The first overture to "Euryanthe" disclosed what are probably Mr. Gericke's salient points in the management of his orchestra. Strong fusion, the binding together of tone in a compact mass, the close welding together of the different choirs of the orchestra, in other words a remarkably equal balance of tone between the various sets of instruments—this was the first impression conveyed. Then it would seem that Gericke watches closely the tone color of every phrase and brings this out with painstaking distinctness. The unity, the solidity and the tone quality—these seem to be his care. Besides this, his attention is evidently put upon giving a clear, unembellished, obedient and studious rendering to the composition in hand. Of excess in any form there is none; of liberty, even, very little. Regularity, repose, clarity, sincerity—these are the characteristics of Gericke's readings. In yesterday's programme there was little or nothing to test the imaginative powers. The musical statements made by Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, certainly call only for a matter-of-fact, truthful exposition. No soarings of the fancy are needed here, nor any emotional extravagance. A scholarly, broad rendering Gericke can always give. It shall be later discovered whether there be fire, warmth and poetry in what he attempts.

A most delicate rendering was certainly given to Chopin's E minor Concerto, in which the accompaniment made but a soft and gauzy background to the strings of pearls and diamonds which Rosenthal dropped in arpeggios, runs and staccatos from his deft fingers.

Sun

SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Of The Eighteenth Series By The Boston Orchestra Given At Music Hall.

IT WAS A SPLENDID SUCCESS

Good Results Achieved Under Gericke's Leadership.

He Returns As Director Of The Orchestra After An Absence Of Eleven Years—Suceess Of Mme. Gadski, The Soloist—An Appreciative Audience.

It was a notable concert—the first of the eighteenth series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore.

Last night was also memorable because it signalized the rentree of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as director of the orchestra after an absence of eleven years. Undoubtedly Mr. Gericke has been the most important factor in the superb development of Colonel Higginson's band. It is he who, through his great powers as a disciplinarian, laid the foundation upon which other conductors have been able to build. Having established the institution upon a firm artistic basis, he returned to Vienna, and after a lapse of years comes back to America to take up again the work which upon his previous visit had been the task of a pioneer. Musical conditions have, however, changed, and what was formerly regarded as a great achievement is now taken as a matter of course.

Still the return of Mr. Gericke is peculiarly opportune. An air of complacency in the orchestra had been from time to time noted which was not altogether in order and which demanded the drastic measures which are peculiar to the returning conductor.

At the concert last night Mr. Gericke showed the same qualities which were so successful in former years. He always knows what he wants and succeeds in getting it from his men. The result is there is an absolute unity of effort. The dynamic effects in the orchestra were also well adjusted—possibly the strings are too pervasive and the wood wind too discreet, but this was only noticeable at times.

This was the programme:

Overture, "In the Spring"................Goldmark.
Scena and Aria, "Ozean! Du Ungeheuer," from "Oberon"........Von Weber.
Variations on a Theme, by Josef Haydn,
(Chorale Sancti Antoni)......Brahms.
Elisabeth's Greeting, "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser"........Wagner.
Symphony No. 2 in C major..............Schumann.

It had a distinctly Viennese flavor, but did not suffer on this account. The Goldmark overture, which in other hands might have been tawdry, was a revelation, and whatever it lacked in depth was hidden by the brilliancy of performance.

The Brahms variations were interesting only in parts. The symphony, however, was the crowning achievement. The alternating virility and softness of Schumann's temperament are nowhere so sharply defined, and all these strange contrasts were definitely marked in the reading. There can be no doubt that the most beautiful passages of the work are not those where the composer has tried to be dramatic—it is in the wonderful adagio and the scherzo where he has expressed his own nature most completely. Opinions differ as to the relative merits of the symphonies of the journalist-musician, but in no one is there such power and poetry as in the C major.

Three years ago Mme. Johanna Gadski appeared at the Baltimore Academy of Music. The young artist came quite unheralded and almost unknown. But when the curtain rose at the beginning of the second act of "Tannhauser" and she launched forth into the massive apostrophe to the "Hall of Song," the audience, at first surprised, was carried away by her beautiful singing, and Mme. Gadski became a celebrity in this city. The great reputation thus begun has been more than maintained in her periodic reappearances.

Last night the same musical soliloquy from "Tannhauser" was one of Mme. Gadski's contributions as soloist of the evening, this time without any of the illusions of stage setting and dramatic action. That her success was unqualified is the highest tribute. The other vocal number was the "monstrously" difficult "Oberon" aria, which was sung with the rarest musical appreciation.

The very large audience that was present showed in no uncertain way its high appreciation of the magnificent work of the Boston Orchestra.

NEW YORK HERALD.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Not an empty seat in vast Carnegie Hall anywhere last evening, and in spite of the most dismal kind of a night.

Fashion has affixed the seal of approval on the Boston Symphony concerts, and it seems to make but little difference who wields the baton so long as it is the orchestra from the Hub that plays.

Herr Gericke, who was welcomed back most cordially, is a man of little if any originality, but an excellent disciplinarian, a musician of refined taste, and one, moreover, who has the best traditions of many schools at his fingers' ends.

But the Boston Symphony Orchestra is simply the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It played Schumann's second symphony just as if Herr Nikisch or Herr Paur conducted, that is, beautifully beyond description. Herr Gericke has more repose and less warmth than the gentlemen whom he preceded and succeeded, but the orchestra played with the same grace and impetuosity.

Herr Rosenthal was the soloist. He played the Scharwenka concerto in such masterly style that five recalls rewarded the artist, and, contrary to the rules of the society, he gave an encore in the form of a Chopin berceuse.

The World.
by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

With Gericke at Its Head, It Gives Its First New York Concert at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid New York its first visit yesterday. It came with its restored leader, Wilhelm Gericke, who returns to find the charge he built up and developed now a master body—one of the four or five great orchestras of the world.

The function was held at Carnegie Hall. It was an afternoon affair, with a gathering almost entirely feminine.

Mr. Gericke's programme was longer than those to which his predecessor, Mr. Paur, had accustomed the New York patrons of the orchestra. It consisted of Weber's brilliant and romantic "Euryanthe" overture, Chopin's noble E minor pianoforte concerto, played by Mr. Moritz Rosenthal; Brahms's variations on a choral theme by Joseph Haydn, opus 56A, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Mr. Rosenthal's performance was a triumph of pianistic art. It was a superlative exhibition of suavity of expression and beauty of tone, of smoothness, finish, and impeccable technique. Virtuosity governed by good taste and intelligence can do no more. As to the poetic, the emotional, the human messages which the composition carries, their delivery was only simulation. The nearest approach to conviction made by Mr. Rosenthal was in the cantabile phrase in the first movement of the concerto. The final passage of the rondo was executed with dazzling bravura.

The orchestra played in its usual masterly manner. The Brahms number served to bring out the solidity of tone, the absolute precision, the technical facility, which are the fundamental qualities of this great band. In the concluding variations it touched the high mark of orchestral execution.

Mr. Gericke's interpretation of the Symphony was hard and mechanical. The famous opening measures were taken—the first two—in strict allegro; the other two in a ritardando—a purely conventional reading. The allegro (scherzo) had little of what may be called "musical humor." The final movement was formulated with superb breadth. For the work of the players in this number words of praise fail. There were a few spots on the sun—a bit of acidity in the tutti of the wood instruments—but otherwise the performance was magnificent.

The Press
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The First Concert of the Season with Mr. Gericke Again in Control.

With all the seats sold for the season it goes without saying that the audience that greeted Mr. Gericke at the Academy of Music last evening on his return to his old post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was by no means a small one, nor was the enthusiasm at all repressed. There seemed to be a particularly cordial personal feeling in the welcome, as if a large part of the audience was on the most intimate and friendly terms with leader and orchestra. And the performance of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's baton did not in any way belie his reputation as an exceedingly sympathetic interpreter without affectations, nor did the band suggest aught of itself save that indescribable perfection of time and tone, that even balance and absolute unity which make the work of the orchestra ideal and its virtuosity amazing.

The programme was not long—just about right. As to the question of the location of symphony it all depends on the character of the music that makes up the rest of the programme. With some programmes the symphony, as a wind-up, seems absurdly misplaced, but there was nothing in the arrangement last evening that interfered with the full enjoyment of Beethoven's fifth symphony, and not even the tremendous efforts of the soloist, Moritz Rosenthal, proved so strong a counter-memory as to displace the musical center of gravity of the evening. Mr. Rosenthal was heard in all his glory in Scharwenka's concerto for the piano in B flat minor. He made a quivering display of technical ability in the matter of force and velocity and, with orchestra at all full tilt and all the strings of the piano in vibration, there was a sky-reaching effect. It brought applause, much of it. But one wonders after all whether it is not an absolute perversion of taste to admire what is essentially a complete disintegration of melody and harmony. The scherzo in the concerto gave the greatest pleasure, as he did not seem warmed up to the first movement, and it gave Mr. Rosenthal at his best in brilliancy of execution with coherency.

The Goldmark overture, "In the Spring," gave the orchestra a chance to show its choir values, and the beauty of tonal contrasts, while in the Bach music, a prelude, Adagio and Gavotte en Rondeau, particularly the Gavotte, the splendid unity and sonority with the unity of the strings, was demonstrated to perfection as both they and the orchestra as a whole were as one man. After this comparatively simple work, the Fifth Symphony was interpreted in superb style, the heights and depths of excellence being fully sounded.

The great attendance caused considerable of a crush at all the doors before the performance, and there was some complaint because the main entrance was not temporarily enlarged to accommodate the public, which all seemed to arrive at about the same time.

Post.

York, Thursday, Nov. 10, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One more step and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will in justice be obliged to change its name and call itself the Boston and New York Orchestra. It gives twenty-four concerts in Boston. In New York it has heretofore given five only, but this year that number has been doubled by adding as many afternoon concerts, with programmes that are not duplicates of the evening entertainments; and, besides these ten, there are ten more in the Borough of Brooklyn, which makes twenty New York concerts to Boston's twenty-four.

The advantage of having a permanent orchestra is illustrated by the new departure of having afternoon concerts with separate programmes. Mr. Higginson's band can do this without extra rehearsals, because it has to be drilled in so many pieces for home use. The question whether it was wise to double the number of concerts was set at rest by yesterday's aspect of Carnegie Hall, which was nearly filled by an audience that had every appearance of being on a financial basis. The engagement of Mr. Rosenthal as soloist may have had something to do with this; but then, good soloists have been secured for the other concerts, too.

"Thirteenth season in New York" the programme says. During those years there have been ups and downs for the Boston orchestra. Of all its conductors, the one most appreciated in New York was Mr. Nikisch, whose emotional and individual readings suited local taste and drew large audiences. A few years ago, under Mr. Paur's direction, the audiences grew rather small, but picked up again last year, thanks to newspaper "booming." Mr. Gericke has now been brought back, and if he keeps up the standard set yesterday, no one will have much cause for complaint, except those who crave dramatic excitement, even in a Mozart or Beethoven symphony—a species of emotion to which Mr. Gericke will not be likely to treat them. He is a conductor as strictly "classical" in his methods as Brahms is in his compositions. He has the most wonderful control of his orchestra. His players are as afraid of him as if he had the power of life and death over them; and in a way he has: he can discharge any one for carelessness or incompetence—a power all conductors ought to wield. Hence a unanimity and precision, a carefulness of phrasing, and rarity of slips that must be pronounced truly amazing. There was an exquisite delicacy and refinement about the band's playing yesterday that could not well be surpassed.

Poets who polish their verses till they shine with the lustre of a humming-bird are not apt to be noted for eagle-winged vigor and sweep, and the same is true of composers and conductors. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which opened yesterday's programme, would have been played by Seidl or Nikisch so operatically, so weirdly in the tomb scene, so impetuously toward the end, that every listener would have looked to see the curtain rise after it. Mr. Gericke played it as a concert piece; but inasmuch as he was giving a concert, and not preluding an opera, no one, perhaps, has reason to blame him for that. In Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" the same quality of serene equability of temper was more appropriate, though it emphasized the dreary monotony of that piece. Mr. Apthorp has properly called attention to the fact that Brahms treated this piece as "a vehicle for the display of musical technique on the part of the composer"—a display of all sorts of harmonic and contrapuntal subtleties. Such display, he might have added, is artistically as objectionable as the mere display of vocal technique in the operas of Donizetti and Rossini. He might further have added that the tolerance in modern music of the variation form shows how far inferior in æsthetic perception the writers of absolute music are to modern men of letters. Imagine an author taking a story and telling it in eight different ways, merely to display his mastery of the technique of composition. The publishers would throw him down the elevator-shaft, and no one would be sorry.

In Beethoven's fifth symphony Mr. Gericke found much that was congenial to his refined method of interpretation, and there was a good deal of spirit, too, in the finale. His accompaniment of the Chopin E minor concerto also was admirable, sympathetic, and precise except in a few bars of the Rondo. As for Mr. Rosenthal, it cannot be said that he revealed all the poetry of this juvenile but inspired work. In the smoothness of technique and the clearness of phrasing nothing was left to desire, but there was a sad lack of tone color. This pianist has not discovered half the secrets of the pedal as a source of rich and varied color; a few weeks with Paderewski would work wonders with him. His bass is often as dry and chopped off as if he were playing a pizzicato on a contrabass, and no one would from his usual playing suspect the gorgeous wealth of tonal charm in Chopin's work. His habit of slurring the bass, or lowest part, when it ought to be sustained, and his lack of repose where he ought to stop and take breath, were particularly disappointing in one of the passages which no one has ever properly played in New York except Paderewski and Josef Hofmann on his first visit. The point cannot be made clear without musical type; but if Mr. Rosenthal will secure a copy of Dr. Schucht's admirable little book on Chopin and refer to pages 46, 47, he will see what is meant; and he will have received a lesson in the art of playing with expression for which we shall make no charge. It may be added, for the benefit of pianists in general, that Dr. Schucht's little book on Chopin is worth more than Dr. Niecks's two ponderous volumes on the same subject.

At this evening's concert of the Boston Orchestra, Mr. Rosenthal will again be the soloist, and the programme will include Scharwenka's first concerto, Schumann's second symphony, R. Strauss's "Don Juan," and the prelude and finale from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The Sun.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1898.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Rosenthal Heard to Advantage—The Musicians in Fine Form.

The second of this month's Boston Symphony concerts took place last evening with a programme as follows:

Robert Schumann,
Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61
Xaver Scharwenka,
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 32
Richard Strauss............Tone Poem, "Don Juan"
Richard Wagner,
Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"

The soloist, as on Wednesday afternoon, was Herr Moriz Rosenthal, who on this occasion apparently more than ever astounded and electrified his audience by a marvellous show of dexterity. To the end of displaying the wonderfully swift working of the pianist's brain and the perfect communication between head and hand that Rosenthal has achieved, the Scharwenka concerto admirably lent itself, for it is written only to serve such a purpose. To the dignity of music in the best sense of this word it never rises, although there are two or three themes in the composition that strut and pose as though they were melodic magnates. In reality they are but platitudinous supernumeraries dressed up as kings and queens, and they flaunt themselves among fields overgrown and overladen with unceasing and meaningless though industriously ingenious scales, aspeggios, octave passages, runs, chromatics, double thirds, trills and so on ad infinitum with every device that a pianist can contrive to make his fingers move over the keyboard. This concerto, as we have suggested, is but a vehicle to show off mechanical pianistic cleverness. What Rosenthal gave as an encore, Chopin's "Bercluse," belongs to the realm of art. Circumstances pointed to the fact that the audience judged of the concerto at its proper valuation. Although the applause was very vigorous after each movement, there were signs that appreciation was decidedly and chiefly directed to the extraordinary technical brilliancy of the soloist.

The concert last evening was more exciting and more dashing than the former one. At this late day and ultra modern time Schumann begins to fall behind among the cut-and-dried square-block kind of composers. His formal phrases are frequent, yet he also frequently sweeps on with what in his day was unwarrantable and culpable freedom, so that he reaches out into our times while he leans back among the stern classicists. More impressive and poetic renderings have been heard of Schumann's symphony than that given last night. The perception of duty seems to be very strong in Herr Gericke, the perception of beauty, or, at all events, of idealized beauty, less so. Clearness of phrasing, precision of attack and many other necessities to a neat and careful performance are all assiduously attended to, but the soul of a composition is not permitted to show itself in its pure compelling essence.

Both on Wednesday and last night the woodwinds were out of tune, once each day very badly so for a few bars. Mr. Gericke's string instrumentalists do splendid work, but at neither of these concerts has there been anything heard which could add to, rather some things which would detract from their past laurels. Richard Strauss's gorgeous and intricate "Don Juan" seemed by far the best piece of playing upon last night's programme. "Isolde's Liebestod" was performed with a swiftness of tempo heretofore unknown to New York audiences. It would be interesting to know Gericke's data on the subject and his reasons for sacrificing breadth and impressive grandeur.

The orchestra is to play in Brooklyn this afternoon and to-morrow evening, with Herr Rosenthal as soloist.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, Nov. 11, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its new home, Carnegie Hall, was discussed at such length in yesterday's paper that it will suffice to make a brief record of last night's entertainment. The most satisfactory feature of it was Schumann's second symphony, which Mr. Gericke conducted with appreciation. In Richard Strauss's symphonic poem "Don Juan" the orchestra's virtuosity was manifested, while in the "Tristan" Vorspiel and Finale the conductor revealed his limitations on the dramatic side. Mr. Rosenthal had a congenial task in Xaver Scharwenka's first concerto, which allowed his fingers to indulge in technical orgies without much need of spiritual restraint. Mr. Rosenthal will play to-day and to-morrow with the same orchestra in Brooklyn.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOV. 11, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Second Concert Given at Carnegie Hall Last Night.

The new scheme of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra embraces two entertainments at each visit of the orchestra to this city, one in the afternoon and the other on the following evening, and with different programmes. The great growth of the popularity of the orchestra in New York was plentifully evidenced by the large and brilliant audience which assembled at last night's entertainment. Of course there was the additional attractiveness of the admired pianist, Rosenthal, but it is safe to say that most of the audience would have gone to hear the orchestra unsupported by the soloist. The fact that Wilhelm Gericke had returned would have been sufficient to excite the interest of the cognoscenti, who would naturally be anxious to compare their impressions of to-day with those of a dozen years ago.

The programme last night consisted of Schumann's symphony in C major, Scharwenka's piano concerto in B flat, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and the prelude and finale of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." This was not a well-made programme; one of the last two numbers would have been sufficient, and it would have been better for the first impression made by Mr. Gericke if it had been the Strauss number and not that by Wagner.

The conductor's most satisfactory work was done in the symphony. As for the orchestra, it is hardly necessary to say that it was a perfectly docile instrument in Mr. Gericke's hands. All that was said yesterday in regard to the new players and to the body of tone as a whole could be said again this morning, with the added comment that, as the whole orchestra had been placed further forward on the stage, there was a decided gain both in sonority and brilliancy. The brass in particular came out better, and Mr. Gericke did not show overanxiety to repress it. But in the symphony the conductor's style of playing upon his many-voiced instrument was most appropriate.

Classic elegance and suavity are Mr. Gericke's strong points, and to these an interpretation of Schumann's symphony in C yields itself with gracious results. The scherzo, it must be admitted, sounded hurried and blurred, but the slow movement was played with such exquisite smoothness, such perfect balance of tone, and such sunny clearness that it was as beautiful as a clear mountain lake in a calm Summer sunset. The final movement went with a good deal of vigor and with inspiring precision.

The Strauss number brought out magnificently the virtuosity and the tonal splendors of the band. Such gorgeous orchestral coloring as that of Strauss is bound to dazzle the senses when set forth in such high light as it got last night. But it must be confessed that there was a facile smoothness about the performance which made it seem, not to use a less polite word, somewhat glib. Strauss's music ought to make a thoughtful listener angry and sometimes disgusted; but there was nothing in Mr. Gericke's reading to "bring the blush of shame to the cheek of modesty."

After the Strauss carnival of vinegary harmonies, staccato chords for brass, and generally dislocated rhythms, Wagner's music sounded comfortably sane; and Mr. Gericke's reading was of a sort to make it seem almost like a dispassionate disquisition upon themes in the classic sonata form. To be sure, the conductor did permit his brass to make a noise in the climax, but volume of tone is not necessarily dramatic, and the deadly smoothness of the whole performance, with its careful avoidance of pressure upon the familiar dramatic accents, made one feel as if Wagner had in art as well as in person gone to join Mozart and the prophets.

Mr. Rosenthal had a congenial task in playing the solo part of Xaver Scharwenka's first concerto, a work which combines cantabile passages with bravura in an engaging style. Rosenthal played the work con amore, but he evidently cared less for Scharwenka's cantilena than for his scales and octaves. He played the melodic passages with a hard tone, but he gave the bravura parts with magnificent power and brilliancy, and in the scherzo he played with ravishing delicacy and clearness. He was called out several times and finally added Chopin's "Berceuse" to the programme.

Speaking of Wilhelm Gericke at the symphony concert in Boston, B. E. Woolf, the well-known critic, writes: His quiet and unobtrusive use of the baton was in striking contrast with the more demonstrative methods of his predecessors. One was never disturbed by the figure at the conductor's stand, but was left at perfect ease to listen to the music. A decisive and irresistible down-beat was always to be found where it belonged, and the orchestra played with none the less precision on that account. It cannot be said that its performances were any better than it has accustomed us to expect from it. The only innovation that was to be noted was something more of unity in attack on the part of the wind instruments.

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 8, 1898.

The musical season may be said to have been opened formally with the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, and the occasion left little to be asked, whether as regards the excellence of the concert or the size and the warmth of the audience, which filled the house in every part. The welcome given to Mr. Gericke on his return to the conductor's desk showed that he was well remembered, but the recognition given him later was due not to past but to present achievements. It was a pleasure to recognize a conductor with no personal vanities or fads to exploit and who controlled his orchestra without self-assertion in a clear and firm interpretation of the work before him. And it was not merely by contrast that Mr. Gericke appeared to have grown in dignity since he was here before. He certainly has developed greatly in breadth and power of expression. He is no longer concerned with repressive discipline. That is all mastered, and now he lets his orchestra play. The performance of the C minor symphony, as warm and splendid as it was sensitive and refined, was altogether the most satisfactory expression of Beethoven that we ever have heard from this orchestra. Moreover Mr. Gericke has discarded some of the theatrical arrangement of his predecessors, bringing his players forward with only a slight elevation, and in quality and richness of tone the orchestra has not for a long time been heard to such advantage, while the exquisite purity and perfect artistic training of the strings were heard with a beauty and a tender feeling not to be excelled in the execution of an arrangement from Bach.

The soloist was Moritz Rosenthal, in whom the technics of the piano-forte have reached a development that is nothing short of astounding. He played Scharwenka's concerto, which was written for technical display without any ideas of consequence, and as there was no musical emotion to be expressed, it is impossible to tell from this whether Mr. Rosenthal has any emotional expression or not. But his manual dexterity, the cleanness and fluency of his touch, the marvelous celerity and the dynamic power, producing effects that seem beyond the capacity of any two hands and one pair of pedals—all this the concerto displayed to the astonishment of the audience. He was recalled again and again, but resisted the invitation to play again.

TELEGRAM—NEW YORK

NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

When listening to the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one is almost inclined to despair of New York's ever having an organization of its own that can in any way compete with the band from Boston. Such precision, such sonority, such perfect ensemble work! Whether it was because so many months have elapsed since we have had such playing in this city, or whether the orchestra realy surpassed itself, certain it is the concert yesterday was one not soon to be forgotten. Aside from the fact that it was the first appearance of the Boston Symphony this season, the concert had additional interest from the fact that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the former conductor of this band, had returned to his post and would make his reappearance in this city after an absence of nine years. Mr. Gericke has changed but very little outwardly. Aside from a slight sprinkling of gray in his beard, he is the same Gericke we knew nearly a decade ago. Nor has his manner of conducting changed to any perceptible extent. He is the same calm, conservative, and, at the same time, authoritative conductor who directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra before Nikisch or Paur. The personnel of the orchestra is practically the same as when heard here in the spring.

There were a few unavoidable changes, made necessary by the lamentable Bourgogne disaster. The new members demonstrated that they were worthy to be heard as part of this unsurpassed organization. The programme was a conservative one, the numbers performed being Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," which was given with delightful precision, and in which the horns deserve special praise; the Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn, even the most intricate passages of which were given with perfect clearness, and in which the new oboeist had an opportunity to display his full, rich tone, and the ever popular Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. This was given throughout as only this band can play it. The men seemed as if inspired and delighted in their work. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal was the soloist. He was heard in Chopin's Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, No. 1, op. 11. Mr. Rosenthal's playing of this number calls only for highest praise. The allegro maestoso was given with an authority that impressed as much as the wealth of tone color and wonderful technique charmed his hearers. The romance was played in a profoundly poetic and graceful manner. His fingers were veritably shod with velvet in this movement, while the rondo was delightful for its crispness and brilliancy. Altogether, Rosenthal was at his very best, and roused the audience to frantic enthusiasm. In spite of five spontaneous recalls, however, he could not be prevailed upon to give an encore. Rosenthal is charmingly modest.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
The Evening Sun, per month .20
The Evening Sun, per year $2.00

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, placed in new surroundings and led by a conductor who returned to it after nine years' absence, gave yesterday the first concert of its thirteenth season in this city. Carnegie Hall was the place, and the uptown music auditorium was well filled. It was a matinée crowd, in which the women predominated, and the applause, if not vociferous, was still genuine and polite.

Wilhelm Gericke was the conductor. His first appearance evoked a demonstration which sufficed to show that it takes more than nine years for the New York public to forget an artist who had once given pleasure. Mr. Gericke's countenance and figure exhibited but little change. His manner of conducting was again the polished, restrained manner that commended him years ago to audiences weary of gesticulation.

Mr. Gericke as a "baton prima donna" is devoted to smoothness and solidity of tone. The balance of parts in his orchestra yesterday was delightful to hear. The well-trained orchestra deserved a share of credit for that; possibly, too, the acoustic properties of the hall added to the effect. At any rate, the voice of violins was never lost in blare of brass or wheeze of wind instruments.

The most applauded number in yesterday's concert was that of which Chopin was the composer and Moriz Rosenthal the chief executant. It was the E minor concerto for pianoforte, op. 11, in which Mr. Rosenthal fairly sang the romance in romantic style and made the flourishes of the allegro really expressive of feeling. He took his audience by storm.

The orchestra was heard in consecutive rendering of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Brahms's Haydn variations and Beethoven's fifth symphony. It will be heard in an entirely new programme this evening in the same hall. The next pair of concerts is set down for Dec. 14 and 15, when Willy Burmester will make his first appearance in this city.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
The Evening Sun, per month .20
The Evening Sun, per year $2.00

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1898.

There was a full house at Carnegie Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season. The audience was enthusiastic, its spirits suffering less from the atmosphere than did the instruments of the band. The programme was more varied even than that of the opening concert on Wednesday.

Schumann's C major symphony, No. 2, was the first selection, and the one in which Conductor Wilhelm Gericke's reposeful and classic ease was most happily effective. The trios and the final allegro were splendidly performed.

In the Scharwenka concerto for pianoforte, Moriz Rosenthal gave an exhibition in surprising contrast to his performance of Chopin on the preceding day. There was severity in his singing tone, but a delicacy in most difficult passages, which gave real fascination to the pianist's work. For display of technique and of the most straightforward interpretation, the concerto was well chosen. At its close the player was five times recalled to the front of the stage. He finally was permitted to play an encore, Chopin's "Berceuse," which he did in such tender fashion as to please even the most emotional of the listeners.

In its philosophy of life, as well as in its music, Richard Strauss's tone poem of "Don Juan" was far removed from the same composer's "Zarathustra," which the Boston orchestra introduced here a year ago. This number last night afforded the best opportunity the orchestra had had for a little display of its own virtuosity. The opportunity was fully improved.

Conductor Gericke in the closing number of the programme presented Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" prelude and "Liebestod" to a public that refuses to hear in these excerpts any departure from the standard of the late Anton Seidl. The storm and stress of the death song were pictured, not immediately felt. The work of both conductor and orchestra was perfect to a fault; exquisite, but unconvincing.

The orchestra will be heard to-day and to-morrow in the opening concerts of its season in Brooklyn.

THE BOSTON [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of this year's series at Music Hall last night. "Veni, Vidi, Vici" might well serve as its motto. It "came" to Baltimore, it "saw" our Baltimore audience, which, to its credit be it said, turned out "en masse," not only to hear the superb programme prepared for its delectation, but also to give a hearty welcome to its new and yet old director, Mr. Gericke, and it "conquered" the music-loving public, judging from the applause given to the performance of each number.

Washington having been struck off the orchestra's visiting list, it appeared as if Baltimore were on trial, and the Monumental City nobly answered the call made upon it.

Mr. Gericke has already in times past shown his skill as a director, and it is mainly due to his previous training that the orchestra has become such a splendid organization; but last night the smooth and even playing was particularly noticeable, this being evidently attributable to his powers as a disciplinarian. An orchestra always imbibes its mode of expression from its conductor, and yesterday evening that "jerky," unsatisfactory sensation that has prevailed during the past two or three years was conspicuous by its absence. The programme consisted of Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," in A major. Goldmark is the only living composer whose name appeared on the programme. The work is brilliant in conception, development and orchestration.

Madame Johanna Gadski, the soloist, sang Elizabeth's greeting, "Dich, Theure Halle," from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and "Ozean, du Ungeheuer," from Weber's "Oberon."

The artiste is not new to Baltimore, as she made her first appearance here in opera about three years ago. Although she was then unknown, it did not take more than one act of "Tannhaeuser" to endear her. Her voice is rich, full, and clear and possesses great power. Her rendition of both these stupendous numbers was most artistic. Great as an artist may be, it happens that sometimes they are in better voice than in other times. Last night Madame Gadski was in particularly good form, and her voice, even in the softer passages, filled the hall. Here again Mr. Gericke showed his mastery over his orchestra, in that he never allowed it to overpower the singer, but simply to act as a support. Variations on a theme of Haydn, "Chorale Sancti Antoni" by Brahms, was the next orchestral number. The work was, of course well given, as such an orchestra only would give it. The composition is interesting, as showing the possibilities of the variation form. One, at least, of the variations was so far removed from the original theme that nothing was left but the fundamental chord progressions, and it is even doubtful if Haydn, could he hear the work, would have known that one of his themes had inspired the composition. The scherzo variation and finale were the most interesting parts of the work.

The programme concluded with Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major, a most genial and delightful symphony, The peculiar part of the form being that the scherzo has two trios. This is, however, not quite a new form, as Schumann himself had already written two trios to the Schergo of his first symphony. The concert was a decided musical and social success, but if it be possible to improve upon it, would it not be better to commence with the symphony, as being the heaviest work of the concert, the audience is in a better condition to appreciate a great work at the beginning, rather than at the end of a long programme.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The disagreeable weather which prevailed all day yesterday, while it worked harm to the intonation of the Boston Orchestra and thus prevented the second concert of this year's series from being as perfect in all things as Wednesday's experiences had led us to expect, served to emphasize its popular success. An audience of Philharmonic proportions and more than Philharmonic enthusiasm filled the handsome concert-room, and a most gladsome and grateful spirit prevailed from the beginning of the Schumann Symphony in C to the last chords of the "Tristan und Isolde" excerpts, which brought the concert to a close. The demonstrations of pleasure reached their climax after Herr Rosenthal's performance of Xaver Scharwenka's concerto in B flat, which was a bewildering technical feat and in its way as radiant a musical achievement as his performances of Chopin's E minor concerto on Wednesday. The two works do not invite comparison in any sense, for while one is all tenderness and charm, the other is chivalresque, self-assertive and self-reliant; but as if to show that there was much more in his art than the amazing digital skill which has been praised till the magazine of laudatory adjectives is exhausted, and the intelligence which can so cunningly be made to simulate emotion, he supplemented the scintillant music of the composer whom New-York has so recently lost with Chopin's "Berceuse." Then, as in the Romance of E minor concerto, there came to all an appreciation of the man's marvellous command of tone, his keen appreciation of sensuous charm and the spirit of beauty.

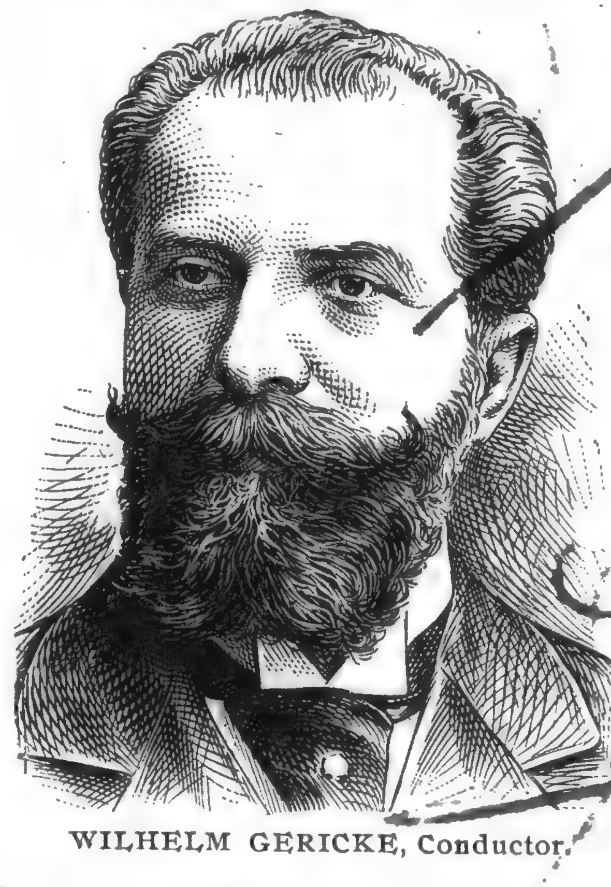
Mr. Gericke and his orchestra were at their best in the Schumann symphony, which had a sympathetic reading and an eloquent exposition. There was affection in the performance, and it awakened affection in the hearers, as always it must when worthily presented. In the prelude and finale of "Tristan und Isolde" there was more warmth, more elasticity, more variety of expression, than in the Beethoven symphony, which seemed tame to us on Wednesday afternoon, even though it fell short of that rush of passion to which we have been accustomed in New-York by Mr. Seidl, whose specific mission in this world, one might be tempted to say, was to lay bare to the multitude the heart of Wagner's love tragedy. Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," preceded the Wagner selection. It is a significant composition—painfully significant, we fear. Certain it is that, brought into close juxtaposition with it, Wagner's music sounded ingenuous, naïve, simple and full of euphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place next Tuesday, at Music Hall, is as follows:

Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring;" Weber aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Oberan, Mme. Gadski; Brahm's variations on a Theme, by Haydn, Wagner; "Elizabeth's Greeting," from "Tannhauser," Mme. Gadski; Schuman Symphony No. 2, in C major.

The overture is scored in Goldmark's usual brilliant style, and is a most fascinating illustration of modern composition.



WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

The eight Brahm's variations on a Chorale, by Haydn, are rich and beautiful in coloring and full of trickery, and require an orchestra of nothing but virtuosi.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2, from its make-up, may be called "heroic," for it is as full of combat as Beethoven's E flat Symphony, which it excels in its finale. The soloist, Mme. Gadski, so well known to all opera goers, has appeared with the Boston Symphony for the past two weeks, with the most gratifying success.

Seats might now be secured at Albert's.

* * *

Dan Daly, who thoughtfully escaped from the fame and fog of London, is rewarded for his slickness in so doing by being starred at the head of a new "Belle of New York" Casino Company, which opens at the Academy of Music, Thanksgiving week, and the occasion is promised to be a gala one for Daly and his "Belles."

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 138.

TUESDAY, NOV. 15, 1898.

The Present Status of the New Boston Music Hall.

Intention to Build on the Site Already Secured, but Plans Not Definitely Determined—Sales in the South End, Somerville and Arlington—Registry Record.

The call for the balance of the subscriptions to the stock of the New Boston Music Hall has revived interest in that project, which had slumbered nearly five years. It has been about that length of time since a parcel of 34,000 square feet on Huntington and Massachusetts avenues and St. Stephens street was purchased. The $200,000 paid in then paid for the land, which is free and clear, and has paid taxes and incidental expenses, including those connected with building sketches. The promoters of the enterprise are proceeding on the supposition that the other half of the subscriptions will be forthcoming in accordance with the promise made when the land was purchased. This would give something like $200,000 for a building, but more is desirable if not absolutely necessary.

When this money is in hand it will be possible to formulate more definite plans than are now possible. The building plans, originally made by McKim, Mead & White, have been modified by them, but nothing is settled in regard to the structure. The prospect is that the building will be simpler than that first suggested, and that the main hall will have a smaller floor area, galleries being introduced to give the required seating capacity. The question of acoustic properties, as well as of expense, has entered into this change of plan.

The lines along which the architects are now working are those of the present Boston Music Hall, modified by that of Leipsic. The hall will be on a level with the ground, with wide corridors on all sides, providing the amplest of exits and excluding street noises. Many deem a smaller hall necessary, and this, if constructed, as it probably will be, will also have its floor on the ground level. Ventilation and other considerations forbid the construction of the smaller hall beneath the main auditorium.

There will be no stores in connection with the building, as all the 32,000 feet available will be needed for the halls, corridors, anterooms and administrative offices.

There has been more or less talk among the outside public of a change of location being made in favor of some of the Park Square land of the New Haven railroad, but it seems that it has never been seriously considered by the gentlemen in charge of the enterprise, although urged upon them. In the first place, that land is held at such a figure as to make a site there much more expensive than that already secured; in the second, it would be too long a time before the railroad abandons the station at Park square, and a longer time before the new streets are determined and built; and lastly, there is no telling what sort of development will take place at Park square, and the hall if built there might soon be surrounded by manufactories, whose noise would be a serious interference with the fullest usefulness of the hall. On the other hand, the conditions surrounding the site selected are pretty well fixed and are believed to be ideal for a music hall.

[illegible]

We wonder whether Mr. Sauer, the pianist, knows anything about the eccentric behavior of his manager, Mr. R. E. Johnston. There is a [illegible] license given to every press agent; you expect to read incredible [illegible] ling statements, [illegible] less ingenious. But Mr. Johnston is the limit. Here is his latest. We [illegible] literatim et verbatim.

"It is said that a Hungarian Countess follows Sauer from town to town since the last eight years. Mr. Sauer recently made a remark as follows: 'Two years ago I arrived in Vienna a few hours before my concert, and I was very much astonished to find at the Hotel Bristol hundreds of letters, not only from musicians and the press, but from wealthy people asking for tickets for my concert. The key to that riddle was quickly found out. A rather eccentric Countess (one of the greatest professional beauties) had bought the whole house, and when I appeared on the stage I found her sitting alone in a big arm chair in the immense hall. Never mind, I played, perhaps, better that evening than a few days later when I had to repeat the program before a crowded audience.'

"'Another case,' said Hanslick, the eminent musical authority for the Freie Presse of Vienna, 'last night I saw a lady belonging to the highest aristocracy who was so far forgetting herself as to fall down on her knees on the platform and screamed out for a kiss.'"

Come, come Mr. Johnston, this will never do. You will injure the reputation of Mr. Sauer, of the firm whose piano he will play, and of your own "beezeness," if you persist in sending broadcast such type-written twaddle. Husbands will not allow their wives and daughters to hear him play.

Furthermore, we are told that Mr. Sauer has a wife and five children. The meeting between her and Mr. Johnston will be an admirable subject for the Historical Painter.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
The Evening Sun, per month.......................... .20
The Evening Sun, per year..........................$2.00

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, placed in new surroundings and led by a conductor who returned to it after nine years' absence, gave yesterday the first concert of its thirteenth season in this city. Carnegie Hall was the place, and the uptown music auditorium was well filled. It was a matinée crowd, in which the women predominated, and the applause, if not vociferous, was still genuine and polite.

Wilhelm Gericke was the conductor. His first appearance evoked a demonstration which sufficed to show that it takes more than nine years for the New York public to forget an artist who had once given pleasure. Mr. Gericke's countenance and figure exhibited but little change. His manner of conducting was again the polished, restrained manner that commended him years ago to audiences weary of gesticulation.

Mr. Gericke as a "baton prima donna" is devoted to smoothness and solidity of tone. The balance of parts in his orchestra yesterday was delightful to hear. The well-trained orchestra deserved a share of credit for that; possibly, too, the acoustic properties of the hall added to the effect. At any rate, the voice of violins was never lost in blare of brass or wheeze of wind instruments.

The most applauded number in yesterday's concert was that of which Chopin was the composer and Moriz Rosenthal the chief executant. It was the E minor concerto for pianoforte, op. 11, in which Mr. Rosenthal fairly sang the romance in romantic style and made the flourishes of the allegro really expressive of feeling. He took his audience by storm.

The orchestra was heard in consecutive rendering of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Brahms's Haydn variations and Beethoven's fifth symphony. It will be heard in an entirel new programme this evening in the same hall. The next pair of concerts is set down for Dec. 14 and 15, when Willy Burmester will make his first appearance in this city.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
The Evening Sun, per month.......................... .20
The Evening Sun, per year..........................$2.00

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1898.

There was a full house at Carnegie Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season. The audience was enthusiastic, its spirits suffering less from the atmosphere than did the instruments of the band. The programme was more varied even than that of the opening concert on Wednesday.

Schumann's C major symphony, No. 2, was the first selection, and the one in which Conductor Wilhelm Gericke's reposeful and classic ease was most happily effective. The trios and the final allegro were splendidly performed.

In the Scharwenka concerts for pianoforte, Moriz Rosenthal gave an exhibition in surprising contrast to his performance of Chopin on the preceding day. There was severity in his singing tone, but a delicacy in most difficult passages, which gave real fascination to the pianist's work. For display of technique and of the most straightforward interpretation, the concerto was well chosen. At its close the player was five times recalled to the front of the stage. He finally was permitted to play an encore, Chopin's "Berceuse," which he did in such tender fashion as to please even the most emotional of the listeners.

In its philosophy of life, as well as in its music, Richard Strauss's tone poem of "Don Juan" was far removed from the same composer's "Zarathustra," which the Boston orchestra introduced here a year ago. This number last night afforded the best opportunity the orchestra had had for a little display of its own virtuosity. The opportunity was fully improved.

Conductor Gericke in the closing number of the programme presented Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" prelude and "Liebestod" to a public that refuses to hear in these excerpts any departure from the standard of the late Anton Seidl. The storm and stress of the death song were pictured, not immediately felt. The work of both conductor and orchestra was perfect to a fault; exquisite, but unconvincing.

The orchestra will be heard to-day and to-morrow in the opening concerts of its season in Brooklyn.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of this year's series at Music Hall last night. "Veni, Vidi, Vici" might well serve as its motto. It "came" to Baltimore, it "saw" our Baltimore audience, which, to its credit be it said, turned out "en masse," not only to hear the superb programme prepared for its delectation, but also to give a hearty welcome to its new and yet old director, Mr. Gericke, and it "conquered" the music-loving public, judging from the applause given to the performance of each number.

Washington having been struck off the orchestra's visiting list, it appeared as if Baltimore were on trial, and the Monumental City nobly answered the call made upon it.

Mr. Gericke has already in times past shown his skill as a director, and it is mainly due to his previous training that the orchestra has become such a splendid organization; but last night the smooth and even playing was particularly noticeable, this being evidently attributable to his powers as a disciplinarian. An orchestra always imbibes its mode of expression from its conductor, and yesterday evening that "jerky," unsatisfactory sensation that has prevailed during the past two or three years was conspicuous by its absence. The programme consisted of Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," in A major. Goldmark is the only living composer whose name appeared on the programme. The work is brilliant in conception, development and orchestration.

Madame Johanna Gadski, the soloist, sang Elizabeth's greeting, "Dich, Theure Halle," from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and "Ozean, du Ungeheuer," from Weber's "Oberon."

The artiste is not new to Baltimore, as she made her first appearance here in opera about three years ago. Although she was then unknown, it did not take more than one act of "Tannhaeuser" to endear her. Her voice is rich, full, and clear and possesses great power. Her rendition of both these stupendous numbers was most artistic. Great as an artist may be, it happens that sometimes they are in better voice than in other times. Last night Madame Gadski was in particularly good form, and her voice, even in the softer passages, filled the hall. Here again Mr. Gericke showed his mastery over his orchestra, in that he never allowed it to overpower the singer, but simply to act as a support. Variations on a theme of Haydn, "Chorale Sancti Antoni" by Brahms, was the next orchestral number. The work was, of course well given, as such an orchestra only would give it. The composition is interesting, as showing the possibilities of the variation form. One, at least, of the variations was so far removed from the original theme that nothing was left but the fundamental chord progressions, and it is even doubtful if Haydn, could he hear the work, would have known that one of his themes had inspired the composition. The scherzo variation and finale were the most interesting parts of the work.

The programme concluded with Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major, a most genial and delightful symphony. The peculiar part of the form being that the scherzo has two trios. This is, however, not quite a new form, as Schumann himself had already written two trios to the Schergo of his first symphony. The concert was a decided musical and social success, but if it be possible to improve upon it, would it not be better to commence with the symphony, as being the heaviest work of the concert, the audience is in a better condition to appreciate a great work at the beginning, rather than at the end of a long programme.

News

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The disagreeable weather which prevailed all day yesterday, while it worked harm to the intonation of the Boston Orchestra and thus prevented the second concert of this year's series from being as perfect in all things as Wednesday's experiences had led us to expect, served to emphasize its popular success. An audience of Philharmonic proportions and more than Philharmonic enthusiasm filled the handsome concert-room, and a most gladsome and grateful spirit prevailed from the beginning of the Schumann Symphony in C to the last chords of the "Tristan und Isolde" excerpts, which brought the concert to a close. The demonstrations of pleasure reached their climax after Herr Rosenthal's performance of Xaver Scharwenka's concerto in B flat, which was a bewildering technical feat and in its way as radiant a musical achievement as his performances of Chopin's E minor concerto on Wednesday. The two works do not invite comparison in any sense, for while one is all tenderness and charm, the other is chivalresque, self-assertive and self-reliant; but as if to show that there was much more in his art than the amazing digital skill which has been praised till the magazine of laudatory adjectives is exhausted, and the intelligence which can so cunningly be made to simulate emotion, he supplemented the scintillant music of the composer whom New-York has so recently lost with Chopin's "Berceuse." Then, as in the Romance of E minor concerto, there came to all an appreciation of the man's marvellous command of tone, his keen appreciation of sensuous charm and the spirit of beauty.

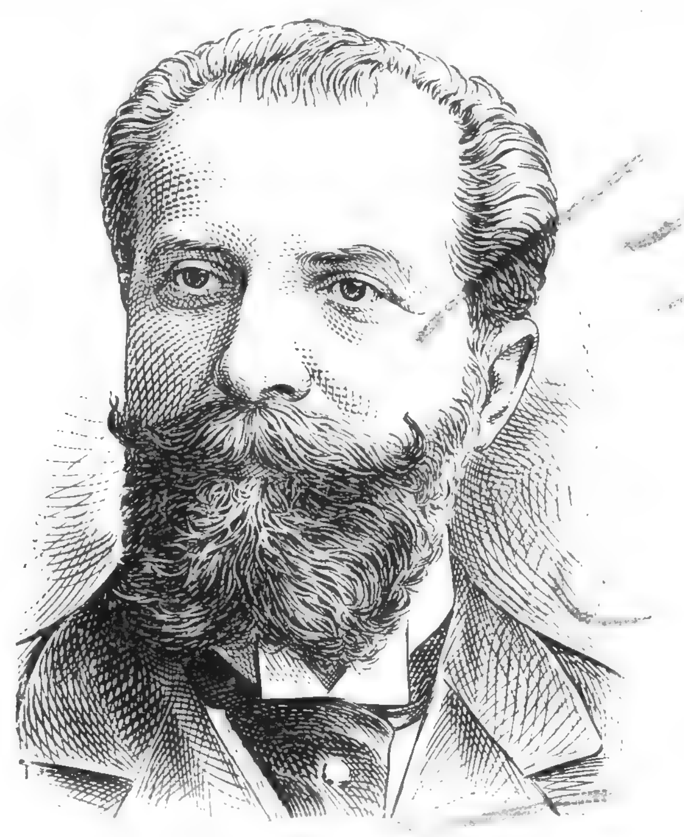
Mr. Gericke and his orchestra were at their best in the Schumann symphony, which had a sympathetic reading and an eloquent exposition. There was affection in the performance, and it awakened affection in the hearers, as always it must when worthily presented. In the prelude and finale of "Tristan und Isolde" there was more warmth, more elasticity, more variety of expression, than in the Beethoven symphony, which seemed tame to us on Wednesday afternoon, even though it fell short of that rush of passion to which we have been accustomed in New-York by Mr. Seidl, whose specific mission in this world, one might be tempted to say, was to lay bare to the multitude the heart of Wagner's love tragedy. Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," preceded the Wagner selection. It is a significant composition—painfully significant, we fear. Certain it is that, brought into close juxtaposition with it, Wagner's music sounded ingenuous, naive, simple and full of euphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place next Tuesday, at Music Hall, is as follows:

Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring;" Weber aria, "Ocean Thou Mighty Monster," from Oberan, Mme. Gadski; Brahm's variations on a Theme, by Haydn, Wagner; "Elizabeth's Greeting," from "Tannhauser," Mme. Gadski; Schuman Symphony No. 2, in C major.

The overture is scored in Goldmark's usual brilliant style, and is a most fascinating illustration of modern composition.



WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

The eight Brahm's variations on a Chorale, by Haydn, are rich and beautiful in coloring and full of trickery, and require an orchestra of nothing but virtuosi.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2, from its make-up, may be called "heroic," for it is as full of combat as Beethoven's E flat Symphony, which it excels in its finale. The soloist, Mme. Gadski, so well known to all opera goers, has appeared with the Boston Symphony for the past two weeks, with the most gratifying success.

Seats might now be secured at Albert's.

* * *

Dan Daly, who thoughtfully escaped from the fame and fog of London, is rewarded for his slickness in so doing by being starred at the head of a new "Belle of New York" Casino Company, which opens at the Academy of Music, Thanksgiving week, and the occasion is promised to be a gala one for Daly and his "Belles."

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 138.

TUESDAY, NOV. 15, 1898.

The Present Status of the New Boston Music Hall.

Intention to Build on the Site Already Secured, but Plans Not Definitely Determined—Sales in the South End, Somerville and Arlington—Registry Record.

The call for the balance of the subscriptions to the stock of the New Boston Music Hall has revived interest in that project, which had slumbered nearly five years. It has been about that length of time since a parcel of 34,000 square feet on Huntington and Massachusetts avenues and St. Stephens street was purchased. The $200,000 paid in then paid for the land, which is free and clear, and has paid taxes and incidental expenses, including those connected with building sketches. The promoters of the enterprise are proceeding on the supposition that the other half of the subscriptions will be forthcoming in accordance with the promise made when the land was purchased. This would give something like $200,000 for a building, but more is desirable if not absolutely necessary.

When this money is in hand it will be possible to formulate more definite plans than are now possible. The building plans, originally made by McKim, Mead & White, have been modified by them, but nothing is settled in regard to the structure. The prospect is that the building will be simpler than that first suggested, and that the main hall will have a smaller floor area, galleries being introduced to give the required seating capacity. The question of acoustic properties, as well as of expense, has entered into this change of plan.

The lines along which the architects are now working are those of the present Boston Music Hall, modified by that of Leipsic. The hall will be on a level with the ground, with wide corridors on all sides, providing the amplest of exits and excluding street noises. Many deem a smaller hall necessary, and this, if constructed, as it probably will be, will also have its floor on the ground level. Ventilation and other considerations forbid the construction of the smaller hall beneath the main auditorium.

There will be no stores in connection with the building, as all the 32,000 feet available will be needed for the halls, corridors, anterooms and administrative offices.

There has been more or less talk among the outside public of a change of location being made in favor of some of the Park Square land of the New Haven railroad, but it seems that it has never been seriously considered by the gentlemen in charge of the enterprise, although urged upon them. In the first place, that land is held at such a figure as to make a site there much more expensive than that already secured; in the second, it would be too long a time before the railroad abandons the station at Park square, and a longer time before the new streets are determined and built; and lastly, there is no telling what sort of development will take place at Park square, and the hall if built there might soon be surrounded by manufactories, whose noise would be a serious interference with the fullest usefulness of the hall. On the other hand, the conditions surrounding the site selected are pretty well fixed and are believed to be ideal for a music hall.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1898.

We wonder whether Mr. Sauer, the pianist, knows anything about the ecentric behavior of his manager, Mr. R. E. Johnston. There is a certain license given to every press agent; you expect to read incredible gossip, startling statements, fabrications more or less ingenious. But Mr. Johnston is the limit. Here is his latest. We quote literatim et verbatim.

"It is said that a Hungarian Countess follows Sauer from town to town since the last eight years. Mr. Sauer recently made a remark as follows: 'Two years ago I arrived in Vienna a few hours before my concert, and I was very much astonished to find at the Hotel Bristol hundreds of letters, not only from musicians and the press, but from wealthy people asking for tickets for my concert. The key to that riddle was quickly found out. A rather eccentric Countess (one of the greatest professional beauties) had bought the whole house, and when I appeared on the stage I found her sitting alone in a big arm chair in the immense hall. Never mind, I played, perhaps, better that evening than a few days later when I had to repeat the program before a crowded audience.'

"'Another case,' said Hanslick, the eminent musical authority for the Freie Presse of Vienna, 'last night I saw a lady belonging to the highest aristocracy who was so far forgetting herself as to fall down on her knees on the platform and screamed out for a kiss.'"

Come, come Mr. Johnston, this will never do. You will injure the reputation of Mr. Sauer, of the firm whose piano he will play, and of your own "beezeness," if you persist in sending broadcast such type-written twaddle. Husbands will not allow their wives and daughters to hear him play.

Furthermore, we are told that Mr. Sauer has a wife and five children. The meeting between her and Mr. Johnston will be an admirable subject for the Historical Painter.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1898.

Boston Symphony Conerts.

AFTER an absence of nearly ten years Wilhelm Gericke returned to New York and at the head of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since then it has had for conductors Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur and both have left their marks upon this organization. Mr. Gericke, to whom belongs the honor of having laid the technical foundations of the band, has not altered much in personal appearance. The audience that greeted him at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday afternoon saw the same erect, soldierly bearing, the same trim figure and alert and dignified movements. The program chosen for his re-entry was this:

Overture to Euryanthe	Von Weber
Concerto for piano in E minor, No. 1, op. 11	Chopin
Variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56A (Chorale Sancti Antoni.)	Brahms
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67	Van Beethoven

Soloist, Moriz Rosenthal.

The selection of Carnegie Hall for these concerts was a wise one. It is better adapted for orchestral playing than is the Metropolitan Opera House. The massed tone of the band was more solid than ever, although hardly as sonorous as usual at the first concert. This was due to the fatigue of traveling, and also to the rather dispersed position of the men. The latter defect was remedied at the second concert.

Weber's brilliant and inspiring overture has been played with more sweep and precision by the Boston Orchestra. It was a performance on a high technical level, but lacking a little in freedom. The characteristic and musical variations of Brahms on the "St. Antony Chorale" gave us Mr. Gericke at his best. Here was keen analysis, intellectual conception, perfect balance, rhythmic and dynamic, while the tone color had just that touch of gray so necessary to Brahms. It would be difficult to single out any particular variation. All were beautifully played. With all his musical metaphysics, Brahms can be very human, as several of these variations testified. The tone color was positively sensuous.

The symphony was rather a disappointment. Breadth was absent, and Mr. Gericke's beat lacked oratorical emphasis. This was particularly noticeable in the last allegro, which was heavy, indeed almost dull. The physical condition of the orchestra was unquestionably to blame for this.

Mr. Rosenthal played, and Mr. Rosenthal in the romanze of the concerto silenced all his critics. He can develop a lively, poetic, caressing touch if needs be, and his performance of the Chopin concerto was all that it should have been. There was just the right volume of tone in the first movement, which, by the way, was read with some marked changes of tempi. The first solo and the lyric theme in E were taken at a slow pace, so as to bring out their cantabile quality. This threw the velocity and brilliancy of the passage work into extraordinary relief. The romanze was a gem. The first theme was enunciated with a delicious touch and the close was singularly poetic. The rondo was played too fast for its character, but not for clearness. It was very exciting, and the Tausig octaves brought the work to a furiously sensational close. Mr. Rosenthal played the old version of the concerto, cutting out most of the first orchestral tutti. At the end of the first allegro he also resorted for a few bars to Tausig in a passage where is a manifest improvement on the original. He would not play an encore, although called out half a dozen times.

The program of the first evening concert, on Thursday, was the following:

Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61	Schumann
Concerto for Piano, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 32	Scharwenka
Tone Poem, Don Juan	Strauss
Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde	Wagner

Soloist, Moriz Rosenthal.

The scheme of playing separate programs is an excellent one, especially for an organization that rehearses so frequently as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audiences that patronize this series—and they were big ones last week—attend both the afternoon and evening functions, and are thus treated to a welcome variety. Certainly the audience that turned out in the rain on Thursday night to welcome Mr. Gericke seemed to enjoy the change of program. Besides, the orchestra and soloist are not subjected to the deadly monotony of playing within twenty-four hours or more the same compositions. The new conductor was at his best in this concert. His conducting, always slightly academic, has broadened, and while one misses the note of dramatic passion, the symmetry, exquisite sense of tonal proportions, just rhythms and interior polyphony are all compensating clauses. The finish of the playing was remarkable; the only danger to be anticipated is that with all angles worn away character, accent and passion are apt to be lost. This, however, may be indulging in undue anticipation. Certain it is that the big, the dramatic is absent in Mr. Gericke's readings. He rather strives after a certain fineness, a certain spiritualization of tone. In the Wagner number, which came as an ante-climax after the Strauss, there was elasticity, purity, sweetness of tone, but hardly fervor, hardly enough animal heat.

The finale was not impressive. It lacked a ponderability. But the Schumann symphony was extremely well played; especially was the scherzo given with wonderful animation and polish. The entire work was executed in a far superior fashion to the Beethoven of the day before. There was tenderness and romance in that charming slow movement, and the allegro molto was an admirable specimen of healthy orchestral tone and technic.

In the region of the superhuman was the playing of the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss. This extraordinary man is at his best and least extravagance in the audacious brilliancies of this orchestral commentary on Lenau's poem. The Boston men worked wonders with the tremendous difficulties of the score. It was an astounding performance. Mr. Rosenthal, in his most brilliant mood, captivated and dazzled us with his playing of the Scharwenka concerto. So impressive was his solo work that he was recalled six times, and finally was forced to play the Chopin Berceuse, which he did in a beautiful way. The orchestral accompaniment was better than at the matinee. Mr. Gericke was warmly received, and he has unquestionably regained his old artistic position in this city, for he always was a favorite.

ONE recalled "the elder, brighter age of pomp and pride" when Xaver Scharwenka's B flat minor concerto was played last week by Rosenthal and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I never heard a prouder theme than the opening one. It is Liszt seen through a fresh temperament, and what a joyous cavalier the composer must have been when he wrote the work! August Spanuth, the music critic of the Staats-Zeitung, told me the story of Scharwenka's début at Hamburg fifteen years ago. Perhaps it was more. The Polish pianist was at that time extremely handsome and soldierly in bearing. His white skin, raven hair, poetic eyes, brilliant and sensuous piano playing, drove the unimpassioned burghers of Hamburg into ecstacies. To me the first movement, with its heroic and dithyrhambic measures, recalls the very tread of Scharwenka. Conscious pride, conscious power, the sap of youth overflowing in his veins, the master of a recondite and difficult art, he composed the music in a distinctly autobiographic vein. It is the martial Scharwenka, the Scharwenka of the tricksy vein and witty humor and the Xaver of the mood grandiose, for the last movement is grandiloquent to a degree. I care for it least of any section of the composition. The scherzo will live.

I doubt if the composer ever played his concerto as did Rosenthal last Thursday evening. He was another Rosenthal from the remote, poetic, reticent Rosenthal of the Chopin concerto the day previous. The dogs of virtuosity were let loose and the passion displayed was almost theatrical. This music does not set you dreaming. It is more Hungarian than Polish in its barbaric glitter, its huge eloquence and its besieging the very gates of hell. Rosenthal shed the velvet from his finger tips, and his cantilena in the slow section of the first movement was big rather than tender. But he spun gold into fiery filaments when he reached the scherzo. This, with its perverse rhythms and gay, jesting spirit was beautifully delivered. The finale, with its chaotic rechauffe of the preceding ideas, is not the best part of the concerto. Rosenthal stormed about in it, pushing aside enormous granite blocks and throwing down mighty walls and boulders. Yet nothing could have been more exquisite than the Chopin-like figuration toward the close. It was Scharwenka raised to the seventh heaven.

The performance of the E minor concerto was admirable, except that the rondo seemed too rapid for the character of the composition. It was miraculously clear, the highly decorative pattern of the music being firmly etched by the firm and agile fingers of the broad-shouldered Moriz. No fault could be found with the romanze, while the first movement, with its arbitrary tempi in the lyric portions, would have proved an object lesson for Josef Hofmann, who played the work here last spring in an uninteresting manner and totally without interior light.

* * *

That master of miniature, Wilhelm Gericke, is undoubtedly in the right place at the head of the Boston Orchestra. I use the phrase in no disparaging sense, for to paint as he does with so fine, so precise a brush; to reveal the bafflingly fine tints and nuances of a score; to be a cool controller of the demon called Rhythm, are these no qualifications? Added are the elements of repose, an aristocratic disdain of cheap effects and a poetical nature that comes to light, not in purely dramatic scenes, but in the music of Schumann, of Brahms, and oddly enough in Richard Strauss. The second theme of that fantastic, wonderful "Don Juan" was most musically played. Some of the variations on the "St. Anthony" chorale—there is no temptation in this series of pictures—were read with fine introspective, and what a dense, wooing color Gericke extorted from the strings!

I could not care for the "Tristan" music. It was reflective rather than affirmative, and the woodnote wild of passion was afar. This pair of lovers were too metaphysical by half. Gericke is a born driller of men, and he is past grand master of the art of conducting with the simplest signs. He has not the grand manner, and so his band does not play in the grand manner. A legitimate conductor of concert music read for the concert platform, is Mr. Gericke, and under him the Boston Orchestra cannot but improve. In three months I expect marvels of execution.

* * *

The new members who replace Jacquet, Pourtau and Weiss are excellent artists. Sautet plays second oboe, while the first oboe, a Parisian, is a wonder. His tone is deliciously acid, and he can whittle it away to a thread. The clarinetist is not the artist his predecessor was, nor has he the same luscious tone, but he is an acquisition all the same. The flutist, too, has a fine, brilliant tone. The new tympanist is a New York man, whose face proved very familiar. The former tympanist, with the anarchistic forehead, now plays side drums and triangle. The strings are the same wonderful strings, while Hackebarth still sounds his sonorous horn and brings to us woodland glade, the rich, full sunshine and the magic of moonlit dell. It is indeed an orchestra of artists.

* * *

I saw Mr. Higginson in the audience, also Charles Ellis. Fred Comée, with an amiable smile and the cough of a condemned man—Boston east wind, I suppose—was very much in the foreground and gave the new quarters of the orchestra a homelike appearance.

You will place take notice, Mr. Comée, that I did not say "homely"!

* * *

I saw Dr. Carl Dufft the other day and noticed that his Berserker beard was trimmed almost à la "Jim Metcalfe."

* * *

One of the first violins in the Boston band is an Armenian. His hair is black as coal and he eats apples most of the day. But the fruit seems to agree with his playing.

* * *

And must I omit the name of "Tim" Adamowski? It will be a cold evening for the orchestra when Mr. Adamowski's chair is not occupied by him. He is still the best looking man on the stage.

* * *

Gericke has not lost his handsome profile and warm coloring. The eyeglasses alone mark the progress of the years. His beard seems as dusky as ever.

BROOKLYN, November 14, 1898.

WE were favored with two concerts from what is called "the best orchestra in the world" on last week's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. They were given under the joint patronage of the Institute and the Philharmonic Society, both associations of old standing here, and it is hardly necessary to say the musicians were the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This was assisted on both occasions by Moriz Rosenthal, pianist. The auditorium of the Academy was filled to overflowing for both concerts, a rather remarkable feature of Friday afternoon being the large proportion of middle-aged men in the audience—business men evidently who came from sheer love of the music. The sale of student's tickets also brought many very young people. Thus the Friday concert, which used to be called a public rehearsal, as the program was identical with that of Saturday evening, and also the "ladies' matinee," has entirely changed its charcter.

It now has an individual program, and there are but few more women than men and boys and girls in the audience. That the new method pays is shown by the fact that the total receipts of the matinee course to date of the first concert are $2,280.50, as against $1,130.50 for the same course last season.

The program for Friday was delightful, consisting of the favorite numbers of old Philharmonic goers. The "Euryanthe" overture had the same spirited elegance that Theodore Thomas used to read from the score, and the bars for the muted strings were played with absolute perfection. One could but feel that if the spirit of Weber ever hovers around where his music is played it would have gone away quite satisfied. Bachrich's adaptation for the string orchestra of the Bach prelude, adagio and gavotte en rondeau was lovely. One was impressed anew with the different sides of Bach's character shown, for the music has a serious, delicate lightness that is most joyous in the gavotte, and was given full scope on Friday. It was a prety sight to see the smiles coming on the faces of the listeners, and one could not blame them for involuntarily keeping time, some of the children nodding away like little China mandarins.

A scrap of syncopated time received a bit of unconscious accent from the conductor himself a motion beginning in the head, continued to the elbow and hand, and finally finished by a slight heel and toe of the right foot. This will hereafter be indelibly connected with the score by those who saw it. The fifth symphony is always a delight. There is tragedy in it, as in life, but as in most lives there is more hapiness, and it leaves a distinct impression of the latter; certainly it does as it was played on Friday. Gericke could not have pleased a Brooklyn audience more than by putting that on his program. Thomas put more effect of changeful expression in it, and Seidl emphasized the tragedy of it, but it was never given with more gracious elegance than then.

As to Rosenthal. He was received without tremendous applause, but what was reserved gave added effect to that which followed his playing, when he was forced to return to the stage and bow again and again. He played Chopin's beautiful concerto in E minor with a dexterity of manipulation that showed with wonderful effect in the passage at the end of a rondo, which he took with a speed that made one breathless. But he subdued his manual skill to the beauty of the music in the diminished chords, played pianissimo, and as arpeggi, which had an accompaniment of equally exquisite taste and piano effect from the oboes.

It was a surprise to most of us that the accompaniment was played by the full orchestra, instead of with a somewhat reduced force in the strings.

Personally I enjoyed Rosenthal's playing better on Friday than on Saturday evening. But that was partly caused by the selection. The Scharwenka concerto is impressive as an exhibition of technic, and is, of course, of much interest, and some of the orchestration is striking. It is full of fireworks, which were tremendously applauded, and which were played with a truly marvelous mechanical skill. At its close the player was applauded again and again and yet again. Probably Mr. Rosenthal is one of those artists who feels that an encore is an extra number and should be paid for as such. Anyway he took his revenge by finally returning to the piano and playing down to what he seemed to consider the intellect of his hearers by giving them a Strauss waltz.

But in justice to himself he made it an apotheosis of a waltz, with the theme twisted and turned, embellished with roulades, glissades, trills, triolets, three octave chords, fifths, octaves, chromatics and all the fol-lals mentioned in the exercise books. His hands seemed to be in six places at once. He literally played like lightning. The orchestra leaned forward with their eyes fixed in wonder on those hands, and when he finished with some scales and octaves played at a rate that did not seem possible to one having merely human mechanism at his command, they joined with the audience in applause for the sparkling dazzlement of the exhibition.

The rest of the program was delightful as music. The strings sang through Goldmark's graceful "Spring" overture with a beauty of ensemble and exact attack, and were a perfect support for the rest of the orchestra. The "Vysehrad," the first number of Smetana's cyclus, "My Country," was the only new thing on the program, and more than fulfilled the promises made for it. It was strongly suggestive of the "Parsifal" music, the scene in the Hall of the Knights and at times of the Rhinegold, the likeness being found in the flowing harmony of the strings. It is a picture drawn with the strong hand and effective outlining of a Diaz, making one long to hear the other five numbers, especially if there are more such solos for the harp in them.

The great music of the night, however, was the Tschaikowsky symphony in B minor, the "Pathetique," and Mr. Gericke interpreted it magnificently, bringing out all the wonderful tonal qualities of his orchestra and making one feel that there was nothing further to be desired in its rendition. At its close the orchestra rose long before its hearers had recovered from the spell of the lamentation of the finale.

The orchestra has changed but little in its personnel since it was last here. Leo Schulz, the 'cellist, is now a soloist, the drummer and his shining kettledrums are new and so are the players on oboes and the first flutist, the others having gone down on the Bourgogne. So many Brooklyn people were lost then that these new faces in the orchestra brought up the horror afresh.

A NEW MUSIC HALL AT LAST.

As the old Music Hall corporation has sold its property to the Boston Real Estate Trust, the directors of the new Boston Music Hall have decided that a new hall should be built as soon as possible on the property purchased at the corner of Massachusetts avenue and Huntington avenue. To this end the committee having in charge the securing of subscriptions, Messrs. E. W. Hooper, H. F. Sears and H. L. Higginson, ask that subscribers to the $500,000 capital stock make full payment in order that new stock may be issued therefor before the building contracts are to be signed. The total subscriptions for a new music hall in 1893 amounted to $402,500, from 406 subscribers. Three hundred and sixty-four have already paid in $208,750. As there still remains $98,500 stock of the $500,000 capital unsubscribed for, the committee is desirous of securing new subscriptions.

The call for the final payment of the subscriptions asks that the money be paid in on or before December 1. The first portions of the subscriptions were paid very promptly and the committee expects this final payment to be met with equal promptness, and it is thought that the additional $100,000 needed will also be raised quickly.

As soon as this second payment is in, contracts will at once be signed for the building. The plans are in the hands of Mr. McKim, of McKim, Meade & White. The new Music Hall will be built on lines similar to the present building, with modifications based on the Music Hall at Leipsic. The Leipsic hall is considered the best in Europe.

HOME JOURNAL.
NOVEMBER 16, 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Wednesday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke having succeeded Mr. Emil Paur as conductor, the most musically educated among the audience were unusually curious and critical. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal was soloist, and the programme was made up of Weber's "Euryanthe," overture; Chopin's "E minor" concerto; Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56*a*;" and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony."

Outside of the overture, the best work done by the orchestra was, strange to say, in a composition that has always been considered by critics as non-orchestral—the Chopin "Concerto." It was ideally beautiful, and as unlike the dull rendering that long acquaintance has made familiar as painted sunset skies are to the real. In nuance, in poetic charm, and in that thing hardest of all to find, balance, the conception was superb. By contrast Mr. Rosenthal's playing was both soulless and tedious. As an exhibition of technique, of velocity, and lightness his work in the last movement was admirable, or, rather, would have been had he been giving us an etude; but alas for Chopin traditions!—those traditions that bedimmed so many beautiful eyes, and that are the "soul of the sweetness" of Chopin's muse—they were wofully misrepresented, and, when not misrepresented, were ignored.

In the Brahms variations the orchestra was not up to expectations. Very few conductors can evade tediousness with Brahms, and it seems that Mr. Gericke is not one of these. He gave us a rendering that was note-correct, but wanting in tone balance, and for this reason wooden.

There still remained the symphony, but it must be confessed that even in this Mr. Gericke was somewhat of a disappointment; and here the weakness of the orchestra, the wood wind, was specially noticeable. How cold, too, and lifeless was the rendering of the andante! Taken as a whole, Mr. Gericke's work as to methods was accurate and scholarly. He took no liberties, and he permitted none, but in the finer and greater qualities he was somewhat lacking.

ALEXANDER MCARTHUR.

The Thursday evening concert—for this season the society gives a pair of concerts, afternoon and evening, instead of rehearsal and concert, as formerly—also drew a large audience, which heard the orchestra play most sympathetically Schumann's symphony No. 2, C major, and Mr. Rosenthal Scharwenka's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor. While the rendering of both was eminently satisfactory, neither was felt to have been the most pleasing selection that the society could offer. This was emphasized by Mr. Rosenthal's choice of Chopin's Berceuse for an encore, and by Straus's tone poem, "Don Juan," the subsequent orchestral number. The latter inspiring piece of music (inspiring despite its lack of relation to the poem) was followed by the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan," and served perfectly to restore the equanimity of the audience.

Journal
Nov 21

Do you remember how the New York critics used to maul and bash Mr. Emil Paur when he was conductor of the Boston Symphony? Now that he is a conductor in New York they have seen a greater light than that which dazed Saul of Tarsus. Here is a quotation from the Times of Nov. 19:

"Boston must look to her orchestral laurels. We have no Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, while certain members of the Musical Mutual Protective Union live we shall not be permitted to have any such organization. But we have a conductor whose constitution comprises an active brain and red blood, and who shows no inclination whatever to wear smoked glasses when he reads scores, nor to wear kid gloves when he wields the baton. His name is Emil Paur. We got him from Boston, which got him from Leipsic, and had not the desire—or the wisdom—to keep him."

[illegible] 21 1898.

Mr. Kneisel Conducts the Symphony Concert.

"The best laid plans of men and mice gang aft agley!"

Our New England climate has seized our conductor by the throat so that gargles and mustard plasters temporarily ousted symphonies and overtures from his sphere of activity on Saturday. Therefore the concert orator, so rarely heard in symphony concerts, came forth to announce a change of conductor and a slight change of programme; Mr. Kneisel was to assume command and Tschaikowsky's "Mozartiana" was to give place to the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

It is a delight to know that even so serious a mischance as the illness of the conductor does not disarrange the schedule of a symphony concert in Boston to any great degree; in operatic management they make very little of substituting "Trovatore" for "Die Walkuere" when illness strikes in.

Mr. Kneisel was warmly greeted as he took the stand and certainly did remarkably good work under the circumstances, giving a decisive beat and catching the mock-heroic spirit of the "Barber of Bagdad" overture, by Cornelius, in an excellent manner.

There was a time when Peter Cornelius was a party matter in music; when the Wagnerians proclaimed him as "the German Cherubini" and the conservatives viewed his opera as an excitable bull views a red flag; that day is fortunately gone by and enough of the composer remains to justify his efforts. Yet it is impossible to grasp the humor of the overture played on Saturday without knowing something of the plot, without understanding the bombastic title of the tonsorial artist given by thundering brasses, without comprehending that the comical element is here almost always grandiloquous. This it was that escaped the comprehension of many of the conservative critics in Germany, and led Hanslick to say—"this barber must shave with guillotines instead of razors!"

Great applause followed the performance and the conductor "pro tem" at once found himself in touch with his audience.

Now followed St. Saen's violoncello concerto with Mr. Alwin Schroeder as soloist. It was not good 'cello weather, the dampness of the atmosphere affecting the strings somewhat, but Mr. Schroeder is too great an artist to allow weather, or anything else, to affect his intonation.

The work is not a great one but is very graceful and is an effective display of the technical stock-in-trade of the soloist. Its orchestration is always fluent, its themes, particularly a dance-theme which the orchestra skilfully intertwines with more earnest solo-work, are piquant and elegant.

Of Mr. Schroeder's work only praise can be spoken; the broad C string playing was very effective, the harmonics were as clear as if they were given upon a violin, and the cadenza introduced about everything that is difficult in violoncello work.

The orchestral support, barring one unfortunate anticipation of the conductor's beat by a violin, was very good. Mr. Schroeder was recalled over and over again, and certainly deserved his triumph.

The Volkmann symphony in D minor came next. Clear in form even to formalism, conservative in orchestration, the musician sees in Volkmann a faithful follower of the classical paths, and this is not without its charm in "these most brisk and giddy-paced times."

It develops its first figure in a very intelligible, yet sufficiently dramatic manner, and its first movement is virile and dramatic without tearing a passion to tatters. Its second movement gave a splendid opportunity to the clarinette, which was taken advantage of and the chief theme was played by that instrument with most pleasing quality of tone. The Scherzo is not at all playful but is vehement and dramatic; its Trio is in excellent contrast.

Altogether the work is one which can be comfortably enjoyed without any rhapsodies whatever; it exhibits talent rather than genius.

The "Tannhaeuser" overture went splendidly; our orchestra has played this so often that we believe they could give it without any conductor. This feat is said to have been accomplished once by the Meiningen orchestra when Bulow was its guiding spirit; the conductor was detained and came to the concert late, it is said, just in time to hear his band win a success in this overture without any leader.

What a robust band of pilgrims Wagner gives us in this overture! After they return from a long journey to Rome they give their typical theme with ten times the power that it had at the beginning of the journey! But it is a grand apotheosis; the Roses and Rapture of Vice (as represented by piccolos and cymbals) are totally crushed out by the religious, but somewhat bigoted trombones. The brasses roared as in the olden days and the violins gave their trying figures with unparallelled vigor

Altogether it is one of the greatest climaxes that even Wagner ever attained, and the fact that he cut it out and replaced it with a very dreary transition into the first act, in the "revised version" (prepared for the Paris performances) is an everlasting proof of the great loyalty which this radical felt to his "theories," to the highest ideal of Art as he understood it.

Spite of the fact that Mr. Kneisel's musicianship and the splendid discipline of the men carried the concert to success, we all hope that Jupiter Serenator will restore our conductor to us by the end of the week.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible]
SUNDAY, NOV [illegible]

Symphony Concert.

The fifth of this season's Symphony concerts was given last evening, and, as usual, the attendance was limited only by the capacity of Music hall. Conductor Gericke presented a program that was notable for a display of intellectuality rather than melody or variety. It consisted of the overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," by Peter Cornelius, concerto for violincello in A minor by Camille Saint-Saens, "Mozartina" suit by Tschaikowsky and symphony No. 1 in D minor by Robert Volkmann.

Mr Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and needless to state he received a very cordial reception from both the audience and his associates in the orchestra. Mr Schroeder's position as the leading cello soloist of Boston was won by artistic merit alone, and no one will pretend to assert that he is not entitled to retain this place of prominence. His performance of the Saint-Saens concerto, a deservedly popular composition, was admirable in all respects. It was an intelligent and sympathetic interpretation, artistically brilliant and technically irreproachable. The half dozen recalls which rewarded his performance were well deserved.

The one novelty on the program, and for the selection of which conductor Gericke should be cordially thanked, was the "Mozartina." This is a suite composed of four pieces by Mozart, gigue, minuet, rhapsody on "Ave verum" and 10 variations on a theme in G major, scored for orchestra by Tschaikowsky. Although giving it a brilliant setting of distinctly modern orchestration, Tschaikowsky has succeeded in preserving the spirit of the original music, and this happy blending of the new with the old is productive of delightfully artistic results. Especially pleasing to yesterday's audience was the "Ave verum," which is truly a noble example of a delicious theme exquisitely harmonized.

Conductor Gericke gave a broad and intelligent reading of the Volkmann symphony, and it is not too high praise to say that the splendid work has never been given here in a more thoroughly satisfactory manner. "The Barber of Bagdad" overture is rarely found on concert programs, and although it contains much that is interesting, even entertaining, there are so many other available works of superior merit that it is not entitled to much prominence.

Mrs Marian Titus will be the soloist at this week's rehearsal and concert. She will sing two arias and the orchestra's numbers will be "Fingal's Cave" overture by Mendelssohn, "La Mer," symphonic sketches by Paul Gibson, and "Les Preludes" by Liszt.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1898.

Mr. Gericke's fifth Symphony programme did not exactly palpitate with interest, although he did let himself stray so far from the path of conservatism as to trust the orchestra with one new thing—the "Mozartiana" of Tschaikowsky. There was no very great confidence required, for the work turned out to be only a fairly clever and reasonably respectful instrumentalizing of four selections from the classic master—two being from a set of small pianoforte pieces, one the favorite "Ave verum" chorus, so often sung by Boston choirs, and the other a theme with variations, also a piano composition. As the first novelty of the season—and, indeed, the only one promised thus far—this suite had merely moderate interest and much less worth. The orchestra went through it readily and skilfully according to their careful directing. The bright, diversified and sometimes even piquant "Barber of Bagdad" overture of Peter Cornelius began the programme cheerfully, and there were both dexterity and grace in the treatment of its elusive figures and its flying fancies. Mr. Schroeder followed it with a truly superb rendering of the violocello concerto in A minor, opus 33, of Saint-Saens which is still fresh, entertaining and valuable after more than thirty years of acquaintance. No doubt its brevity, its melodiousness and its disregard of the conventionality of three separate movements, have helped to keep it vital, spirited and attractive to audiences; but the composer's great knowledge of what tends to the advantage of the instruments for which he has chosen to write his concertos, has its influence and its power. Mr. Schroeder reached a degree of virtuosity in execution during the cadenzas and ornate passages which a violinist might envy, drew a noble richness of tone from the graver portions and proved his ever ripening art in the fine sense and shape of his reading. The "Mozartiana" came after him, and Volkmann's first symphony—D minor, opus 44,—whose almost bitter severity is never long broken in upon by any hopeful animation and whose sombre coloring is only relieved, not dominated, by brighter hues, ended the programme. Its strong, engrossing movements were played with perfect intelligence and proportion, and energy and determination often swelled high; but there was no movement of real passion, either of despair or courage, so that the spiritual conflict which it has been thought to typify never seemed one for life and death. There was some eminent individual playing during the concert—especially the long and tender cantabile for the clarinet in the andante of the symphony, various obbligati for the flute, oloe and solo first violin, and several phrases of the first horn, which spoke in a voice almost as large and resonant as if Reiter himself were blowing.

The next programme has nothing but well established acquaintance—Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, Liszt's "Preludes" and Gilson's "Sea" sketches. Mrs. Titus will sing twice.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

is more hapiness, and it leaves a distinct impression of the latter; certainly it does as it was played on Friday. Gericke could not have pleased a Brooklyn audience more than by putting that on his program. Thomas put more effect of changeful expression in it, and Seidl emphasized the tragedy of it, but it was never given with more gracious elegance than then.

As to Rosenthal. He was received without tremendous applause, but what was reserved gave added effect to that which followed his playing, when he was forced to return to the stage and bow again and again. He played Chopin's beautiful concerto in E minor with a dexterity of manipulation that showed with wonderful effect in the passage at the end of a rondo, which he took with a speed that made one breathless. But he subdued his manual skill to the beauty of the music in the diminished chords, played pianissimo, and as arpeggi, which had an accompaniment of equally exquisite taste and piano effect from the oboes.

It was a surprise to most of us that the accompaniment was played by the full orchestra, instead of with a somewhat reduced force in the strings.

Personally I enjoyed Rosenthal's playing better on Friday than on Saturday evening. But that was partly caused by the selection. The Scharwenka concerto is impressive as an exhibition of technic, and is, of course, of much interest, and some of the orchestration is striking. It is full of fireworks, which were tremendously applauded, and which were played with a truly marvelous mechanical skill. At its close the player was applauded again and again and yet again. Probably Mr. Rosenthal is one of those artists who feels that an encore is an extra number and should be paid for as such. Anyway he took his revenge by finally returning to the piano and playing down to what he seemed to consider the intellect of his hearers by giving them a Strauss waltz.

But in justice to himself he made it an apotheosis of a waltz, with the theme twisted and turned, embellished with roulades, glissades, trills, triolets, three octave chords, fifths, octaves, chromatics and all the fol-lals mentioned in the exercise books. His hands seemed to be in six places at once. He literally played like lightning. The orchestra leaned forward with their eyes fixed in wonder on those hands, and when he finished with some scales and octaves played at a rate that did not seem possible to one having merely human mechanism at his command, they joined with the audience in applause for the sparkling dazzlement of the exhibition.

The rest of the program was delightful as music. The strings sang through Goldmark's graceful "Spring" overture with a beauty of ensemble and exact attack, and were a perfect support for the rest of the orchestra. The "Vysehrad," the first number of Smetana's cyclus, "My Country," was the only new thing on the program, and more than fulfilled the promises made for it. It was strongly suggestive of the "Parsifal" music, the scene in the Hall of the Knights and at times of the Rhinegold, the likeness being found in the flowing harmony of the strings. It is a picture drawn with the strong hand and effective outlining of a Diaz, making one long to hear the other five numbers, especially if there are more such solos for the harp in them.

The great music of the night, however, was the Tschaikowsky symphony in B minor, the "Pathetique," and Mr. Gericke interpreted it magnificently, bringing out all the wonderful tonal qualities of his orchestra and making one feel that there was nothing further to be desired in its rendition. At its close the orchestra rose long before its hearers had recovered from the spell of the lamentation of the finale.

The orchestra has changed but little in its personnel since it was last here. Leo Schulz, the 'cellist, is now a soloist, the drummer and his shining kettledrums are new and so are the players on oboes and the first flutist, the others having gone down on the Bourgogne. So many Brooklyn people were lost then that these new faces in the orchestra brought up the horror afresh.

A New Music Hall at Last.

As the old Music Hall corporation has sold its property to the Boston Real Estate Trust, the directors of the new Boston Music Hall have decided that a new hall should be built as soon as possible on the property purchased at the corner of Massachusetts avenue and Huntington avenue. To this end the committee having in charge the securing of subscriptions, Messrs. E. W. Hooper, H. F. Sears and H. L. Higginson, ask that subscribers to the $500,000 capital stock make full payment in order that new stock may be issued therefor before the building contracts are to be signed. The total subscriptions for a new music hall in 1893 amounted to $402,500, from 406 subscribers. Three hundred and sixty-four have already paid in $208,750. As there still remains $98,500 stock of the $500,000 capital unsubscribed for, the committee is desirous of securing new subscriptions.

The call for the final payment of the subscriptions asks that the money be paid in on or before December 1. The first portions of the subscriptions were paid very promptly and the committee expects this final payment to be met with equal promptness, and it is thought that the additional $100,000 needed will also be raised quickly.

As soon as this second payment is in, contracts will at once be signed for the building. The plans are in the hands of Mr. McKim, of McKim, Meade & White. The new Music Hall will be built on lines similar to the present building, with modifications based on the Music Hall at Leipsic. The Leipsic hall is considered the best in Europe.

HOME JOURNAL.
NOVEMBER 16. 18

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Wednesday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke having succeeded Mr. Emil Paur as conductor, the most musically educated among the audience were unusually curious and critical. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal was soloist, and the programme was made up of Weber's "Euryanthe," overture; Chopin's "E minor" concerto; Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56*a*;" and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony."

Outside of the overture, the best work done by the orchestra was, strange to say, in a composition that has always been considered by critics as non-orchestral—the Chopin "Concerto." It was ideally beautiful, and as unlike the dull rendering that long acquaintance has made familiar as painted sunset skies are to the real. In nuance, in poetic charm, and in that thing hardest of all to find, balance, the conception was superb. By contrast Mr. Rosenthal's playing was both soulless and tedious. As an exhibition of technique, of velocity, and lightness his work in the last movement was admirable, or, rather, would have been had he been giving us an etude; but alas for Chopin traditions!—those traditions that bedimmed so many beautiful eyes, and that are the "soul of the sweetness" of Chopin's muse—they were wofully misrepresented, and, when not misrepresented, were ignored.

In the Brahms variations the orchestra was not up to expectations. Very few conductors can evade tediousness with Brahms, and it seems that Mr. Gericke is not one of these. He gave us a rendering that was note-correct, but wanting in tone balance, and for this reason wooden.

There still remained the symphony, but it must be confessed that even in this Mr. Gericke was somewhat of a disappointment; and here the weakness of the orchestra, the wood wind, was specially noticeable. How cold, too, and lifeless was the rendering of the andante! Taken as a whole, Mr. Gericke's work as to methods was accurate and scholarly. He took no liberties, and he permitted none, but in the finer and greater qualities he was somewhat lacking.

Alexander McArthur.

The Thursday evening concert—for this season the society gives a pair of concerts, afternoon and evening, instead of rehearsal and concert, as formerly—also drew a large audience, which heard the orchestra play most sympathetically Schumann's symphony No. 2, C major, and Mr. Rosenthal Scharwenka's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor. While the rendering of both was eminently satisfactory, neither was felt to have been the most pleasing selection that the society could offer. This was emphasized by Mr. Rosenthal's choice of Chopin's Berceuse for an encore, and by Straus's tone poem, "Don Juan," the subsequent orchestral number. The latter inspiring piece of music (inspiring despite its lack of relation to the poem) was followed by the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan," and served perfectly to restore the equanimity of the audience.

Journal
Nov 21

Do you remember how the New York critics used to maul and bash Mr. Emil Paur when he was conductor of the Boston Symphony? Now that he is a conductor in New York they have seen a greater light than that which dazed Saul of Tarsus. Here is a quotation from the Times of Nov. 19:

"Boston must look to her orchestral laurels. We have no Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, while certain members of the Musical Mutual Protective Union live we shall not be permitted to have any such organization. But we have a conductor whose constitution comprises an active brain and red blood, and who shows no inclination whatever to wear smoked glasses when he reads scores, nor to wear kid gloves when he wields the baton. His name is Emil Paur. We got him from Boston, which got him from Leipsic, and had not the desire—or the wisdom—to keep him."

TON EVENING RECORD
NOVEMBER 21 1898.

Mr. Kneisel Conducts the Symphony Concert.

"The best laid plans of men and mice gang aft agley!"

Our New England climate has seized our conductor by the throat so that gargles and mustard plasters temporarily ousted symphonies and overtures from his sphere of activity on Saturday. Therefore the concert orator, so rarely heard in symphony concerts, came forth to announce a change of conductor and a slight change of programme; Mr. Kneisel was to assume command and Tschaikowsky's "Mozartiana" was to give place to the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

It is a delight to know that even so serious a mischance as the illness of the conductor does not disarrange the schedule of a symphony concert in Boston to any great degree; in operatic management they make very little of substituting "Trovatore" for "Die Walkuere" when illness strikes in.

Mr. Kneisel was warmly greeted as he took the stand and certainly did remarkably good work under the circumstances, giving a decisive beat and catching the mock-heroic spirit of the "Barber of Bagdad" overture, by Cornelius, in an excellent manner.

There was a time when Peter Cornelius was a party matter in music; when the Wagnerians proclaimed him as "the German Cherubini" and the conservatives viewed his opera as an excitable bull views a red flag; that day is fortunately gone by and enough of the composer remains to justify his efforts. Yet it is impossible to grasp the humor of the overture played on Saturday without knowing something of the plot, without understanding the bombastic title of the tonsorial artist given by thundering brasses, without comprehending that the comical element is here almost always grandiloquous. This it was that escaped the comprehension of many of the conservative critics in Germany, and led Hanslick to say—"this barber must shave with guillotines instead of razors!"

Great applause followed the performance and the conductor "pro tem" at once found himself in touch with his audience.

Now followed St. Saen's violoncello concerto with Mr. Alwin Schroeder as soloist. It was not good 'cello weather, the dampness of the atmosphere affecting the strings somewhat, but Mr. Schroeder is too great an artist to allow weather, or anything else, to affect his intonation.

The work is not a great one but is very graceful and is an effective display of the technical stock-in-trade of the soloist. Its orchestration is always fluent, its themes, particularly a dance-theme which the orchestra skilfully intertwines with more earnest solo-work, are piquant and elegant.

Of Mr. Schroeder's work only praise can be spoken; the broad C string playing was very effective, the harmonics were as clear as if they were given upon a violin, and the cadenza introduced about everything that is difficult in violoncello work.

The orchestral support, barring one unfortunate anticipation of the conductor's beat by a violin, was very good. Mr. Schroeder was recalled over and over again, and certainly deserved his triumph.

The Volkmann symphony in D minor came next. Clear in form even to formalism, conservative in orchestration, the musician sees in Volkmann a faithful follower of the classical paths, and this is not without its charm in "these most brisk and giddy-paced times."

It develops its first figure in a very intelligible, yet sufficiently dramatic manner, and its first movement is virile and dramatic without tearing a passion to tatters. Its second movement gave a splendid opportunity to the clarinette, which was taken advantage of and the chief theme was played by that instrument with most pleasing quality of tone. The Scherzo is not at all playful but is vehement and dramatic; its Trio is in excellent contrast.

Altogether the work is one which can be comfortably enjoyed without any rhapsodies whatever; it exhibits talent rather than genius.

The "Tannhaeuser" overture went splendidly; our orchestra has played this so often that we believe they could give it without any conductor. This feat is said to have been accomplished once by the Meiningen orchestra when Bulow was its guiding spirit; the conductor was detained and came to the concert late, it is said, just in time to hear his band win a success in this overture without any leader.

What a robust band of pilgrims Wagner gives us in this overture! After they return from a long journey to Rome they give their typical theme with ten times the power that it had at the beginning of the journey! But it is a grand apotheosis; the Roses and Rapture of Vice (as represented by piccolos and cymbals) are totally crushed out by the religious, but somewhat bigoted trombones. The brasses roared as in the olden days and the violins gave their trying figures with unparallelled vigor

Altogether it is one of the greatest climaxes that even Wagner ever attained, and the fact that he cut it out and replaced it with a very dreary transition into the first act, in the "revised version" (prepared for the Paris performances) is an everlasting proof of the great loyalty which this radical felt to his "theories," to the highest ideal of Art as he understood it.

Spite of the fact that Mr. Kneisel's musicianship and the splendid discipline of the men carried the concert to success, we all hope that Jupiter Serenator will restore our conductor to us by the end of the week.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV 20, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The fifth of this season's Symphony concerts was given last evening, and, as usual, the attendance was limited only by the capacity of Music hall. Conductor Gericke presented a program that was notable for a display of intellectuality rather than melody or variety. It consisted of the overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," by Peter Cornelius, concerto for violincello in A minor by Camille Saint-Saens, "Mozartina" suit by Tschaikowsky and symphony No. 1 in D minor by Robert Volkmann.

Mr Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and needless to state he received a very cordial reception from both the audience and his associates in the orchestra. Mr Schroeder's position as the leading cello soloist of Boston was won by artistic merit alone, and no one will pretend to assert that he is not entitled to retain this place of prominence. His performance of the Saint-Saens concerto, a deservedly popular composition, was admirable in all respects. It was an intelligent and sympathetic interpretation, artistically brilliant and technically irreproachable. The half dozen recalls which rewarded his performance were well deserved.

The one novelty on the program, and for the selection of which conductor Gericke should be cordially thanked, was the "Mozartina." This is a suite composed of four pieces by Mozart, gigue, minuet, rhapsody on "Ave verum" and 10 variations on a theme in G major, scored for orchestra by Tschaikowsky. Although giving it a brilliant setting of distinctly modern orchestration, Tschaikowsky has succeeded in preserving the spirit of the original music, and this happy blending of the new with the old is productive of delightfully artistic results. Especially pleasing to yesterday's audience was the "Ave verum,' which is truly a noble example of a delicious theme exquisitely harmonized.

Conductor Gericke gave a broad and intelligent reading of the Volkmann symphony, and it is not too high praise to say that the splendid work has never been given here in a more thoroughly satisfactory manner. "The Barber of Bagdad" overture is rarely found on concert programs, and although it contains much that is interesting, even entertaining, there are so many other available works of superior merit that it is not entitled to much prominence.

Mrs Marian Titus will be the soloist at this week's rehearsal and concert. She will sing two arias and the orchestra's numbers will be "Fingal's Cave" overture by Mendelssohn, "La Mer," symphonic sketches by Paul Gibson, and "Les Preludes" by Liszt.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1898.

Mr. Gericke's fifth Symphony programme did not exactly palpitate with interest, although he did let himself stray so far from the path of conservatism as to trust the orchestra with one new thing—the "Mozartiana" of Tschaikowsky. There was no very great confidence required, for the work turned out to be only a fairly clever and reasonably respectful instrumentalizing of four selections from the classic master—two being from a set of small pianoforte pieces, one the favorite "Ave verum" chorus, so often sung by Boston choirs, and the other a theme with variations, also a piano composition. As the first novelty of the season—and, indeed, the only one promised thus far—this suite had merely moderate interest and much less worth. The orchestra went through it readily and skilfully according to their careful directing. The bright, diversified and sometimes even piquant "Barber of Bagdad" overture of Peter Cornelius began the programme cheerfully, and there were both dexterity and grace in the treatment of its elusive figures and its flying fancies. Mr. Schroeder followed it with a truly superb rendering of the violocello concerto in A minor, opus 33, of Saint-Saens which is still fresh, entertaining and valuable after more than thirty years of acquaintance. No doubt its brevity, its melodiousness and its disregard of the conventionality of three separate movements, have helped to keep it vital, spirited and attractive to audiences; but the composer's great knowledge of what tends to the advantage of the instruments for which he has chosen to write his concertos, has its influence and its power. Mr. Schroeder reached a degree of virtuosity in execution during the cadenzas and ornate passages which a violinist might envy, drew a noble richness of tone from the graver portions and proved his ever ripening art in the fine sense and shape of his reading. The "Mozartiana" came after him, and Volkmann's first symphony—D minor, opus 44,—whose almost bitter severity is never long broken in upon by any hopeful animation and whose sombre coloring is only relieved, not dominated, by brighter hues, ended the programme. Its strong, engrossing movements were played with perfect intelligence and proportion, and energy and determination often swelled high; but there was no movement of real passion, either of despair or courage, so that the spiritual conflict which it has been thought to typify never seemed one for life and death. There was some eminent individual playing during the concert—especially the long and tender cantabile for the clarinet in the andante of the symphony, various obbligati for the flute, oboe and solo first violin, and several phrases of the first horn, which spoke in a voice almost as large and resonant as if Reiter himself were blowing.

The next programme has nothing but well established acquaintance—Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, Liszt's "Preludes" and Gilson's "Sea" sketches. Mrs. Titus will sing twice.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

NOV 19 1898

CONCERTS AND CONDUCTORS.

The Philharmonic Society of New York.

The history and influences of the Philharmonic Society make up a career of such dignity and benevolence that we may properly be anxious whenever something like a new chapter is to be opened. A new conductor almost inevitably must mean such a chapter. Between the Society's outset, far back in the winter of 1842–3, and last spring, just six leaders have been its pilots—Eisfeld, Bergmann, Neundorff, Leopold Damrosch, Thomas, and Seidl. When Mr. Seidl's death deprived the Society of his services and his personal prestige, there were many troublous considerations affecting not only the choice of a successor (whom the actual players in the Society's band elect), but his utility. For at least a dozen years the Society's orchestra has suffered artistically, while no firmer pecuniary support could be asked from a great public more devoted than keen.. Rehearsals have been scanted; and rehearsals are the marrow of symphonic duty. The new and auxiliary musicians have not always been well chosen, and when above par they have been tantalizingly kept in the rear of serviceableness. Again, many of the Philharmonic's authoritative players have lost the fire of youth, have become wonted to playing as a bit of annual mechanics, and so the interpretations of works, both new and old, have lacked eloquence and virtuosity. Temperament is a gift to be cherished, but it evaporates in academic musical air. Moreover, the veteran musician is not apt to new schooling, not tender to being kept up to his full duty and nervosity. The vielles moustaches of an orchestra have their own ideas. Like Hubert in "Ivanhoe"—"My grandsire drew a good bow at the Battle of Hastings and never played at such a mark in his life and—neither will I." Such members of an orchestra would rather have King Log than King Stork. Should King Stork be chosen and persist in being every inch a king, why, the symphonic frog-pond can make his reign a fine purgatory for him.

An old Society's new Leadership and new Season begun.

Mr. Emil Paur's selection in Mr. Seidl's place wounded no sentimentalities, could augur only a rule of the highest musical capability and conscientiousness. Yet there were misgivings in our minds as to Mr. Paur's concrete success when the time for work should come. Never was a concert-director summoned to a post more demanding tact, firmness, knowledge of human nature, and insight into a special status in quo, for reasons quite below general public observation. Mr. Paur could be trusted for his part. But would he be met half-way? The Philharmonic's public seemed to expect so, for never has the Society's year set out with a more splendid subscription. The patrons already have their reward. The first concerts seem conclusive of Mr. Paur's personal esteem from his great charge, and of the new life that he will breathe into it. I have heard the Philharmonic for some twenty-odd years. I have not heard it play in a dozen seasons with the vigor, the ensemble quality of tone, and with the precision in the work of individual members which entered into its opening rehearsal and concert for this fifty-seventh season. The musicians—yes, even Mr. Arnold and Mr. Schmitt and Mr. Roebbelen, and many more of the honored conscript fathers of the Society—seemed to have had a sip of the Fountain of Youth. They watched their new leader as a man to be watched, and perceptibly they obeyed him. The quality of the great orchestra's tone is noticeably more refined, rounded, and solidified already, and it continually leaped to a life quite new. The strings rose to a noble sonority; the wood-wind group—never the Philharmonic's golden treasury—was more intent on nuances and tone than it has been since Mr. Thomas's days of authority. The brass was mellower, and significantly discreet or alert in turn. The programme gave well-worn numbers, but wisely picked—Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" prelude, Brahms's B flat piano-forte concerto, and Beethoven's Symphony in A. Mr. Paur is, beyond doubt, one of the truest "readers" and leaders of Beethoven now before any public, and again came evidence thereof. The Brahms concerto (perhaps the most beautiful one yet written) brought again to New York auditors Miss Adele aus der Ohe. Her absence from us has certainly not lessened by a shade her exquisite, sensitive, reserved art, and that charm of sincerity and high musicianship that has set her apart from a thousand other pianists of her sex in a profession so over-crowded that often there seems hardly room where she is—at the top.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra: Mr. Wilhelm Gericke returns.

The procession of this winter's great concerts is fairly forward. There was nothing if not success and enthusiasm in the entrance last week, on Wednesday and Thursday, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on a thirteenth season that has none of the omens belonging to the number mentioned. How insidiously do years and orchestral anniversaries succeed! These orchestras and singers and players betray us pitilessly by their beguilements. Last week, strikingly less than real seemed the flight of so much time since the Boston Orchestra first came to us. With Mr. Gericke it came. Long terms, new leaders, have intervened. But now was not Mr. Gericke again here, tall and straight, before us bodily and vigorously once more?—looking in every essential detail quite the same disciplinarian, the same vigilant creator of the Orchestra's glory, that he was when he left his charge. Mr. Gericke, too, was conducting it to-day with all that admirable leadership, calm yet inspiring, unostentatious yet dignified, which charmed us aforetime. The Orchestra's experiment of afternoon concerts here (with programmes quite other than those of the evening series, though with identical soloists) opens with every outward success. Both concerts, in fact, were crowded. Both repeated the cordiality toward Mr. Gericke, and the intent, discriminating delight in the Orchestra which warmed to its yearly visits under his direction of old, not to speak of our regard for the work of the many seasons when Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur have been the leaders before us. The band this year has turned to Carnegie Hall for its auditorium, an excellent change from the dreadful hollow of the Metropolitan's area. The effect of the playing of the afternoon and evening was vastly the gainer by the removal. The programmes respectively offered (a) Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Chopin's piano-forte concerto in E minor, Brahms's "Chorale 'St. Antoni'" variations, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; and (b) Schumann's symphony in C major, Scharwenka's second concerto for piano-forte, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" tone-poem, and the prelude and death-finale of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist. It is of interest to notice that Mr. Gericke finds the band he now redirects as little altered in actual personnel by the decade as he himself is by his absence. Less than a dozen changes have occurred. But in gradual and sure progress upward toward a perfection of ensemble not surpassed by any symphonic organization either in America or Europe, the Orchestra has passed into a finer individuality, season by season, not a little with thanks to the integrity of its wise early adjustment under the director who is once more at its head to-day.

Max Alvary. 1856–98.

The note of personal tragedy always sounds more dolorous in connection with the stage than under any other circumstances, especially if the sorrow come untimely. The death of Max Alvary, which has occurred in his German home, must have been a shock and regret to a great circle of the American musical public. Mr. Alvary's career was built on his brilliant and just American successes as a member of the German companies who gave us especially such bright pages of our Wagnerian chronicle between 1883 and 1890–1. His début here occurred in the autumn of 1885. Like many German tenors, Mr. Alvary had a better voice than skill in its use, and was, on the whole, more an artist in his diction and acting than a really accomplished opera-singer. But his free and magnetic art as an actor, the resonance of a tenor voice originally not "heroic," but rapidly developed in its volume and fibre, and his personal charm, captivated all the public. He became its bright star, and he had no rival. As Adolar in Weber's "Euryanthe" Alvary was a real individuality; as Assad in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," as Loge in Wagner's "Rheingold," scarcely less so. He was a charming Walther, too, in "Die Meistersinger." But of all his impersonations his Siegfried—the boyish Siegfried of the third Nibelungen music-drama—was the most unapproachable. We have never had another Siegfried like him, and we shall never have one. Alvary was as if born for this part, and he made it his own with a verve and beauty to haunt the eye and the ear through a lifetime. It is in just that remembrance that I have taken out of a large pile of portraits of him lying at my hand, not his every-day self, but his Siegfried identity, as it was before us in 1887 or 1888, in all its graceful and statuesque beauty. Mr. Alvary last returned to America early in 1896, and though singing less effectively, was welcomed with renewed favor. About three years ago accident created a lingering and dreadful disease—cancer of the stomach. His career was closed. I understand that, through no fault of his, it was closed in poverty, and that his family are penniless. His life was the romance of a gentleman, a successful artist, and a nature of beautiful refinement and perceptiveness, suddenly cast into shadow and an untimely fate. It is only in such lovely fables as Andersen's "The Nightingale" that Death can be kept away by a song!

The Castle Square Company's Chief Lack.

The Castle Square Company is reviving a special success of last year—"Carmen." As usual, Bizet's masterpiece has the fullest attention from a public that grows more and more general. "Il Trovatore," "Roméo et Juliette," and "The Pirates of Penzance" have succeeded each other recently. The principal lack of this interesting and faithful organization, of which much may come, is a couple of light tenors who have good looks as well as good voices and training, and a considerable repertory into the bargain. Both Mr. Sheehan and Mr. Lavin are wholly insufficient or ill placed in romantic opera.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 20, 1898.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The unusually bad weather of last night brought about some surprising conditions in the Symphony concert. In the first place it kept Conductor Gericke at home, the announcement having been made prior to the concert that, owing to a severe cold, his physician had forbidden him to go out. In his place, therefore, Mr. Kneisel assumed the conductor's stand and the indulgence of the audience, which was asked for at the outset, was not warranted, as judged by general results. (Mr. Gericke's absence necessitated a slight rearrangement of the programme and the "Mozartiana" suite of Tchaikowsky was omitted and the overture to "Tannhauser" was introduced as a finale to an altogether interesting programme.

If memory serves us right, this was the second time Mr. Kneisel has conducted the Symphony band, and, as he was given a most cordial reception on his entrance and also loudly applauded after each number, it would seem that the audience took kindly to the innovation. Mr. Kneisel conducts with much force and authority, using his left hand quite as much as his right. In the Volkmann symphony he showed careful discrimination and brought out all the underlying beauties of the score. As for the "Tannhauser" overture, we can recollect few times when it has been more beautifully played; in fact, it has long ago become apparent that this band takes great delight in interpreting Wagner.

The soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, who was heard in one of Saint-Saens's concertos for 'cello. His tones were wonderfully pure and sweet, and the solo instrument with the merest suggestion of an orchestral accompaniment produced the most beautiful effect. Mr. Schroeder received several recalls for his artistic playing.

At next Saturday's concert Mrs. Marian Titus will sing and the composers to be heard are Mendelssohn, Paul Gilson and Liszt.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Mr. Kneisel Conducted, for Mr. Gericke Is Suffering From a Severe Cold—A Change in the Program Was Therefore Necessary.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"......Cornelius
Concerto for 'Cello in A minor....Saint-Saëns
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony No. 1 in D minor ....Volkmann
Overture, "Tannhäuser"..............Wagner

Mr. Gericke, it appears, is suffering from a severe cold, and physicians considered it would be imprudent for him to lead the orchestra last night and expose himself to the dismal weather. That the audience might not be disappointed, Mr. Kneisel, at exceedingly short notice, kindly consented to lead in his stead. Mr. Kneisel, who has before this succeeded admirably as a conductor under trying circumstances, again showed coolness and ability. It is to be hoped that Mr. Gericke will soon recover, and his many friends—for is not the whole audience his friend?—extend him their heartfelt sympathy.

⁂

The editor of the program-book says that Cornelius's "Barbier von Bagdad" was brought out at Weimar in 1859. It was first performed there Dec. 15, 1858.

The editor, following his beloved custom, gives a technical analysis that is of no use to professional or amateur, "Greek nor Jew, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free." It would have been more to the point if he had explained that the striking theme given at the beginning to the brass is the theme that introduces the Barber in the opera: "Abul Hasan Ali Ebn Bekar."

This overture is a singular piece, in that the composer seems to have one foot on the safe rock of conventionality and to be exploring with the other for new ground. There are brilliant passages, and there are lapses into the old-fashioned theatre-overture; there is sparkling orchestration, and there is also the evident attempt of the German to be light-footed in his orchestral gait.

⁂

Saint-Saëns's 'cello concert was first played by Tolbecque Jan. 19, 1873, at the Paris Conservatory. Whatever Saint-Saëns undertakes is generally well-done; for he has a sure and fluent technic. This concerto is not one that appeals to the empty-headed 'cellist, for with the exception of the delightful minuet there is little in the work to please the mere virtuoso-friend. The themes are thought out rather than spontaneous, and there are few direct appeals to easily-aroused emotions. The literature for the 'cello with orchestra is not rich, and serious soloists must often be perplexed in the matter of a becoming and effective selection. Mr. Schroeder played in most musician-like manner, with sure technic that was never wantonly displayed—in fact, Mr. Schroeder almost apologizes for the ease with which he overcomes difficulties—with beauty of tone, with fine and discriminating feeling, and with the repose of the true master of an instrument. The audience was quick to appreciate the beauty of the performance.

⁂

Mr. Gericke is probably fond of Volkmann's Symphony in D minor, for it was the first symphony led by him when he took command of the Boston Orchestra Oct. 18, 1884. I confess that much of this work is to me tiresome. The austerity of the first movement is not displeasing, although I prefer the noble austerity of Cherubini, whose classic figure was apparently in Volkmann's mind. There is an effective passage in the slow movement where the horns persist against the strings, but there is also the thought of Abt, and once I feared that Volkmann was about to call in the aid of a male quartet, with "There's Moonlight on the Lake." The trio of the scherzo is not without prettiness, but the finale, with its pedagogic counterpoint, reminds me of Conservatory students who plot out a fugue with Dux et Comes as though they were planting cabbages. The andante gave an opportunity for agreeable solo display on the part of certain members of the wind choir. The symphony, as a whole, was played at times with a roughness that under the circumstances was excusable.

Mr. Kneisel was most heartily applauded when he took his position, and after the various selections.

⁂

The program of the concert Saturday night, as now announced, will be:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ......Mendelssohn
"La Mer," Symphonic Sketches .Paul Gilson
Les Preludes ....Liszt

Mrs. Marian Titus will sing.

Philip Hale.

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Kneisel Conducts Owing to the Illness of Mr. Gericke.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fifth concert. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, soloist. The programme:

Overture—"Barber of Bagdad" ....Cornelius
Concerto for 'Cello in A minor.......Saint-Saens
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony No. 1 in D minor..........Volkmann
Overture—"Tannhauser" ....Wagner

Owing to the indisposition of Mr. Gericke, the duty of conducting devolved upon the reliable Mr. Kneisel on Saturday evening, and it was performed with conscientious care and a good degree of success. There was also a necessary change in the programme, and we did not get the new Tschaikowsky "Mozartiana," as promised. But there was plenty of excellent musical food, though all, except the "Tannhauser" overture, of a mild type of seasoning. The orchestra did its work with very praiseworthy smoothness, considering the loss of its leader. It has always been easy to say half-jocosely that our organization could play without a conductor. It could; but you would notice the difference soon enough. However, all credit to Mr. Kneisel for facing a trying position with coolness and ability.

Mr. Schroeder's playing of the Saint-Saens concerto was full of rare beauty, fire and feeling. There are few cellists who could bring out more of vitality from the work.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1898.

The program of the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening was:

Overture, The Barber of Bagdad................Cornelius
Concerto for 'cello in A minor................Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 1, D minor.....................Volkmann
Overture, Tannhäuser ....Wagner

The soloist was Alwin Schroeder.

* * *

Originally Tschaikowsky's "Mozartiana" was anounced for its first Boston performance on this occasion, but the Wagner overture was substitued for it. The reason was Mr. Gericke's indisposition. He was suffering from a very severe cold, and his physician deemed it imprudent for him to venture out in the miserable stormy weather that had prevailed for two days. To prevent disappointment Mr. Kneisel kindly consented to conduct at very short notice. He had been called on before in similar emergencies, and invariably acquitted himself with admirable skill, and the result on this occasion was no exception to the rule. It would be manifestly unfair to dwell in a spirit of exacting criticism upon the performances given under such conditions. They were, however, of a high order of excellence, and such slight shortcomings as came into prominence were quite pardonable, all things considered. Mr. Kneisel was received with marked cordiality when he appeared at the conductor's stand, and the audience applauded him heartily after each performance.

The graceful but somewhat shallow 'cello concerto was beautifully read and played by Mr. Schroeder. Again he delighted by the purity and the finish of his style, the musicianly spirit that animates his work, the elegance of his technic and his freedom from affectation and obtrusive display. His audience was warm in its appreciation of the exceptionally artistic quality of the effort.

* * *

[57]

CONCERTS AND CONDUCTORS.

The Philharmonic Society of New York.

THE history and influences of the Philharmonic Society make up a career of such dignity and benevolence that we may properly be anxious whenever something like a new chapter is to be opened. A new conductor almost inevitably must mean such a chapter. Between the Society's outset, far back in the winter of 1842–3, and last spring, just six leaders have been its pilots—Eisfeld, Bergmann, Neundorff, Leopold Damrosch, Thomas, and Seidl. When Mr. Seidl's death deprived the Society of his services and his personal prestige, there were many troublous considerations affecting not only the choice of a successor (whom the actual players in the Society's band elect), but his utility. For at least a dozen years the Society's orchestra has suffered artistically, while no firmer pecuniary support could be asked from a great public more devoted than keen.. Rehearsals have been scanted; and rehearsals are the marrow of symphonic duty. The new and auxiliary musicians have not always been well chosen, and when above par they have been tantalizingly kept in the rear of serviceableness. Again, many of the Philharmonic's authoritative players have lost the fire of youth, have become wonted to playing as a bit of annual mechanics, and so the interpretations of works, both new and old, have lacked eloquence and virtuosity. Temperament is a gift to be cherished, but it evaporates in academic musical air. Moreover, the veteran musician is not apt to new schooling, not tender to being kept up to his full duty and nervosity. The vielles moustaches of an orchestra have their own ideas. Like Hubert in "Ivanhoe"—"My grandsire drew a good bow at the Battle of Hastings and never played at such a mark in his life and—neither will I." Such members of an orchestra would rather have King Log than King Stork. Should King Stork be chosen and persist in being every inch a king, why, the symphonic frog-pond can make his reign a fine purgatory for him.

An old Society's new Leadership and new Season begun.

Mr. Emil Paur's selection in Mr. Seidl's place wounded no sentimentalities, could augur only a rule of the highest musical capability and conscientiousness. Yet there were misgivings in our minds as to Mr. Paur's concrete success when the time for work should come. Never was a concert-director summoned to a post more demanding tact, firmness, knowledge of human nature, and insight into a special status in quo, for reasons quite below general public observation. Mr. Paur could be trusted for his part. But would he be met half-way? The Philharmonic's public seemed to expect so, for never has the Society's year set out with a more splendid subscription. The patrons already have their reward. The first concerts seem conclusive of Mr. Paur's personal esteem from his great charge, and of the new life that he will breathe into it. I have heard the Philharmonic for some twenty-odd years. I have not heard it play in a dozen seasons with the vigor, the ensemble quality of tone, and with the precision in the work of individual members which entered into its opening rehearsal and concert for this fifty-seventh season. The musicians—yes, even Mr. Arnold and Mr. Schmitt and Mr. Roebbelen, and many more of the honored conscript fathers of the Society—seemed to have had a sip of the Fountain of Youth. They watched their new leader as a man to be watched, and perceptibly they obeyed him. The quality of the great orchestra's tone is noticeably more refined, rounded, and solidified already, and it continually leaped to a life quite new. The strings rose to a noble sonority; the wood-wind group—never the Philharmonic's golden treasury—was more intent on nuances and tone than it has been since Mr. Thomas's days of authority. The brass was mellower, and significantly discreet or alert in turn. The programme gave well-worn numbers, but wisely picked—Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" prelude, Brahms's B flat piano-forte concerto, and Beethoven's Symphony in A. Mr. Paur is, beyond doubt, one of the truest "readers" and leaders of Beethoven now before any public, and again came evidence thereof. The Brahms concerto (perhaps the most beautiful one yet written) brought again to New York auditors Miss Adele aus der Ohe. Her absence from us has certainly not lessened by a shade her exquisite, sensitive, reserved art, and that charm of sincerity and high musicianship that has set her apart from a thousand other pianists of her sex in a profession so over-crowded that often there seems hardly room where she is—at the top.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra: Mr. Wilhelm Gericke returns.

The procession of this winter's great concerts is fairly forward. There was nothing if not success and enthusiasm in the entrance last week, on Wednesday and Thursday, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on a thirteenth season that has none of the omens belonging to the number mentioned. How insidiously do years and orchestral anniversaries succeed! These orchestras and singers and players betray us pitilessly by their beguilements. Last week, strikingly less than real seemed the flight of so much time since the Boston Orchestra first came to us. With Mr. Gericke it came. Long terms, new leaders, have intervened. But now was not Mr. Gericke again here, tall and straight, before us bodily and vigorously once more?—looking in every essential detail quite the same disciplinarian, the same vigilant creator of the Orchestra's glory, that he was when he left his charge. Mr. Gericke, too, was conducting it to-day with all that admirable leadership, calm yet inspiring, unostentatious yet dignified, which charmed us aforetime. The Orchestra's experiment of afternoon concerts here (with programmes quite other than those of the evening series, though with identical soloists) opens with every outward success. Both concerts, in fact, were crowded. Both repeated the cordiality toward Mr. Gericke, and the intent, discriminating delight in the Orchestra which warmed to its yearly visits under his direction of old, not to speak of our regard for the work of the many seasons when Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur have been the leaders before us. The band this year has turned to Carnegie Hall for its auditorium, an excellent change from the dreadful hollow of the Metropolitan's area. The effect of the playing of the afternoon and evening was vastly the gainer by the removal. The programmes respectively offered (a) Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Chopin's piano-forte concerto in E minor, Brahms's "Chorale 'St. Antoni'" variations, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; and (b) Schumann's symphony in C major, Scharwenka's second concerto for piano-forte, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" tone-poem, and the prelude and death-finale of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Rosenthal was the soloist. It is of interest to notice that Mr. Gericke finds the band he now redirects as little altered in actual personnel by the decade as he himself is by his absence. Less than a dozen changes have occurred. But in gradual and sure progress upward toward a perfection of ensemble not surpassed by any symphonic organization either in America or Europe, the Orchestra has passed into a finer individuality, season by season, not a little with thanks to the integrity of its wise early adjustment under the director who is once more at its head to-day.

Max Alvary, 1856–98.

The note of personal tragedy always sounds more dolorous in connection with the stage than under any other circumstances, especially if the sorrow come untimely. The death of Max Alvary, which has occurred in his German home, must have been a shock and regret to a great circle of the American musical public. Mr. Alvary's career was built on his brilliant and just American successes as a member of the German companies who gave us especially such bright pages of our Wagnerian chronicle between 1883 and 1890–1. His début here occurred in the autumn of 1885. Like many German tenors, Mr. Alvary had a better voice than skill in its use, and was, on the whole, more an artist in his diction and acting than a really accomplished opera-singer. But his free and magnetic art as an actor, the resonance of a tenor voice originally not "heroic," but rapidly developed in its volume and fibre, and his personal charm, captivated all the public. He became its bright star, and he had no rival. As Adolar in Weber's "Euryanthe" Alvary was a real individuality; as Assad in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," as Loge in Wagner's "Rheingold," scarcely less so. He was a charming Walther, too, in "Die Meistersinger." But of all his impersonations his Siegfried—the boyish Siegfried of the third Nibelungen music-drama—was the most unapproachable. We have never had another Siegfried like him, and we shall never have one. Alvary was as if born for this part, and he made it his own with a verve and beauty to haunt the eye and the ear through a lifetime. It is in just that remembrance that I have taken out of a large pile of portraits of him lying at my hand, not his every-day self, but his Siegfried identity, as it was before us in 1887 or 1888, in all its graceful and statuesque beauty. Mr. Alvary last returned to America early in 1896, and though singing less effectively, was welcomed with renewed favor. About three years ago accident created a lingering and dreadful disease—cancer of the stomach. His career was closed. I understand that, through no fault of his, it was closed in poverty, and that his family are penniless. His life was the romance of a gentleman, a successful artist, and a nature of beautiful refinement and perceptiveness, suddenly cast into shadow and an untimely fate. It is only in such lovely fables as Andersen's "The Nightingale" that Death can be kept away by a song!

The Castle Square Company's Chief Lack.

The Castle Square Company is reviving a special success of last year—"Carmen." As usual, Bizet's masterpiece has the fullest attention from a public that grows more and more general. "Il Trovatore," "Roméo et Juliette," and "The Pirates of Penzance" have succeeded each other recently. The principal lack of this interesting and faithful organization, of which much may come, is a couple of light tenors who have good looks as well as good voices and training, and a considerable repertory into the bargain. Both Mr. Sheehan and Mr. Lavin are wholly insufficient or ill placed in romantic opera.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 20, 1898.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The unusually bad weather of last night brought about some surprising conditions in the Symphony concert. In the first place it kept Conductor Gericke at home, the announcement having been made prior to the concert that, owing to a severe cold, his physician had forbidden him to go out. In his place, therefore, Mr. Kneisel assumed the conductor's stand and the indulgence of the audience, which was asked for at the outset, was not warranted, as judged by general results. Mr. Gericke's absence necessitated a slight rearrangement of the programme and the "Mozartiana" suite of Tchaikowsky was omitted and the overture to "Tannhauser" was introduced as a finale to an altogether interesting programme.

If memory serves us right, this was the second time Mr. Kneisel has conducted the Symphony band, and, as he was given a most cordial reception on his entrance and also loudly applauded after each number, it would seem that the audience took kindly to the innovation. Mr. Kneisel conducts with much force and authority, using his left hand quite as much as his right. In the Volkmann symphony he showed careful discrimination and brought out all the underlying beauties of the score. As for the "Tannhauser" overture, we can recollect few times when it has been more beautifully played; in fact, it has long ago become apparent that this band takes great delight in interpreting Wagner.

The soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, who was heard in one of Saint-Saens's concertos for 'cello. His tones were wonderfully pure and sweet, and the solo instrument with the merest suggestion of an orchestral accompaniment produced the most beautiful effect. Mr. Schroeder received several recalls for his artistic playing.

At next Saturday's concert Mrs. Marian Titus will sing and the composers to be heard are Mendelssohn, Paul Gilson and Liszt.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Mr. Kneisel Conducted, for Mr. Gericke Is Suffering From a Severe Cold—A Change in the Program Was Therefore Necessary.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"......Cornelius
Concerto for 'Cello in A minor....Saint-Saëns
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony No. 1 in D minor ....Volkmann
Overture, "Tannhäuser"..............Wagner

Mr. Gericke, it appears, is suffering from a severe cold, and physicians considered it would be imprudent for him to lead the orchestra last night and expose himself to the dismal weather. That the audience might not be disappointed, Mr. Kneisel, at exceedingly short notice, kindly consented to lead in his stead. Mr. Kneisel, who has before this succeeded admirably as a conductor under trying circumstances, again showed coolness and ability. It is to be hoped that Mr. Gericke will soon recover, and his many friends—for is not the whole audience his friend?—extend him their heartfelt sympathy.

⁂

The editor of the program-book says that Cornelius's "Barbier von Bagdad" was brought out at Weimar in 1859. It was first performed there Dec. 15, 1858.

The editor, following his beloved custom, gives a technical analysis that is of no use to professional or amateur, "Greek nor Jew, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free." It would have been more to the point if he had explained that the striking theme given at the beginning to the brass is the theme that introduces the Barber in the opera: "Abul Hasan Ali Ebn Bekar."

This overture is a singular piece, in that the composer seems to have one foot on the safe rock of conventionality and to be exploring with the other for new ground. There are brilliant passages, and there are lapses into the old-fashioned theatre-overture; there is sparkling orchestration, and there is also the evident attempt of the German to be light-footed in his orchestral gait.

⁂

Saint-Saëns's 'cello concert was first played by Tolbecque Jan. 19, 1873, at the Paris Conservatory. Whatever Saint-Saëns undertakes is generally well-done; for he has a sure and fluent technic. This concerto is not one that appeals to the empty-headed 'cellist, for with the exception of the delightful minuet there is little in the work to please the mere virtuoso-friend. The themes are thought out rather than spontaneous, and there are few direct appeals to easily-aroused emotions. The literature for the 'cello with orchestra is not rich, and serious soloists must often be perplexed in the matter of a becoming and effective selection. Mr. Schroeder played in most musician-like manner, with sure technic that was never wantonly displayed—in fact, Mr. Schroeder almost apologizes for the ease with which he overcomes difficulties—with beauty of tone, with fine and discriminating feeling, and with the repose of the true master of an instrument. The audience was quick to appreciate the beauty of the performance.

⁂

Mr. Gericke is probably fond of Volkmann's Symphony in D minor, for it was the first symphony led by him when he took command of the Boston Orchestra Oct. 18, 1884. I confess that much of this work is to me tiresome. The austerity of the first movement is not displeasing, although I prefer the noble austerity of Cherubini, whose classic figure was apparently in Volkmann's mind. There is an effective passage in the slow movement where the horns persist against the strings, but there is also the thought of Abt, and once I feared that Volkmann was about to call in the aid of a male quartet, with "There's Moonlight on the Lake." The trio of the scherzo is not without prettiness, but the finale, with its pedagogic counterpoint, reminds me of Conservatory students who plot out a fugue with Dux et Comes as though they were planting cabbages. The andante gave an opportunity for agreeable solo display on the part of certain members of the wind choir. The symphony, as a whole, was played at times with a roughness that under the circumstances was excusable.

Mr. Kneisel was most heartily applauded when he took his position, and after the various selections.

⁂

The program of the concert Saturday night, as now announced, will be:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ......Mendelssohn
"La Mer," Symphonic Sketches .Paul Gilson
Les Preludes ....Liszt

Mrs. Marian Titus will sing.

Philip Hale.

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Kneisel Conducts Owing to the Illness of Mr. Gericke.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fifth concert. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, soloist. The programme:

Overture—"Barber of Bagdad" ....Cornelius
Concerto for 'Cello in A minor.......Saint-Saens
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony No. 1 in D minor..........Volkmann
Overture—"Tannhauser" ....Wagner

Owing to the indisposition of Mr. Gericke, the duty of conducting devolved upon the reliable Mr. Kneisel on Saturday evening, and it was performed with conscientious care and a good degree of success. There was also a necessary change in the programme, and we did not get the new Tschaikowsky "Mozartiana," as promised. But there was plenty of excellent musical food, though all, except the "Tannhauser" overture, of a mild type of seasoning. The orchestra did its work with very praiseworthy smoothness, considering the loss of its leader. It has always been easy to say half-jocosely that our organization could play without a conductor. It could; but you would notice the difference soon enough. However, all credit to Mr. Kneisel for facing a trying position with coolness and ability.

Mr. Schroeder's playing of the Saint-Saens concerto was full of rare beauty, fire and feeling. There are few cellists who could bring out more of vitality from the work.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1898.

The program of the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening was:

Overture, The Barber of Bagdad................Cornelius
Concerto for 'cello in A minor...............Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 1, D minor....................Volkmann
Overture, Tannhäuser ....Wagner

The soloist was Alwin Schroeder.

* * *

Originally Tschaikowsky's "Mozartiana" was anounced for its first Boston performance on this occasion, but the Wagner overture was substitued for it. The reason was Mr. Gericke's indisposition. He was suffering from a very severe cold, and his physician deemed it imprudent for him to venture out in the miserable stormy weather that had prevailed for two days. To prevent disappointment Mr. Kneisel kindly consented to conduct at very short notice. He had been called on before in similar emergencies, and invariably acquitted himself with admirable skill, and the result on this occasion was no exception to the rule. It would be manifestly unfair to dwell in a spirit of exacting criticism upon the performances given under such conditions. They were, however, of a high order of excellence, and such slight shortcomings as came into prominence were quite pardonable, all things considered. Mr. Kneisel was received with marked cordiality when he appeared at the conductor's stand, and the audience applauded him heartily after each performance.

The graceful but somewhat shallow 'cello concerto was beautifully read and played by Mr. Schroeder. Again he delighted by the purity and the finish of his style, the musicianly spirit that animates his work, the elegance of his technic and his freedom from affectation and obtrusive display. His audience was warm in its appreciation of the exceptionally artistic quality of the effort.

* * *

[57]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 21, 1898.

Mr. Kneisel Conducts the Symphony Concert.

"The best laid plans of men and mice gang aft agley!"

Our New England climate has seized our conductor by the throat so that gargles and mustard plasters temporarily ousted symphonies and overtures from his sphere of activity on Saturday. Therefore the concert orator, so rarely heard in symphony concerts, came forth to announce a change of conductor and a slight change of programme; Mr. Kneisel was to assume command and Tschaikowsky's "Mozartiana" was to give place to the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

It is a delight to know that even so serious a mischance as the illness of the conductor does not disarrange the schedule of a symphony concert in Boston to any great degree; in operatic management they make very little of substituting "Trovatore" for "Die Walkuere" when illness strikes in.

Mr. Kneisel was warmly greeted as he took the stand and certainly did remarkably good work under the circumstances, giving a decisive beat and catching the mock-heroic spirit of the "Barber of Bagdad" overture, by Cornelius, in an excellent manner.

There was a time when Peter Cornelius was a party matter in music; when the Wagnerians proclaimed him as "the German Cherubini" and the conservatives viewed his opera as an excitable bull views a red flag; that day is fortunately gone by and enough of the composer remains to justify his efforts. Yet it is impossible to grasp the humor of the overture played on Saturday without knowing something of the plot, without understanding the bombastic title of the tonsorial artist given by thundering brasses, without comprehending that the comical element is here almost always grandiloquous. This it was that escaped the comprehension of many of the conservative critics in Germany, and led Hanslick to say—"this barber must shave with guillotines instead of razors!"

Great applause followed the performance and the conductor "pro tem" at once found himself in touch with his audience.

Now followed St. Saen's violoncello concerto with Mr. Alwin Schrceder as soloist. It was not good 'cello weather, the dampness of the atmosphere affecting the strings somewhat, but Mr. Schroeder is too great an artist to allow weather, or anything else, to affect his intonation.

The work is not a great one but is very graceful and is an effective display of the technical stock-in-trade of the soloist. Its orchestration is always fluent, its themes, particularly a dance-theme which the orchestra skilfully intertwines with more earnest solo-work, are piquant and elegant.

Of Mr. Schroeder's work only praise can be spoken; the broad C string playing was very effective, the harmonics were as clear as if they were given upon a violin, and the cadenza introduced about everything that is difficult in violoncello work.

The orchestral support, barring one unfortunate anticipation of the conductor's beat by a violin, was very good. Mr. Schroeder was recalled over and over again, and certainly deserved his triumph.

The Volkmann symphony in D minor came next. Clear in form even to formalism, conservative in orchestration, the musician sees in Volkmann a faithful follower of the classical paths, and this is not without its charm in "these most brisk and giddy-paced times."

It develops its first figure in a very intelligible, yet sufficiently dramatic manner, and its first movement is virile and dramatic without tearing a passion to tatters. Its second movement gave a splendid opportunity to the clarinette, which was taken advantage of and the chief theme was played by that instrument with most pleasing quality of tone. The Scherzo is not at all playful but is vehement and dramatic; its Trio is in excellent contrast.

Altogether the work is one which can be comfortably enjoyed without any rhapsodies whatever; it exhibits talent rather than genius.

The "Tannhaeuser" overture went splendidly; our orchestra has played this so often that we believe they could give it without any conductor. This feat is said to have been accomplished once by the Meiningen orchestra when Bulow was its guiding spirit; the conductor was detained and came to the concert late, it is said, just in time to hear his band win a success in this overture without any leader.

What a robust band of pilgrims Wagner gives us in this overture! After they return from a long journey to Rome they give their typical theme with ten times the power that it had at the beginning of the journey! But it is a grand apotheosis; the Roses and Rapture of Vice (as represented by piccolos and cymbals) are totally crushed out by the religious, but somewhat bigoted trombones. The brasses roared as in the olden days and the violins gave their trying figures with unparallelled vigor.

Altogether it is one of the greatest climaxes that even Wagner ever attained, and the fact that he cut it out and replaced it with a very dreary transition into the first act, in the "revised version" (prepared for the Paris performances) is an everlasting proof of the great loyalty which this radical felt to his "theories," to the highest ideal of Art as he understood it.

Spite of the fact that Mr. Kneisel's musicianship and the splendid discipline of the men carried the concert to success, we all hope that Jupiter Serenator will restore our conductor to us by the end of the

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIV., NO. 143.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Kneisel Conducted, as Mr. Gericke Was Taken Ill.

Tschaikowsky's Suite, "Mozartiana," Was Therefore Omitted and the Tannhauser Overture Given—Mr. Schroeder Received Four Enthusiastic Recalls.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with this programme:

Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"...Cornelius
Concerto for 'cello, in A minor.....Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 1, in D minor..........Volkmann
Overture, "Tannhauser"...............Wagner

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist.

Originally, Tschaikowsky's suite, "Mozartiana," was to have come before the symphony, and the Wagner overture was not among the selections announced, but Mr. Gericke had been suddenly attacked by a severe cold, and had received imperative instructions from his physician to remain at home; therefore, he did not appear in his usual place at the conductor's stand last evening, Mr. Kneisel officiating in his stead.

This rendered necessary the change in the programme, the Tschaikowsky suite being new and consequently not to be attempted with the slight opportunity that Mr. Kneisel had had to make himself familiar with the score. He acquitted himself admirably in the trying position to which he had been called. Critical comment is clearly out of place under the circumstances, but Mr. Kneisel may be both complimented and congratulated on the excellent results he obtained, and on the spirit, judgment and ability of his conducting.

The Saint-Saens concerto is not a notably deep work, but it is full of charm, especially in the allegretto con moto, a delicate and gracefully piquant minuet movement, and the brilliancy of the other portions of the work keeps the hearers' attention steadily interested. Mr. Schroeder's performance of the solo part again exemplified the perfection of his technique, the purity and elegance of his style, the depth of his artistic taste and the large musical feeling that inspires him and renders his playing always so delightful. Particularly beautiful was his broad cantabile in the allegretto, but the whole effort in interpretation and execution was wholly worthy of him; which means, in other words, that it was that of an artist of the first rank. He was tremendously applauded and had four enthusiastic recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; aria, "Mia Speranza," Mozart; symphonic sketches, "La Mer," Paul Gilson; the Indian bell song, "Lakme," Delibes; "Les Preludes," Liszt. Mrs. Marian Titus is to be the soloist.

Despite the bad day Friday the Symphony rehearsal was well attended and the soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, enthusiastically received and recalled three times after his masterly performance. Among those noticed in the audience were Mrs. John Lowell, Miss Lowell, Mr. and Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, Miss Mary Parkman, Mr. Bayard Thayer, Miss Mary S. Ames, Mrs. J. C. Jones, Mr. James P. Stearns, Miss Stearns, Prof. and Mrs. Carl Baermann, Mr. William H. Allen, Mrs. Robert D. Evans, Miss Hunt, Mrs. Wilmot W. Blackmar, Miss Brewer, Mrs. Charles Hayden, Miss Faulkner, Mrs. William Endicott, 3d, Mrs. Charles M. Clapp, Miss Clapp, Mr. Charles P. Curtis and Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Redfern.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 27, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixth symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture; recitative, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and rondo, "Ah! Non sai qual pena sia," by Mozart; symphonic sketches, "The Sea," by Paul Gilson; "Legend of the Pariah's Daughter," from "Lakme," by Leo Delibes, and Liszt's symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes." Mrs. Marian Titus was the soloist. Owing to the continued illness of Mr Gericke, the performance was directed by Mr. Franz Kneisel, whose work throughout the evening was excellent.

The symphonic sketches, by Paul Gilson, entitled "The Sea," are in four movements: 1. Sunrise; 2. Sailors' Songs and Dances; 3. Twilight; 4. Tempest.

Three of these movements have been given once here before, under Mr. Nikisch but this was the first complete performance of the work in this city. It can be said that it is generally tedious throughout. There are many places where the instrumentation is clever, but not original, and the few themes are commonplace in the extreme. The composer has taken much time to say very little. The performance was a smooth one. Liszt's well known symphonic poem, "The Preludes," is an ever-welcome work, and received an admirable performance, and so did the Mendelssohn overture.

Mrs. Titus sang acceptably throughout, but her voice is hardly powerful enough for Music Hall. She sings to more advantage in a smaller hall, where her voice is less liable to being forced.

There will be no soloist at the rehearsal and concert this week. The orchestral selections are by Beethoven, MacDowell, Wagner and Berlio

---

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fifth symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Peter Cornelius: Overture to "Der Barbier von Bagdad."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violoncello, in A minor, opus 33.
Volkmann: Symphony No. 1, in D minor, opus 44.
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

Mr. Gericke was suddenly taken with a severe feverish cold after the Friday afternoon public rehearsal, and was unable to conduct on Saturday evening. Mr. Kneisel took his place at short notice, and with no opportunity for further rehearsal; this substitution also made a change in the programme advisable, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture being given instead of Tchaikovsky new "Mozartiana" suite, which was played on Friday afternoon and announced for Saturday evening. Mr. Kneisel, who is not new to the conductor's desk, nor the orchestra to his baton, acquitted himself with excellent firmness, precision and skill. Mr. Gericke has the sympathies of all who know him, and all musical Boston will unite with Fritz Kothner in wishing "gut' Bess' rung dem Meister!"

Cornelius's "Barbier von Bagdad" overture has much to recommend it; its worst side is a certain patchworkiness of style; like many another pioneer work, it tries to be too many things at once. It anticipates not a little of the later Wagner; and, at the same time, shows its composer's high regard for the French opéra-comique—two elements in dramatic music that do not pull overwell together. It is to be noted, too, that Cornelius has not succeeded in working the French opéra-comique vein nearly as much to the manner born as Wagner himself—only remember Daland's air, "Mögst du, mein Kind," in the "Holländer!"—while his "Wagnerianism" has naturally not quite so authentic a ring as Wagner's own. The occasional apparition of a cantabile melody, scored in the modern French way for strings in octaves, to a homophonic accompaniment in the rest of the orchestra, seems almost as much out of harmony with the musical surroundings as Banquo's ghost with Macbeth's supper-party. There is, however, a thread which runs through the whole overture and gives it a certain artistic unity; and this thread is the composer's never-failing brilliancy and talent. There may be no particular part of the overture that some other man would not have done better than he; but surely very few composers in the whole list—not even Meyerbeer, perhaps Meyerbeer least of all—could have held so motley a composition so well together, or have stamped every part of it with so recognizable an individuality.

Volkmann's D minor symphony has one, not wholly inconspicuous, advantage; it is less of a bore than his symphony in B-flat major. Indeed, the first movement is an uncommonly strong piece of work; the two middle movements we like less, but the interest revives again in the finale. Upon the whole, Volkmann is something of a puzzle; in one way he was rather like Gustave Flaubert. Flaubert's great ideal was absolutely irresponsible romanticism; and he was really as hard-and-fast a "naturalist" as any writer of the next two following generations in France; Volkmann evidently looked upon himself as quite a wild romanticist in music, but could never really get out of the classical rut. There is a certain timidity about his romanticism that gives it a very peculiar physiognomy; it behaves itself, for all the world, as if it were always afraid of wetting its feet and catching cold. Yet, curiously enough, this rather dry, stolidly going, neutral-tinted man has outlived Joachim Raff! There can be no doubt about it; he has. Raff had ten times his brilliancy, and, though never any too solid a writer, quite his solidity; but he is now virtually worn out, whereas Volkmann still lives quite as vigorous a life as ever. To be sure, he has been subjected to far less wear and tear than Raff; but that he has worn better is undeniable. It seems even as if something rather vigorous would have to be done to assist Nature in killing him; if any movement of this sort is ever set afoot, we should like to subscribe our mite to help it on.

Only the impoverished condition of the literature of the violoncello could make such work as Saint-Saëns's A minor concerto welcome. But, with all its shortcomings, it is so much better than many another that one can receive it almost with open arms. Saint-Saëns carries two qualities to a wellnigh Satanic pitch; artistic wisdom and cleverness. No serpent could be wiser than he; no anything cleverer! The man has apparently no heart, no mood, no penumbra; his style is clear as crystal, yet it reveals no sloveniiness in what might be called his musical housekeeping; the world is free to look in through that well-washed window and find no fleck of dust inside—possibly very little else inside, either. And this concerto is as sharply characteristic an example of Saint-Saëns's peculiar gifts as could probably be found in his whole portfolio. Mr. Schroeder played it wonderfully; with entrancing beauty of tone, grace of phrasing and elegance of style. In the matter of virtuosity and brilliant technic Mr. Schroeder's playing left nothing to be desired. It is to be noted that he played an altered version of the coda of the concerto, prepared for him (if we are rightly informed) by Mr. Gustav Strube, in which a long and elaborate cadenza is introduced. Mr. Schroeder was enthusiastically applauded, as he deserved to be, and four times recalled.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Die Fingals-Höhle," opus 26; Aria; Paul Gilson, symphonic sketches, "La Mer;" Aria; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Préludes." Mrs. Marian Titus will be the singer.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 28, 1898.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mr. Kneisel Again Conducts the Symphony Concert.

Mr. Gericke is still upon his sick bed and Mr. Kneisel still proves himself an excellent conductor for an emergency—and something more.

On Saturday the programme was rather oceanic in character and one had the opportunity of listening to the sea a la Mendelssohn and a la Gilson.

Mendelssohn did not steer his bark over troubled waters; his "Hebrides" overture, which began the concert, is plaintive in its reiteration of a wave-figure, full of suggestions of loneliness, but not especially turbulent. It is probably the composer's most spontaneous work, for he scored the entire chief theme on the Isle of Staffa merely to give his sister Fanny his impressions of Fingal's Cave.

The two names given to the work sometimes puzzle musical amateurs and only three years ago a Berlin critic gravely announced his preference for the "Fingal's Cave" overture as better than the "Hebrides"!

The performance was a smooth one, although the horns were rather brusque in the development. The clarinette sustained its important passages very well. Mendelssohn and Weber might be called the godfathers of the clarinette (although Mozart first introduced it into symphony) and Mendelssohn, both in this overture and in the Scotch symphony, gives the instrument an unusual prominence.

Mrs. Marian Titus was the vocalist of the concert; she sang a Mozart aria, not from "Titus," however, the concert-aria, "Ah non sai quel Pena." Her voice seemed rather light, but was flexible and true in intonation, even to F in alt.

Her phrasing showed conscientious care, and the interpretation was one which could arouse neither animadversion nor enthusiasm. Her second number was "The Legend of the Pariah's Daughter" from Delibes's "Lakme," which was well adapted to the display of her vocal wares, and was excellently rendered. She was heartily applauded.

Gilson is a name associated with the history of Boston Baked Beans, but in Brussels it is also connected with music. In our symphony concerts we long ago made the acquaintance of three-quarters of his "The Sea"; last night we for the first time heard the entire work.

The free setting of this aqueous subject as a set of orchestral sketches, a species of Suite, is not so good as the Rubinstein treatment of the same theme as an "Ocean Symphony." The first movement pictured sunrise on the ocean. We had always associated sunrise at sea with black coffee in the smoking room, but our present composer associates it with high positions on the violins.

There is a certain amount of thematic treatment in this first movement, but it has much reiteration and much scale work that can only be regarded as padding. It is not comparable with the noble manner in which Rubinstein begins his great symphony. The effects of the harmonics long drawn out upon the violins might picture the immensity of ocean, but they might also portray the long, flat expanse of a canal. There is too much of Gallic ecstasy in evidence.

The second movement is a species of Scherzo, and represents the sailors enjoying themselves, probably in the second dog-watch, that curtailed hour of marine delights.

There was a bright hornpipe theme in this, but one could give M. Gilson a dozen "Shanties" which would have been more graphic in this part of the suite. It is a wonder, by the way, that not one of the sturdy and characteristic shanties has as yet found its way into the classical repertoire; some of these working-songs are brimful of figures suited for thematic development.

The third movement is entitled "Crepuscule," but it pictures more than a mere twilight, for the poem of Eddy Levis, on which this programme piece is founded, tells us of a sailor and his lass wandering by the shore and bidding each other farewell. The woodwind is finely employed in this movement and the duet is of considerable beauty, although the parting is made rather prolix; "he oft bade farewell, yet was loth to depart." There is no suggestion of the Welsh rarebits that the ocean traveller is accustomed to look for just after the twilight hour upon the high seas, unless the muted horn tones suggest indigestion. If we venture to think of prosaic matters in connection with a symphonic work it is only because its cloying sweetness causes disesteem, because we find nothing of the true majesty of Poseidon in the work, because "The Sea" is too much watered.

Nor did the final storm, heard for the first time in Boston, alter the impression; one could say with the old Athenian wit, Dorian: "I have heard a greater tempest in a pot of boiling water!" There are crashes, it is true, and there are dismal passages which portend disaster, but the whole is not convincing, one sees the intention too constantly, it all remains but "a painted ship upon a painted ocean."

It is possible that the judgment is too harsh, but the first hearing of this Tempest and its effect upon the reviewer can be summed up in a very short French poem:—

"Tempete M'embete."

Liszt's "Les Preludes" ended the concert. It is probably the best of his symphonic poems. Its development and final apotheosis of a theme suspiciously like "We won't go home till morning" is dramatically carried out. Horns, tuba and trombones have plenty of work to do and in this case did it well. Mr. Kneisel's decisive beat held the men well together in this complicated work and there was no trace either of timidity or of rigidity in its capricious measures.

Is it not time to correct a misstatement that has been made more than a dozen times at these concerts? Mozart is chronicled as having died at Salzburg. As he loathed Salzburg with a great hatred it must be disagreeable to his spirit to have it suggested that he went back to that city to die; as a matter of fact he carefully avoided Salzburg during his later years and died in Vienna.

Louis C. Elson.

Journal.

[illegible] 27, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY.

Kneisel Again in Mr. Gericke's Place.

First Performance of Gilson's "The Sea" Entire.

Mrs. Titus Soloist—Program for Next Concert.

The program of the Sixth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, Mr. Kneisel conductor (for Mr. Gericke, I regret to say, is still sick), was as follows:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ....Mendelssohn
Recitative, "Mia speranza adorata," and Rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sia" ....Mozart
Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"..Paul Gilson
(First time complete in Boston.)
I., Sunrise; II., Sailors' Songs and dances; III., Twilight; IV., Tempest.
The Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, from "Lakmé" ....Delibes
Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes" ....Lizst

So far as the program-book is concerned, the reader is left in doubt whether this Gilson may not be, after all, a Bostonian.

"A blessin," Dr. Schwazey cried, "a blessin onto the hed of the man what invented beans! A blessin onto his hed!"

"Which his name is Gilson! He's a first family of Boston," replied Artemus.

Paul Gilson was born at Brussels June 15, 1865. He studied at the Brussels Conservatory under Duyck and Gevaert. In 1889 he gained the Prix de Rome with his cantata, "Sinai." He has writtten "he Demon," a lyric drama; "The Supliants;" "Daphne," for solo voices, chorus and orchestra; "David," an oratorio; a remarkable work, "Francesca da Rimini;" incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Princess Maleine," and orchestral pieces, of which one has been produced by Theodore Thomas and one by Van der Stucken. His opera "Pauvre Gens," is new in rehearsal. "The Sea" was first played, and with great success, at Brussels March 20, 1892, at a concert conducted by Joseph Dupont, to whom the work is dedicated. There was a second performance at Brussels May 7 of that year. It was produced at Paris by Colonne Jan. 15, 1893. It was produced at a Philharmonic concert in New York in December, 1892. The first three movements were performed at a Boston Symphony Concert led by Mr. Nikisch March 25, 1893.

The first scene represents sunrise at sea; it has one chief melodic subject, which is the foundation motive of the whole work. The second scene introduces lustly dances, one of which is "La ronde du Gabier"—the dance of the top-man. The third movement, "Twilight," tells of the love scene between a sailor and his lass. He takes to his ship; she "implores the enigmatic, implacable and cruel night in his behalf." The finale is the storm; the vessel is swallowed up; and before she goes down, the dances and songs of the sailor-men are heard as in mocking irony.

It is the custom when this suite is played in Brussels and Paris to precede each movement by the reading of the appropriate part of the poem by Eddy Levis, which suggested this music.

"The Sea" is a work of technical strength. It is more than this: it is a work of high poetic imagination. There is the mystery of the sea; there is the thought of the sea of "undug graves." There are no cheap attempts at musical photography any more than in the beautiful overture by Mendelssohn, the "Fingal's Cave," which, with some of the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," is the work of that composer in his finest and least copyright-trademark mood. Perhaps the third movement is too long. The long drawn-out conversation of lovers, the repeated assurances of devotion are of little interest to a third person, in spite of Emerson's dictum. If King Mark were only a stronger character, he would be a welcome relief to the amorous chatter of Tristan and Isolde. But in this same movement, what exquisite harmonic and orchestral effects! The first movement is noble throughout. A new clear voice speaks with authority. The second movement will undoubtedly always be the most popular of the four on account of the pronounced melody and rhythm; and in this song and dance, Gilson is hearty, rough, if you please, without being musically vulgar. The last movement is full of force, but I care for it the least. Here is a work full of originality, rejoicing in strength and beauty. Here is a work that is something more than a study in orchestration. There is depth; there is thought; there is passion; there is freedom, boldness of expression.

Mr. Kneisel led with much sympathy and with the authority of the intelligent and skilled musician. He conducted the rehearsals of Gilson's suite, and to him, as well as to the orchestra, [illegible] the honor of a brilliant performance.

* * *

Mrs. Titus sang the difficult aria that Mozart wrote for Mrs. Lange, and the [illegible] familiar aria from "Lakmé." She sang with marked purity of style and with fine technic. Loudly heralded foreign singers have in times past not given as much musical satisfaction at Symphony Concerts of this orchestra.

* * *

The program of the concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be:

Symphony No. 1........................Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine" .... MacDowell
Siegfried Idyll..............................Wagner
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"........Berlioz

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIV., NO. 150.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphonic Sketches of Paul Gilson Given Complete.

Mendelssohn's Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Admirably Played—Singing by Mrs. Titus of Mozart's "Mia Speranza" Marked by Exquisite Delicacy of Taste.

For the sixth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening the programme was:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave"........Mendelssohn
Recitative and Rondo, "Mia speranza"..Mozart
Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"...Paul Gilson
Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, "Lakme," ....Delibes
Symphonic poem, "The Preludes"........Liszt

Mrs. Marian Titus was the soloist.

Mr. Gericke's illness continuing, Mr. Franz Kneisel again officiated as conductor.

The Mendelssohn overture is still heard with pleasure for its perfection of form, the beauty of its workmanship and the easy flow into which the composer's inspiration goes on its way from beginning to end. It was admirably played and with a prevailing fine effect of light and shade.

The Gibson symphonic sketches were given for the first time here in their completeness. The first three movements were heard under Mr. Nikisch's regime, but the finale had its first hearing on this occasion. The score abounds in strong and impressive effects of tone color, and there are moments when true poetic feeling in themes and treatment is shown, but as a whole the work fatigues the attention by the almost constant strain made upon it to fathom the composer's meaning. Without the help the programme affords the music, for all that it says intelligibly or even suggestively about the sea, it might as well be called anything else.

The instrumentation is brilliant, and in the extreme modern vein. The most attractive movement is that entitled "Twilight," but it is spun out to too great length, and its brief themes are repeated so many times that they at length pall by their monotony of treatment, and the heavy blasts of noise that are introduced now and then for the sake of providing contrast scarcely mend matters, their purpose being too obvious. The storm of the closing movement is a fearful hurly-burly, but the noise is not exciting, and before it is over it becomes somewhat ridiculous and a trifle of a bore. In none of the movements does the composer show that he knew where to stop when he had no more to say that had not been said by him again and again.

Mr. Kneisel read the music sympathetically and intelligently, and the performance by the orchestra did all justice to the work.

The Mozart selection is perhaps the most carefully written of all the composer's concert arias. It is not often sung because of the demands it makes on the higher register of the singer's voice in the lovely andante. It was last given here by Miss Emma Thursby, some twenty and odd years ago.

Mrs. Titus sang it very charmingly, declaiming the pathetic recitative with just effect and singing the slow movement with exquisite delicacy of taste and warmth and breadth of feeling. The high F's rang out clear, true and effortless, and the florid coda was given gracefully and brilliantly. The phrasing throughout was musicianly, and the effort as a whole may be fairly pronounced Mozart singing of the most artistic quality.

In the Delibes selection the easy flexibility and purity of the singer's voice and the delicacy of her style were delightfully exemplified. Her bravura was clean-cut and fluent, and in both the tender and more animated features of the song her rendering was flawless. There were appreciative applause and recalls for her after each effort, and her artistic success was unmistakable.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," MacDowell; Siegfried Idyl, Wagner; overture, "Bonvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV 27, 1898.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

Mr Gericke being sick, the symphony rehearsal and concert last week were conducted by Mr Franz Kneisel. The popular young soprano, Mrs Marian Titus, was the soloist, and the program was as follows: Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," a Mozart recitative and aria, Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches, "The Sea," recitative and aria from Delibes' "Lakme" and the Liszt symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

The principal interest in the program was centered upon the young soloist, who is one of the foremost singers in the local world, and whose work promises to make her well and favorably known in a wider field within a short time. Mrs Titus combines an attractive personality with a voice of great purity and flexibility under excellent control. She sings easily and without a trace of affectation or mannerisms. Although light in quality, the carrying power of her voice is admirable, and her enunciation is distinct without showing a deliberation in utterance.

The Mozart recitative and aria was sung with beautiful expression. The more dramatic portion of the recitative would have been improved by a broader and more passionate treatment, but this defect was so slight that the sympathetic interpretation of the whole number revealed but few blemishes. Her phrasing and execution throughout were charming, and the silvery voice was as true to pitch as one could wish. The florid music of the Lakme legend found in Mrs Titus a delightful exponent. The opening cadenza which introduced the legend was a brilliant example of bravura singing, and the runs and trills were given with a facility and evenness of execution that were nearly flawless. In brief it may be said that Mrs Titus acquitted herself with great credit and showed that she is steadily advancing in her chosen profession. That a young local artist should appear with the symphony players and achieve such a success should be a source of great gratification to herself, her teachers and friends. The audience was very large and very enthusiastic, bestowing special applause upon Mrs Titus.

Mr Kneisel conducted the selections in a highly commendable manner. The restless phrases of the "Fingal's Cave" overture were given clearly, and the closing coda was thoroughly satisfactory in tempo and brilliancy. "The Sea," with its storm effects capitally illustrated, was as a whole effectively interpolated, and the Liszt poem was also excellent throughout. The fragmentary phrases by the violas, basses and trombones deserve special praise for smoothness in their "conversation."

The program announced for this week's concerts is as follows: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," MacDowell; Siegfried Idyll, Wagner; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

MUSICAL AMERICA
New York, November 26, 1898.

Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, the programme of the fifth symphony concert had to be somewhat changed, and Mr. Kneisel had to take the baton. The programme given was the overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," Cornelius; concerto for 'cello, in A minor, op. 33, Saint-Saëns; Volkmann's Symphony, No. 1, in D minor, and the "Tannhäuser" overture. Mr. Schroeder was the soloist. The performance, as a whole, was an admirable one.

You know that Mr. Kneisel, like Theodore Thomas, is a born conductor, consequently regardless of his appearance in this emergency he succeeded in carrying through the performance in a commendable manner. He received a rousing welcome when he came on, and was heartily applauded after each number.

One has but to praise Mr. Schroeder whenever he presents himself as soloist. The ripe musicianship, the ample technic, the mature style, and the expressive playing of this eminently able performer are too well known to require further comment.

The Volkmann Symphony, which contains much splendid material, was somewhat coarsely played, regardless of Mr. Kneisel's efforts to command and restrain the players. Strange to say, there was some one among the first violins who came in forte in the wrong place, a matter of carelessness of which the offender should be ashamed.

This symphony offered the opportunity for the new first clarinet player to display his powers, and in my opinion he used it, not very creditably, when one considers the position he occupies and its demands. His style is dry and he is seldom warm on the pitch. When he attempts to increase power he blows his instrument direfully flat. It isn't necessary to go to Paris to obtain this kind of playing, for it can be had without the expense of importation.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Fingals-Höhle," opus 26.
Mozart: Recitative, "Mia speranza adorata," and Rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sia."
Paul Gilson: Esquisses symphoniques, "La Mer." (First time complete in Boston.)
Delibes: Légende de la Fille du Paria, from "Lakmé."
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Préludes."
Mrs. Marian Titus was the singer.

Owing to Mr. Gericke's continued illness Mr. Kneisel again conducted. And, by the way, it is no mean feather in the Symphony Orchestra's cap to retain a new work like Gilson's "La Mer" on the programme, in spite of the illness of its regular conductor; most orchestras would have deemed a change of bill prudent; but with Mr. Kneisel all things may be dared!

It was good to hear Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" again; it made an excellent beginning to what was, upon the whole, rather a marine programme. Moreover, the overture holds its own wonderfully well; when Mendelssohn was in just the right mood his romanticism and picturesque suggestiveness were hard to beat; in spite of its small score and strict form—strict, but not in the least pedantic—this overture can vie with anything of its sort that has been written since its time. It was capitally played.

If we mistake not, there has been a good deal of curiosity in several quarters to hear some more of Gilson's "La Mer" ever since Mr. Nikisch gave the first three movements here in 1893. As well as we can remember, our own impression of the work was not particularly favorable then; but last Saturday evening we were considerably more impressed with it than we expected to be. All four movements are too long, especially the third; this seems plain enough. But there is not a little beauty, of a rather vague, poetic sort, in the work; Gilson must have some Flemish blood in him, to cure the Gallic downrightness in his composition, for he shows himself very capable of falling easily and naturally into a mood, and letting that mood color his work. No true Frenchman was ever guilty of so unreasoning a thing as a mood! You may be pretty sure that a moody Gaul has some un-Gallic blood in his veins. But, together with Gilson's un-French moodiness, one finds one very French trait in him; a strong pictorial bent, an evidently instinctive tendency to put the optics of his subject into the foreground. In one sense, his treatment of his poetic subject is of the realistic sort, although the four movements of his symphonic composition have little in common with the four parts of Eddy Levis's poem, beyond the mere titles; but his realism is almost without exception visual, not auditory. Except in the "Storm" movement, one finds little or nothing of that suggestion of sea sounds that is so potent in Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt;" on the contrary, his music is almost constantly suggestive of sea sights, of waves flashing in the sunlight, of twilight dimness, of mournful solitude. Even in the "Storm," where the wind sighs its chromatic scales as it does in all orchestral tempests, one finds a more vivid suggestion of the sudden illumination of a flash of lightning, alternating with moments of utter darkness, than one does of the auditory phenomena of a marine cyclone. One point which struck us particularly in this "Storm" of Gilson's, which may, upon the whole, be compared very favorably with Rubinstein's in his "Ocean" symphony, is a strange absence of violence in the music; the moderate tempo, in itself, somehow precludes the idea of violence; everything sounds inexorable, if you will, but rather deliberate. Perhaps the performance may have had something to do with this. Whatever may be thought of these sketches of Gilson's, either as pure music or as tone-painting, there can hardly be two opinions about the composer's admirably beautiful orchestration; his color-effects are often simply wonderful. The performance under Mr. Kneisel was excellent throughout; the whole composition was mounted by him—for the performance under Mr. Nikisch could have had little effect upon the players at this distance of time—and to him belongs the credit of a singularly fine and exhaustive rendering.

Liszt's "Les Préludes" was grandly played, and made a fine close to the concert. Say what one may about this work, about its leaning toward the commonplace and what not, it remains surely one of the most musical things Liszt ever wrote; the music gives evidence of a wealth of inventive resource such as Liszt could not often lay claim to.

Mrs. Titus sang Mozart's concert aria remarkably well. It is one of the most important of the whole set of twelve, one which shows the composer in his grander, larger vein of melody and sentiment. At moments this air rises well into the Donna Anna stratum. That Mrs. Titus has quite the breadth of style demanded by this sort of writing cannot truly be said; but she offers a very acceptable substitute for it, in taking the music in a little less heroic vein than was evidently contemplated by the composer, substituting a very true and genial pathos for tragic breadth of expression, and, in a word, never venturing beyond her own depth. Then the aria has unquestionably another side; it was written as a show-piece for an exceptionally high-voiced singer; and Mrs. Titus is here on her native heath. Her high E-flats and F-natural rang out as easily and purely as those of a flute; her brilliant coloratura was unexceptionable. Upon the whole, her performance of this really very beautiful air was singularly fine. Her singing, too, of the Delibes song was exquisite. One wishes, though, that this particular song could have a well-earned rest for several years; it is wearing out; one hears it with curious twinges, as one reflects upon how close the relationship is between French opéra-comique, of the Delibes sort, and French opéra-bouffe. Mrs. Titus was applauded loud and long, and more than once recalled.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21; MacDowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Wagner, "Ein Siegfried-Idyll," Berlioz, overture to Benvenuto Cellini, opus 23.

[59]

Boston Journal.
Y, NOVEMBER 27, 1898

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Kneisel Again in Mr. Gericke's Place.

First Performance of Gilson's "The Sea" Entire.

Mrs. Titus Soloist—Program for Next Concert.

The program of the Sixth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, Mr. Kneisel conductor (for Mr. Gericke, I regret to say, is still sick), was as follows:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ....Mendelssohn
Recitative, "Mia speranza adorata," and Rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sia" ....Mozart
Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"..Paul Gilson
(First time complete in Boston.)
I., Sunrise; II., Sailors' Songs and dances; III., Twilight; IV., Tempest.
The Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, from "Lakmé" ....Delibes
Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes" ....Lizst

So far as the program-book is concerned, the reader is left in doubt whether this Gilson may not be, after all, a Bostonian.

"A blessin," Dr. Schwazey cried, "a blessin onto the hed of the man what invented beans! A blessin onto his hed!"

"Which his name is Gilson! He's a first family of Boston," replied Artemus.

Paul Gilson was born at Brussels June 15, 1865. He studied at the Brussels Conservatory under Duyck and Gevaert. In 1889 he gained the Prix de Rome with his cantata, "Sinai." He has writtten "he Demon," a lyric drama; "The Supliants;" "Daphne," for solo voices, chorus and orchestra; "David," an oratorio; a remarkable work, "Francesca da Rimini;" incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Princess Maleine," and orchestral pieces, of which one has been produced by Theodore Thomas and one by Van der Stucken. His opera "Pauvre Gens," is now in rehearsal. "The Sea" was first played, and with great success, at Brussels March 20, 1892, at a concert conducted by Joseph Dupont, to whom the work is dedicated. There was a second performance at Brussels May 7 of that year. It was produced at Paris by Colonne Jan. 15, 1893. It was produced at a Philharmonic concert in New York in December, 1892. The first three movements were performed at a Boston Symphony Concert led by Mr. Nikisch March 25, 1893.

The first scene represents sunrise at sea; it has one chief melodic subject, which is the foundation motive of the whole work. The second scene introduces lustly dances, one of which is "La ronde du Gabier"—the dance of the top-man. The third movement, "Twilight," tells of the love scene between a sailor and his lass. He takes to his ship; she "implores the enigmatic, implacable and cruel night in his behalf." The finale is the storm; the vessel is swallowed up; and before she goes down, the dances and songs of the sailor-men are heard as in mocking irony.

It is the custom when this suite is played in Brussels and Paris to precede each movement by the reading of the appropriate part of the poem by Eddy Levis, which suggested this music.

"The Sea" is a work of technical strength. It is more than this: it is a work of high poetic imagination. There is the mystery of the sea; there is the thought of the sea of "undug graves." There are no cheap attempts at musical photography any more than in the beautiful overture by Mendelssohn, the "Fingal's Cave," which; with some of the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," is the work of that composer in his finest and least copyright-trademark mood. Perhaps the third movement is too long. The long drawn-out conversation of lovers, the repeated assurances of devotion are of little interest to a third person, in spite of Emerson's dictum. If King Mark were only a stronger character, he would be a welcome relief to the amorous chatter of Tristan and Isolde. But in this same movement, what exquisite harmonic and orchestral effects! The first movement is noble throughout. A new clear voice speaks with authority. The second movement will undoubtedly always be the most popular of the four on account of the pronounced melody and rhythm; and in this song and dance, Gilson is hearty, rough, if you please, without being musically vulgar. The last movement is full of force, but I care for it the least. Here is a work full of originality, rejoicing in strength and beauty. Here is a work that is something more than a study in orchestration. There is depth; there is thought; there is passion; there is freedom, boldness of expression.

Mr. Kneisel led with much sympathy and with the authority of the intelligent and skilled musician. He conducted the rehearsals of Gilson's suite, and to him, as well as to the orchestra, is due the honor of a brilliant performance.

⁂

Mrs. Titus sang the difficult aria that Mozart wrote for Mrs. Lange, and the more familiar aria from "Lakmé." She sang with marked purity of style and with fine technic. Loudly heralded foreign singers have in times past not given as much musical satisfaction at Symphony Concerts of this orchestra.

⁂

The program of the concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be:

Symphony No. 1........................Boothoven
Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine"................................ MacDowell
Siegfried Idyll.............................Wagner
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"........Berlioz

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 150.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphonic Sketches of Paul Gilson Given Complete.

Mendelssohn's Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Admirably Played—Singing by Mrs. Titus of Mozart's "Mia Speranza" Marked by Exquisite Delicacy of Taste.

For the sixth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening the programme was:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave"........Mendelssohn
Recitative and Rondo, "Mia speranza"..Mozart
Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"...Paul Gilson
Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, "Lakme," Delibes
Symphonic poem, "The Preludes"-------Liszt

Mrs. Marian Titus was the soloist.

Mr. Gericke's illness continuing, Mr. Franz Kneisel again officiated as conductor.

The Mendelssohn overture is still heard with pleasure for its perfection of form, the beauty of its workmanship and the easy flow into which the composer's inspiration goes on its way from beginning to end. It was admirably played and with a prevailing fine effect of light and shade.

The Gibson symphonic sketches were given for the first time here in their completeness. The first three movements were heard under Mr. Nikisch's regime, but the finale had its first hearing on this occasion. The score abounds in strong and impressive effects of tone color, and there are moments when true poetic feeling in themes and treatment is shown, but as a whole the work fatigues the attention by the almost constant strain made upon it to fathom the composer's meaning. Without the help the programme affords the music, for all that it says intelligibly or even suggestively about the sea, it might as well be called anything else.

The instrumentation is brilliant, and in the extreme modern vein. The most attractive movement is that entitled "Twilight," but it is spun out to too great length, and its brief themes are repeated so many times that they at length pall by their monotony of treatment, and the heavy blasts of noise that are introduced now and then for the sake of providing contrast scarcely mend matters, their purpose being too obvious. The storm of the closing movement is a fearful hurly-burly, but the noise is not exciting, and before it is over it becomes somewhat ridiculous and a trifle of a bore. In none of the movements does the composer show that he knew where to stop when he had no more to say that had not been said by him again and again.

Mr. Kneisel read the music sympathetically and intelligently, and the performance by the orchestra did all justice to the work.

The Mozart selection is perhaps the most carefully written of all the composer's concert arias. It is not often sung because of the demands it makes on the higher register of the singer's voice in the lovely andante. It was last given here by Miss Emma Thursby, some twenty and odd years ago.

Mrs. Titus sang it very charmingly, declaiming the pathetic recitative with just effect and singing the slow movement with exquisite delicacy of taste and warmth and breadth of feeling. The high F's rang out clear, true and effortless, and the florid coda was given gracefully and brilliantly. The phrasing throughout was musicianly, and the effort as a whole may be fairly pronounced Mozart singing of the most artistic quality.

In the Delibes selection the easy flexibility and purity of the singer's voice and the delicacy of her style were delightfully exemplified. Her bravura was clean-cut and fluent, and in both the tender and more animated features of the song her rendering was flawless. There were appreciative applause and recalls for her after each effort, and her artistic success was unmistakable.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," MacDowell; Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; overture, "Bonvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV 27, 1898.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

Mr Gericke being sick, the symphony rehearsal and concert last week were conducted by Mr Franz Kneisel. The popular young soprano, Mrs Marian Titus, was the soloist, and the program was as follows: Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," a Mozart recitative and aria, Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches, "The Sea," recitative and aria from Delibes' "Lakme" and the Liszt symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

The principal interest in the program was centered upon the young soloist, who is one of the foremost singers in the local world, and whose work promises to make her well and favorably known in a wider field within a short time. Mrs Titus combines an attractive personality with a voice of great purity and flexibility under excellent control. She sings easily and without a trace of affectation or mannerisms. Although light in quality, the carrying power of her voice is admirable, and her enunciation is distinct without showing a deliberation in utterance.

The Mozart recitative and aria was sung with beautiful expression. The more dramatic portion of the recitative would have been improved by a broader and more passionate treatment, but this defect was so slight that the sympathetic interpretation of the whole number revealed but few blemishes. Her phrasing and execution throughout were charming, and the silvery voice was as true to pitch as one could wish. The florid music of the Lakme legend found in Mrs Titus a delightful exponent. The opening cadenza which introduced the legend was a brilliant example of bravura singing, and the runs and trills were given with a facility and evenness of execution that were nearly flawless. In brief it may be said that Mrs Titus acquitted herself with great credit and showed that she is steadily advancing in her chosen profession. That a young local artist should appear with the symphony players and achieve such a success should be a source of great gratification to herself, her teachers and friends. The audience was very large and very enthusiastic, bestowing special applause upon Mrs Titus.

Mr Kneisel conducted the selections in a highly commendable manner. The restless phrases of the "Fingal's Cave" overture were given clearly, and the closing coda was thoroughly satisfactory in tempo and brilliancy. "The Sea," with its storm effects capitally illustrated, was as a whole effectively interpolated, and the Liszt poem was also excellent throughout. The fragmentary phrases by the violas, basses and trombones deserve special praise for smoothness in their "conversation."

The program announced for this week's concerts is as follows: Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," MacDowell; Siegfried Idyll, Wagner; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, November 26, 1898.

Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, the programme of the fifth symphony concert had to be somewhat changed, and Mr. Kneisel had to take the baton. The programme given was the overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," Cornelius; concerto for 'cello, in A minor, op. 33, Saint-Saëns; Volkmann's Symphony, No. 1, in D minor, and the "Tannhäuser" overture. Mr. Schroeder was the soloist. The performance, as a whole, was an admirable one.

You know that Mr. Kneisel, like Theodore Thomas, is a born conductor, consequently regardless of his appearance in this emergency he succeeded in carrying through the performance in a commendable manner. He received a rousing welcome when he came on, and was heartily applauded after each number.

One has but to praise Mr. Schroeder whenever he presents himself as soloist. The ripe musicianship, the ample technic, the mature style, and the expressive playing of this eminently able performer are too well known to require further comment.

The Volkmann Symphony, which contains much splendid material, was somewhat coarsely played, regardless of Mr. Kneisel's efforts to command and restrain the players. Strange to say, there was some one among the first violins who came in forte in the wrong place, a matter of carelessness of which the offender should be ashamed.

This symphony offered the opportunity for the new first clarinet player to display his powers, and in my opinion he used it, not very creditably, when one considers the position he occupies and its demands. His style is dry and he is seldom warm on the pitch. When he attempts to increase power he blows his instrument direfully flat. It isn't necessary to go to Paris to obtain this kind of playing, for it can be had without the expense of importation.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Fingals-Höhle," opus 26.
Mozart: Recitative, "Mia speranza adorata," and Rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sia."
Paul Gilson: Esquisses symphoniques, "La Mer." (First time complete in Boston.)
Delibes: Légende de la Fille du Paria, from "Lakmé."
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Préludes."
Mrs. Marian Titus was the singer.

Owing to Mr. Gericke's continued illness Mr. Kneisel again conducted. And, by the way, it is no mean feather in the Symphony Orchestra's cap to retain a new work like Gilson's "La Mer" on the programme, in spite of the illness of its regular conductor; most orchestras would have deemed a change of bill prudent; but with Mr. Kneisel all things may be dared!

It was good to hear Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" again; it made an excellent beginning to what was, upon the whole, rather a marine programme. Moreover, the overture holds its own wonderfully well; when Mendelssohn was in just the right mood his romanticism and picturesque suggestiveness were hard to beat; in spite of its small score and strict form—strict, but not in the least pedantic—this overture can vie with anything of its sort that has been written since its time. It was capitally played.

If we mistake not, there has been a good deal of curiosity in several quarters to hear some more of Gilson's "La Mer" ever since Mr. Nikisch gave the first three movements here in 1893. As well as we can remember, our own impression of the work was not particularly favorable then; but last Saturday evening we were considerably more impressed with it than we expected to be. All four movements are too long, especially the third; this seems plain enough. But there is not a little beauty, of a rather vague, poetic sort, in the work; Gilson must have some Flemish blood in him, to cure the Gallic downrightness in his composition, for he shows himself very capable of falling easily and naturally into a mood, and letting that mood color his work. No true Frenchman was ever guilty of so unreasoning a thing as a mood! You may be pretty sure that a moody Gaul has some un-Gallic blood in his veins. But, together with Gilson's un-French moodiness, one finds one very French trait in him; a strong pictorial bent, an evidently instinctive tendency to put the optics of his subject into the foreground. In one sense, his treatment of his poetic subject is of the realistic sort, although the four movements of his symphonic composition have little in common with the four parts of Eddy Levis's poem, beyond the mere titles; but his realism is almost without exception visual, not auditory. Except in the "Storm" movement, one finds little or nothing of that suggestion of sea sounds that is so potent in Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt;" on the contrary, his music is almost constantly suggestive of sea sights, of waves flashing in the sunlight, of twilight dimness, of mournful solitude. Even in the "Storm," where the wind sighs its chromatic scales as it does in all orchestral tempests, one finds a more vivid suggestion of the aspect of a tempestuous sea in the sudden illumination of a flash of lightning, alternating with moments of utter darkness, than one does of the auditory phenomena of a marine cyclone. One point which struck us particularly in this "Storm" of Gilson's, which may, upon the whole, be compared very favorably with Rubinstein's in his "Ocean" symphony, is a strange absence of violence in the music; the moderate tempo, in itself, somehow precludes the idea of violence; everything sounds inexorable, if you will, but rather deliberate. Perhaps the performance may have had something to do with this. Whatever may be thought of these sketches of Gilson's, either as pure music or as tone-painting, there can hardly be two opinions about the composer's admirably beautiful orchestration; his color-effects are often simply wonderful. The performance under Mr. Kneisel was excellent throughout; the whole composition was mounted by him—for the performance under Mr. Nikisch could have had little effect upon the players at this distance of time—and to him belongs the credit of a singularly fine and exhaustive rendering.

Liszt's "Les Préludes" was grandly played, and made a fine close to the concert. Say what one may about this work, about its leaning toward the commonplace and what not, it remains surely one of the most musical things Liszt ever wrote; the music gives evidence of a wealth of inventive resource such as Liszt could not often lay claim to.

Mrs. Titus sang Mozart's concert aria remarkably well. It is one of the most important of the whole set of twelve, one which shows the composer in his grander, larger vein of melody and sentiment. At moments this air rises well into the Donna Anna stratum. That Mrs. Titus has quite the breadth of style demanded by this sort of writing cannot truly be said; but she offers a very acceptable substitute for it, in taking the music in a little less heroic vein than was evidently contemplated by the composer, substituting a very true and genial pathos for tragic breadth of expression, and, in a word, never venturing beyond her own depth. Then the aria has unquestionably another side; it was written as a show-piece for an exceptionally high-voiced singer; and Mrs. Titus is here on her native heath. Her high E-flats and F-natural rang out as easily and purely as those of a flute; her brilliant coloratura was unexceptionable. Upon the whole, her performance of this really very beautiful air was singularly fine. Her singing, too, of the Delibes song was exquisite. One wishes, though, that this particular song could have a well-earned rest for several years; it is wearing out; one hears it with curious twinges, as one reflects upon how close the relationship is between French opéra-comique, of the Delibes sort, and French opéra-bouffe. Mrs. Titus was applauded loud and long, and more than once recalled.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21; MacDowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Wagner, "Ein Siegfried-Idyll"; Berlioz, overture to Benvenuto Cellini," opus 23.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the [illegible] concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening. Although the streets are not yet in a condition to make travelling either pleasant or comfortable, there was little, if any, diminution in the numbers of the audience. The seats were well filled, as usual. A fine concert was listened to under the direction of Mr. Franz Kneisel, whose place at the head of the first violins was filled by Mr. C. M. Loeffler. An attack of the grippe has prevented Conductor Gericke from public appearance for several days, and Mr. Kneisel filled his place at the concert in Boston last week.

The programme offered last night was as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring," Op. 36..........Karl Goldmark
Concerto for violoncello, in A-minor, Op. 33..........Camille Saint-Saens
Allegro non troppo (A-minor).
Allegretto con moto (B-flat major).
Come prima. un peu moins vite (A-minor).
Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte en Rondeau..........Johann Sebastian Bach
(Arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich.)
I. Preludio: Allegro (E-major).
II. Adagio (C-major).
III. Gavotte en Rondeau: Moderato (E-major)
Symphony No. 2, in C-major, Op. 61..........Robert Schumann
I. Sostenuto assai (C-major).
Allegro ma non troppo (C-major).
II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace (C-major).
Trio I. (G-major).
Trio II (C-major).
III. Adagio espressivo (C-minor).
IV. Allegro molto vivace (C-major).

As will be seen, the programme was strictly an instrumental one. It was made up of numbers that were well contrasted and full of interest. Goldmark's concert overture, "In the Spring," a fresh and tuneful work, has been heard here but once before, but is well worth hearing oftener. Like all of Goldmark's compositions, it is full of character and originality, melodious and remarkable for the skill shown in intricate and brilliant instrumentation. Orchestra "color" is laid on with a free hand and climaxes are worked up with the utmost energy. It was played with abounding spirit and fire.

The string orchestra was heard to fine advantage in the number by Bach, which is arranged by Sigismund Bachrich from the violin sonatas of the old Leipsic cantor. According to report, a part of this music was discovered by chance among a heap of old papers in 1814. Probably no one will ever know how many priceless treasures of the greatest of all composers met the fate which was so narrowly escaped in this instance. Mr. Bachrich's arrangement is a skillful one, and the number, as played by this unrivalled body of strings, is always a popular one. The closing orchestral number, Schumann's symphony in C, is another work too rarely heard in these concerts. It is one of Schumann's most poetic compositions. The orchestra did perhaps its best work of the evening in this, and the concert closed with a most brilliant and satisfactory effect.

The soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, played Saint-Saens's fine concerto for violoncello with abounding skill, displaying his finished technic and powers of interpretation to the greatest advantage.

Mr. Kneisel was given a warm greeting when he came forward to the conductor's desk, and he must be given the credit of filling the breach in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. His reputation as a conductor is a solid and growing one. Perhaps he will end by being a conductor, like so many others who have reached that position through the road of the first violin desk.

The concert was a pleasing one, and aroused many tokens of interest and approval. The third concert of the series will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 28.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Union — Nov. 5

Although the programmes for the first Boston Symphony concerts in Brooklyn were published last Saturday, they are republished to-day for the benefit of music-lovers who have not yet bought their tickets. The sale is open at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street, and at the office of the Brooklyn Institute, 502 Fulton street. Rosenthal will be the soloist at both the matinee, Friday afternoon, Nov. 11, and at the concert on Saturday evening, Nov. 12. The matinee programme is as follows:

Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."
Bach—Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte en Rondeau.
(Arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich.)
I. Preludio: Allegro (E major).
II. Adagio (C major).
III. Gavotte en Rondeau: Moderato (E major).
Chopin—Piano Concerto No. 1, in E minor.
I. Allegro maestoso.
II. Romance, Larghetto.
III. Rondo vivace.
Mr. Rosenthal.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
I. Allegro con brio (C minor).
II. Andante con moto (A flat major).
III. Allegro (C major).
Trio (C major).
IV. Allegro (C major).

The programme for Saturday evening will be as follows:

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Scharwenka—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor; op. 32.
I. Allegro patetico: Adagio: Allegro animato.
II. Sherzo (Allegro assai.)
III. Allegro non tanto quasi adagio: Allegro molto e passionato.
Mr. Rosenthal.
Smetana—Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cyclus, "My Country.")
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74.
I. Adagio (B minor.)
Allegro non troppo (B minor.)
II. Allegro con grazia (D major.)
III. Allegro molto vivace (G major.)
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B minor.)

The concerts will be given at the Academy of Music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Welcomed by a Large Audience at the Academy of Music.

Eagle Nov. 12

The best orchestra in the world is here again, and it drew an audience to the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon that it was a pleasure to see. But before a word of notice is given to the concert, it ought to be urged that the mangement of the orchestra and the Brooklyn Institute, under whose auspices these Brooklyn concerts are given, are rich enough to hire an additional doorkeeper and pass the public through the lobby in time to hear the whole programme. There are late comers at every concert, who would be late if they had two days to get ready in; but it was no fault of some hundreds yesterday that they were not in their seats when Mr. Gericke lifted his baton for the first number. The outer lobby was a surging mass of people, all trying to pass through a door two feet wide, the dozen or fifteen stockholders having a door to themselves, which the public could not use, and the door to the right being closed and bolted. As a result of this method, so many were delayed in their entrance that they almost filled the aisle which surrounds the auditorium. It might be an added expense of 50 cents to hire another man to collect tickets at the door on the right for twenty minutes or less, but even if it were a dollar, there are people in the audience who would cheerfully make up this sum in order to reach the inside of the building in season to hear the whole programme. The Seidl Society, with audiences not more than two-thirds as large as that of yesterday, was able to do this, and was also able to preserve one of the most pleasant of the Academy's traditions—that of decorating the stage with palms and flowers. The lighting the first part of the concert yesterday was agreeable, that is, the glare in the auditorium was softened, but during the last half of the bill, lights were turned into the public eye again. The massing of lamps about the stage, where one must look into them, instead of being arranged so that they would shine on the stage and not into the auditorium, is one of the defects in the Academy that will probably never be remedied. It causes more drowsiness and headache than all the lights in all the other theaters in Brooklyn combined.

Well, that's over. So one may now speak of the concert. As it was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it came as near to perfection as one is likely to hear in this present day of grace. After Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur, the leadership has reverted to Mr. Gericke again. He is an able and in some respects admirable leader. He is self-contained, he never loses his grasp on his subject or his men for an instant, through emotion or enthusiasm, he has exacted the highest finish from his band, especially from its matchless string division, that can be obtained. He has individuality, too, and proves it now and again in his reading, though it is the reading of a passage, rather than of a work. In his manner he is more like Theodore Thomas than any other director with whom the American people have long been familiar. He has his confidence, care and almost his repose, albeit he has more austerity than Mr. Thomas, he lacks the roughness and gaucherie of Mr. Paur, he never poses as Mr. Nikisch used to, and he is not the man to exhibit the alternating indifference and command of Mr. Seidl. The lack is that of accent. Smoothness is secured at the cost not of strength, but of dramatic effect. One can hardly imagine Mr. Gericke giving the "Tannhauser" overture or the Siegfried death music as Seidl gave them, but as a Beethoven director he is possibly the safer. He is faithful to the composer. The first number was the "Euryanthe" overture, and this was given with spirit as well as polish. The weird vision for muted strings would have roused the wonder of us all not many years ago, but we are used to perfections now, and it was played with absolute perfection. It revealed a beauty in Weber that has not always been brought out of his work, even his delightful overture. Had he written only that dozen or twenty bars he would have still been a remarkable man, and that one little episode was forty years ahead of his epoch. It is as free as to form as Wagner, and may have been one of the things that influenced that composer toward the attainment of a larger liberty. The strings were also heard in the Bachrich arrangement of the Bach prelude, adagio and gavotte, that, as Mr. Apthorp tells us, was rescued in manuscript from a number of papers that were going to the butter shop, like the sonnets that Ragenneau's wife made him use for wrapping papers for his cakes. Neither the work nor the treatment of it revealed the master in his stateliest aspect, but it was most serious and lovely, and is as if made for the strings. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was played spendidly, yet fell a shade short of satisfying the listener because of that one lack of verve. Its proclamatory passages wanted just that touch of authority which even Seidl, with a small and scrappy orchestra, would sometimes give to it. Its beauty was all there, its tenderness, its charm and most of its tragedy. It was wholesome and satisfying, as free from morbid emphasis as if it had been Mozart, and in its effect almost cheerful, which the Fifth Symphony is not really supposed to be. One almost needs to hear this symphony once a year, if he lives in a city, to keep his mind fresh, just as he needs the seasonable "Messiah" about Christmas time, and as he needs to see a Shakspearean play once in a while, to feel sure that the world of men has not become altogether frivolous.

If the audience was larger than usual it may be that the soloist had something to do with that fact. Nine people in ten would rather hear one man fiddle than to hear the fifty-six artists who play on stringed instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and who beat any one fiddler fifty-six times over. The soloist this time was Moriz Rosenthal, the master mechanic of the piano. There is no man on the concert stage who can strike so many notes in a second as Mr. Rosenthal; therefore he is an idol of a large part of the public. But, in justice to his art, it is due to him to say that if he is not a player of deep feeling he is a man of better understanding than people think, and that, while he likes best to display his technic, he can, nevertheless, give an intelligent and artistic performance of music that is not all scales, trills, turns, glissades and that sort of thing. The piece he is going to play at the concert to-night is understood to be a manufacture of that kind, and if it is there will be a bobbery in the gallery that cannot be suppressed for five minutes, for his audience will be wild with wonder and delight. But yesterday he played music instead, and played it with charm and deftness. It was the Chopin concerto in E minor, which, all things considered, is the best of piano concerti, unless one excepts the Schum[illegible] deepen the pathos and mystery of the work, but he did not dispel them. Within his limitations, which are not physical limitations, he was sympathetic. As a disclosure in virtuosity his playing was wonderful and enjoyable. He sparkled and dazzled when he could, and there is a brief opportunity for fireworks at the end of the rondo, which passage he took at amazing speed. The singing touch, that one must have if he would play Chopin, is not so well at his command as it should be. He is used to playing brilliant things that require a staccato, and yesterday one also felt a lack of solidity in his bass. Possibly, the fact that Mr. Gericke arrayed the whole orchestra of seventy-five men against him, instead of thinning down the strings, as leaders generally do, compelled him to work under a disadvantage, for there were moments when the band was a little too strong for him. But the artist played the work pleasantly enough to win thanks, and now and then disclosed a touch that was delightful, as in the diminished chords near the close of the romance, which are played softly and as arpeggi. In these his touch was pearly and fine, and the notes tinkled as purely and sweetly as the chiming of water drops. He was called out again and again and obliged to bow until he was nearly as tired of doing it as he would have been of playing.

The orchestra has changed but little in personnel since last season. The picturesque players on oboes and the leading flutist are at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean, victims of the Bourgogne disaster. Mr. Schultz, who was in the front rank of the 'cellists, is now a wandering soloist, and the drummer who presides over a set of kettles that shine like the Rhine treasure, is a new man. But new and old alike, all are artists of high rank, and a concert by them is a thing to hear at a cost of miles of travel. The bill to-night contains the Goldmark "Spring" overture, a Scharwenka concerto, Smetana's "Vysehrad" and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. And it looks as though it would begin on time.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rosenthal and Gericke Warmly Greeted.

Citizen Nov. 12

Yesterday afternoon, a notably large audience greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra, on its return to the Brooklyn Academy of Music, together with its new conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, and Moritz Rosenthal. The great pianist, Rosenthal, who has not been heard in Brooklyn since 1888, was evidently the drawing card with the majority of the audience, and his reception was well nigh an ovation.

Applause more or less hearty greeted Mr. Gericke as he came before the orchestra and raised his baton to lead the opening number of the programme, Weber's "Euryanthe," which is ever popular and taking selection for the orchestra. The performance at once showed the strict discipline and precision demanded by the leader, though in conducting he is calmer than his predecessor, Emil Paur. An occasional wave of his hand and movement of the baton suggests the graceful Nikisch, once at the head of this orchestra. Getting used to the change of conductors will probably be the only difficulty for people who were so fond of Mr. Paur's leadership, while the unapproachable standard of excellence exhibited by the Boston Symphony musicians will be maintained.

Second on the programme of yesterday was a Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte en Rondeaux, by Sebastian Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich. These were deeply enjoyed by students of music and graciously received by others who were awaiting the appearance of Rosenthal in the "Chopin Concerto, in E Minor," which followed.

This composition, considered by many pianists, as one of the most poetic compositions in the entire literature of their instrument, was performed in such a manner that the interpreter may be classed as one of the most poetic players among the few pianists of highest rank.

In the first movement of the concerto, there was not a feeling of perfect satisfaction with the interpretation, but as player and listener became acquainted, and the second movement was begun critics grew more favorable. Brilliant runs and delicate turns, in which this movement abounds, were rendered with marvelous technical dexterity and rapidity, and with rare poetic taste. His pianissimos were faultless; but in sustained chords or single notes, there was at times, a lack of tonal quality, which might result from a different manipulation of fingers. While one of the greatest living pianists, he lacks the personal magnetism which, with all other requisite qualifications, makes the public bow down and worship such genius as Rosenthal's.

The concluding "rondo vivace" displayed some exquisite effects of orchestral accompaniment. No sooner had the final chord been struck than the audience started up an applause which only succeeded in bringing the pianist back to bow many times.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was the concluding number of the programme, and being one of the best known of all the Beethoven symphonies, it was highly appreciated. Here the orchestra did its best work of the afternoon.

The receipts for the concert of yesterday represented an increase over last season of $640. The total receipts for the matinee course to date are $2,280.50, as against $1,130.50 for the same course last season. It looks as if popular matinee orchestral concerts are at last established on a solid footing.

CONCERT-GOERS.

Union — Nov. 8

Much to Interest Them In a Coming Musical Event.

THE PROGRAMME FOR THE ENTERTAINMENTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAVE ARRIVED, TOGETHER WITH NOTES OF HISTORICAL INFORMATION.

The programme books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts of Nov. 11 and 12 arrived in this city yesterday afternoon. The notes are written, as usual, by William F. Apthorp, and furnish an amount of historical and descriptive information, analysis and comment that will be appreciated by the many patrons of the concerts.

Of the opening number at the Friday concert (Weber, overture to "Euryanthe,") Mr. Apthorp says it is taken from a work which has been called at once Weber's greatest masterpiece and his greatest fiasco. The theme of the opera was taken from the old French romance, and a striking general similarity can be traced between the characters in it and in Wagner's "Lohengrin." The causes which prevented its favorable reception in Vienna in 1823 and later, were, first, the advanced musical ideas of the composer, and secondly, a wretchedly inferior libretto. The piece opens one of those brilliant, impetuous rushes of the whole orchestra for which Weber was famous. This is succeeded by a commanding martial theme in full harmony, with striking rhythms and brilliant figure work, the passage from which to the gracefully buoyant and tender second theme, as sung by the first violins, produces a poignantly dramatic effect. Later, in a passage borrowed from the scene in the forest in the second act of the opera we have one of the most originally poetic episodes in all Weber. The effect is that of a soft rustling of leaves.

Mr. Apthorp refers but briefly to the second number, prelude, adagio and gavotte en rondeau by Bach (transcription of Bachrich). He mentions, however, the interesting fact that the autograph of the original set of three sanatas and three partitas by Bach was discovered in 1814 in a heap of old paper intended for a butter shop. The concerto in E minor by Chopin, which will be played by Rosenthal and orchestra, calls forth the remark that Chopin in his entire lifetime wrote only two works with orchestral accompaniment. He loved the piano as a sole instrument and felt he must touch the keys himself without being called upon to heed the player sitting next to him. Yet of this concerto Van Cleve says: "It is justly regarded by all pianists as one of the noblest and most poetic compositions in the entire literature of their instrument. The brilliant runs, the ravishing melodies, the dazzling passages of bravura, the aerial nuances which abound in this immortal concerto combine to render it a masterpiece in the highest sense." Mr. Apthorp concludes his notes to the Friday programme with a somewhat extended account of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The tradition that Beethoven intended the grand exordium of the symphony to suggest "Fate knocking at the gate" is rejected by the annotator.

On turning to the pages dealing with Saturday's programme one is chiefly interested in what Mr. Apthorp has to say about the two novelties on the list. Of the Scharwenka concerto he says:

"The B flat concerto is a virile and brilliant work. The composer has not held to a strict model as regards form, preferring the liberty of free expression and treatment of his ideas adopted by many another modern composer; yet the general outlines of the concerto form are preserved. The piano and orchestra are equal agents in presenting the themes of the work and in treating them. This concerto was played by Mme. Madeline Schiller in a concert by the Thomas Orchestra in Cambridge, Mass., Feb. 12, 1878, and later by the composer himself in a Boston concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 7, 1891." Rosenthal is the sole player in this case.

Mr. Apthorp states that the Smetana number "Vysehrad" is taken from a cyclus of six symphonic poems on "My Country," the titles of which are as follows: I. Vysehrad (a fortress in Bohemia). II. Vltava (the river Moldau). III. Sarka (the noblest of the mythical Bohemian Amazons). IV. Z Ceskych Luhuv and A Hajuv (From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows). V. Taber (The fortress of the Hussite warriors). VI. Blanik (the mountain on which the Hussite heroes sleep, awaiting their resurrection and renewed fight for the faith). The composer's programme for "Vysehrad," describing the fortress in its glory and afterwards as destroyed by the enmities of the knights, is reprinted. The last work taken up is Tschaikowsky's well-known Pathetic Symphony in B minor, which Mr. Apthorp analyzes at length. Mention should also be made of Goldmark's concert overture, "In the Spring," which opens the concert. It was first played by the Boston Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch, Jan. 21, 1893.

MUSIC FOR THE WEEK.

Eagle —— Nov. 6

OPENING OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Rosenthal, the Piano Virtuoso, to Play, and Two New Works on the List. Other Interesting Musical Events Just Ahead.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

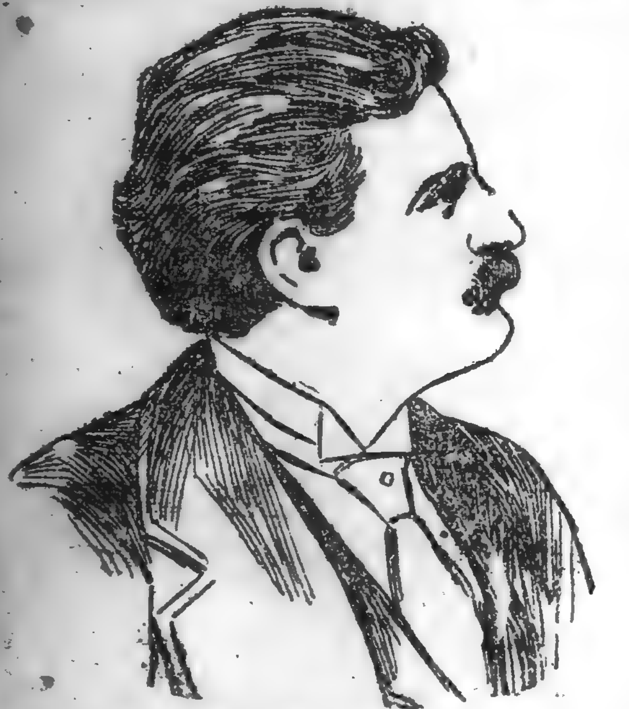
SUNDAY, 4:30 P. M.—Dudley Buck's "Triumph of David" at Holy Trinity Church.

MONDAY, 8:15 P. M.—Free organ recital by Hugo Troetschel, at German Lutheran Church, Schermerhorn street.

FRIDAY, 3:30 P. M.—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music.

SATURDAY, 8:15 P. M.—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Band this week to play two concerts in the Academy of Music, under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, its old conductor, promises to be a red letter event, both in musical and social circles. The department of music of the Institute has so arranged the two events as to constitute a musical festival of the best kind and a formal welcome to Mr. Gericke on his return from a recuperative stay of several years in Vienna. He worked so hard to make the orchestra founded by Mr. Higginson the greatest in the world that he broke down, under the strain, but the task had been so well done that the orchestra never deteriorated. On Mr. Gericke's return it was an instrument ready to his hand, and the greeting extended to conductor and men in the home city a few weeks ago was most hearty and appreciative.



MORITZ ROSENTHAL.

The first of the two concerts will take place on Friday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock, instead of 3, as heretofore. The second concert takes place on the Saturday evening following at 8:15 o'clock. It will be the eighteenth season in the history of the orchestra, the eleventh season and the sixty-fifth concert given by the orchestra in Brooklyn. The sale of seats has been the largest since the banner season of four years ago, while boxes have been engaged to an unprecedented extent. Eloquent testimony to the increased interest manifested by reason of Mr. Gericke's reappearance is borne by the fact that the concert sales to date have reached the figure of $4,671.50, as against $3,139.50 last year. This is an increase of 50 per cent. By the time Mr. Gericke waves his baton next Saturday evening there will probably not be a vacant seat in the Academy. Such audiences are not expected at the matinee concerts, but a straw showing how the wind blows is shown by the very great demand for students' tickets, nearly three hundred pupils of the public and private schools having bought season tickets for these events.

On the artistic side the concerts will be found very interesting. Moriz Rosenthal, the pianist, will be heard in the E minor Chopin concerto on Friday afternoon, and in Scharwenka's new concerto in B flat minor on Saturday evening. Mr. Rosenthal declares himself much pleased with Scharwenka's new work and has determined to play it often with orchestra. He describes the first movement as pathetic, the second as elegant and graceful and the third as stormy. His unusual virtuosity will find the best vehicle for its expression in the concluding movement. The programmes in detail are:

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture to "Euryanthe"..................... Weber
Prelude, adalio and gavotte en rondeau," Bach
(Arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich).
Piano concerto No. 1 in E minor........Chopin
Mr. Rosenthal.
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67..Beethoven

SATURDAY EVENING.

Overture—"In the Spring"............... Goldmark
Concerto for piano forte No. 1, in B flat, minor, op. 32 ....Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Symphonic poem—"Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the cyclus, "My Country")...................Smetana
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74 ....Tschaikowsky

The two symphonies represent the greatest achievements in the domain of pure music and that we are to get them both in one week is somewhat unusual even with the Boston orchestra. The two novelties are the Scharwenka concerto for which we have only Mr. Rosenthal's promises, and the Smetana symphonic poem, which calls attention to a composer who has not been so well known on this side of the Atlantic as he deserves, but who is coming into increasing favor with our programme makers. The cycle from which theVisehrad is taken bears the general title of "Mein Vaterland," and is intended to typify the achievements, hopes and aspirations of the Bohemian people. There are three sections of the work, "Vysehrad," "Vitava" and "Libussa." The second piece, which was played by the orchestra in Brooklyn last year, takes its name from the leading river of Bohemia (the Moldau). "Visehrad," which will be played on Saturday, is based on the Visehrad fortress. It has been played in Boston and was much liked there.

gether until their work is like that of four hands guided by a single brain. They will be assisted at this concert by Victor Baillard, an excellent baritone; Leo Schulz, the 'cellist whose playing aroused such enthusiasm at the last Institute concert, and Robert Thallon, accompanist. The programme is this:

Variations ....E. Rudorff
"Entree de Fete"...............Gounod—Saint-Saens
Misses Sutro.
"The Rosary" ....Nevin
"Hindoo Song" ....Bemberg
Mr. Baillard.
Grand Duo sur "l'Etoile du Nord" de Meyerbeer ....C. Wehle
Misses Sutro.
Nocturne ....Chopin
Gavotte ....Fitzenhagen
Spinnlied (Concert etude) .... Popper
Mr. Schulz.
Romanze ....C. Thern
Introduction and gavotte ....N. von Wilm
Hungarian dance ....J. Brahms
Turkish march, from "Ruins of Athens".Beethoven
Airs Bohemiens ....E. Pirani
Misses Sutro.
Dio Possenti, "Faust" ....Gounod
Toreador, "Carmen" ....Bizet
Mr. Baillard.
"Valse Carnavalesque" ....C. Chaminade
Misses Sutro.

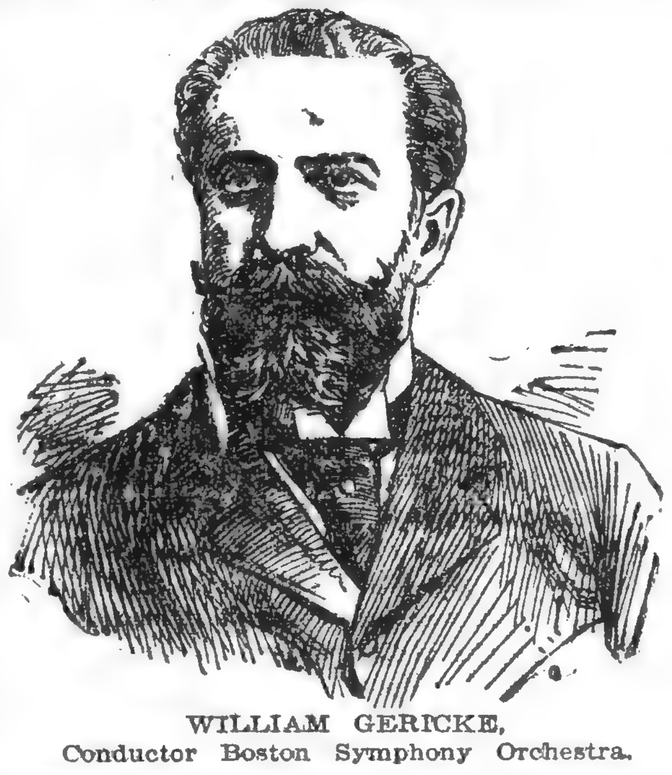
Mr. Hugo Troetschel will give the first free organ recital of his tenth season at that labor of love at the German Evangelical Church, on Schermerhorn street, on Monday evening. He will have the assistance of Hildegard Hoffmann, a popular soprano, in this programme:

Organ sonata, No. 3 in A minor, op 23 A. G. Ritter
Soprano solo—"O Bona Patria," from "Hora Novissima" ....H. W. Parker
Miss Hoffmann.
Largo, from symphony, "The New World," Anton Dvorak
"Fiat Lux" ....Theodore Dubois
Sonatina from the cantata (No. 106), "Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit' .... Sebastian Bach
Scherzo in F sharp, in form of a canon, S. Jadassohn
Soprano solo—"The Lord Is My Light," F. Allitsen
Miss Hoffmann.
"Procession du Saint Sacrament".....A. Chauvet
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....Richard Wagner
"Final alla Schumann," op. 83.....Alex Guilmant

The Brooklyn Quartet Club, under the leadership of Carl Fique, will give an interesting concert at Prospect Hall on next Sunday evening. The chorus of the club will have the support of a large orchestra and the assistance of Miss Helene Bartenwerffer, mezzo soprano; Heinrich Hallego, 'cello; Carl Fique, pianist, and Arthur Claassen, conductor of the concerto, which Mr. Fique will play with the orchestra. The programme is as follows:

Overture, "Oberon" .... Weber
Metropolitan Orchestra.
"Night in the Mountains" ....Fique
"Soldiers' Song" from the "Seven Years' War," with fifes and drums ....Kremser
Male chorus.
Concerto for piano and orchestra..............Weber
Mr. Carl Fique, piano.
Mr. Arthur Claassen, conductor.
"An Evening in August" (new)..............Fique
"Arragonaise" .... Massenet
Orchestra.
Two songs for soprano.........................Bohm
Miss Helene Bartenwerffer.
"The Rhine" ....Bruch
Male chorus.
Concerto for violoncello................ Goltermann
Mr. Heinrich Hallego.
Suabian folk song ....Zoellner
Male chorus.
Two songs for soprano......................Claassen
Miss Helene Bartenwerffer.
"Pilgrims' Chorus," "Song to the Evening Star," and "Entry of Guests" from "Tannhauser" Wagner
Orchestra.
"Frederick Barbarossa" ....Attenhofer
Chorus and orchestra.

At Robert Thallon's sixth Saturday morning concert of the season yesterday, at 900 St. Marks avenue, the programme included Beethoven's seventh symphony, arranged for two pianos; the intermezzo from "Cavalleria," the Chopin polonaise in A and Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony arranged for two pianos.



WILLIAM GERICKE,
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Frederic Reddall resumed his Saturday mornings at the Pouch Gallery yesterday, giving the twelfth of his morning concerts there. The programme has been announced in the Eagle. It introduced Miss Fielding Rosello, a new contralto here, and Mr. Carl Feininger, an excellent violinist, and the occasion proved a pleasant reunion of the audience which Mr. Reddall has gathered for these concerts.

The first monthly afternoon musical service at Holy Trinity Church, on Montague street, this afternoon at 4:30, will have unusual interest for musical people outside the congregation, because Dudley Buck's cantata, "The Triumph of David," will be sung, of course, under the direction of the composer and with his fine choir.

Mr. H. E. Krehbiel is delivering a series of afternoon lectures on "How to Listen to Music," at the Lyceum Theater, Manhattan. On Tuesday, November 15, Beethoven's seventh symphony will be played by the American symphony orchestra, under Sam Franko, as a basis for the lecture.

MUSICAL PROGRAMMES OF A FORTNIGHT.

Citizen Oct. 30

Rosenthal, the Soloist, at the First Boston Symphony Concert.

SECOND SONG RECITAL

At the Brooklyn Institute This Week —Henri Marteau's Offer to American Composers.

Another season of Boston Symphony concerts and matinees in this borough will be illustriously inaugurated on Friday afternoon, Nov. 11, and Saturday evening, Nov. 12. It will be Mr. Gericke's introduction to a Brooklyn audience in the recently accepted role of conductor. The soloist is to be Moritz Rosenthal, the great pianist, whose performance during the present season is accredited remarkable by those who heard him play last week. In Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, on Wednesday evening, Moritz Rosenthal came back to his own, being received by an audience of managers, critics, teachers and students of the piano, with all the honors due to the restored monarch of the keyboard. Two years of recuperation, following his dangerous illness in Chicago, have got him back his iron muscles, his technical dexterity and his control of pianoforte magic. For two hours and more he easily held the great audience in the grasp of a powerful and imaginative art.

Among the Brooklyn musicians attracted thither despite the downpour were R. Huntington Woodman, John Hyatt Brewer and T. Merrill Austin. After hearing the artist on that occasion, Mr. Austin said: "It seems to me that a Rosenthal craze is on, and that he will become a popular idol. He certainly is the greatest technical player in the world, and throws a magnetic spell over his audience. A spell not so much of emotion or intellectuality, but of sheer wonder and amazement at his remarkably easy way of performing the most stupendous pianistic feats. I heard him repeatedly about seven years ago, and at that time considered him a purely technical player. He has, however, broadened very much, and now charms with his emotion and especially his wonderful tone and color as well."

The following programmes will be rendered in the Academy of Music:

Brooklyn, Friday afternoon, Nov. 11:

Weber:
Overture to "Euryanthe."
Bach:
Prelude, adagio and Gavotte en Rondeau (arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich): Preludio, Allegro (E major); adagio (C. major); Gavotte en Rondeau, moderato (E major).
Chopin:
Piano concerto No. 1, in E minor. Allegro maestoso, Romance, Larghetto, Rondo Vivace.
Mr. Rosenthal.
Beethoven:
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67. Allegro con brio (C minor); andante con moto (A-flat major); Allegro (C. minor); trio (C major), Allegro (C major).

Brooklyn, Saturday evening, Nov. 12.

Goldmark:
Overture, In the Spring.
Scharwenka:
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 32. Allegro patetico, Adagio, Allegro animato; Scherzo (allegro assai); Allegro non tanto quasi adagio, Allegro molto e passionato.
Mr. Rosenthal.
Smetana:
Symphonic poem, Vysehrad (No. 1 of the Cyclus, My Country).
Tschaikowsky:
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Pathetique, op. 74. Adagio (B minor), Allegro non troppo (B. minor); Allegro con grazia (D major); Allegro molto vivace (G major); Finale, Adagio lamentoso (B minor).

THE MATINEE SYMPHONY.

Eagle Nov 12

The house which assembled to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening concert of the season yesterday afternoon was one of the largest noted at an afternoon event in this city. The receipts represented an increase over last season of $640. The total receipts for the matinee course to date are $2,280.50, as against $1,130.50 for the same course last season. It looks as if popular matinee orchestral concerts are at last established on a solid footing.

COMMENT ON SYMPHONY MUSIC.

Much to Interest This Week's Concert Goers in Mr. Apthorp's Programme Notes.

Eagle —— Nov. 8

The programme books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts of November 11 and 12 arrived in this city yesterday afternoon. The notes are written, as usual, by William F. Apthorp, and furnish an amount of historical and descriptive information, analysis and comment that will be appreciated by the many patrons of the concerts.

Of the opening number, at the Friday afternoon concert (Weber, overture to "Euryanthe"), Mr. Apthorp says it is taken from a work which has been called at once Weber's greatest masterpiece and his greatest fiasco. The theme of the opera was taken from an old French romance, and a striking general similarity can be traced between the characters in it and in Wagner's "Lohengrin." The causes which prevented its favorable reception in Vienna, in 1823 and later, were, first, the advanced musical ideas of the composer, and, secondly, a wretchedly inferior libretto. The overture is a classic. The piece opens with one of those brilliant, impetuous rushes of the whole orchestra for which Weber was famous. This is succeeded by a commanding martial theme in full harmony, with striking rhythms and brilliant figure work, the passage from which to the gracefully buoyant and tender second theme, as sung by the first violins, produces a poignantly dramatic effect. Later, in a passage borrowed from the scene in the forest in the second act of the opera, we have one of the most originally poetic episodes in all Weber. The effect is that of a soft rustling of leaves.

Mr. Apthorp refers but briefly to the second number, prelude, adagio and gavotte en rondeau, by Bach (transcription of Bachrich). He mentions, however, the interesting fact that the autograph of the original set of three sonatas and three partitas by Bach was discovered in 1814 in a heap of old paper intended for a butter shop. The concerto in E minor, by Chopin, which will be played by Rosenthal and orchestra, calls forth the remark that Chopin, in his entire lifetime, wrote only two works with orchestral accompaniment. He loved the piano as a sole instrument, and felt he must touch the keys himself without being called upon to heed the player sitting next to him. Yet of this concerto Van Cleve says: "It is justly regarded by all pianists as one of the noblest and most poetic compositions in the entire literature of their instrument. The brilliant runs, the ravishing melodies, the dazzling passages of bravura, the aerial nuances which abound in this immortal concerto combine to render it a masterpiece in the highest sense." Mr. Apthorp concludes his notes to the Friday programme with a somewhat extended account of Beethoven's fifth symphony. The tradition that Beethoven intended the grand exordium of the symphony to suggest "Fate knocking at the gate" is rejected by the annotator.

On turning to the pages dealing with Saturday's programme one is chiefly interested in what Mr. Apthrop has to say about the two novelties on the list. Of the Scharwenka concerto he says: "The B-flat concerto is a virile and brilliant work. The composer has not held to a strict model as regards form, preferring the liberty of free expression and treatment of his ideas adopted by many another modern composer; yet the general outlines of the concerto form are preserved. The piano and orchestra are equal agents in presenting the themes of the work and in treating them. This concerto was played by Mme. Madeline Schiller in a concert by the Thomas Orchestra in Cambridge, Mass., February 12, 1878, and later by the composer himself in a Boston concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 7, 1891." Rosenthal is the solo player in this case.

Mr. Apthorp states that the Smetana number "Vysehrad" is taken from a cyclus of six symphonic poems on "My Country," the titles of which are as follows: I. Vysehrad (a fortress in Bohemia). II. Vltava (the river Moldau). III. Sarka (the noblest of the mythical Bohemian Amazons). IV. Z. Ceskych Luhuv A Hajuv (From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows). V. Tabor (The fortress of the Hussite warriors). VI. Blanik (the mountain on which the Hussite heroes sleep, awaiting their resurrection and renewed fight for the faith). The composer's programme for "Vysehrad," describing the fortress in its glory and afterward as destroyed by the enmities of the knights is reprinted. The last work taken up is Tschaikowsky's well known Pathetic Symphony in B minor, which Mr. Apthorp analyzes at length. Mention should also be made of Goldmark's concert overture, "In the Spring," which opens the concert. It was first played by the Boston Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch, January 21, 1893.

ROSENTHAL TO PLAY HERE.

Eagle Oct. 31

He Describes His Brooklyn Numbers and Talks About His Long Tour.

Moriz Rosenthal, the Austrian pianist, was the recipient of many congratulations on his opening concert at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, last Wednesday evening. He goes to Boston this week to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city on November 4 and 5. The following week he expects to play in New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, having a couple of engagements with Mr. Gericke's band at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on November 11 and 12.

In view of Rosenthal's approaching visit here he was asked by a reporter to speak about his prospective American tour and the programme for the Brooklyn concerts in particular. He replied as follows:

"My repertoire for the coming tour will comprise about two hundred pieces, among the novelties being works by Schytte, Poldini, Joseffy and some original compositions. But as my illness of two years ago prevented me from giving the number of concerts planned, the whole repertoire will be largely new.

"I am scheduled to play in Brooklyn November 12, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I shall play Chopin's E Minor concerto on the first date and Scharwenka's concerto in B flat minor on the second. The first movement of the latter work may be described as 'pathetique,' the second as very elegant and graceful, while the third may be called 'stormy.'

"I do not consider the work mapped out by my manager as hard.As for the visit to the Pacific coast and the Mexican engagements, I anticipate both wtih plesure because I love California and admire Mexico. It is a mistake to suppose that a virtuoso who has once mastered his art can maintain the high level of excellence only by continuous toil. The ability once acquired is as permanent a possession as your knowledge of English is to you. A membership of this sort carries one with confidence through long periods of public engagements."

BOTH WERE SUCCESSFUL.

Citizen — Nov. 14

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Moritz Rosenthal at the Academy

RECEIVED WITH RAPTURE.

Music Lovers of Brooklyn Filled the Academy—The Renowned Musicians Merited the Praise and Applause They Received.

Brooklyn reassured the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Moritz Rosenthal Saturday evening of the sincerity of the welcome afforded them at the first matinee of the season on Friday, while that renowned company of musicians and the great pianist merited more praise from the audience which filled the Academy on Saturday evening than the day before. Wilhelm Gericke, leader of the orchestra, and Rosenthal ceased to be a stranger in our midst, and improved with that acquaintance which produces an at-home feeling.

Promptly at 8:15 the opening overture, "In the Spring," by Karl Goldmark, was struck up fearlessly, and with the abandon which nature suggests in the awaking of birds and flowers after winter sleep. The opening theme is brilliant, while the conclusion is marked by a flowing cantabile melody on the violins, with contracted harmonies in the wind instruments. The coda is wonderfully dramatic and full of climatic effect, to which justice was done by the orchestra.

By the time late-comers had found their seats, and the piano had been moved in place, the pianist, who is attracting most attention in this country at the present time, made his bow to the audience, and was ready to enter upon the Scharwenka Concerto in B-flat minor, which was his scheduled number for the concert, and which exhibited the style of playing for which Rosenthal is pre-eminently suited. While in this composition soloist and orchestra share alike in presenting themes and their variations, which in the Scherzo and finale allegro, are pyrotechnic displays for the technician. And still the wonder grew as the soloist increased the rapidity of octave and scale passages toward the close. The first movement of the Concerto has an adapted theme, the melody of which Rosenthal produced with much finer singing quality than he brought out of the Chopin selection of the day before, while no one could say that his base was not sufficiently heavy for the occasion. That brilliant and showy compositions, with any amount of technical difficulties, are his forte was further assured by the encore which he consented to play.

Upon the conclusion of the concerto, Rosenthal shook hands with Mr. Gericke and bowed to the orchestra in recognition of their fine support, then walked from the stage, only to return in response to great applause. After the second bow Mr. Gericke seated himself by Mr. Kneisel, and awaited the encore, which was almost certain. After five bows, Rosenthal sat down at the keyboard and rendered with characteristic brilliant effect his own arrangement of a familiar Strauss waltz, "Souvenir de Vienne."

A symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," by Bedrich Sonetana, which in reality is a cyclus of six symphonic poems, which portray the glory of the famed fortress, "Vysehrad," a festal tourney of knights, and the destruction of the fortress. This rather short number was a well-adapted link between the concerto and the symhpony, which was Tchaikowsky's No. 6, in B minor. The opening adagio movement scored for harp interpretation, was beautifully rendered, after which the weird themes of the allegro, in both second and third movements, were worked out with artistic effect. Mr. Gericke, showing more animation than seemed to be his wont, was in deepest earnest with every count, as was every man in the orchestra, helping to produce the matchless ensemble.

This is a symphony which a truly musical audience should listen to not less than once every season, for it grows in favor with each succeeding repetition.

With the adagio lamentoso of funereal character, supposed to have been the composer's own requiem, the symphony came to a solemn close, which the audience seemed to respect by omitting vociferous applause.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Union — Nov. 14

Another large audience assembled Saturday evening at the Academy of Music to listen to the Boston Orchestra, under the ladership of Gericke. The impression produced by the music, though the programme was entirely different, was very similar to that of Friday afternoon. Gericke as a conductor is distinctly more serene, more polished, more conservative than either Seidl, Nikisch or Paur; but he is to a certain extent lacking in temperament. Yet it is doubtful if much of the criticism of musical directors, after they have reached a righ plane of efficiency and skill, is not more or less affectation. The main part of any given symphony or important composition is read not so very differently by different conductors; from very necessity the interpretation of nine-tenths of all music is dependant on absolute knowledge, which is much the same with one musician of the first rank as with another. It is only here and there, in certain portentous passages that the touch of genius makes itself felt. To be sure it is often just this touch that Mr. Gericke lacks, and we miss it always just where we can least spare it, even though the main interpretation may be everything we could ask. While he charms and satisfies, he does not as a rule thrill us, and the people of this dying century demand that their feelings shall be greatly harrowed.

Yet, after all, he fails to impress us in the second-class style of emotional music, so to speak, rather than in works which bear the stamp of immortality. Of Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring" and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," undoubtedly a conductor like Nikisch, with his susceptibility to warmth and color, or Seidl, instantly alive to the dramatic note, would have made more. But it is doubtful if either would have done better, on the whole, with Tchaikovsky's Symphony "Pathetique." The limpidity of the second movement was as remarkable as Beethoven's Seventh Symphony under Theodore Thomas, and in much the same mood; while the third went brilliantly, and reached an impressive conclusion. But it was the Adagio Lamentoso which proved conclusively that Mr. Gericke is possessed of the artist's soul not less than the musician's knowledge; it demonstrated that half this talk about the man's inability to reach spiritual heights is mere stuff and nonsense. When the music is worthy of him, he is worthy of the music, for no nobler rendering of that sublime threnody was ever heard in this city. The tug on the heart-strings, as that impassional cry throbbed among the 'cellos, was almost more than one could bear. Amidst that wonderful organ tone of the eight basses and their allies, and the solemn beat of the orchestra in full fortissimo, a soul seemed truly to have passed beyond its earthly home. Mr. Gericke's reading was simple and unforced, but, absolutely convincing and sincere. It was as though one stood beside the open grave.

Rosenthal, the soloist of the occasion, was in a very different mood from that of Friday afternoon. With Scharwenka's first concerto, full to overflowing with notes and difficulties, he toyed as a lady with her fan. Nothing seemed to daunt him, and he took the music at amazing speed, adding immeasurably to the composer's intention. The poetic feeling evinced in the Chopin concerto the day before had completely evaporated, and we saw only the virtuoso exulting in his agility and his strength. It was not enjoyable in the true sense of the word, but it was marvelous. Only the professional musician can fully understand what Rosenthal's playing means—he alone can measure the technical difficulties essayed and overcome. It was interesting to watch the men in the orchestra, who had an opportunity to give their attention to the pianist during the encore—a Strauss waltz, with original and extraordinary variations. Every face exhibited the most intense and eager interest, the lips parted with excitement and wonder at such prodigious digital dexterity and strength of wrist; those in the rear rising that they might look over the heads of their associates. The shout and violent applause that went up from his brother associates not less than the audience indicated unmistakeably the appreciation of Rosenthal by the profession. He may lack the soul, the legato touch and the pedal magic of Paderewski (for that matter, who doesn't?), but he is one of the wonders of the day.

The Sun.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1898.

Conductor Gericke of the Boston Symphony Better.

BOSTON, Nov. 28.—Mr. F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gives out the information that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is better to-day. He was stricken with the grip a week ago last Saturday, and his high temperature caused his physician to fear typhoid fever. This morning, however, the temperature has been reduced, and the chance of his having typhoid is now very small. Mr. Kneisel will conduct the orchestra this week, but it is hoped that Mr. Gericke will be able to conduct by next week.

SYMPHONY MUSIC.

Citizen — Nov. 8

Comment on Concert Programme by W. F. Apthorp.

The programme books of the Symphony Orchestra for the concerts of Nov. 11 and 12 arrived in this city yesterday afternoon. The notes are written, as usual, by William F. Apthorp, and furnish an amount of historical and descriptive information, analysis and comment that will be appreciated by the many patrons of the concerts.

Of the opening number at the Friday afternoon concert (Weber, overture to "Euryanthe"), Mr. Apthorp says it is taken from a work which has been called at once Weber's greatest masterpiece and his greatest fiasco. The theme of the opera was taken from an old French romance, and a striking general similarity can be traced between the characters in it and in Wagner's "Lohengrin." The causes which prevented its favorable reception in Vienna in 1823 and later were first, the advanced musical ideas of the composer, and secondly, a wretchedly inferior libretto. The overture is classic. The piece opens with one of those brilliant, impetuous rushes of the whole orchestra for which Weber was famous. This is succeeded by a commanding martial theme in full harmony, with striking rhythms and brilliant figure work, the passage from which to the gracefully buoyant and tender second theme as sung by the first violins produces a poignantly dramatic effect. Later, in a passage borrowed from the scene in the forest in the second act of the opera we have one of the most originally poetic episodes in all Weber. The effect is that of a sort of rustling of leaves.

Mr. Apthorp refers but briefly to the second number, prelude, adagio and gavotte en rondeau by Bach (transcription of Bachrich). He mentions, however, the interesting fact that the autograph of the original set of three sonatas and three partitas by Bach was discovered in 1814 in a heap of old paper intended for a butter shop. The concerto in E minor by Chopin, which will be played by Rosenthal and orchestra, calls forth the remark that Chopin in his entire lifetime wrote only two works with orchestral accompaniment. He loved the piano as sole instrument, and felt he must touch the keys himself without being called upon to heed the player sitting next to him. Yet of this concerto Van Cleve says: "It is justly regarded by all pianists as one of the noblest and most poetic compositions in the entire literature of their instrument. The brilliant runs, the ravishing melodies, the dazzling passages of bravura, the aerial nuances which abound in this immortal concerto combine to render it a masterpiece in the highest sense." Mr. Apthorp concludes his notes to the Friday programme with a somewhat extended account of Beethovan's fifth symphony. The tradition that Beethovan intended the grand exordium of the symphony to suggest "Fate knocking at the gate" is rejected by the annotator.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Eagle Nov. 13

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy was as largely attended as the one on Friday and evoked even more enthusiasm. Conditions appeared to be more favorable for that rapport between audience and artists than they were at the matinee and Mr. Gericke showed more spirit in his leading and reading than he did at the former concert. The music was all of a recent day, yet only one number was new to local audiences, and that was Smetana's "Vysehrad," the first number in his cyclus, "My Country." But though the other music was familiar, it was delightfully played. That the brasses were a little off once in the symphony and the wood and silver wind in the concerto were things of only passing moment and the blemish heightened the wondrous perfection that followed and had gone before. The attack of the strings, their singing, almost organ quality, was discovered in the symphony especially. Goldmark's "Spring" overture, which is not descriptive, but is suggestive of the freshness, gaiety, life and abandon of May, was played in au authoritative fashion, but with expression and gace as well. The Smetana piece, in which one might fancy the composer as an ancient bard singing to the harp of the glory and power of old Bohemia, is free in form and suggests Wagner in "The Rhine Gold," especially as there is a flowing figure for the strings that recalls the Rhine music. The hary has a proud, commanding part in the work and the picture that is called up is strong and high in light and color, if not strikingly beautiful. It would be of interest to have the entire work of six numbers performed at some one of these concerts. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony was the great piece of the night, and Mr. Gericke gave a sedate, appreciative, even noble interpretation of it. This symphony is one of the lasting works. It goes deep in its appeal and in its meaning we reach the ultimate. It is too mournful to be called morbid. Rather it is tragic. It is as epic as "Macbeth" or "Hamlet." The close of the dirge is death itself, and one can but believe that Tchaikowsky, who went laughing but stubborn to his death but a little after, had a forecast of his fate when he put these notes to paper. Rough, strange, barbaric as the music is at times, in its might and mass it is Homeric.

But audiences better like to be tickled than impressed, and Mr. Rosenthal, the pianist, aroused the most excitement of the evening. He played Xaver Scharwenka's first concerto, which is not so trifling a thing as some would have it thought, for it is interesting in its orchestral part—more so than in the piano score of it—and in instrumentation is sometimes original and opulent. It is not deep in purpose or feeling, however, and its declamatory passages do not stir one much. As a medium for the virtuoso it serves and Mr. Rosenthal was applauded to the top of his bent.

After coming out and bowing a number of times he responded to the ferocious coil that was happening up stairs, and played a Strauss waltz with frills manufactured by himself. And such a lot of them! There were notes enough to make about three such waltzes as their author usually writes. Pianist defied mathematics and physics by proving that one object could occupy several places at once. He was all over the keyboard. He tossed off scales, he ripped out three-octave chords, he played fifths and octaves at a speed that made his hands seem as diaphanous as the wings of a humming bird or the teeth of a buzz saw. As a technical exhibition it was one of the most remarkable ever seen. Musically it wasn't worht much, but the eyes of even the orchestra "bugged out" when they looked upon this wonderful mechanism. The management is thanked for opening the extra door and letting the audience pass to its seats without the customary lets and hindrances. The Boston players will be with us again on the 16th and 17 of December.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

[illegible] Oct. 29.

The programmes for the two first concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not fail to arouse interest among the members of the Brooklyn Institute, under whose auspices the concerts will be given at the Academy of Music. Moritz Rosenthal will be the soloist at both concerts. For Friday afternoon, Nov. 11, the programme will be as follows:

Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."
Bach—Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte en Rondeau.
(Arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich.)
  I. Preludio: Allegro (E major).
  II. Adagio (C major).
  III. Gavotte en Rondeau: Moderato (E major).
Chopin—Piano Concerto No. 1, in E minor.
  I. Allegro maestoso.
  II. Romance, Larghetto.
  III. Rondo vivace.
Mr. Rosenthal.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
  I. Allegro con brio (C minor).
  II. Andante con moto (A flat major).
  III. Allegro (C minor).
  Trio (C major).
  IV. Allegro (C major).

The programme for Saturday evening, Nov. 12, will be as follows:

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Scharwenka—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor; op. 32.
  I. Allegro patetico: Adagio: Allegro animato.
  II. Sherzo (Allegro assai.)
  III. Allegro non tanto quasi adagio: Allego molto e passionato.
Mr. Rosenthal.
Smetana—Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cyclus, "My Country.")
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74.
  I. Adagio (B minor.)
  Allegro non troppo (B minor.)
  II. Allegro con grazia (D major.)
  III. Allegro molto vivace (G major.)
  IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B minor.)

"It seems to me," said T. Merrill Austin, of the Institute Department of Music, after hearing the concert in Carnegie Hall, Wednesday evening, "that a Rosenthal craze is on and that he will become a popular idol. He certainly is the greatest technical player in the world and throws a magnetic spell over his audience. A spell not so much of emotion or intellectuallity but of sheer wonder and amazement at his remarkably easy way of performing the most stupendous pianiste feats. I heard him repeatedly about seven years ago, and at that time considered him a purely technical player. He has, however, broadened very much and now charms with his emotion and especially his wonderful tone color as well."

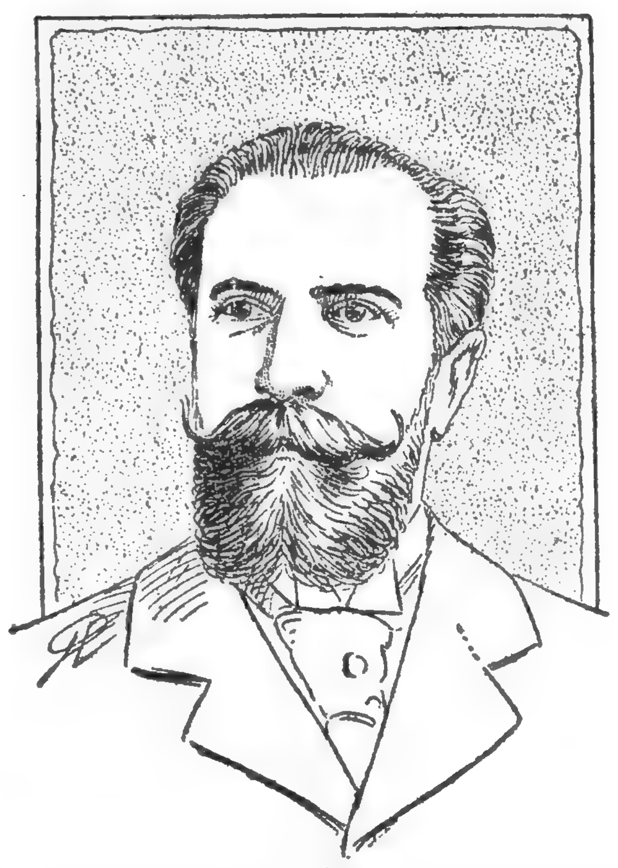
An opportunity for the young people of the Bedford and Stuyvesant districts to learn sight singing under exceptionally favorable conditions will be afforded at the organization of Brooklyn Institute sight-singing classes, under the direction of Wilbur A. Luyster, at Calvary Baptist Church, Sumner avenue and Decatur street, next Thursday evening. Mr. Luyster is an exponent of the Galin-Paris-Chove method, which was devised by three disciples of Rousseau in the last century; has been endorsed by many eminent musicians, and adopted with gratifying results in the public schools of France, Belgium and Switzerland. At the opening meeting Mr. Luyster will bring with him a class of little girls who have been taught six weeks in the method. For the benefit of those unfamiliar with the method, the abilities of the little folks will be extensively tested in singing at sight and at random, any interval in the major mode, ditto in two and three parts; in recognizing sounds as soon as heard in major; staff notation, singing at sight from staff, difficult syncopated time, and singing from staff exercises in any of the eleven keys. In addition to the demonstration referred to, Mr. Luyster will give a talk on the origin and history of the method. The fee for the course of ten lessons is $1. The necessary books and music will be furnished to pupils at cost. At the end of ten weeks new classes will be formed, in which both beginners and advanced students will be accommodated.

Evan Williams, tenor, and Miss Charlotte Maconda, soprano, assisted by Leo Schulz, 'cellist, will appear in a recital Wednesday evening, Nov. 2, at Association Hall. This will be the second in the series of song recitals in the Brooklyn Institute series.

Times Nov. 5

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The only musical events of importance in Brooklyn next week will be the first afternoon and evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. There will be ten concerts in all during the season, five on Friday afternoons and five on Saturday evenings. The opening concerts of this series will be noteworthy for more reasons than one—the orchestra is the finest in the country. The programme will be very attractive. Rosenthal is to be the soloist and Mr. Gericke will appear as conductor for the first time before a Brooklyn audience. This may be regarded as a fortunate condition of affairs, which will give unusual significance to these initial orchestral concerts of the season.



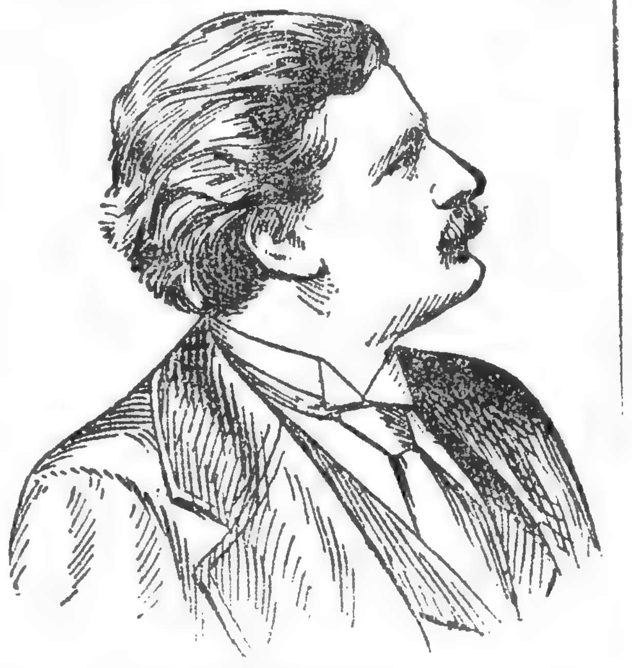
WILLIAM GERICKE.

Of the splendid qualities of this orchestra it is hardly necessary to speak. Rosenthal will return after an absence of ten years. It is known that he was to have played here two years ago, but was prevented by a serious illness, which made necessary the cancellation of all his dates. From all accounts he is a greater technician than ever, but Brooklyn can form its own opinion next Friday afternoon. Rosenthal will also play at the Saturday evening concert and the programmes for both concerts will be:

Friday Afternoon.
Overture to "Euryanthe" ....Weber
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte en Rondeau ....Bach
(Arranged for string orchestra.).
Piano concerto No. 1, in E minor..Chopin
Mr. Rosenthal.
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67 Beethoven

Saturday Evening.
Overture, "In the Spring"....Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 32........Scharwenka
Mr. Rosenthal.
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the cyclus "My County") Smetana
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique" in B minor. Op. 74 .. ..Tschaikowski

A certain interest attaches to Mr. Gericke's resumption of the leadership of this orchestra, because of what he accomplished from 1884 to 1889 in bringing the work of this company of players up to the high standard for which it has since been noted. He was a strict disciplinarian and he is credited with practically laying the foundation of the completeness in ensemble playing of this orchestra. Mr. Gericke retired as director after five years' service because his health was not of the best. He was succeeded by Mr. Nikisch, who was followed by Mr. Paur. The advent of Mr. Gericke has given a boom to the concerts of the orchestra in Boston, and his personality and style as a leader are such as to lead to the inference that he will quickly gain the confident respect of Brooklynites.



MORIZ ROSENTHAL.

CONCERTS PAST AND COMING.

Citizen Nov. 6

Rosenthal Will Appear Here First With the Boston Orchestra.

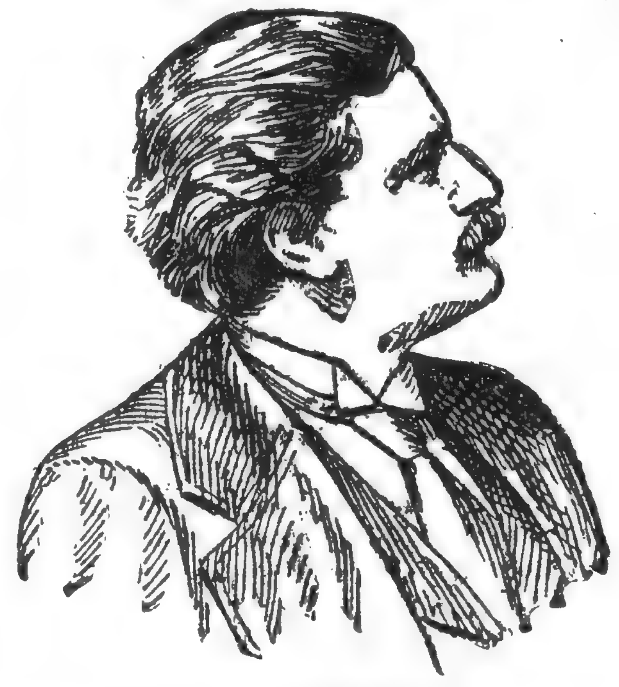
SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

Frederic Reddall's Musical Mornings Resumed Yesterday at the Pouch Gallery—Free Organ Concerts to Begin on Monday Evening.

At the end of this week, music-lovers and concert-goers will welcome to Brooklyn once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its newly chosen conductor, William Gericke. With them Moritz Rosenthal, the justly famous pianist, will make his first Brooklyn debut since 1888. His successes across the river make his coming anticipated with unusual delight, and augur well for the season of music in this borough. The Friday afternoon programme has placed a popular selection, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," first, and the inevitable Bach number second. The symphony to be performed at the matinee is Beethoven's No. 5, while Rosenthal's selection is Chopin's Concerto No. 1, in E Minor."

The Saturday evening programme is the following: Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring." Scharwenka—Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B flat minor, Op. 32; 1, Allegro Patetico; Adagio; Allegro Animato; 2, Scherzo (Allegro Assai); 3, Alegro Non Tanto Quasi Adagio; Allegro Molto e Passionato; Mr. Rosenthal. Smetana—Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cyclus, "My Country"). Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74; 1, Adagio (B minor), Allegro non Troppo (B minor); 2, Allegro Con Grazia (D major); 3, Allegro Molto Vivace (G major); 4, Finale: Adagio Lamentoso (B minor).

Mr. Frederic Reddall's "musical mornings" at the Pouch Gallery, were resumed, beginning another season, yesterday morning, with a large and appreciative audience. Mr. Reddall, who contributed a trio of songs, including the favorite old English ballad, "Polly Willis," was assisted by Mr. Karl Feininger, violinist, accompanied by Mrs. Feininger, and by Miss Grace M. Whiting, Mrs. Linda Holmes Byrne, sopranos; Miss Marion G. Inglee, mezzo-soprano; and Miss Fielding Roselle, contralto.



MORITZ ROSENTHAL.

Miss Whiting gave an artistic rendering of three selections—"Ever True," by Shelley; "Daisies," by Hawley, and "Burst, ye Apple Buds," Emery—and also took part in a trio with Mrs. Byrne and Miss Inglee.

Mrs. Byrne sang the favorite "Jewel Song," from Faust, and Miss Roselle sang three songs, "The Rosary," by Ethelbert Nevin, taking especially well with the audience.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Standard Nov. 12 Union

The Boston Orchestra was good to look upon yesterday afternoon, at the Academy of Music, and so was the large audience which welcomed it. Whoever may be the conductor, this particular body of musicians is always the same—one of the most superb organizations of its kind in the world. And since the Brooklyn Institute took hold, the audiences in this city are worthy of the entertainment afforded. Yesterday's occasion was memorable as the re-introduction of Gericke as conductor, after an absence of nine years. Gericke retired, and there was Nikisch and then Paur, the former one of the most gifted directors that America has ever had, though Boston somehow seemed more or less unaware of that fact. Paur had capacity of a certain order, and is in his element just now across the river, striving to infuse spirit, vitality and homogeneity into the Philharmonic performances. Boston is delighted to have Gericke again, and there is no particular reason why New York should complain, even though the change involves a return to the calm classicality of an earlier day as against the passionate romanticism of Nikisch and the resounding turbulence of Paur.

The programme of yesterday was admirably adapted to bring out those effects in which Mr. Gericke is at his best. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was handled in a masterly manner, and with a reverence which would have delighted the composer himself, could he have happened upon the scene. Just imagine for a moment the joy of the old masters over such superb interpretations of their immortal strains as are given without thought nowadays by a modern orchestra! With the limited material of those days, only in their dreams, and hardly then, could they have conceived of such tonal splendor, such balance of parts and perfection of detail, as was the portion of every listener yesterday afternoon. While each note was as clear as a bell, no instrument asserted itself unduly above its mate, and the result was a glorious whole. The terror of the brasses was never once felt, something of which one is never sure in the best of orchestras, even the Boston itself having sometimes sinned in this respect under Paur.

The prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, of Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Sigismund Bachrich, was another enjoyable number. There is nothing quite so wonderful as the strings of this particular body of men, and there were times yesterday when the listener was transported out of the Academy into a cathedral, with the marvelous brasses giving forth a pure organ tone. To these strings there is not only great body, but life, individuality and refinement, and that absolute cohesion which follows only in the wake of high skill and constant practice. Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," which opened the concert, was the least satisfactory number, possibly because its style is essentially dramatic. It will be interesting to watch this evening Gericke's interpretation of Tschaikowski's Symphony Pathetique. That was a prime favorite both with Nikisch and Seidl.

The soloist yesterday was the pianist Rosenthal, and his number the Chopin Concerto in E minor. By his lovely interpretation of the first two movements, the performer quite won the hearts of his audience, many of whom had believed him to be a master only of technique. Technique there certainly is in abundance, but also fine poetic feeling and delicacy of phrase. No mere virtuoso could so move a large mass of people by a work peculiarly emotional; with every bar of the noble Allegro and the tender Romance Mr. Rosenthal won friends. The Concerto gives small opportunity for the orchestra, but there were some exquisite effects among the wood wind, the new clarinetist and flutist, replacing the lamented members lost on the La Bourgoyne, having a chance to show us the value of their tones.

MUSICAL.

Times Nov. 14

Evening Symphony Concert.

A fine concert on Saturday evening introduced the evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience was large and enthusiastic, particularly over the playing of Rosenthal, the pianist, who provoked wonderment and compelled admiration of his marvelous technique. He played Scharwenka's Concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor and for an encore his own brilliantly ornamented version of a Strauss waltz. The latter was dazzling as an exhibition of digital dexterity and presumably the performer desired that it should be taken as an indication of his forte in the art of pianism. After hearing Rosenthal on Friday afternoon one might hesitate to pronounce definitely as to his distinctive qualities as a pianist. But taking the two concerts together, the conviction is forced upon the unbiased hearer that Rosenthal's art represents a high development of a retrospective conception of keyboard traditions. It seems to stand for technical attainment which has absorbed all other considerations of what constitutes the highest art in piano playing. There seems too little or nothing of personality or individuality in it, but it is marvelously brilliant, wonderful as to grace and ease of execution, and compels expressions of surprise and admiration without taking that firm hold of the auditor of which the highest form of interpretive ability is capable—wherein the performer reveals personal character and soul as well as mechanical polish and dexterity.

The orchestra was heard with splendid effect in Goldmark's Overture, "In the Spring,' which is really as much of a symphonic poem as Smetana's "Vysehrad." This latter is the first of a cyclus of six symphonic poems, to which is given the general title, "My Country." The composer aims to picture different phases of Bohemian life. "Vysehrad" is the name of a famous old fortress and the composer has sought to suggest its past glory and present decay, "a deserted monument of past glory; from its ruins resounds the echo of the long-silent song of the singer-prince Lurmi through the mournful stillness." The composer has given free rein to his fancy and has produced a noble bit of orchestral writing. Tschaikowsky's symphony "Pathetique," was beautifully played. It has been heard often enough during the past five years to have fully emphasized its enduring right to a place among the foremost works of its class. The last movement is especially pathetic in character and is most impressive as such, particularly to thoe who bear in mind the supposition that the composer intended this adagio lamentoso for his own requiem, and to many Brooklynites who will always associate it with that sublime funeral service in memory of Anton Seidl.

Mr. Gericke seems a trifle rigid and somewhat lacking in enthusiasm after what Brooklyn has been accustomed to, but there can be no question as to his superior ability as a conductor and that he will always find a respectful host of admirers here.

MUSICAL.

Times Nov. 12

Symphony Orchestra and Rosenthal.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon attracted a good house, and yet the auditorium was not so crowded as might have been expected, all things considered. But Brooklyn will doubtless do full justice to the occasion of the first evening concert to-night. Yesterday's audience was a typical matinee gathering—largely feminine and many late comers. This latter objection may be mitigated to some extent when the season gets under way. It is not reasonable to hope that this annoyance will ever be done away with altogether. Yesterday it was accentuated by the fact that Mr. Gericke began the concert a couple of minutes ahead of time, added to the delay occasioned by having only one entrance door open for those who filled the main part of the auditorium. This permitted only a tardy admission of the crowd which gathered about the Academy entrance at the last moment.

Weber's bright "Euryanthe" overture opened the concert, and was followed by Bachrich's arrangement for strings of the prelude, adagio and gavotte in rondo form, Bach's Partita No. 3 and Sonata No. 2. These were enjoyed as characteristic examples of the great composer's lighter mood. Beethoven's ever-charming Fifth Symphony was the principal orchestral number, and nothing more fitting could have been selected for this first afternoon concert. This work is by common consent a universal favorite, and however personal taste may lead to expressions of approval of other similar works, this masterpiece by the greatest of symphonists stands out as coming nearest to filling the measure of human desire for one work that represents all that is beautiful in symphonic writing.

Mr. Gericke, who conducted yesterday, was director of the Boston Symphony players from 1884 till 1889, and after an absence of nine years, returns to this country to lead the orchestra again. Some slight changes in the grouping of the instruments was noticed, the most important being the placing of the tympani to the right of the conductor at the back, instead of opposite the conductor at the back as under previous arrangements. As a leader Mr. Gericke at once commands respect and confidence. He has no personal peculiarities, and his manner is that of quiet authority, which carries with it the impression of a firm, well-defined conception of orchestral proprieties. His readings have the accuracy of scholarly precision, suggesting a conscientious devotion to the lofty ideal of interpretation.

Rosenthal was the soloist, and it would hardly be fitting or proper to attempt to sum up his ability as a pianist from merely hearing his interpretation of the Chopin E minor concerto, although none who heard him yesterday could doubt that he is a pianist of rare power. A concerto cannot be expected to give the most comprehensive idea of a pianist's rank as an artist. It takes a recital to do that. And yet this splendid concerto—the unmistakable creation of precocious genius—gives a noble opportunity to a pianist. It has those elements of absolute merit which test the soundness of any performer's claim to distinction. And Rosenthal clearly demonstrated his right to be considered a master of keyboard exigencies. He is in undoubted command of those nice details of executive skill which make for perfection in pianism. There can be no question as to his superior attainments as an executant, and in this respect his playing yesterday compelled sincere admiration. The romance was exquisitely played, with probably less sympathetic tonal warmth and freedom than some other players, not so skilled, could have imparted. He was several times recalled after finishing the concerto, but declined to grant an encore and many feminine hearts were disappointed. At to-night's concert Mr. Rosenthal will play Scharwenka's B flat minor concerto. The orchestra will play Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture; Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" and Tschaikowsky's great "Pathetique" symphony.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 155.

FRIDAY, DEC. 2, 1898.

PLANS FOR NEW MUSIC HALL.

The Last Day for Subscribing Came Yesterday.

Public-Spirited Enterprise Providing a Home for the Symphony and "Pop" Concerts—New Building to Be Modelled on the German Music Halls.

One more step was taken yesterday toward the erection of a new music hall. Architect Charles F. McKim brought over several sketches from his New York office, for the consideration of the board of directors. There was a long discussion, lasting over three hours, and as a result one of the sketches was provisionally accepted. Mr. McKim is to make a relatively elaborate and careful plan for submission later, when the time for final decision on building the structure comes.

The last day for paying up subscriptions on the stock of the new music hall was yesterday, and the accounting therefore of yesterday's business would thus appear to have settled the question of a new music hall or not. As a matter of fact, however, it is highly probable that the hall was really decided upon long ago, and, whatever happens, there are people interested who will see the thing through. It is one of the public spirited actions of rich Bostonians, projected and carried on, as one of the subscribers said yesterday, much as the [illegible] Theatre and the old Music Hall [illegible] built. A need for these old-time structures became sufficiently urgent, and there were enough people found to put their hands in their pockets to build them. They would have been glad to get their money back, and with a profit if possible, but they awaited a return as a rule in vain. That fact probably made little difference to them, as civic pride is something not to be measured in money, and most of the theatre and hall subscribers were strong in that quality.

The old Music Hall, built by private subscriptions originally, came in time, by the settling of estates and other occasions for a transfer of ownership, to be on the point of falling into the speculators' hands. A controlling portion of the stock was secured by Mr. Higginson and some other stockholders acting together, and they have held it. Their action preserved the old hall from the chances of the real estate market, but in 1893 the inevitable sale of the property was foreseen, and the question of a new music hall was considered by a group of people interested in what Music Hall stood for—the Symphonies mainly, the Pop concerts and so on. The public was invited to subscribe to a fund in a circular signed by Messrs. Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper and Dr. Henry S. Sears. There were 406 people interested enough to respond, with subscriptions for $402,000. When preparatory to incorporation, 364 persons put in $208,750, a 50 per cent. assesment.

Land was bought at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues, bounded also by St. Stephen and Gainsboro streets, 34,000 feet in all. It has remained ever since in the name of "The New Music Hall," and is assessed for $161,500. It is proposed to build a structure on this land costing $300,000. The cost of the land is supposed to be a sum which, with accrued interest, taxes and other charges, will make it ultimately a debit of $200,000 for that one item.

Last year the old Music Hall was sold for commercial purposes, the new owners to take possession April, 1900. Mr. Higginson's lease of the hall expires next April, after which the Symphony concerts, around which centres most of the sentiment in the affair, would be without a home. People interested in this distinctively Bostonian expression of musical taste look upon it as above the "hire a hall" phase, and would not think of having them except in a dignified and adequate environment. The list of subscribers reads like what a severely critical social mentor would put forth as the "best-set" in the city. Very many of them are women prominent in social ways, a fact which, perhaps as much as anything else, takes it out of the ordinary run of business enterprises. The sale of the old hall brought the project to a head, and yesterday was the date set for a final paying up.

Mr. Edward W. Hooper, treasurer of the corporation, told a Herald man last night that not all the money was paid in as yet, but in affairs of this kind impeccable promptitude was not expected, and a certain amount of "drumming up" would probably be necessary. It was not so much a reluctance of anybody to pay that kept the list in tentative shape as the changes of various kinds during five years. Death had removed some of the original subscribers. The hard times of 1893 had had an influence in retarding financial co-operation. The silver controversy, the war and such things could be instanced as having an important influence. Yesterday was merely a date set, which must be set some time, when something definite must be accomplished, and their most important business was deciding on the plans of the structure. This would appear to assume that the new hall was all settled, which it is not, as matters are not decisively arranged, but for reasons stated above it may be accepted as an assured thing.

Mr. McKim's first plan was on exhibition for a good while a year ago, but there were objections urged by some of the subscribers, notably by Mr. Higginson, on the score of acoustic defects. The sketches considered yesterday were suggestions, one of which was favorably regarded, and will be studied later, when presented in a maturer form. The general idea of the latest plan is founded on the best German music halls. The German auditoriums found best adapted to orchestral concerts are halls about twice as long as they are wide, and this idea will be followed in the main here. The stage will be at the end, and there will be little else, as ante-rooms, foyer, etc., for the public. Two galleries are contemplated here, a departure from the German plans, where a lower hall for lounging and ante-room purposes is provided, in addition to the concert hall proper. The building will be a modest one, as it must be fireproof and cost only about $10 a square foot—$300,000—on 34,000 feet of land.

Dec 1

Musical Record

Gericke, Paur, Rosenthal

WILHELM Gericke, Emil Paur, and Moritz Rosenthal have been the prominent personages on the musical stage in New York since I last wrote to the MUSICAL RECORD. Rosenthal has given four recitals, on Oct. 26, Oct. 29, Nov. 1, and Nov. 19, and has played twice with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Emil Paur made his début as a New York conductor at the first concert of his own orchestra in Carnegie Hall, on the evening of Oct. 29. Since that he has conducted a Philharmonic concert, with its customary public rehearsal, two Sunday night concerts, and the first rehearsal and concert of his own orchestra, in a series of five, to be given at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke has conducted one afternoon and one evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, and the same in the series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

In addition to these important events, we have had the return of that substantial pianist, Adele Aus der Ohe, who has played at the Philharmonic and in one recital; the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet series; the first of the Dannreuther Quartet series; the first Kaltenborn String Quartet concert in Brooklyn; Mr. Krehbiel's lecture on "How to Listen to Music," delivered at the Lyceum Theatre, and illustrated by Sam Franko's orchestra; productions of Il Trovatore, Romeo and Juliet, The Pirates of Penzance, and Carmen by the Castle Square Opera Company; and the first performance here of Stanislaus Stange and Julian Edward's operetta, The Jolly Musketeer, with Mr. Jefferson de Angelis in the principal part. It is a somewhat busy little town, and with half the population struggling to keep its intellectual balance in the presence of Mr. Hall Caine's mystery play, The Christian, and Mr. Zangwill's mild protestations that we are all fools, created simply for the amusement of his superior mind, it is hardly to be expected that we shall have time to waste upon such people as Schumann and Beethoven.

Nevertheless, some of us have had something to think about. I for one have found it a formidable difficulty to present my views of the orchestral situation in New York without appearing to say harsh things of a dead man. My only excuse is that I said them when he was alive. In commenting on one of his Brighton Beach concerts on Aug. 24, 1888, I said: "It is no exaggeration to say that forty per cent. of Herr Seidl's numbers have been selected from Wagner. And the other sixty per cent. has been indifferently played. Indeed, so faulty has been Mr. Seidl's judgment as to tempo that members of the band have complained that in some of the allegri, they could not, at the pace set by the director, play all the notes set down for them by the composer." I continued to object to Mr. Seidl's misinterpretations of the symphonic masters as long as he lived.

I call attention to this matter here because it is the explanation of Mr. Paur's extraordinary success as a conductor in New York. Every one here knew him, and every one damned him with faint praise, because with the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his hand, he was neither a Gericke nor a Nikisch. But the moment he made his appearance at the head of an orchestra of New York musicians, the critics, one and all, and the general public recognized a new force. It was certainly a very fortunate thing for New York that Mr. Paur left Boston. For years (I decline to say how many) this city has been without a competent orchestral conductor. We have had men who aimed at precision and smoothness, and, having attained it, regarded their mission as complete. But we have had no one who understood the technics of orchestral performance as Mr. Paur does, no one who could take an orchestra in hand and literally teach the men how to play the music. The testimony of the musicians is unanimous. They all say: "This man is all right; he understands his business."

I never before heard a New York orchestra play with such brilliant masculinity and such clear and sure phrasing as Mr. Paur's new symphony orchestra did at its first concert. Its work at the Sunday night concerts has not been so good, but it has been above the standard of such entertainments. But we have no right to expect excellence at once. In the course of the season the orchestra will certainly improve in precision and general finish. At present its chief merit lies in the clearness and significance of its accentuation. The same excellences revealed themselves in the work of the Philharmonic Society at its first concert. Those good old gentlemen who have been awake in recent years only when they played Wagner, played the Benvenuto Cellini overture as as if they really liked it. And though they left a good deal to be desired in the way of smoothness, they made the finale of the Seventh Symphony a pretty stirring affair.

Mr. Gericke will please the older concert-goers in New York a great deal more than the younger ones. His calm and dignified style of wielding the baton, and his smooth, mellifluous, polished, unemotional interpretation of such works as Beethoven's C minor symphony ought to fill the old adherents of Theodore Thomas with delight. Mr. Thomas read music in that style until New York went to sleep and forgot him; and he had to migrate to Chicago. But Mr. Gericke has traditions behind him, and they will help him to preserve his dignity in New York for a time.

But I do remember that in his former reign I heard a sarcastic brother speak of "Fräulein Gericke und die Wiener Damen-Capelle." I don't wish to hear this sort of thing again; but if Mr. Gericke comes and reads Wagner to us any more as he read the Tristan und Isolde music last week, I shall certainly think of Caffarelli, Farinelli, Senesino, and that lot. When I heard your magnificent orchestra sing that heartbreaking Vorspiel as if it were a lullaby, I cried in my heart, "Oh, for an hour of Seidl now!" For that music no man has read here as Seidl did.

If Mr. Gericke would only play Brahms's "Academic" overture in his truly academic style, he would be at home. Haydn and Mozart and Mendelssohn ought to be his favorites, and I should like very much to hear him conduct a symphony of Gyrowetz or Cipriano Potter; but I would to heaven he would let Wagner alone, or go out first and fill himself with sherry and egg. I want my Wagner alive, not stuffed and set up in a museum.

Schumann's C major symphony, Mr. Gericke read much better than he did Beethoven's fifth. But I have heard the finale given with a more joyous lilt and a larger utterance. The new members of the orchestra pleased New York immensely. Ah, that M. Longy is a remarkably fine oboe player! The new clarinet is not a Pourtau, but he will do. The flute is admirable. Your tympanist used to be in New York.

What shall I say now about Rosenthal? First and foremost, that I have heard more nonsense talked about him than about any other pianist who ever played here. Mr. Rosenthal is a great pianist, but he is nothing except a pianist. Nothing in music reaches his heart except through the response of the keys to his fingers. The only emotion Rosenthal feels is the ecstasy of the virtuoso in his own work. When he is playing a bit of music which courts the sweetest and mellowist accents of the piano, he revels in it because of its opportunities for the employment of the singing tone and the most tender colors of his palette. But it never occurs to Mr. Rosenthal that it is his business to study how to sing every passage, no matter whether it naturally suggests singing or not. When the music is enormously difficult, it is the brilliant and facile mastery of the difficulties that appeals to Rosenthal, warms his heart, and animates his fingers.

When he plays Chopin's E minor concerto, he plays like a poet, because Chopin's music coaxes from him his most wooing tones. He does not get them out of the music; the music gets them out of him. Now Mr. Rosenthal apparently thinks that because Liszt made an arrangement of Schubert's "Hark, Hark, the Lark," it must be a virtuoso piece, and he plays it in the most childishly flippant style. Again, he is immense in parts of Scharwenka's B flat minor concerto; but Scharwenka himself, a fourth-rate pianist, can play the cantabile passages with double the musical warmth of Rosenthal.

Mr. Rosenthal is a pianist, and he knows it. His whole stay in America has been saddened by an overwhelming realization of the fact, that all the furious applause of the public has been for his prodigious feats. He knows that the tribute of genuine feeling has not been his. His friends know it, too, otherwise they would not write me raging letters because I have said in print that their idol was a great pianist—and nothing more. But truth is mighty, mightier than technic. And it is high and holy to speak the truth, especially about a pianist.

W. J. HENDERSON.

New York, Nov. 18.

Concerts in Boston

YOU will find the programs of the various concerts of the last few weeks published among the "Boston Notes."

Now that Mr. Gericke has become better acquainted with the Symphony Orchestra, what is to be said of the character of the performances?

It is a singular commentary on the musical conditions that prevail in this city—and for that matter, in New York and London and Berlin—that the one leading question asked during the last month was, "What will Mr. Gericke do with the Pathetic Symphony by Tschaikowsky?" Again an instance of the public's interest in the individual rather than in the work itself. "What will he do with it?" I said to Mr. Gericke before the performance, "There is much curiosity concerning your reading of this symphony." He smiled and said, "But I see only one reading that is possible; Tschaikowsky has indicated his minutest wishes with such care." This was the answer of an eminent musician and a conductor of extraordinary authority, who believes it the duty of a conductor to be, first of all, faithful to the intention of the composer. The symphony was played; there was the most careful attention to detail; there was an attempt to do precisely as the composer wished (although perhaps in the reprise of the second theme of the first movement, where the melody dies a lingering death in the breath of the clarinet, the slackening of the tempo was not equal to Tschaikowsky's demand—I mean the passages where the nuances are extreme, p p p p, etc.). I have seldom heard a more careful, more accurate performance of any work. And yet what was the result? The intense individuality, the amazing humanity of the work—with its wild regret for vanished youth; its mad, incessant endeavor to be gay while the inexorable years look on without emotion as they hurry by; its vision, in the third movement, of Death smiling at the petty triumph that this world acclaims with shouts and tossing up of caps; its final shuddering lamentation over the end of every man's desire—all this was eliminated. There was the corpse of the thing, with face shaved, with hair becomingly combed, with hands neatly manicured. And yet the performance was incredibly letter-perfect. How do you explain this? Here enters the individuality of the conductor.

Now, my friend Mr. Apthorp declared in the Transcript that Mr. Gericke does not "really like the work"; and he then proceeded to abuse and maul the symphony itself. I am not disposed to quarrel with any intelligent man over a question of taste; I do not say that Mr. Apthorp showed himself by this article to be a critic of singular limitations or a man of imperfect sympathies; he may be heroically right in this judgment; but his article is of such an extraordinary nature that I quote from it, to preserve it for at least a month.

> The extramusical exegesis of a composition is always hazardous; but, in the case of this "Pathétique" of Tschaikowsky's the extramusical, psychical suggestion is so vivid and compelling that one can hardly avoid it. To our mind—now that we have heard the work repeatedly, and studied the score—this symphony threads all the foul ditches and sewers of human despair; it is profoundly and convincingly human, but as unclean as music well can be. One might call the first movement, Zola's "Confession de Claude" set to music! That unspeakable second theme may tell of what Heine called "Die verschwundene, süsse, blöde Jugendeselei," if you please; the impotent senile remembrance of calf love. But of what a calf love! that of Hogarth's lazy apprentice. Indisputably there is power in it: who but Tschaikowsky could have made the vulgar, obscene phrase powerful? The second movement, with its strabismal rhythm, is hardly less ignoble; the third, full of the vigor of the genius though it be, is, after all, sheer billingsgate. In the finale, blear-eyed paresis meets us face to face, and that solemn closing epitaph of the trombones might begin with "Here continues to rot—" In what foul straw has genius here made its bed! But it is unmistakably genius, for all that; the expression fits the feeling with Shakespearian nicety; "tout se tient," it all hangs together!

In the September number of the MUSICAL RECORD I quoted at length Mr. Vernon Blackburn's article on this same symphony. He begins, "So instructive and so vital is M. Lamoureux's interpretation of this great and most noble work that he has actually taught us to look for its parallel in the elegiac literature of our own country in no less supreme a work of literary art, that is, than Shelley's Adonais." He ends: "It remains a fact that Lamoureux, through the medium of Tschaikowsky's ineffable and splendid music, gives to the world an impression of that pure poetry of despair, of that life for its own sake, and of the utter and complete darkness of the grave with which that music is filled from beginning to end." I wish you would read Mr. Blackburn's article again, and I regret that I cannot now put it in a column parallel with the article by Mr. Apthorp.

Reading Mr. Apthorp's denunciation, I am reminded of the epigram: "To the pure all things are nasty."

But Mr. Gericke, if he did not rise to the great height where Tschaikowsky dwells, led certain performances of a strength and beauty that were marvelous. I allude to his reading of Mr. Chadwick's noble Melpomene overture, Smetana's haunting and romantic Vysehrad (a work of epic simplicity in thought and grandeur in expression), Schumann's Symphony in C major, and portions of Brahms's Third Symphony. And I confess that to me the performance of the excerpts from Tristan and Isolde was irresistible and overwhelming, although certain New Yorkers found that when Mr. Gericke led these excerpts in their city, the lovers were metaphysical rather than physical; but in New York they wish Wagner's lovers to scream in their ecstasy and to bite each other in the sight of the audience. In the memorable performance of the Schumann symphony, Mr. Gericke was passionate in the Adagio, which seems to me to be contemplative, a beautiful song under mild stars, rather than profoundly emotional.

The Orchestra in perfection of technic — in precision of attack by wood-wind and brass, in sharply defined rhythmic feeling, in nuancirung — already shows improvement. Brilliant as were many of the performances under Messrs. Nikisch and Paur, slovenliness had crept in and at times reared its head.

Johanna Gadski was not heard to her full advantage. Her intonation was not always pure, and she forced tone.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its eleventh season in Brooklyn under the leadership of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. The enthusiasm created by this orchestra is shared alike by the musician as well as the concert-going public. The Friday matinée, Nov. 11, and the Saturday evening concert, Nov. 12, were largely attended, and each number given was played with perfection that is synonymous with the name of this orchestra. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal played at each concert. His technical skill is certainly marvelous.

The first concert of the eighteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given in Music Hall, Oct. 15. The hall was crowded, and Mr. Gericke was welcomed most heartily. The welcome was spontaneous, reminiscent, and with serene hope for the future. And Mr. Gericke richly deserved the tribute.

The program was:

Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber
Prelude, "Adagio gavotte"	Bach-Bachrich
Variations, "Chorale Sancti; Antoni"	Brahms
Symphony, No. 5	Beethoven

Of this concert I shall say little. The Orchestra was naturally nervous, and yet there were many moments when the performance reached the high-water mark. Already was there shown a marked improvement in the attack of the wood-wind and brass, although several of the players appeared for the first time. These same players — Messrs. Longy, first oboe, Maquarre, first flute, Selmer, clarinet, Kloepfel, first trumpet, Mausebach, second trombone, as well as Mr. Rettberg, tympanist, showed themselves at once to be valuable acquisitions, men that will undoubtedly aid materially in preserving the high reputation of the Orchestra. To speak at length of Mr. Gericke's readings or his mastery over the Orchestra, would be impertinent, because the rehearsals under him had been few, and an orchestra is not suddenly molded like clay in the hand of the potter. It is enough to say that the performance under the circumstances was extraordinarily good.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston, Oct. 19.

Franz Kneisel

MR. KNEISEL, a Roumanian by birth, but of German parentage, studied the violin in Vienna with Grün and Hellmesberger. He studied not only the violin, he studied music; and he studied by most intelligent hearing and observation as well as by the performance of routine task. Concertmaster in Vienna of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, he went to Berlin, to be the concertmaster of Bilse's Orchestra, a position that had been filled by such men as Halir, Ysaye, César Thomson.

When Mr. Gericke was obliged to find a successor to Mr. Listemann, he called Mr. Kneisel to be the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the second year of Mr. Gericke's reign, and at the third concert, Oct. 31, 1885, Mr. Kneisel, then twenty years old, made his first appearance at these concerts as a soloist. He played the Concerto by Beethoven. Oct. 22, 1898, and again under the direction of Mr. Gericke, he played the Concerto by Goldmark, and this was his eighteenth appearance at these concerts as a soloist, although many have been his incidental solo passages.

It would be interesting to go through in detail the indefatigable and illustrious career of Mr. Kneisel in this city alone. As solo violinist, he introduced at the Symphony concerts concertos by Brahms, Goldmark, Strube. He has played in addition to the concertos already mentioned, Joachim's Hungarian (first movement), Spohr's 9th, Paganini's in D arranged by Wilhelmj, Mendelssohn's, Viotti's in A minor, No. 22. With Mr. Loeffler, he has played Bach's double Concerto and the viole d'amour in Loeffler's Mort de Tintagiles; and with Mr. Schroeder, Brahms's Concerto for violin and 'cello. And this list, no doubt, is incomplete.

As a solo player, he ranks among the very first, in the qualities that characterize the artist-violinist. He is not that comet-like being, the "dazzling, phenomenal virtuoso"; he is a star of the first magnitude that shines with steady, reassuring, cheering brilliance; a star that shines serenely, while all manner of falling stars, meteors, and other celestial phenomena excite wonder for a moment and are then lost in outer darkness. A master of technic, he surmounts difficulties with what German critics are pleased to call "classic calmness and accuracy." Let no one think from this that he is ever phlegmatic, stolid. He is a man of passion, which is neither frozen as on a Grecian frieze, nor a crackle, a splutter, an explosion. There are violinists who have greater tone; there is Sarasate whose tone by its heart-reaching, irresistible, haunting quality places him apart from all other violinists; the tone of Mr. Kneisel, peculiarly his own, satisfies the mind and the ear, and it becomes the voice of the composer singing his thought to the interpreter. Mr. Kneisel is a musician who, as others put their musical thoughts in chamber-music, orchestral-work, or piano piece, finds the violin the medium for his rare expression. And, above all, do I praise the supreme simplicity of his art. He answers fully the description given by Walt Whitman of the great poet:

> The art of art, the glory of expression * * * is simplicity. Nothing is better than simplicity—nothing can make up for excess or lack of definiteness. * * * To speak with the perfect rectitude and insouciance of the movements of animals and the unimpeachableness of the sentiment of trees in the woods and grass by the roadside is the flawless triumph of art. If you have looked on him who has achieved it, you have looked on one of the masters of the artists of all nations and times. You shall not contemplate the flight of the graygull over the bay, or the mettlesome action of the blood horse, or the tall leaning of sunflowers on their stalk, or the appearance of the moon afterward with any more satisfaction than you shall contemplate him.* * * He swears to his art, "I will not be meddlesome; I will not have in my writing any elegance, or effect, or originality to hang in the way between me and the rest like curtains. I will have nothing hang in the way, not the richest curtains. What I tell, I tell for precisely what it is. Let who may, exalt, or startle, or fascinate, or soothe, I will have purposes as health, or heat, or snow has, and be as regardless of observation. What I experience or portray shall go from my composition without a shred of my composition. You shall stand by my side, and look in the mirror with me."

* * *

If you ask, "And how about Mr. Kneisel as concertmaster?" I invite your attention to a concert by the Symphony Orchestra. If you have heard the Orchestra, you will not ask the question. Authoritative, kindly, interested in the work and not solely in himself, eager for the triumph of the Orchestra and not for his own vain-glory, he stimulates when all is well; he is a strong tower in time of trouble. No matter what the piece may be, no matter whether the Orchestra be under its own leader or under a choral director at a Festival, the burden put upon the concertmaster's shoulders is borne gallantly to the end. He himself is a conductor of marked ability; yet as concertmaster he knows his duty, even when as musician he may question the choice of tempo or the wisdom of the demand in phrasing.

* * *

As a quartet player, as the director of a quartet, you have only to know the Kneisel Quartet to recognize his rare abilities. Here he reveals himself the musician of sound knowledge as well as the most exquisite feeling. Patient — oh, how patient in preparation — a disciplinarian without arrogance, he will not allow the performance of a piece until technical mastery allows full poetic expression without thought of technical difficulties. This whole musical country owes him a heavy debt of gratitude, for from Boston to San Francisco he has made lovers of music acquainted with chamber masterpieces in their perfection, and he has kindled in the breast of even the indifferent who had hitherto cared chiefly for operatic high note or orchestral roar an honest love of that which is pure, which is without meretricious charm or applause-catching affectation.

* * *

As a man, he is of strong convictions, yet reasonable in argument or general discussion. He is appreciative of the talents of others — thus I have never heard a more loving yet discriminating tribute than that he pays to Sarasate. Fastidious, he is yet catholic in taste, and he recognizes the fact that music is not bounded by frontier lines, that there is one great Republic of Music. Honorable in his dealings singularly happy in his home-life generous in his hospitality warm in his affections a most lovable personality,— Franz Kneisel, by his walk and conversation among men, has not only been an ornament to his art; he has without effort, merely by the force of his example, removed from many minds the ancient and still existing vain prejudice against the musician as an individual.

PHILIP HALE.

When Mr. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was his generous intention to furnish the best music at a price within the means of nearly all music-lovers. It is an ironical fact that for a seat this year at the Friday afternoon rehearsals, a humble lover of music paid at auction a sum that will give him his musical pleasure at the rate of fourteen dollars a concert.

* * *

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV. NO. 156.
SATURDAY, DEC. 3, 1898.

THE PROJECTED MUSIC HALL.

It is to be hoped that the public-spirited citizens of Boston will be prompt to respond to the appeal for funds for the erection of a new music hall in the city. It is clear that the time is approaching when there will be imperative need of a building of this character. Fortunately, the site for it was obtained several years ago, and is in the ownership of the men who have taken the work in hand. All that remains now is to erect a suitable edifice for a requirement entirely obvious. It is in the power of Boston to provide one which shall be an important addition to our public buildings and in consonance with the reputation of the city for liberality in its provision for the higher arts. It is hardly to be conceived as possible that we are to be without some successor to the Music Hall that is fated in little more than a year to become a thing of the past. The important consideration is to make the new structure worthy of the public taste and reputation here, and to this end the present effort is directed.

De BOSTON POST, 3
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MUSIC HALL SUBSCRIPTION.

Messrs. Higginson and Hooper Say They Do Not Know the Amount.

Treasurer E. W. Hooper of the new Music Hall Association, when seen by a reporter yesterday, stated that it was not known yet whether the full $500,000 required had been subscribed for the new Music Hall. The books had been closed Thursday, but the amount received had not yet been figured up.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson said he did not know any more about the matter than Treasurer Hooper. He had little doubt but that the new Music Hall would be built.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 4, 1898.

The programme of the seventh Symphony was changed from what had been announced, and that much for the better. It began with Schubert's ninth symphony—the very favorite one in C major, with the great emphatic single notes, the sweet andante, and the richly melodious scherzo and finale. Then came MacDowell's second symphonic poem, in which some of the emotions which derive from and centre about Tennyson's "Launcelot and Elaine" idyll are more than intimated in the blending moods of chivalry and ideality, the eagerness of martial energy, the poetry of quiet rhapsody and the pathos of funereal grief and solemnity. The writing is of its author's best, for it is sincere, clear, unaffected by any pedantry of expression and unweighted by any abstruseness. Next was placed the "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" of Saint Saens, and finally came the splendid stateliness of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz. Mr. Kneisel conducted admirably——with firm but quiet hand, quick sensitiveness, definite discrimination and unfailing taste. Many points in the execution of his programme—in which the following of the orchestra was faithfully obedient and nicely sympathetic——might be cited; but our praise today must be general in its approval and warmth. The symphony values were enhanced by the doubling of the wooden wind choir, and in the Saint Saens the violin tones at the close fairly melted away upon the ear. The audience was enthusiastic and several times called Mr. Kneisel forward.

The next programme is Tschiakowsky's fifth symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto, to be played by Mr. Burmeister and the "Meistersinger" prelude."

than physical; but in New York they wish Wagner's lovers to scream in their ecstasy and to bite each other in the sight of the audience. In the memorable performance of the Schumann symphony, Mr. Gericke was passionate in the Adagio, which seems to me to be contemplative, a beautiful song under mild stars, rather than profoundly emotional.

The Orchestra in perfection of technic — in precision of attack by wood-wind and brass, in sharply defined rhythmic feeling, in nuancirung — already shows improvement. Brilliant as were many of the performances under Messrs. Nikisch and Paur, slovenliness had crept in and at times reared its head.

Johanna Gadski was not heard to her full advantage. Her intonation was not always pure, and she forced tone.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its eleventh season in Brooklyn under the leadership of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. The enthusiasm created by this orchestra is shared alike by the musician as well as the concert-going public. The Friday matinée, Nov. 11, and the Saturday evening concert, Nov. 12, were largely attended, and each number given was played with perfection that is synonymous with the name of this orchestra. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal played at each concert. His technical skill is certainly marvelous.

The first concert of the eighteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given in Music Hall, Oct. 15. The hall was crowded, and Mr. Gericke was welcomed most heartily. The welcome was spontaneous, reminiscent, and with serene hope for the future. And Mr. Gericke richly deserved the tribute.

The program was:

Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber
Prelude, "Adagio gavotte"	Bach-Bachrich
Variations, "Chorale Sancti: Antoni"	Brahms
Symphony, No. 5	Beethoven

Of this concert I shall say little. The Orchestra was naturally nervous, and yet there were many moments when the performance reached the high-water mark. Already was there shown a marked improvement in the attack of the wood-wind and brass, although several of the players appeared for the first time. These same players — Messrs. Longy, first oboe, Maquarre, first flute, Selmer, clarinet, Kloepfel, first trumpet, Mausebach, second trombone, as well as Mr. Rettberg, tympanist, showed themselves at once to be valuable acquisitions, men that will undoubtedly aid materially in preserving the high reputation of the Orchestra. To speak at length of Mr. Gericke's readings or his mastery over the Orchestra, would be impertinent, because the rehearsals under him had been few, and an orchestra is not suddenly molded like clay in the hand of the potter. It is enough to say that the performance under the circumstances was extraordinarily good.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston, Oct. 19.

Franz Kneisel

MR. KNEISEL, a Roumanian by birth, but of German parentage, studied the violin in Vienna with Grün and Hellmesberger. He studied not only the violin, he studied music; and he studied by most intelligent hearing and observation as well as by the performance of routine task. Concertmaster in Vienna of the Hofburg Theatre Orchestra, he went to Berlin, to be the concertmaster of Bilse's Orchestra, a position that had been filled by such men as Halir, Ysaye, César Thomson.

When Mr. Gericke was obliged to find a successor to Mr. Listemann, he called Mr. Kneisel to be the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the second year of Mr. Gericke's reign, and at the third concert, Oct. 31, 1885, Mr. Kneisel, then twenty years old, made his first appearance at these concerts as a soloist. He played the Concerto by Beethoven. Oct. 22, 1898, and again under the direction of Mr. Gericke, he played the Concerto by Goldmark, and this was his eighteenth appearance at these concerts as a soloist, although many have been his incidental solo passages.

It would be interesting to go through in detail the indefatigable and illustrious career of Mr. Kneisel in this city alone. As solo violinist, he introduced at the Symphony concerts concertos by Brahms, Goldmark, Strube. He has played in addition to the concertos already mentioned, Joachim's Hungarian (first movement), Spohr's 9th, Paganini's in D arranged by Wilhelmj, Mendelssohn's, Viotti's in A minor, No. 22. With Mr. Loeffler, he has played Bach's double Concerto and the viole d'amour in Loeffler's Mort de Tintagiles; and with Mr. Schroeder, Brahms's Concerto for violin and 'cello. And this list, no doubt, is incomplete.

As a solo player, he ranks among the very first, in the qualities that characterize the artist-violinist. He is not that comet-like being, the "dazzling, phenomenal virtuoso"; he is a star of the first magnitude that shines with steady, reassuring, cheering brilliance; a star that shines serenely, while all manner of falling stars, meteors, and other celestial phenomena excite wonder for a moment and are then lost in outer darkness. A master of technic, he surmounts difficulties with what German critics are pleased to call "classic calmness and accuracy." Let no one think from this that he is ever phlegmatic, stolid. He is a man of passion, which is neither frozen as on a Grecian frieze, nor a crackle, a splutter, an explosion. There are violinists who have greater tone; there is Sarasate whose tone by its heart-reaching, irresistible, haunting quality places him apart from all other violinists; the tone of Mr. Kneisel, peculiarly his own, satisfies the mind and the ear, and it becomes the voice of the composer singing his thought to the interpreter. Mr. Kneisel is a musician who, as others put their musical thoughts in chamber-music, orchestral-work, or piano piece, finds the violin the medium for his rare expression. And, above all, do I praise the supreme simplicity of his art. He answers fully the description given by Walt Whitman of the great poet:

> The art of art, the glory of expression * * * is simplicity. Nothing is better than simplicity—nothing can make up for excess or lack of definiteness. * * * To speak with the perfect rectitude and insouciance of the movements of animals and the unimpeachableness of the sentiment of trees in the woods and grass by the roadside is the flawless triumph of art. If you have looked on him who has achieved it, you have looked on one of the masters of the artists of all nations and times. You shall not contemplate the flight of the graygull over the bay, or the mettlesome action of the blood horse, or the tall leaning of sunflowers on their stalk, or the appearance of the moon afterward with any more satisfaction than you shall contemplate him.* * * He swears to his art, "I will not be meddlesome; I will not have in my writing any elegance, or effect, or originality to hang in the way between me and the rest like curtains. I will have nothing hang in the way, not the richest curtains. What I tell, I tell for precisely what it is. Let who may, exalt, or startle, or fascinate, or soothe, I will have purposes as health, or heat, or snow has, and be as regardless of observation. What I experience or portray shall go from my composition without a shred of my composition. You shall stand by my side, and look in the mirror with me."

* * *

If you ask, "And how about Mr. Kneisel as concertmaster?" I invite your attention to a concert by the Symphony Orchestra. If you have heard the Orchestra, you will not ask the question. Authoritative, kindly, interested in the work and not solely in himself, eager for the triumph of the Orchestra and not for his own vain-glory, he stimulates when all is well; he is a strong tower in time of trouble. No matter what the piece may be, no matter whether the Orchestra be under its own leader or under a choral director at a Festival, the burden put upon the concertmaster's shoulders is borne gallantly to the end. He himself is a conductor of marked ability; yet as concertmaster he knows his duty, even when as musician he may question the choice of tempo or the wisdom of the demand in phrasing.

* * *

As a quartet player, as the director of a quartet, you have only to know the Kneisel Quartet to recognize his rare abilities. Here he reveals himself the musician of sound knowledge as well as the most exquisite feeling. Patient — oh, how patient in preparation — a disciplinarian without arrogance, he will not allow the performance of a piece until technical mastery allows full poetic expression without thought of technical difficulties. This whole musical country owes him a heavy debt of gratitude, for from Boston to San Francisco he has made lovers of music acquainted with chamber masterpieces in their perfection, and he has kindled in the breast of even the indifferent who had hitherto cared chiefly for operatic high note or orchestral roar an honest love of that which is pure, which is without meretricious charm or applause-catching affectation.

* * *

As a man, he is of strong convictions, yet reasonable in argument or general discussion. He is appreciative of the talents of others — thus I have never heard a more loving yet discriminating tribute than that he pays to Sarasate. Fastidious, he is yet catholic in taste, and he recognizes the fact that music is not bounded by frontier lines, that there is one great Republic of Music. Honorable in his dealings singularly happy in his home-life generous in his hospitality warm in his affections a most lovable personality,—Franz Kneisel, by his walk and conversation among men, has not only been an ornament to his art; he has without effort, merely by the force of his example, removed from many minds the ancient and still existing vain prejudice against the musician as an individual.

PHILIP HALE.

When Mr. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was his generous intention to furnish the best music at a price within the means of nearly all music-lovers. It is an ironical fact that for a seat this year at the Friday afternoon rehearsals, a humble lover of music paid at auction a sum that will give him his musical pleasure at the rate of fourteen dollars a concert.

* * *

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 156.

SATURDAY, DEC. 3, 1898.

THE PROJECTED MUSIC HALL.

It is to be hoped that the public-spirited citizens of Boston will be prompt to respond to the appeal for funds for the erection of a new music hall in the city. It is clear that the time is approaching when there will be imperative need of a building of this character. Fortunately, the site for it was obtained several years ago, and is in the ownership of the men who have taken the work in hand. All that remains now is to erect a suitable edifice for a requirement entirely obvious. It is in the power of Boston to provide one which shall be an important addition to our public buildings and in consonance with the reputation of the city for liberality in its provision for the higher arts. It is hardly to be conceived as possible that we are to be without some successor to the Music Hall that is fated in little more than a year to become a thing of the past. The important consideration is to make the new structure worthy of the public taste and reputation here, and to this end the present effort is directed.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MUSIC HALL SUBSCRIPTION.

Messrs. Higginson and Hooper Say They Do Not Know the Amount.

Treasurer E. W. Hooper of the new Music Hall Association, when seen by a reporter yesterday, stated that it was not known yet whether the full $500,000 required had been subscribed for the new Music Hall. The books had been closed Thursday, but the amount received had not yet been figured up.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson said he did not know any more about the matter than Treasurer Hooper. He had little doubt but that the new Music Hall would be built.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 4, 1898.

The programme of the seventh Symphony was changed from what had been announced, and that much for the better. It began with Schubert's ninth symphony—the very favorite one in C major, with the great emphatic single notes, the sweet andante, and the richly melodious scherzo and finale. Then came MacDowell's second symphonic poem, in which some of the emotions which derive from and centre about Tennyson's "Launcelot and Elaine" idyll are more than intimated in the blending moods of chivalry and ideality, the eagerness of martial energy, the poetry of quiet rhapsody and the pathos of funereal grief and solemnity. The writing is of its author's best, for it is sincere, clear, unaffected by any pedantry of expression and unweighted by any abstruseness. Next was placed the "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" of Saint Saens, and finally came the splendid stateliness of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz. Mr. Kneisel conducted admirably——with firm but quiet hand, quick sensitiveness, definite discrimination and unfailing taste. Many points in the execution of his programme—in which the following of the orchestra was faithfully obedient and nicely sympathetic——might be cited; but our praise today must be general in its approval and warmth. The symphony values were enhanced by the doubling of the wooden wind choir, and in the Saint Saens the violin tones at the close fairly melted away upon the ear. The audience was enthusiastic and several times called Mr. Kneisel forward.

The next programme is Tschiakowsky's fifth symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto, to be played by Mr. Burmeister and the "Meistersinger" prelude."

[illegible] HERALD.
[illegible] EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
[illegible] CIV., NO. 157.
[illegible] DECEMBER 4, 1898.

[illegible] KNEISEL HELD THE BATON.

Last Night's Symphony Concert Admirably Conducted.

Although Mr. Gericke Is Convalescent, It Was Deemed Inadvisable for Him to Resume His Duties—A Clear and Sympathetic Rendering of Schubert's No. 9 Symphony.

The selections for the seventh concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening were:

Symphony No. 9, in C-major..........Schubert
Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine"... MacDowell
"Omphale's Spinning Wheel"......Saint-Saens
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"..........Berlioz

Though Mr. Gericke, happily, is convalescent, it was considered inadvisable that he should yet resume his duties, and therefore Mr. Franz Kneisel again assumed direction of the orchestra. The programme was well balanced and thoroughly interesting throughout. Mr. Kneisel gave an admirably clear, sympathetic and effective reading of the Schubert symphony, and the performance of the work was exceptionally fine in color, brilliancy and vigor. In order that the wood wind should come out with due force in the more heavily instrumental moments of the score, the parts were doubled; that is, there were four flutes, four oboes, four clarinets and four bassoons, instead of the conventional two of each. This augmentation scarcely achieved the intended results, except in regard to the bassoons, whose effect was pleasingly intensified.

Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem [illegible] interested by the skill and the charming hues of its orchestration, but its music, though not lacking in artistic dignity and musicianly qualities of a high order, its meaning becomes no clearer upon better acquaintance. The picturesque piquancy of the melodious and [illegible] "Omphale" received full justice [illegible] hands of Mr. Kneisel and the [illegible], and a splendidly brilliant performance of the Berlioz overture was given, Mr. Longy achieving wonders with his masterful playing of the oboe solo. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 5, Tschaikowsky; concerto for violin, Beethoven; and overture to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Mr. Willy Burmeister is to be the soloist.

[illegible] out yourself? Friday afternoon, [illegible] the Symphony rehearsal girl was [illegible] along to Music Hall, attention was called to the manner in which she dresses her feet with the remark: "See what tramping the links has done for the women of 1898!" It was slushy and snowy and everything sloppy, yet low-cut shoes, with a stretch of gauzy hosiery above, were by no means uncommon. In fact, I saw half a dozen girls in tan oxford ties, when they ought to have protected their feet with overshoes or high boots. The majority of women, it is true, wore the disguising "arctic," but they had evidently reached the mellow age of indifference or of independence. One young girl was remonstrated with for her imprudence, but she only laughed and said rather [illegible], "I'm not my grandmother!" Then, adding she was used to it and the soles were as thick as a board, she went [illegible] flippant way to Music Hall and sat with the muddy edge of her petticoat against her ankles for an hour and a half!

Mr. Gericke's friends and well-wishers are gratified and relieved to know that his illness, which it was feared would result seriously, has taken a favorable turn, and he is on the road to recovery. His physicians promise him that, if he continues to gain as he now does, he will be able to be out in about a fortnight.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 158.
[illegible]DAY, DEC. 5, 1898.

[illegible] Col. Higginson's opinion, orchestral music never sounds so well with an audience of women, whose feathers and [illegible] and other fabrics composing their raiment, deaden the musical sounds and [illegible] their quality. Perhaps he is [illegible] in the right, but considering that women compose two-thirds of [illegible] Symphony concert and rehearsal, it [illegible] rather bold to say it. There is only [illegible] way, then, to give classical music [illegible] and with perfect artistic results. But it would be too cold. Or perhaps—but, no! that would be too cruel—[illegible] have two sets of concerts, one for [illegible] and one for women? Half of the pleasure of hearing fine music is to [illegible] to it in the company of those one [illegible]. It is true, however, musicianly [illegible] will be thankful when they [illegible] go to the Symphony rehearsals [illegible] not hear the orchestra between [illegible] of well clothed human beings on [illegible] stairs. It is too diverting, [illegible] one wishes to watch only [illegible] and the conductor. But let [illegible] the new Music Hall will dissipate these minor annoyances, and give [illegible] to the majority of the subscribers and the public at large. It will [illegible] if it does, but let's pray [illegible] impossible. Col. Higginson and [illegible] deserve it should be as [illegible] human foresight par-

---

[illegible] DEC. 4, [illegible]

Seventh Symphony Concert.

Mr Kneisel again led the symphony orchestra at the rehearsal and concert in Music hall last week. Mr Gericke is convalescent, but it was considered unwise for him to resume his duties until another week. Mr Kneisel was warmly welcomed and the admirable playing of the orchestra under his direction well merited the hearty applause which rewarded the performance of each selection. It is not necessary at this late date to call attention to Mr Kneisel's ability as a conductor, but the orchestra may again be complimented upon having in its membership one who is so thoroughly capable of meeting an emergency created by the temporary retirement of its recognized leader.

With characteristic modesty Mr Kneisel presented a program of works which had previously been played by the orchestra. It was admirably arranged and afforded much pleasure. The selections were: Symphony No. 9 in C major, by Schubert; symphonic poem No. 2, "Launcelot and Elaine," by Edward MacDowell; symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," by Camille Saint-Saens, and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, by Hector Berlioz.

Mr Kneisel read the Schubert symphony with thorough intelligence and with strict regard to tradition, resulting in an eminently satisfactory performance. The MacDowell symponic poem was listened to with much pleasure. One's admiration for this work increases the oftener it is heard, and it will long retain favor on orchestral programs.

Perhaps the most enjoyable feature of the concert, certainly the one which received most applause, was Saint-Saens' exquisite orchestral poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." It was played with infinite delicacy, captivating expression and perfect finish. Especially delightful was the sureness and daintiness of execution which marked the violins' playing of the exacting and various rhythmic changes of the closing passages. Mr Kneisel was recalled no less than five times after the performance of this number. Berlioz familiar overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," was played with splendid spirit and great brilliancy.

Mr Willy Burmester is announced as the soloist for the next rehearsal and concert. The program will be: Symphony No. 5, Tschaikowsky; concerto for violin, Beethoven, and Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.

—The list of stockholders of the present Music hall corporation, exclusive of such as may have responded to the last call, is one of the most noteworthy ever made for a semi-public project in this city. It includes the names of 121 women, all prominent in Boston society. The signers for 10 shares and more are Messrs William S. Bigelow, G. T. W. Braman, Martin Brimmer, Shepherd Brooks, Miss Charlotte Bowditch, Mrs Frances G. Blake, Messrs John C. Bancroft, J. Arthur Beebe, Franklin H. Beebe, Francis V. Balch, T. Dennie Boardman, J. R. Coolidge, Louis Cabot, Arthur A. Carey, Eben S. Draper, Lewis S. Dabney, trustee of Alice B. Chase; William Endicott Jr, R. D. Evans, Miss Sarah B. Fay, Messrs John L. Gardner, Henry S. Grew, Edward W. Hooper, Charles Head, H. H. Hunnewell, Mrs Aug. Hemenway Jr, Messrs Aug. Hemenway, Reginald Gray and George S. Hale, trustees; Eben D. Jordan, Henry T. Kidder, David P. Kimball, Mrs William C. Loring, Miss Georgina Lowell, Mrs Harriet J. Morse, Messrs Mortimer P. Mason, W. Powell Mason, Albert A. Pope, Mrs Julia B. Paine, Miss Alice F. Perkins, Mrs Annie T. Phillips, Messrs Henry F. Sears, Barthold Schlesinger, J. Montgomery Sears, James P. Stearns, Quincy A. Shaw, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs Elizabeth C. Ware, Mr Samuel P. Warren, Mrs Ellen H. Weld, Messrs Charles G. Weld, Josiah Wheelwright, Henry M. Whitney, J. W. Wheelwright, Andrew C. Wheelwright and Miss Mary Lee Ware.

—Mr Gericke is rapidly recovering. He has been ill with influenza, and his physician, Dr Broughton of Jamaica Plain, expects that he will soon be able to resume his work.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 4, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was an interesting programme that was presented at the seventh Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening. Mr. Kneisel conducted, and there was no soloist. Schubert's symphony in C was the first number, one of the greatest of all symphonies, and, in spite of its great length, is never tiresome to the listener. Schubert wrote this symphony a short time before his death, in 1828, but it was never performed in his lifetime. It was in fact unknown for a number of years, it being first performed in public in Leipsig on March 22, 1839. Since then it has steadily grown in favor and is now a standard work in its class.

The performance last evening was superb in every way. The other numbers were MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25; Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31, and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

Mr. MacDowell's composition is excellent every way and is a worthy example of native talent. The other numbers are well-known favorites.

The work of the orchestra, under Mr. Kneisel, was admirable, and he was much applauded. The programme of the next rehearsal and concert will include the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto and the "Meistersinger" prelude. Mr. Willy Burmester will be the soloist.

[illegible] Journal.
[illegible] DECEMBER 4, 1898.

A Delightful Performance of Familiar Works Under Mr. Kneisel's Direction — Mrs. Szumowska's Piano Recital in Steinert Hall.

The program of the seventh symphony concert in Music Hall last night, Mr. Kneisel, conductor, in place of Mr. Gericke, who is now convalescent, however, was as follows:

Symphony No. 9, in C major..........Schubert
Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine"............................ MacDowell
"Omphale's Spinning-wheel".....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"......Berlioz

Happy should be conductor and orchestra when there is really nothing to write about their performance save warm words of praise! Furthermore, the vocabulary of praise is as limited as that of censure is unlimited. It should be enough to say that the orchestra in ensemble and in solo performance was at its height, and that Mr. Kneisel led with marked appreciation, discrimination and authority. The concert tested so frequently the skill of the first oboist that I cannot refrain from alluding to the remarkable playing of Mr. Longy. In the second movement of the symphony his rhythmic precision was a delight. In the brilliant ironic jest of Saint-Saëns, the voice of the mocking Omphale was well bred, and not without a tinge of womanly tenderness toward the sulking Hercules. And it must be remembered that Omphale was a woman of distinction, not a mere cackling light-o'-love. Then in the "Cellini" overture—led with great spirit—Mr. Longy blew his tune with a purity of tone and a beauty of phrasing that would repay a journey.

Of the pieces played, the symphonic-poem by Mr. MacDowell is the least familiar. It was first produced here early in 1890 by Mr. Nikisch. To me it is not as musically satisfactory or as of such sustained imagination as the Indian Suite or the Suite that preceded the latter; nor do I think it to be as poetic a work as the composer's Hamlet and Ophelia. I find it too episodic, and although there are charming passages, and although there is often the most refined orchestration, I find neither pronounced musical character-drawing nor any irresistible and haunting climax. The composer once said to me that he was not wholly satisfied with the orchestration, and that he thought of rewriting the work. The subject has tempted him in various forms. There is the noble piano sonata that bears the motto, "Arthur, flower of Kings." At one time Mr. MacDowell contemplated seriously an opera with some part of the Arthurian legend for the subject. He looked for a libretto; if I am not mistaken, he sketched one. Whether he could find material in Mr. Richard Hovey's trilogy is a question that admits of two answers. I do not believe that Lancelot, Elaine, Arthur and Guinevere lend themselves easily to operatic purposes. Several composers have tried their hand without success, and Bemberg's flabby music, thanks to the interest shown by Melba, and the composer's pocketbook, was produced in New York. A "Lancelot du Lac" will soon be brought out in Paris.

⁂

The program of the concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be:

Symphony No. 5..................Tschaikowsky
Violin Concerto.........................Beethoven
Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger"......Wagner

Mr. Kneisel will conduct. Mr. Willy Burmester, violinist, will make his first appearance in America.

Philip Hale.

The Boston Traveler
[illegible]

Dec 3

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Kneisel Again Conducts Admirably in the Absence of Mr. Gericke—Berlioz's Great Overture.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventh concert, Mr. Franz Kneisel conducting. The programme:

Symphony No. 9, in C major..........Schubert
Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine"..........................MacDowell
"Omphale's Spinning Wheel"......Saint-Saens
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"........Berlioz

Mr. Kneisel, who still held the conductor's baton, demonstrated again and more surely than ever before his genuine ability and fitness as a leader of orchestral forces. Of course his training and experience have done much for him in this line, both in his own matchless quartet and as a concertmeister of the orchestra, but he is now showing something that he has not exhibited previously—strength and emotional force. His beat is becoming almost as "inexorable"—I believe that is the stock phrase—as that of Mr. Gericke himself. Nor does he merely cut the air in time; he evidently knows his scorce and has a well defined idea as to where the effects he desires are coming from.

The Schubert symphony was read and played with warmth and elegance. As for MacDowell's "Launcelot and Elaine" symphonic poem, it is one of the dullest and most ineffective larger works of this able composer. It is nowhere trivial or poor, of course, but it is nowhere inspiring or very suggestive. Not even when the listener tries to put himself into the Arthurian mood for receptive purposes does the music give him any very clear impressions. It was not in the playing, for that was as fine as need be; it was the lack of genius in the work itself.

Saint-Saens' brilliant episode of Hercules and his charmer's spinning wheel was given with the utmost grace and technical beauty, and then came the finest part of the concert, a magnificent performance of Berlioz's splendid "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. The freshness and richness of this 60-year-old work are astonishing. No wonder it staggered the critics of 1838, who would have none of the opera. Mr. Kneisel read the piece with great fervor, and reached the highest level he has yet shown as a conductor. It is not over-rash to prophesy that he will some day lead orchestras as a profession.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE
New York, December 3, 1898.

BOSTON, MASS., Nov. 28, 1898.

Mr. Gericke's illness still continues with little promise of speedy recovery. At this time of writing I am informed that a typhoid condition does not actually exist, yet there are symptoms indicating that tendency. Let us hope that this dread affliction will not prevail.

Mr. Kneisel will conduct the concerts in the interim. The programme of the last concert, the sixth, of the Symphony Orchestra embraced Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," overture; symphonic sketches, "The Sea," by Paul Gilson; and Liszt's "The Preludes." Miss Marian Titus sang an aria by Mozart and the "Bell Song" from Délibes' "Lakmé."

Gilman's composition exhibits the author's facility in modern instrumentation, shows a vivid imaginaton and presents some themes of more than ordinary value, but their extended treatment prostrates their effectiveness and wearies the listener, the monotony in the end becoming unbearable. To be sure it was played with an almost total disregard of its dynamic demands, a fact that in itself prevented gaining more than a slight idea of the composition in its presentation. Kneisel kept the time firmly, but that was about all, while the band played on boisterously and in a manner heedless of the composer's indications. The other more familiar numbers were better played, especially the Mendelssohn overture.

If Mr. Gericke's illness is to be a prolonged one, Mr. Kneisel had better take the orchestra severely in hand and curb its independent inclination.

Mrs. Titus sang her selections in a tasteful manner. Her voice is not a full one, and she renders it less so through the unfortunate habit of singing in her nose, probably the result of a practice of the "dans le masque" fallacy that is so popular nowadays and at the same time so surely destructive of the voice. This capable and brilliant vocalist should remedy this difficulty, for to pursue a career upon this basis is to induce a premature loss of one's vocal powers. She should also build up her middle voice, otherwise there is a penalty attached to colorature efforts.

Gericke Ill.—Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still sick in Boston, with typhoid fever. Latest reports happily state that the eminent leader is on the road to recovery.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIV., NO. 157.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1898.

MR. KNEISEL HELD THE BATON.

Last Night's Symphony Concert Admirably Conducted.

Although Mr. Gericke Is Convalescent, It Was Deemed Inadvisable for Him to Resume His Duties—A Clear and Sympathetic Rendering of Schubert's No. 9 Symphony.

The selections for the seventh concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening were:

Symphony No. 9, in C-major..........Schubert
Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine"... MacDowell
"Omphale's Spinning Wheel".......Saint-Saens
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"..........Berlioz

Though Mr. Gericke, happily, is convalescent, it was considered inadvisable that he should yet resume his duties, and therefore Mr. Franz Kneisel again assumed direction of the orchestra. The programme was well balanced and thoroughly interesting throughout. Mr. Kneisel gave an admirably clear, sympathetic and effective reading of the Schubert symphony, and the performance of the work was exceptionally fine in color, brilliancy and vigor. In order that the wood wind should come out with due force in the more heavily instrumental moments of the score, the parts were doubled; that is, there were four flutes, four oboes, four clarinets and four bassoons, instead of the conventional two of each. This augmentation scarcely achieved the intended results, except in regard to the bassoons, whose effect was pleasingly intensified.

Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem again interested by the skill and the charming hues of its orchestration, but as music, though not lacking in artistic dignity and musicianly qualities of a high order, its meaning becomes no clearer upon better acquaintance. The picturesque piquancy of the melodious and graceful "Omphale" received full justice at the hands of Mr. Kneisel and the orchestra, and a splendidly brilliant performance of the Berlioz overture was given, Mr. Longy achieving wonders with his masterful playing of the oboe solo. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 5, Tschaikowsky; concerto for violin, Beethoven; and overture to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Mr. Willy Burmeister is to be the soloist.

Get out your stilts! Friday afternoon, when the Symphony rehearsal girl was hastening along to Music Hall, attention was called to the manner in which she dresses her feet, with the remark: "See what tramping the links has done for the women of 1898!" It was slushy and snowy and everything sloppy, yet low-cut shoes, with a stretch of gauzy hosiery above, were by no means uncommon. In fact, I saw half a dozen girls in tan oxford ties, when they ought to have protected their feet with overshoes or high boots. The majority of women, it is true, wore the disguising "arctic," but they had evidently reached the mellow age of indifference or of independence. One young girl was remonstrated with for her imprudence, but she only laughed and said rather tritely, "I'm not my grandmother!" Then, adding she was used to it and the soles were as thick as a board, she went her flippant way to Music Hall and sat with the muddy edge of her petticoat against her ankles for an hour and a half!

Mr. Gericke's friends and well-wishers are gratified and relieved to know that his illness, which it was feared would result seriously, has taken a favorable turn, and he is on the road to recovery. His physicians promise him that, if he continues to gain as he now does, he will be able to be out in about a fortnight.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 158.
MONDAY, DEC. 5, 1898.

—In Col. Higginson's opinion, orchestral music never sounds so well with an audience of women, whose feathers and furs, and other fabrics composing their raiment, deaden the musical sounds and injure their quality. Perhaps he is acoustically in the right, but considering that women compose two-thirds of every Symphony concert and rehearsal, it is rather bold to say it. There is only one way, then, to give classical music properly and with perfect artistic result. But it would be too cold. Or perhaps—but, no! that would be too cruel—to have two sets of concerts, one for men and one for women? Half of the pleasure of hearing fine music is to listen to it in the company of those one likes. It is true, however, musicianly listeners will be thankful when they can go to the Symphony rehearsals and not hear the orchestra between walls of well clothed human beings on the stage stairs. It is too diverting, also, when one wishes to watch only the players and the conductor. But let us hope the new Music Hall will dissipate all these minor annoyances, and give satisfaction to the majority of the subscribers and the public at large. It will be astonishing if it does, but let's pray for the impossible. Col. Higginson and his orchestra deserve it should be as near perfection as human foresight per-

---

Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 4, 1898.

Seventh Symphony Concert.

Mr Kneisel again led the symphony orchestra at the rehearsal and concert in Music hall last week. Mr Gericke is convalescent, but it was considered unwise for him to resume his duties until another week. Mr Kneisel was warmly welcomed and the admirable playing of the orchestra under his direction well merited the hearty applause which rewarded the performance of each selection. It is not necessary at this late date to call attention to Mr Kneisel's ability as a conductor, but the orchestra may again be complimented upon having in its membership one who is so thoroughly capable of meeting an emergency created by the temporary retirement of its recognized leader.

With characteristic modesty Mr Kneisel presented a program of works which had previously been played by the orchestra. It was admirably arranged and afforded much pleasure. The selections were: Symphony No. 9 in C major, by Schubert; symphonic poem No. 2, "Launcelot and Elaine," by Edward MacDowell; symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," by Camille Saint-Saens, and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, by Hector Berlioz.

Mr Kneisel read the Schubert symphony with thorough intelligence and with strict regard to tradition, resulting in an eminently satisfactory performance. The MacDowell symponic poem was listened to with much pleasure. One's admiration for this work increases the oftener it is heard, and it will long retain favor on orchestral programs.

Perhaps the most enjoyable feature of the concert, certainly the one which received most applause, was Saint-Saens' exquisite orchestral poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." It was played with infinite delicacy, captivating expression and perfect finish. Especially delightful was the sureness and daintiness of execution which marked the violins' playing of the exacting and various rhythmic changes of the closing passages. Mr Kneisel was recalled no less than five times after the performance of this number. Berlioz familiar overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," was played with splendid spirit and great brilliancy.

Mr Willy Burmester is announced as the soloist for the next rehearsal and concert. The program will be: Symphony No. 5, Tschaikowsky; concerto for violin, Beethoven, and Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.

—The list of stockholders of the present Music hall corporation, exclusive of such as may have responded to the last call, is one of the most noteworthy ever made for a semi-public project in this city. It includes the names of 121 women, all prominent in Boston society. The signers for 10 shares and more are Messrs William S. Bigelow, G. T. W. Braman, Martin Brimmer, Shepherd Brooks, Miss Charlotte Bowditch, Mrs Frances G. Blake, Messrs John C. Bancroft, J. Arthur Beebe, Franklin H. Beebe, Francis V. Balch, T. Dennie Boardman, J. R. Coolidge, Louis Cabot, Arthur A. Carey, Eben S. Draper, Lewis S. Dabney, trustee of Alice B. Chase; William Endicott Jr, R. D. Evans, Miss Sarah B. Fay, Messrs John L. Gardner, Henry S. Grew, Edward W. Hooper, Charles Head, H. H. Hunnewell, Mrs Aug. Hemenway Jr, Messrs Aug. Hemenway, Reginald Gray and George S. Hale, trustees; Eben D. Jordan, Henry T. Kidder, David P. Kimball, Mrs William C. Loring, Miss Georgina Lowell, Mrs Harriet J. Morse, Messrs Mortimer P. Mason, W. Powell Mason, Albert A. Pope, Mrs Julia B. Paine, Miss Alice F. Perkins, Mrs Annie T. Phillips, Messrs Henry F. Sears, Barthold Schlesinger, J. Montgomery Sears, James P. Stearns, Quincy A. Shaw, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs Elizabeth C. Ware, Mr Samuel P. Warren, Mrs Ellen H. Weld, Messrs Charles G. Weld, Josiah Wheelwright, Henry M. Whitney, J. W. Wheelwright, Andrew C. Wheelwright and Miss Mary Lee Ware.

—Mr Gericke is rapidly recovering. He has been ill with influenza, and his physician, Dr Broughton of Jamaica Plain, expects that he will soon be able to resume his work.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 4, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was an interesting programme that was presented at the seventh Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening. Mr. Kneisel conducted, and there was no soloist. Schubert's symphony in C was the first number, one of the greatest of all symphonies, and, in spite of its great length, is never tiresome to the listener. Schubert wrote this symphony a short time before his death, in 1828, but it was never performed in his lifetime. It was in fact unknown for a number of years, it being first performed in public in Leipsig on March 22, 1839. Since then it has steadily grown in favor and is now a standard work in its class.

The performance last evening was superb in every way. The other numbers were MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25; Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31, and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

Mr. MacDowell's composition is excellent every way and is a worthy example of native talent. The other numbers are well-known favorites.

The work of the orchestra, under Mr. Kneisel, was admirable, and he was much applauded. The programme of the next rehearsal and concert will include the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto and the "Meistersinger" prelude. Mr. Willy Burmester will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1898.

A Delightful Performance of Familiar Works Under Mr. Kneisel's Direction — Mrs. Szumowska's Piano Recital in Steinert Hall.

The program of the seventh symphony concert in Music Hall last night, Mr. Kneisel, conductor, in place of Mr. Gericke, who is now convalescent, however, was as follows:

Symphony No. 9, in C major..........Schubert
Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine"............................ MacDowell
"Omphale's Spinning-wheel".....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"......Berlioz

Happy should be conductor and orchestra when there is really nothing to write about their performance save warm words of praise! Furthermore, the vocabulary of praise is as limited as that of censure is unlimited. It should be enough to say that the orchestra in ensemble and in solo performance was at its height, and that Mr. Kneisel led with marked appreciation, discrimination and authority. The concert tested so frequently the skill of the first oboist that I cannot refrain from alluding to the remarkable playing of Mr. Longy. In the second movement of the symphony his rhythmic precision was a delight. In the brilliant ironic jest of Saint-Saëns, the voice of the mocking Omphale was well bred, and not without a tinge of womanly tenderness toward the sulking Hercules. And it must be remembered that Omphale was a woman of distinction, not a mere cackling light-o'-love. Then in the "Cellini" overture—led with great spirit—Mr. Longy blew his tune with a purity of tone and a beauty of phrasing that would repay a journey.

Of the pieces played, the symphonic-poem by Mr. MacDowell is the least familiar. It was first produced here early in 1890 by Mr. Nikisch. To me it is not as musically satisfactory or as of such sustained imagination as the Indian Suite or the Suite that preceded the latter; nor do I think it to be as poetic a work as the composer's Hamlet and Ophelia. I find it too episodic, and although there are charming passages, and although there is often the most refined orchestration, I find neither pronounced musical character-drawing nor any irresistible and haunting climax. The composer once said to me that he was not wholly satisfied with the orchestration, and that he thought of rewriting the work. The subject has tempted him in various forms. There is the noble piano sonata that bears the motto, "Arthur, flower of Kings." At one time Mr. MacDowell contemplated seriously an opera with some part of the Arthurian legend for the subject. He looked for a libretto; if I am not mistaken, he sketched one. Whether he could find material in Mr. Richard Hovey's trilogy is a question that admits of two answers. I do not believe that Lancelot, Elaine, Arthur and Guinevere lend themselves easily to operatic purposes. Several composers have tried their hand without success, and Bemberg's flabby music, thanks to the interest shown by Melba, and the composer's pocketbook, was produced in New York. A "Lancelot du Lac" will soon be brought out in Paris.

⁂

The program of the concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be:

Symphony No. 5..................Tschaikowsky
Violin Concerto... ....Beethoven
Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger"......Wagner

Mr. Kneisel will conduct. Mr. Willy Burmester, violinist, will make his first appearance in America.

Philip Hale.

The Boston Traveler
Seventy-sixth Year—Vol LIV No. 209.—

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Kneisel Again Conducts Admirably in the Absence of Mr. Gericke—Berlioz's Great Overture.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventh concert, Mr. Franz Kneisel conducting. The programme:

Symphony No. 9, in C major...........Schubert
Symphonic Poem, "Lancelot and Elaine" ....MacDowell
"Omphale's Spinning Wheel" ......Saint-Saens
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"........Berlioz

Mr. Kneisel, who still held the conductor's baton, demonstrated again and more surely than ever before his genuine ability and fitness as a leader of orchestral forces. Of course his training and experience have done much for him in this line, both in his own matchless quartet and as a concertmeister of the orchestra, but he is now showing something that he has not exhibited previously—strength and emotional force. His beat is becoming almost as "inexorable"—I believe that is the stock phrase—as that of Mr. Gericke himself. Nor does he merely cut the air in time; he evidently knows his scorce and has a well defined idea as to where the effects he desires are coming from.

The Schubert symphony was read and played with warmth and elegance. As for MacDowell's "Launcelot and Elaine" symphonic poem, it is one of the dullest and most ineffective larger works of this able composer. It is nowhere trivial or poor, of course, but it is nowhere inspiring or very suggestive. Not even when the listener tries to put himself into the Arthurian mood for receptive purposes does the music give him any very clear impressions. It was not in the playing, for that was as fine as need be; it was the lack of genius in the work itself.

Saint-Saens' brilliant episode of Hercules and his charmer's spinning wheel was given with the utmost grace and technical beauty, and then came the finest part of the concert, a magnificent performance of Berlioz's splendid "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. The freshness and richness of this 60-year-old work are astonishing. No wonder it staggered the critics of 1838, who would have none of the opera. Mr. Kneisel read the piece with great fervor, and reached the highest level he has yet shown as a conductor. It is not over-rash to prophesy that he will some day lead orchestras as a profession.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, December 3, 1898.

BOSTON, MASS., Nov. 28, 1898.

Mr. Gericke's illness still continues with little promise of speedy recovery. At this time of writing I am informed that a typhoid condition does not actually exist, yet there are symptoms indicating that tendency. Let us hope that this dread affliction will not prevail.

Mr. Kneisel will conduct the concerts in the interim. The programme of the last concert, the sixth, of the Symphony Orchestra embraced Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," overture; symphonic sketches, "The Sea," by Paul Gilson; and Liszt's "The Preludes." Miss Marian Titus sang an aria by Mozart and the "Bell Song" from Délibes' "Lakmé."

Gilman's composition exhibits the author's facility in modern instrumentation, shows a vivid imaginaton and presents some themes of more than ordinary value, but their extended treatment prostrates their effectiveness and wearies the listener, the monotony in the end becoming unbearable. To be sure it was played with an almost total disregard of its dynamic demands, a fact that in itself prevented gaining more than a slight idea of the composition in its presentation. Kneisel kept the time firmly, but that was about all, while the band played on boisterously and in a manner heedless of the composer's indications. The other more familiar numbers were better played, especially the Mendelssohn overture.

If Mr. Gericke's illness is to be a prolonged one, Mr. Kneisel had better take the orchestra severely in hand and curb its independent inclination.

Mrs. Titus sang her selections in a tasteful manner. Her voice is not a full one, and she renders it less so through the unfortunate habit of singing in her nose, probably the result of a practice of the "dans le masque" fallacy that is so popular nowadays and at the same time so surely destructive of the voice. This capable and brilliant vocalist should remedy this difficulty, for to pursue a career upon this basis is to induce a premature loss of one's vocal powers. She should also build up her middle voice, otherwise there is a penalty attached to colorature efforts.

◆

Gericke Ill.—Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still sick in Boston, with typhoid fever. Latest reports happily state that the eminent leader is on the road to recovery.

[illegible] ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1898.

Kneisel Conducts a Flawless Performance at the Symphony.

The programme of the Symphony concert Saturday evening was changed because of the continued indisposition of Mr. Gericke and the first symphony of Beethoven and the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner had no place on it. The numbers were Schubert's ninth symphony, MacDowell's symphonic poem No 2, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25, Saint Saens' symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31, and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Celline," op. 23.

Mr. Gericke was reported as convalescent, but no promise was given as to his appearance even next week. The performance was again under the direction of Mr. Kneisel, which is equivalent to saying that the loss through the conductor's absence was scarcely perceptible. It was a performance so free from flaws that one could give up oneself to the delight of renewing old acquaintances and charming reminiscences, for the works are all more or less familiar.

The Schubert symphony is one of those deathless in destiny, the last, greatest and most original symphony the composer ever wrote. Of this Schumann, who resurrected after nearly a decade, wrote:—

"One must appreciate that more than mere melody, something above sorrow and joy, lies concealed in this symphony. Nay, more! In listening to symphonies like this, we are transported to a region where we never remember to have been before. Here we have, besides masterly power over the musical technicality of composition, life in all its phases, color in exquisite gradations, the minutest accuracy and fitness of expression and permeating the whole work a spirit of romance such as we recognize in other works of Franz Schubert."

Time has not stultified the generosity of Schumann's praise. The technical difficulties have kept it from becoming hackneyed and its spirit remains exalted as ever.

The composition of our own MacDowell has been heard here least often of the numbers. Without considering it the least interesting of his later works, it nevertheless has certain arid intervals which even many strong, beautiful passages and a rarely impressive finale do not wholly redeem. It is to more consistency, more sustenance of emotion that the composer will address himself if he rewrites it, as he is said to contemplate doing.

The Saint-Saens symphonic poem was in some respects the morsel of the evening, for, without being performed any better than the others, it was yet snapped up most appreciatively by the audience and applauded more demonstratively. Brilliant and vivacious as it is, without shallows, it yet appears that there is still a marked fondness for programme-music. Like Haydn, the public will have its "little story." No doubt there are many who find something "practical" in it. All the same the whir of the spinning wheel, the groans of Hercules and the gay laughter of Omphale are dainty conceits brilliantly scored.

The resplendent "Cellini" overture was given with fine fire and ensemble.

The Philadelphia Press
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1898.

OPERA SEASON IN FULL SWING

"Romeo and Juliet" Sung Before a Brilliant Audience at the Academy.

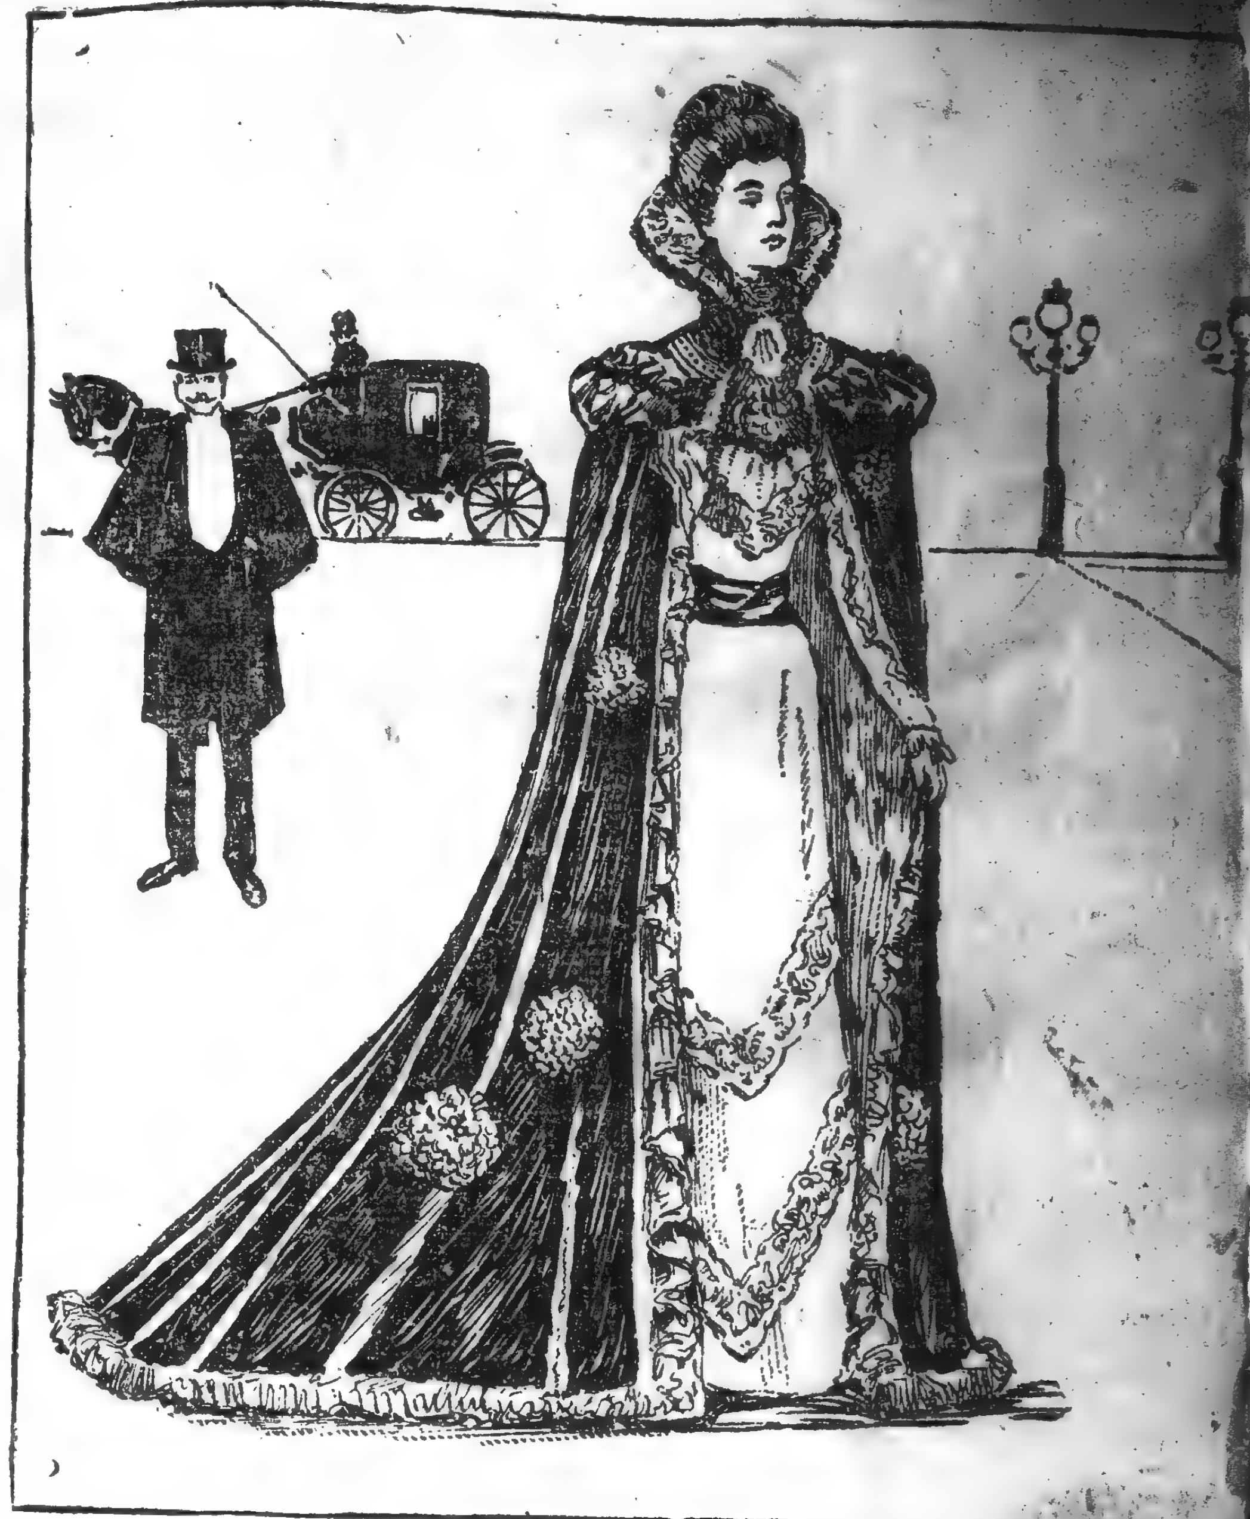
SOCIETY TURNS OUT IN FORCE.

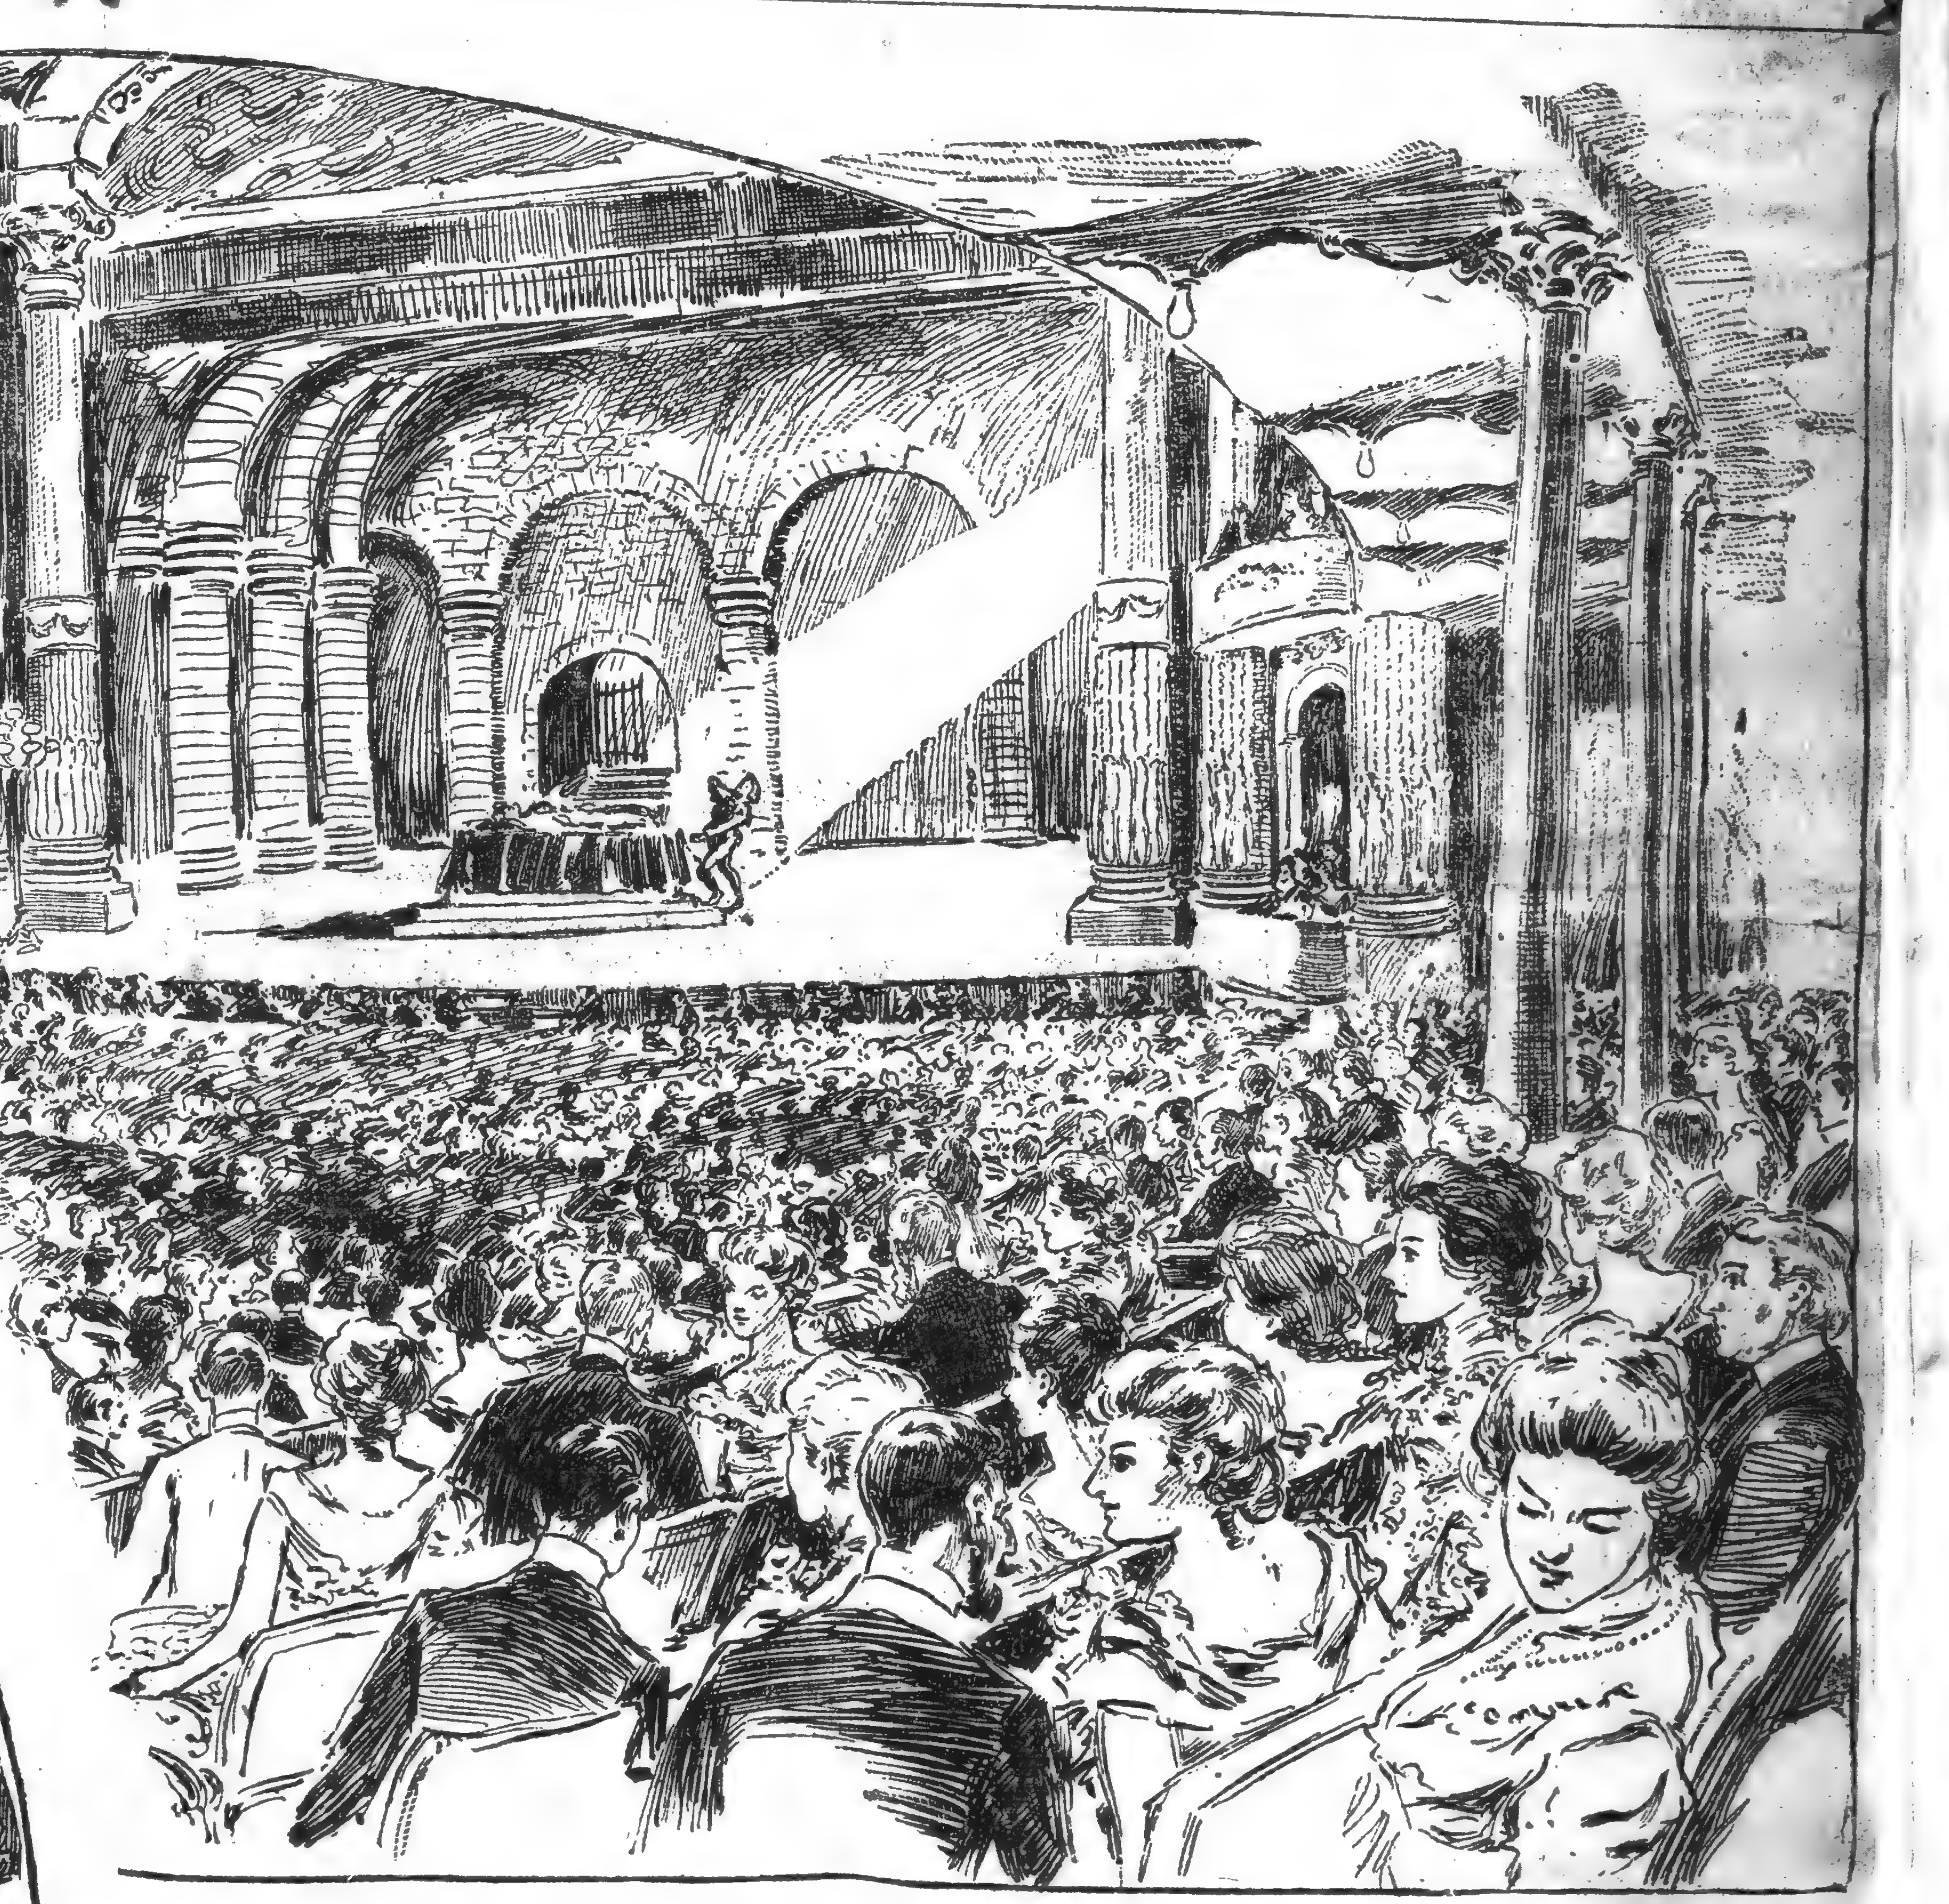
A Crowded House Welcomes Madame Melba and the Ellis Company.

BONNARD A GREAT SUCCESS.

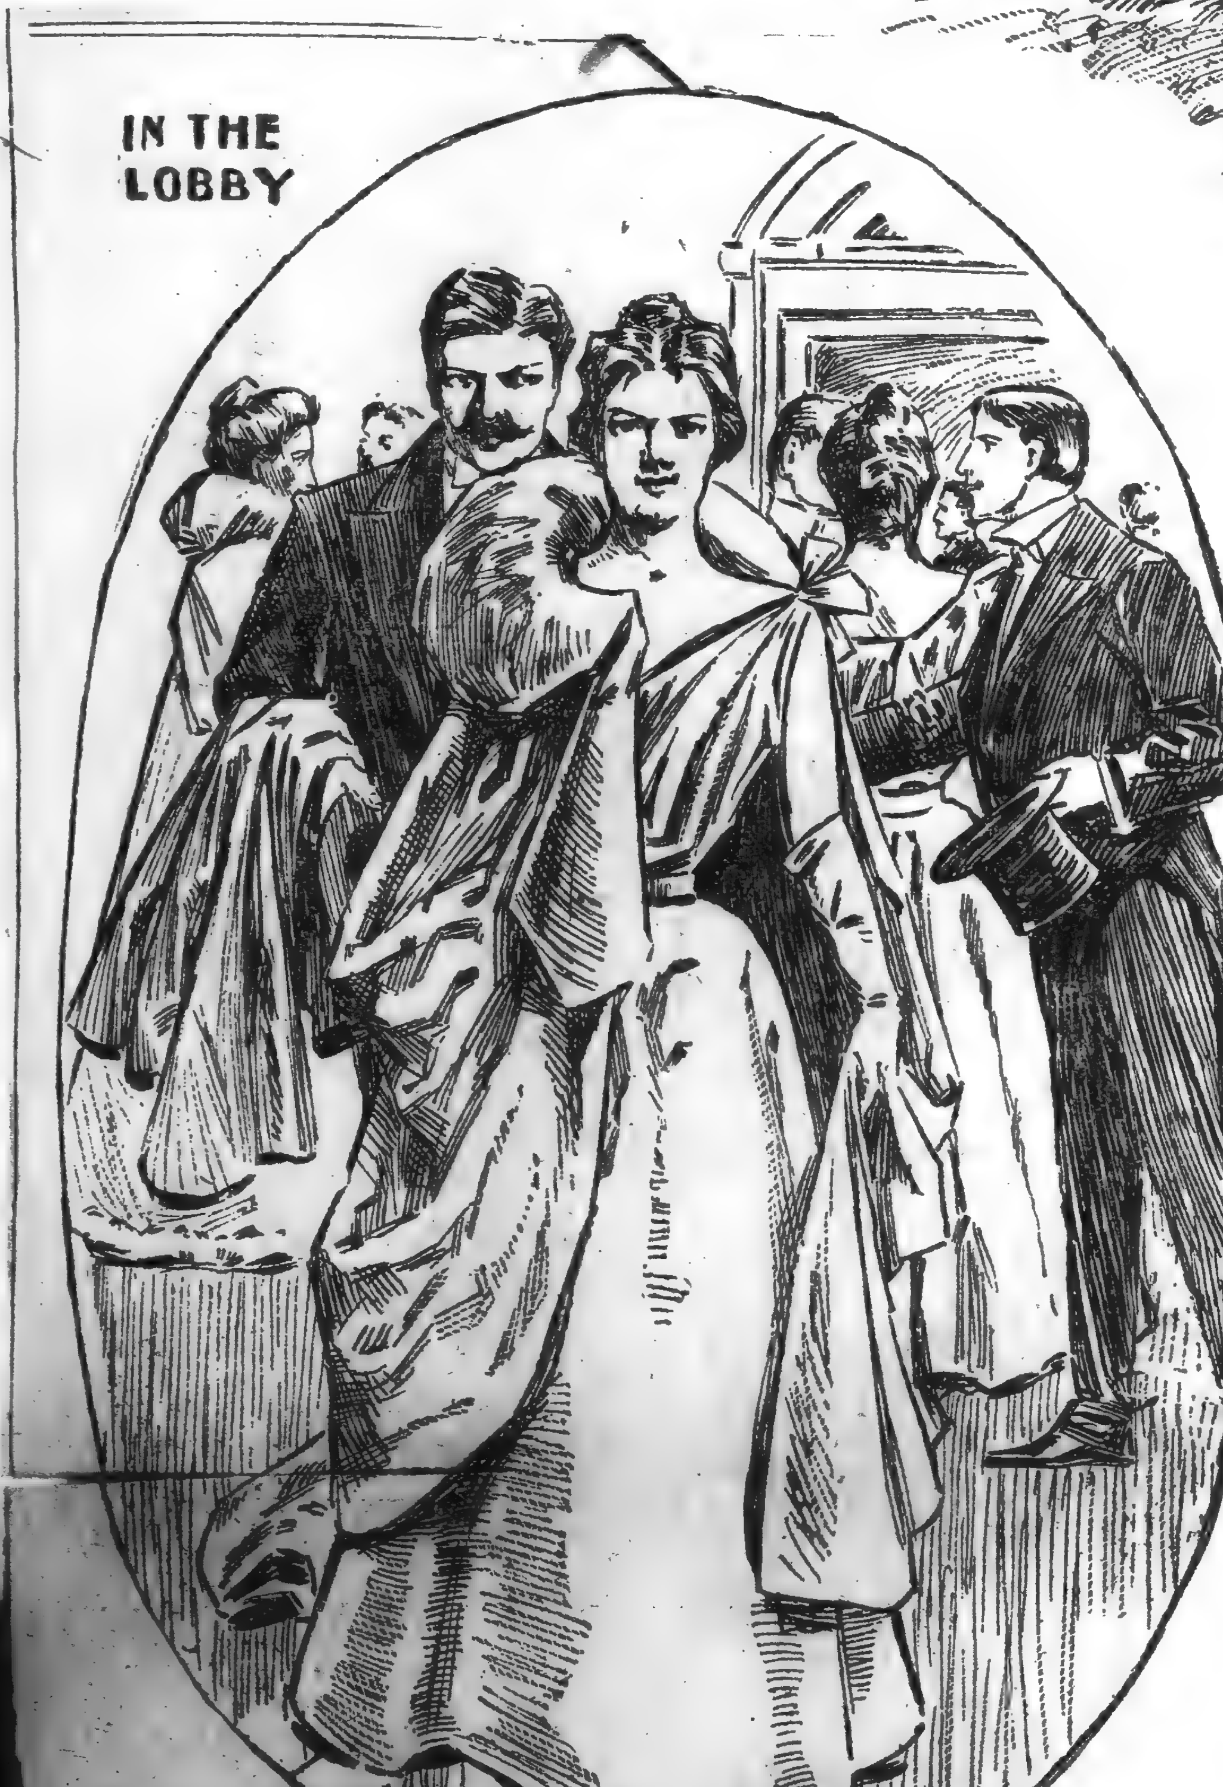
The New French Tenor Pleases All as "Romeo"—What the Prima Donna Has to Say—Those Who Were There.

THE OPENING NIGHT OF THE OPERA SEASON AT THE ACADEMY





A GLIMPSE INTO THE ACADEMY DURING THE TOMB SCENE.



The fourth season of opera under a quasi local subvention was ushered in last evening at the Academy of Music by a well-rounded performance of "Romeo and Juliette." The beautiful auditorium was filled with a brilliant audience, which was an auspicious omen for the success of the season, which in the way of sale of subscription seats and popular interest bids fair to far surpass last year. Those who have been prominently identified with the opera for four years were all present and the social turnout was complete in all particulars and thoroughly representative of Philadelphia life. Such an audience cannot but be inspiring to the singers under such circumstances and the effect on Madame Melba was particularly noticeable. She was in splendid voice and she sang in splendid style, as one who was among friends and was only too delighted to do her share in making the occasion notable.

Viewing the work of Melba and Bonnard alone, it may be felt that the words "well rounded" are hardly enthusiastic enough. And this is true in part, since the two principals did splendidly; but, taking the orchestra, under Seppilli, the chorus, the ballet and the singers, with one exception, the performance was particularly well balanced and even, and was perhaps one of the most satisfactory productions of the opera heard here in years. This was possible from the fact that at last a French tenor has been found who can do something else besides be graceful and bleat like a calf.

A "Romeo and Juliet" resolves itself largely into a matter of an interrupted duet between "Juliet" and "Romeo" the question of the tenor role is a pressing one, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, who has gathered the company, is to be congratulated in securing Bonnard. The new tenor has none of the aggressive faults of the French school. There is no tremolo, his voice has volume, a rich and sympathetic quality, he phrases well and has the art of vocal expression at his command, and, above all, his voice blends most beautifully with Madame Melba's. This gave the first and all the succeeding duets a special charm, while in the duel scene and in the other dramatic situations, Bonnard gave full evidence of power, and that without sense of strain or huskiness.

Of Madame Melba's "Juliet" to write anything is to rewrite old praise. She gave a new phrasing here and there and made particular effort to render the part in the full meaning and with splendid vocal success. Boudouresque's "Friar Lawrence" was on the lines made familiar last year and was an even bit of work, without reaching a high level. Stehmann was an excellent "Capulet" and Rains a sonorous "Duc di Verona." As "Tybault," Van Hoose gave marked evidence of the advance he has been making since last year, and sang and acted the part in excellent style, and Marie Mattfeld was an acceptable "Stephano," even if she did not justify the composer in interpolating it. All this was very well, but the opera came a cropper in Bensaude's "Mercutio." It is not easy to imagine how it could have

[68]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C major.
MacDowell: Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Launcelot and Elaine," opus 25.
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," opus 31.
Berlioz: Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," opus 23.

Again Mr. Kneisel conducted, Mr. Gericke being on the road to recovery, but not yet quite recovered.

The great Schubert symphony has lost no jot of its greatness. What a sudden leap forward Schubert took when he wrote it! Think of there being nothing but the unfinished B minor to stand between this mighty work and the composer's earlier symphonies, none of which really emerge from the Haydn-Mozart period of symphony writing. And here, in this wondrous C major, we find Schubert neck and neck with Beethoven himself, as a symphonist, in romanticism of conception, modern—that is, brand new—turns of musical idiom, fulness of orchestration, richness of development—in short, in all but freedom of form. In this one matter of form, Schubert's C major symphony is certainly behind Beethoven; the form is so exactly according to schedule that it seems at times almost school-boyish. It is, to be sure, saved from all appearance of pedantry by Schubert's noble insouciance, by his evidently not sticking so closely to a given scheme from any sense of artistic duty, but simply because, being absorbed in his work, he instinctively took to sliding down hill the easiest way—which is, generally speaking, the best worn way. Upon the whole, this cut-and-dried academic regularity of form is, to us, one of the most interesting points in the symphony; for, strange to say, it does not in the least detract from the romantic style and essence of the music; a more intrinsically romantic composition has hardly ever been written, and yet its form is as if all measured off by foot rule.

In mounting this symphony for performance, Mr. Kneisel tried an experiment which we have often wished to see tried before, and the unqualified success of which in this case is pleasant to record. This was doubling all the wood-wind: having respectively an extra pair of flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassoons ripieni for all the forte and fortissimo passages for full orchestra. We have often wished to see this experiment tried with some of the later Beethoven symphonies and the "Eroica"; but the very peculiar scoring of Schubert's great C major makes it doubly appropriate here. It has more than once been noted that Schubert has used his three trombones in unison (instead of in three-part harmony) with singular persistency in the stronger passages of this symphony; a style of scoring which tends to make the doubly reenforced trombone part unduly prominent. Yet, if you try to tone down this prominence by having the instruments played more softly, much of the desirable vigor of effect is lost. Now, the double woodwind is just what is needed to counteract the trombones; never has the symphony sounded more brilliant. Mr. Kneisel's reading of the great work seemed to us admirable; perhaps we should have liked a thought faster pace in the coda to the first movement, and in the whole of the last—but then! . . . Mr. Longy's work—the Symphony might, in one sense, almost be called an oboe concerto—was exquisite throughout.

Mr. MacDowell's "Launcelot and Elaine" still rather escapes our comprehension. It was a singularly happy idea to have it come together with Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale;" a sharper contrast could hardly be imagined. Both compositions, as their common name of symphonic poem suggests, are essentially romantic, imaginative, picturesque; they are not only romantic in feeling and purpose, but couched, so to speak, in the chosen romantic dialect of our modern music. Yet, although we own to not quite understanding Mr. McDowell's composition, how genuine, deeply felt, and full of true thought and emotion it seems; to be sure, Mr. MacDowell does not always tell his story in a language that we fully understand, but we cannot escape an inkling of the weighty import of the tale; whereas, in Saint-Saëns's case, we are simply wheedled into admiration, in spite of ourselves, by the ineffable grace and clearness with which he reels off his nothing-at-all of matter; we feel that he has really nothing to say, but he says that nothing so well!

Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture was admirably, extraordinarily well played. It is a ticklish work; it depends almost wholly upon the conductor to show it forth as the dullest of platitudes, or as a work of brilliant genius. Mr. Kneisel made us feel the genius of the thing.

The next programme is: Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64; Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D minor, opus 61; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg." Mr. Willy Burmester will be the solo violinist.

Which mention of a Tchaikovsky symphony reminds us that our good friend, Mr. Philip Hale, says in the December Musical Record, in speaking of the vehement Russian's "Pathetic" symphony in B minor: "Now, my friend Mr. Apthorp declared in the Transcript that Mr. Gericke does not 'really like the work.' " If Mr. Hale has not already demolished the article in the Transcript here referred to, he can find on a second perusal of the same that this statement is not quite up to his usual standard of accuracy. In fact, Mr. Apthorp never "declared" anything of the sort; not having talked with Mr. Gericke about the symphony in question, and being wholly ignorant of his opinion of the work, he was in no position to make such a declaration. The exact phrase used in the article was: "We doubt if Mr. Gericke really likes the work."

[illegible] NOT CLOSED

Several Reasons Why the Committee Has Decided to Keep Them Open

Attention is called to the fact that Edward W. Hooper of 50 State street is not the treasurer of the new Music Hall corporation, but is only one of the three gentlemen appointed to receive the money paid on the subscriptions, of which the two others are Dr. Henry F. Sears and Colonel Henry L. Higginson. Speaking for the committee, Mr. Hooper said this morning that not all of the $500,000 of capital required for the erection of the building had been subscribed, but that this fact was not to be interpreted to mean that it will not be. One of the difficulties of closing the books is that some of the more important of the original subscribers, like Eben D. Jordan and Henry Lee, have died since writing their subscriptions, and in such cases there must be considerable negotiation before it can be determined whether the amounts subscribed will be paid in. The project is not one promising a sure financial return on the investment, hence it is not thought wise to regard the funds of an estate as if they were still in charge of the original owner. Again, several of the subscriptions, one of them, at least, among the heaviest, are contingent upon other payments being made, and it will be some time before a satisfactory conclusion can be reached as to the total value of the subscription list.

Charles E. Cotting is still the treasurer of the corporation, which is as yet organized only under the general laws, the provisions of which as to the issue of the whole of the stock must be complied with before the corporation can begin upon the further use of its money. The amount issued thus far is only $200,000, most of which has been used in the purchase of land and the payment of taxes.

It is understood that a good organ will constitute part of the equipment of the new building, and that there will be mechanical facilities enough to permit, perhaps, the presentation of a scene from an opera. Beyond such provision the building cannot be regarded as an opera house.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 11, 1898.

Eighth Symphony Concert.

The program for the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert was as follows: Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, Beethoven's D major concerto for violin and the prelude to "The Mastersingers," Wagner. Mr Kneisel conducted and Mr Willy Burmester was the soloist. Tchaikovsky's noble composition shows the wonderful varieties of tonal coloring at his command, and each performance reveals new instrumental combinations utilized to give proper effect to the composer's ideas and words. The passion and gloom of the first movement finds a contrast in the more churchly second part, which leads up to the theme of the "glorified valse" comprising the third movement. The closing part forms a climax of splendid intensity, with double fortissimos innumerable, calling forth the full powers of the orchestra.

The interpretation left but little to be desired, the intricate orchestration being most skilfully presented by our great band. The conclusion theme preceding the free fantasia in part first was a beautiful example of alternating work by four or five contingents, and the coda and subsequent close, pianissimo, though totally different in character, were each faultless. In the broad and stately second movement, the character of which was admirably preserved, special mention is due the horn, clarinet and oboe players for harmony in duo and trio passages. The G string melody was sonorously sung by the violins, and Mr Kneisel's gradation to double pianissimo marked excellent control of his men, the finale being reached without break in the diminuendo.

The valse, part three, was specially satisfying to the auditors. The dainty melody, set in such a peculiar way by the Russian as to make it a novelty, is developed in a characteristic manner, but retains its melodic form throughout; and herein the great Russian again compels admiration for his ability to say things in an original style. The valse was most effectively played and aroused great applause. The brilliant and massive closing movement was smoothly given as a rule, the grand climax showing the orchestra to great advantage in fortissimo work of the most strenuous nature. The "Mastersingers" prelude was well played, as it should be by reason of the men's familiarity with the composition.

The debut of Mr Willy Burmester was the feature of the performance, as his reputation as an artist of great ability had preceded him. His success was almost instantaneous, and this despite the fact that he had but recently arrived in America after a long sea voyage, and really was not in proper condition to do himself justice. The Beethoven concerto is immensely difficult and very long, and taxes the endurance of the performer nearly to the limit, and so the new violinist had much to contend with that was unknown to the audience. His choice of the work indicated his standing as a performer, and his interpretation quickly proved his mastery of the instrument. On account of his indisposition his tones at times seemed to lack in vigor, but his technique, bowing and expression were flawless. His tonal production, whether in single or chord fingerings, was clear and true, and his cadenzas were splendid examples of rapidity in runs and changes in bowing. The second movement was played with exquisite delicacy and sentimental expression, the pure, cantabile quality of the strings giving forth the song in a way to entrance the listener. Mr Burmester is an artist of magnificent powers, and his cordial reception was thoroughly merited.

There will be no concert until next week. Mme Hopekirk will be the pianist, and the orchestral selections will include Mozart's D major symphony, Cesar Frank's "Le Chasseur Maudi " and Brahm's Academic overture. The rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, Dec 22, and the concert Friday evening, Dec 23.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1898

THE NEW MUSIC HALL

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I read with much surprise in the Transcript of Saturday last a statement quoted as having been made by Colonel Henry L. Higginson, regarding the proposed building of the new Music Hall Association.

In this statement Colonel Higginson says: "We do hope to have," and above it without quotation marks is the bald statement that "the hall is to be designed for concerts, oratorios, etc., without regard to the possibilities of giving grand opera."

There are many Boston citizens who would like to know what the "we" are, and by what right Colonel Higginson states what is to be done, before the plans have been shown even to the stockholders in the new corporation. I can find no record of any public appointment of the "committee" that has figured in this Music Hall deal so prominently thus far, and as president of the association Colonel Higginson is an executive merely, to carry out the desires not only of the stockholders, but, in this case, thousands of Boston citizens who are to be deprived of any other building for musical performances in this city for a generation.

No better justification of the position taken by those who desire that an opera house shall be built with the money subscribed under the call of the "committee" is needed than the open letter published over Colonel Higginson's own signature five years ago, in which he suggested the desirability of an opera house rather than a music hall, and for just the reasons that still make this action desirable. It is entirely safe to predict that only one building for musical purposes in this city will be paid for by the present generation, and if the "committee" are allowed to carry out their present plans, announced officially by Colonel Higginson, all hope of any permanent development in operatic performances may as well be dismissed by the musical public of this city for another twenty-five years.

A pretty thorough familiarity with public amusements of all sorts in Boston for a generation fails to enable me to discover in the experience or action of Colonel Higginson or his associates in the "committee" the first qualification to justify the intrusting to their care of the important duty of supplying Boston with a new building for musical purposes. Such a building must be constructed so as to be a financial as well as artistic success if it is to remain in the custody of those who have the musical interests of Boston at heart.

Facts are stubborn things, and the results of the unwise action of the original subscribers to the stock of the Boston Theatre and the present Music Hall need no amplification. To the credit of the manager of the Boston Theatre it can be said that his pride as a Bostonian has always led him to maintain this grand old auditorium in splendid condition, however much business necessities have led to its varied uses—none, however, in his day other than creditable to the city.

The present condition of Music Hall is sufficient, to my mind, to deter anyone with the slightest interest in the reputation of this dear old city from keeping quiet when the proprietors assume the duty of providing Boston with a musical home for the next generation. Have they not robbed Music Hall of the "big organ" rather than keep it in repair, and left a board roof over the Music Hall stage an entire season unpainted?

Maintaining concerts when the public will pay $2500 to $3000 per concert, and continuing such entertainments when the public fails to respond at the box office, are vastly different matters, and it remains to be seen what effect a sharp decline in the concert market would have upon the present symphony concert scheme.

Let the action of the Metropolitan Opera House Company of New York be carefully studied and followed, and the coming generation of musical Boston will bless those who put their money into this undertaking, whatever happens to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A CONCERT MANAGER

Boston, Dec. 6.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Pape
OF NEW ENGLAND

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 11, 1898.
(Copywright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eighth concert was given in Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Mr. Kneisel, with Mr. Willy Burmester as the soloist.

The programme included Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor, concerto for violin in D by Beethoven and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

The symphony was admirably played throughout, and it is a work which certainly improves upon every performance. It is very melodic, with many striking contrasts, and the instrumentation is of that peculiar richness that one looks for in Tschaikowsky's work. The least interesting of the four movements is the last one. The use of the waltz movement in this symphony is to be noted as unusual.

Mr. Burmester is a violinist new to the musical public of this city. He has a highly finished technic, which masters all known difficulties, which in the violin are numerous, and his tone, though light, is remarkably pure, and intonation always correct.

Beethoven's concerto demands the highest intellectual abilities on the part of the performer, and there is no opportunity for sensational effects. Mr. Burmester, by his performance, proves himself an artist of high rank, and his abilities were fully recognized by the audience, which recalled him several times.

The concert ended with a brilliant performance of the "Meistersinger" prelude.

The next rehearsal and concert will be on Thursday afternoon, the 22d, and Friday evening, the 23d, there being no performances the coming week.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIV., NO. 164.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Willy Burmester's First Appearance This Season.

Franz Kneisel Again Leads, as Mr. Gericke Is Not Yet Very Strong—Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5 the Chief Selection—Overture from Wagner's "Meistersaenger."

The eighth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, in Music Hall, presented this programme:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin.................Beethoven
Overture, "The Master Singers".......Wagner

The soloist was Mr. Willy Burmester, who made his first concert appearance in America on this occasion.

Mr. Franz Kneisel again conducted, for, though Mr. Gericke has recovered from his recent illness, his strength is not yet sufficiently restored to warrant his return to his duties. When the orchestra comes back from its trip of this week, and the next concert here takes place, two weeks hence, the reappearance of Mr. Gericke at the conductor's stand may be confidently anticipated.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is always interesting, despite its inequalities. It ranges freely from nobility of sentiment to inflated triviality, now and then making a narrow escape from offending against the eternal fitness of things, as if the composer felt, in his exuberance of animal spirits, that he would like to slip into a bit of pretty comic opera tunefulness, but recovers his gravity just in the nick of time. He very nearly gets there in the waltz which takes the place of the usual scherzo; in fact, it is scarcely certain that were it not for his treatment of his themes in this movement, especially in its trio, it would resemble something exceedingly like a scoff at the proprieties. At several spots in the symphony he seems to be on the point of leaping from his stilts, but thinks better of it.

A closer acquaintance with the slow movement brings the brevity of its beautiful themes into greater prominence and causes their persistent repetition to become monotonous in effect. The work, however, overflows with charm and is fascinatingly aglow with richness of orchestral color and holds the attention steadily from beginning to end. Mr. Kneisel gave a splendid reading of it; perhaps, on the whole, the most brilliant, effective and spirited that it has ever had here. The orchestra was at its best and fully in sympathy with its conductor. The wood wind had an opportunity to show its virtuosity in the trio of the waltz and did so with exquisite results. The audience was keen in its appreciation of the beauty of the interpretation and recalled Mr. Kneisel with great fervor several times. The Wagner overture was also finely read and played.

Mr. Burmester has a small and weak tone, but it is delightfully pure and appealing. He plays with beautiful finish of technique, and in a style that may be characterized as almost fragile in its exceeding delicacy. He bows with largeness and freedom, and all that he does has the distinctions of refined taste, grace and elegance. It did not seem that he has the depth and the fire to do full justice to a work of the exacting nature of the Beethoven concerto. He played it in a manner that was thoroughly artistic, technically, but his interpretation was over sugary and constantly suggested that he would have been much more at home in the Mendelssohn concerto, as far as the distinguishing features of his style are concerned. He is without affectation, plays frankly and with authority, and his tenderness of feeling, his clean-cut execution, and his manifest sincerity won him the hearty and deserved favor of his hearers, whose plaudits and recalls were fairly earned.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in D major, No. 31, B. & H., Mozart, first time; concerto for piano; "Le Chasseur Maudit," Caesar Franck, and academic overture, Brahms. Mme. Helen Hopekirk is to be the soloist.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

After conducting the fifth public rehearsal in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, November 18, Mr. Gericke had a sudden and severe attack of the grip, which has confined him to his house ever since. A high temperature for several days made his physicians fear an attack of typhoid fever, but this fear has been averted, and he is now on the road to rapid and complete recovery. Ever since the date given Franz Kneisel has very creditably filled Mr. Gericke's place, and will continue in the position of conductor until Mr. Gericke has fully recovered. As all the performances of the orchestra on its December trip this week will be under the direction of Mr. Kneisel, the following sketch of his career may prove interesting: Franz Kneisel, a Rumanian by birth but of German parentage, studied the violin in Vienna with Gruen and Hellmesberger. He studied not only the violin, but music; and he studied music by most intelligent hearing and observation, as well as by the performance of routine task. Graduating at the Vienna Conservatory, he made his first appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on December 21, 1882, and was soon afterward offered the position of solo violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Court Theatre. Afterward he was associated with the Bilse Orchestra at Berlin, as concert-meister, a position of the highest honor, which had been held before him by such eminent artists as Ysaye, Halir and Thomson. Americans are indebted to Wilhelm Gericke for his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for it was he who engaged him as principal of that organisation. This was in the second year of Mr. Gericke's administration, and at the third concert, October 31, 1885, Mr. Kneisel, then twenty years old, made his first appearance at these concerts as a soloist. He played the concerto by Beethoven. On October 22, 1898, and again under the direction of Mr. Gericke, he played the concerto by Goldmark, and this was his eighteenth appearance at these concerts as a soloist, although many have been his incidental solo passages. It would be interesting to go through in detail the indefatigable and illustrious career of Mr. Kneisel in Boston alone. As solo violinist, he introduced at the Symphony concerts concertos by Brahms, Goldmark and Strube. He has played, in addition to the concertos already mentioned, Joachim's Hungarian (first movement), Spohr's Ninth, Paganini's in D, arranged by Wilhelmj; Mendelssohn's, Viotti's in A minor, No. 22. With Mr. Loeffler, he has played Bach's double concerto and the viole d'amour in Loeffler's "Mort de Tintagiles," and, with Mr. Schroeder, Brahms's concerto for violin and 'cello. And this list, no doubt, is incomplete. He had the honor of conducting this orchestra, after Mr. Nikisch's departure, on its Western trip, and at three concerts at the World's Fair. Mr. Kneisel is a member of the Harvard Musical Association, the St. Botolph Club, of Boston, and many famous foreign musical organizations.

The programmes at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York and Brooklyn this week will be as follows:

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY MATINEE.

Symphony No. 9, in C major..................Schubert
Concerto for violin..............................Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25, MacDowell
Overture to "Tannhäuser"............................Wagner
Solo player, Willy Burmester.

NEW-YORK, THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 65........Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61........Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31..............................Saint-Säens
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"............Liszt
Solo player, Willy Burmester.

BROOKLYN, FRIDAY MATINEE.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64........Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61........Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31..............................Saint-Säens
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23..........Berlioz
Solo player, Willy Burmester.

BROOKLYN, SATURDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61.........Schumann
Concerto for violin, in D major (in one movement), Paganini
Overture, "Fingal's Cave," op. 26 ....Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"............Liszt
Solo player, Willy Burmester.

Willy Burmester, the violinist, who will play solos at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York and Brooklyn this week, has won a fine reputation, chiefly for his technical skill, throughout Europe. He is a native of Hamburg, was born in 1869 and studied first with his father, and afterward with Joachim for three years in Helsingfors, Finland, before beginning his career as a virtuoso.

The New York Times

NEW YORK, SUNDAY, DEC. 11, 1898.

The second matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday at 2 o'clock. The programme will consist of Schubert's C-Major Symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Willy Burmester, violinist; Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," (first time here,) and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, Franz Kneisel will conduct both this and the Thursday evening concert, of which this is the programme:

Symphony No. 5, E minor.........Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin..................Beethoven
.....Mr. Willy Burmester.
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" Saint-Saens.
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"........Liszt

MUSICAL MATTERS AT HOME.

Franz Kneisel, during Mr. Gericke's illness, has made a great success as a conductor in Boston. Mr. Kneisel, who is a Roumanian by birth, but of German parentage, studied the violin in Vienna, and made his first appearance with the famous Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra Dec. 21, 1882, and was soon afterward offered the position of solo violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Court Theatre. Afterward he was associated with the famous Bilse Orchestra of Berlin as concert meister, a position of the highest honor, and which had been held before him by such eminent artists as Ysaye, Halir, and Thomson. Mr. Gericke, in the second year of his directorship, engaged him as concert master with the Boston Symphony [illegible], and at the third concert, Oct[illegible] Kneisel, then only twenty [illegible] his first appearance [illegible] He pl[illegible] Mr. K[illegible]

The Sun.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening. These two programmes will be given:

WEDNESDAY MATINÉE, DEC. 14.

Symphony No. 9, in C major................Schubert
Concerto for violin.........................Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," Op. 25..................................Macdowell
Overture to "Tannhäuser"......................Wagner

THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 15.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64...Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, Op. 61....Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Op. 31 ....Saint-Saens
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"........Liszt

Willy Burmester will be the soloist at both concerts, which will be under the direction of Franz Kneisel owing to the illness of Wilhelm Gericke. These concerts will introduce Mr. Burmester in this city.

WORLD: SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its second visit to New York this week. Owing to the recent illness of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, he will be unable to conduct the two concerts fixed for Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 14, and Thursday evening, Dec. 15, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Franz Kneisel will act in his stead. This will be the first time that Mr. Kneisel officiates as conductor in this city. His efficiency as such has been tested on many occasions elsewhere and his admirers here will now be able to appreciate it from personal observation.

The programme for the first concert consists of Schubert's C major symphony, MacDowell's symphonic poem "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25, Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture and Mendelssohn's violin concerto. The second concert will present Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Saint-Saens's "Rouet d'Omphale," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, op. 61.

The soloist on both occasions will be Mr. Willy Burmester, one of the youngest of great contemporary violinists. He is a pupil of Joachim. In Germany he is considered to be a master in technique and has been dubbed "the German Paganini."

MUSICAL AMERICA

EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND

PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

Devoted to Music, Drama and the Arts

New York, December 10, 1898

BOSTON, MASS., Dec. 4, 1898.

Mr. Gericke is now convalescent, but in order that his recovery shall be the more permanent he has decided not to take up his work again until after the Symphony Orchestra returns from its trip next week, so you will have a chance in New York to judge of Mr. Kneisel's efforts with the baton. As I remarked in a previous letter, Mr. Kneisel, like Theodore Thomas, is a born conductor, and great good fortune has attended the orchestra in having so capable a director at hand during the illness of Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Kneisel gave us for a programme at the last concert Schubert's symphony in C major; the symphonic poem "Launcelot and Elaine," by MacDowell; the "Rouet d'Omphale," poem by Saint Saëns; and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." It is needless to comment further upon the reading and playing of this programme further than to say that it was unequivocally a model performance. Mr. Kneisel distinguished himself as well as did the orchestra under his firm and intelligent command of its resources.

It was a great occasion for Mr. Longy, the new oboe player, for the works played offered him the opportunity to display his masterly ability. There is not one item in the make-up of this artist that does not shine in a pre-eminent degree. Nobility of tone, purity of intonation, exquisite finish and mastery in technical resources are his accomplishments, while his artistic attributes reveal delicacy, tenderness and repose, together with breadth and dignity in the broader passages, and a wonderful sustaining power, all of which, with splendid phrasing, are marvels of surpassing excellence that distinguish his eminent ability. Oh, that the sea had not claimed the lamented Pourton whose clarionet exhaled the breath of heaven and sang the voice of love! And Molé, that consummate master of the flute who should never have been allowed to depart from the orchestra; what a marvelous player was he! How these exceptional artists, with the equally eminent Longy, would have distinguished even the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra! But alas! the hand of fate has cast the die and we must gracefully submit to its inevitable decision.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Mr. Willy Burmester, Violinist, Made His First Appearance in the United States Last Night—Mr. Kneisel Distinguished Himself as a Conductor.

The program of the eighth Symphony concert, Mr. Kneisel, conductor, in place of Mr. Gericke, who is canvalescent, was as follows:

Symphony in E minor No. 5....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin.....................Beethoven
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"........Wagner

Mr. Willy Burmester, who made his first appearance in the United States last night, was born at Hamburg in 1869. He was taught first by his father; then for four years he studied with Joachim. For three years he worked by himself at Helsingfors in Finland. With his sister Johanna he made his first appearance in Berlin, Nov. 18, 1891. He reappeared there in 1894. His first appearance in London was March 14, 1895.

Mr. Burmester made a very favorable impression. His tone is not large, but it is fine, and in a way individual. His technic seems amply adequate for any demand that might be made upon it. His performance of the concerto was thoughtful, without the suggestion of pedagogic dryness. He was content to let the music speak without undue personal explanation. His sentiment was manly, and his vigor was controlled. He played with full appreciation of the authoritative strength of the first movement, and beauty of the second; nor did he grow impatient with the rondo and try to make something out of it. Although there were tones in the larghetto that moved the hearer, there was no sensuous appeal, and, therefore, no incongruous display of what is loosely known as emotion, which certain persons find contagious whenever a violinist saws on the G string or rolls eyes toward the heaven that lies presumably somewhere above the ceiling. No, Mr. Burmester is not first of all an emotional player. He is more than this; he is a man of fine taste who has been trained in a pure school, who respects sincerity and is sincere, and who, therefore, does not trample on the composer to step toward glory. His performance was one that gave much musical enjoyment; it was without taint of anything that was meretricious; it was free from any virtuoso trick. The applause was hearty, and there were several recalls.

⁂

Mr. Gericke is rapidly nearing health and it is confidently expected that he will be able to lead at the concerts of the 22d and 23d. Mr. Kneisel will conduct during the visit of the orchestra to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. And it is not now out of place to congratulate heartily Mr. Kneisel on the ability and intelligence displayed by him under trying circumstances. Each concert has in turn enlarged his reputation as a conductor. He has shown authority, discrimination, an instinct for treatment of detail, spirit and a mastery over the expression of his feelings. He has interested himself in the composition of each composer as though it were his own. He conducted for Mr. Burmester last night as he might wish another would conduct for him with his violin in hand. The performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony, as well as that of the Schubert symphony, at the preceding concert, proved conclusively that with experience and study he might justly be ranked among leading conductors. And he has performed this task unexpectedly put upon him without thought of personal advantage—indeed, to the sacrifice of his quartet interests—and with the simplicity and the modesty that are characteristic of the man. His one thought has been for the satisfaction of Mr. Gericke and the reputation of the orchestra, which has helped and supported him in every way.

⁂

There will be no concert this week Friday and Saturday. The program for Dec. 22-23 (Thursday afternoon and Friday evening) will be as follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 31..........Mozart
(First time.)
Concerto for piano.........................
Helen Hopekirk.
"Le Chasseur Maudit" ....César Franck
Academic Overture ....Brahms

Philip Hale.

Fashionable and musical Boston has been rejoicing since it has recently been known that Mr. Gericke is fast regaining health and strength. The early reports were far from encouraging, but after ten days he was really on the road to recovery, and since then his house has been bombarded with attentions, flowers, fruit and kind wishes. Well as the orchestra has done under Mr. Kneisel, we have all felt that he was only a substitute, and not our pet conductor.

The smart concert of the week was that given by Miss Alison Haughton, assisted by Mr. [illegible]

New-York Daily Tribune.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

After conducting the fifth public rehearsal in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, November 18, Mr. Gericke had a sudden and severe attack of the grip, which has confined him to his house ever since. A high temperature for several days made his physicians fear an attack of typhoid fever, but this fear has been averted, and he is now on the road to rapid and complete recovery. Ever since the date given Franz Kneisel has very creditably filled Mr. Gericke's place, and will continue in the position of conductor until Mr. Gericke has fully recovered. As all the performances of the orchestra on its December trip this week will be under the direction of Mr. Kneisel, the following sketch of his career may prove interesting: Franz Kneisel, a Rumanian by birth but of German parentage, studied the violin in Vienna with Gruen and Hellmesberger. He studied not only the violin, but music; and he studied music by most intelligent hearing and observation, as well as by the performance of routine task. Graduating at the Vienna Conservatory, he made his first appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on December 21, 1882, and was soon afterward offered the position of solo violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Court Theatre. Afterward he was associated with the Bilse Orchestra at Berlin, as concert-meister, a position of the highest honor, which had been held before him by such eminent artists as Ysaye, Halir and Thomson. Americans are indebted to Wilhelm Gericke for his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for it was he who engaged him as principal of that organization. This was in the second year of Mr. Gericke's administration, and at the third concert, October 31, 1885, Mr. Kneisel, then twenty years old, made his first appearance at these concerts as a soloist. He played the concerto by Beethoven. On October 22, 1898, and again under the direction of Mr. Gericke, he played the concerto by Goldmark, and this was his eighteenth appearance at these concerts as a soloist, although many have been his incidental solo passages. It would be interesting to go through in detail the indefatigable and illustrious career of Mr. Kneisel in Boston alone. As solo violinist, he introduced at the Symphony concerts concertos by Brahms, Goldmark and Strube. He has played, in addition to the concertos already mentioned, Joachim's Hungarian (first movement), Spohr's Ninth, Paganini's in D, arranged by Wilhelmj; Mendelssohn's, Viotti's in A minor, No. 22. With Mr. Loeffler, he has played Bach's double concerto and the viole d'amour in Loeffler's "Mort de Tintagiles," and, with Mr. Schroeder, Brahms's concerto for violin and 'cello. And this list, no doubt, is incomplete. He had the honor of conducting this orchestra, after Mr. Nikisch's departure, on its Western trip, and at three concerts at the World's Fair. Mr. Kneisel is a member of the Harvard Musical Association, the St. Botolph Club, of Boston, and many famous foreign musical organizations.

The programmes at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York and Brooklyn this week will be as follows:

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY MATINEE.

Symphony No. 9, in C major..................Schubert
Concerto for violin..................Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25. MacDowell
Overture to "Tannhäuser"..................Wagner
Solo player, Willy Burmester.

NEW-YORK, THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 65......Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61........Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31..................Saint-Säens
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"............Liszt
Solo player, Willy Burmester.

BROOKLYN, FRIDAY MATINEE.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64........Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61.........Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31..................Saint-Säens
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23..........Berlioz
Solo player, Willy Burmester.

BROOKLYN, SATURDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61..........Schumann
Concerto for violin, in D major (in one movement). Paganini
Overture, "Fingal's Cave," op. 26 ....Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"............Liszt
Solo player, Willy Burmester.

Willy Burmester, the violinist, who will play solos at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York and Brooklyn this week, has won a fine reputation, chiefly for his technical skill, throughout Europe. He is a native of Hamburg, was born in 1869 and studied first with his father, and afterward with Joachim for three years in Helsingfors, Finland, before beginning his career as a virtuoso.

The New York Times

NEW YORK, SUNDAY, DEC. 11, 1898.

—The second matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday at 2 o'clock. The programme will consist of Schubert's C-Major Symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Willy Burmester, violinist; Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," (first time here,) and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, Franz Kneisel will conduct both this and the Thursday evening concert, of which this is the programme:

Symphony No. 5, E minor.........Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin..................Beethoven
Mr. Willy Burmester.
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" Saint-Saens.
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"........Liszt

MUSICAL MATTERS AT HOME.

Franz Kneisel, during Mr. Gericke's illness, has made a great success as a conductor in Boston. Mr. Kneisel, who is a Roumanian by birth, but of German parentage, studied the violin in Vienna, and made his first appearance with the famous Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra Dec. 21, 1882, and was soon afterward offered the position of solo violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Court Theatre. Afterward he was associated with the famous Bilse Orchestra of Berlin as concert meister, a position of the highest honor, and which had been held before him by such eminent artists as Ysaye, Halir, and Thomson. Mr. Gericke, in the second year of his directorship, engaged him as concert master with the Boston Symphony, and at the third concert, Oct. 31, 1885, Mr. Kneisel, then only twenty years old, made his first appearance at these concerts as a soloist. He played the concerto by Beethoven. Mr. Kneisel acted as conductor after Mr. Nikisch's departure on the orchestra's Western trip, and at three [illegible] World's Fair.

The Sun.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening. These two programmes will be given:

WEDNESDAY MATINÉE, DEC. 14.

Symphony No. 9, in C major................Schubert
Concerto for violin......................Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," Op. 25...............................Macdowell
Overture to "Tannhäuser"..................Wagner

THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 15.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64...Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, Op. 61....Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Op. 31 ....Saint-Saens
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"........Liszt

Willy Burmester will be the soloist at both concerts, which will be under the direction of Franz Kneisel owing to the illness of Wilhelm Gericke. These concerts will introduce Mr. Burmester in this city.

WORLD: SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its second visit to New York this week. Owing to the recent illness of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, he will be unable to conduct the two concerts fixed for Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 14, and Thursday evening, Dec. 15, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Franz Kneisel will act in his stead. This will be the first time that Mr. Kneisel officiates as conductor in this city. His efficiency as such has been tested on many occasions elsewhere and his admirers here will now be able to appreciate it from personal observation.

The programme for the first concert consists of Schubert's C major symphony, MacDowell's symphonic poem "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25; Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture and Mendelssohn's violin concerto. The second concert will present Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Saint-Saens's "Rouet d'Omphale," Liszt's "Les Préludes" and Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, op. 61.

The soloist on both occasions will be Mr. Willy Burmester, one of the youngest of great contemporary violinists. He is a pupil of Joachim. In Germany he is considered to be a master in technique and has been dubbed "the German Paganini."

MUSICAL AMERICA

JOHN C. FREUND

Devoted to Music, Drama and the Arts

New York, December 10, 1898.

BOSTON, MASS., Dec. 4, 1898.

Mr. Gericke is now convalescent, but in order that his recovery shall be the more permanent he has decided not to take up his work again until after the Symphony Orchestra returns from its trip next week, so you will have a chance in New York to judge of Mr. Kneisel's efforts with the baton. As I remarked in a previous letter, Mr. Kneisel, like Theodore Thomas, is a born conductor, and great good fortune has attended the orchestra in having so capable a director at hand during the illness of Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Kneisel gave us for a programme at the last concert Schubert's symphony in C major; the symphonic poem "Launcelot and Elaine," by MacDowell; the "Rouet d'Omphale," poem by Saint Saëns; and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." It is needless to comment further upon the reading and playing of this programme further than to say that it was unequivocally a model performance. Mr. Kneisel distinguished himself as well as did the orchestra under his firm and intelligent command of its resources.

It was a great occasion for Mr. Longy, the new oboe player, for the works played offered him the opportunity to display his masterly ability. There is not one item in the make-up of this artist that does not shine in a pre-eminent degree. Nobility of tone, purity of intonation, exquisite finish and mastery in technical resources are his accomplishments, while his artistic attributes reveal delicacy, tenderness and repose, together with breadth and dignity in the broader passages, and a wonderful sustaining power, all of which, with splendid phrasing, are marvels of surpassing excellence that distinguish his eminent ability. Oh, that the sea had not claimed the lamented Pourton whose clarionet exhaled the breath of heaven and sang the voice of love! And Molé, that consummate master of the flute who should never have been allowed to depart from the orchestra; what a marvelous player was he! How these exceptional artists, with the equally eminent Longy, would have distinguished even the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra! But alas! the hand of fate has cast the die and we must gracefully submit to its inevitable decision.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Mr. Willy Burmester, Violinist, Made His First Appearance in the United States Last Night—Mr. Kneisel Distinguished Himself as a Conductor.

The program of the eighth Symphony concert, Mr. Kneisel, conductor, in place of Mr. Gericke, who is canvalescent, was as follows:

Symphony in E minor No. 5....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin....................Beethoven
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"........Wagner

Mr. Willy Burmester, who made his first appearance in the United States last night, was born at Hamburg in 1869. He was taught first by his father; then for four years he studied with Joachim. For three years he worked by himself at Helsingfors in Finland. With his sister Johanna he made his first appearance in Berlin, Nov. 10, 1891. He reappeared there in 1894. His first appearance in London was March 14, 1895.

Mr. Burmester made a very favorable impression. His tone is not large, but it is fine, and in a way individual. His technic seems amply adequate for any demand that might be made upon it. His performance of the concerto was thoughtful, without the suggestion of pedagogic dryness. He was content to let the music speak without undue personal explanation. His sentiment was manly, and his vigor was controlled. He played with full appreciation of the authoritative strength of the first movement, and beauty of the second; nor did he grow impatient with the rondo and try to make something out of it. Although there were tones in the larghetto that moved the hearer, there was no sensuous appeal, and, therefore, no incongruous display of what is loosely known as emotion, which certain persons find contagious whenever a violinist saws on the G string or rolls eyes toward the heaven that lies presumably somewhere above the ceiling. No, Mr. Burmester is not first of all an emotional player. He is more than this; he is a man of fine taste who has been trained in a pure school, who respects sincerity and is sincere, and who, therefore, does not trample on the composer to step toward glory. His performance was one that gave much musical enjoyment; it was without taint of anything that was meretricious; it was free from any virtuoso trick. The applause was hearty, and there were several recalls.

⁂

Mr. Gericke is rapidly nearing health and it is confidently expected that he will be able to lead at the concerts of the 22d and 23d. Mr. Kneisel will conduct during the visit of the orchestra to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. And it is not now out of place to congratulate heartily Mr. Kneisel on the ability and intelligence displayed by him under trying circumstances. Each concert has in turn enlarged his reputation as a conductor. He has shown authority, discrimination, an instinct for treatment of detail, spirit and a mastery over the expression of his feelings. He has interested himself in the composition of each composer as though it were his own. He conducted for Mr. Burmester last night as he might wish another would conduct for him with his violin in hand. The performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony, as well as that of the Schubert symphony, at the preceding concert, proved conclusively that with experience and study he might justly be ranked among leading conductors. And he has performed this task unexpectedly put upon him without thought of personal advantage—indeed, to the sacrifice of his quartet interests—and with the simplicity and the modesty that are characteristic of the man. His one thought has been for the satisfaction of Mr. Gericke and the reputation of the orchestra, which has helped and supported him in every way.

⁂

There will be no concert this week Friday and Saturday. The program for Dec. 22-23 (Thursday afternoon and Friday evening) will be as follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 31..........Mozart
(First time.)
Concerto for piano.........................
Helen Hopekirk.
"Le Chasseur Maudit" ....César Franck
Academic Overture ....Brahms

Philip Hale.

Fashionable and musical Boston has been rejoicing since it has recently been known that Mr. Gericke is fast regaining health and strength. The early reports were far from encouraging, but after ten days he was really on the road to recovery, and since then his house has been bombarded with attentions, flowers, fruit and kind wishes. Well as the orchestra has done under Mr. Kneisel, we have all felt that he was only a subsitute, and not our pet conductor.

The smart concert of the week was that given by Miss Alison Haughton, assisted by Mr. [illegible]

[illegible]
Established 1813.
[illegible] Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
[illegible] MORNING, DEC. 12, 1898.

[illegible] in the Symphony Concert

—Mr. Burmester's Debut

The eastern question still remains unsettled. It came up at Saturday's concert again in the shape of Tschaikowsky's E minor symphony.

The Russians look upon Tschaikowsky as being too "Cosmopolitan," to represent the true Muscovite vein, but we believe that new Russia can be best represented without steeping the compositions in Vodki, without giving the flavor of Caviar in every movement. Surely the Slavonic sadness is in this work, and if it is expressed with some degree of classical form, so much the better.

If R. Strauss & Co., manufacturers of dissonances, dealers in musical metaphysics, unresolved seventh chords, and tonal dynamite, had only stopped where Tschaikowsky did, one might have more hope of the ultra-modern school. The first movement was given with astonishing breadth, and revealed possibilities of conductorship in Mr. Kneisel that went beyond all expectations.

The second movement intensified the gloom of the composition; it vibrated between melodic brooding and fierce dissonance; the climaxes may be sensational, but they are thrilling nevertheless. Perhaps there was a trifle too much of the graveyard flavor in the movement, coming so soon after the Threnody of the "Symphonie Pathetique" by the same composer.

Tschaikowsky evidently discarded the proverb that a brave man dies but once, and gives us a mortuary report in almost every slow movement; for a little while we would let the bones, and the trombones, of the master rest. The horn playing in this movement was especially excellent.

As if to make amends for his touches of the charnel-house, the composer next gives a waltz movement. The Russians take kindly to the innovation of Berlioz, which brought the waltz into symphony, for Glazounow also introduces this dance in classical work, giving it to string quartette. It is not easy to see why the waltz should not have some prerogative in symphony; Father Haydn brought the minuet into the full sonata forms, (symphony, string quartette, etc.), with undeviating regularity, and the waltz is the child of the minuet; if one cares to study the transition, it can readily be found in the minuets of Schubert, which are thinly disguised waltzes.

The fury of the final movement is not of the Occident; the Russian has been scratched, and the Tartar has revealed himself. This movement is made up of military ferocity and vehement pageantry; it ought to be directed with a knout instead of with an ordinary baton! It is too prolix, yet it has moments which excite with a dancing dervish kind of frenzy. And this man is called "cosmopolitan!" Not even the waltz was European, for St. Vitus himself could not have danced some portions of it.

But the chief triumph of the work belongs to Mr. Kneisel, who has never conducted as he did in this symphony; not only was there clearness in every part, but there was also the necessary caprice, the sudden changes of shading, the general abandon which is the soul of this composition; it was a memorable performance, and the conductor, pro tempore, was recalled twice to the stand amid great applause.

Now entered the soloist of the concert, M. Willy Burmester of Hamburg, Helsingfors and Berlin. He played the solo part of Beethoven's great violin concerto, a severe yard-stick by which to measure any artist. Perhaps it would be unfair to judge of him irrevocably by this first appearance; he had just come off the ocean, he had passed through a most tempestuous voyage, he had been seasick, yet he had not thrown up his Boston engagement.

He seems a calm, musicianly and non-sensational performer, with a tone of marvellous purity, yet somewhat lacking in breadth. In the first movement of this work, a movement that is more Titanic than anything in the whole concerto repertoire, this was a defect, and the shortcoming could not be wholly atoned for by the limpid purity and sweetness of the tone nor by the brilliancy of the cadenza. Everything was sure, placid and reserved. In some of his work Mr. Burmester reminds of our own Franz Kneisel.

What a wonderful rhythmic undertone there is in this first movement! The four great blows which thunder so constantly through its measures might be given by the hammer of Thor himself! They are certainly more like "Destiny Knocking at the Door" than the famous figure of the beginning of the Fifth symphony.

It is said that Beethoven took this figure from the knocks of a drunken man who was barred out of his house in Vienna. It is almost certain that Schubert borrowed the idea from Beethoven and used it in his C major symphony, which was payed at the preceding concert, for in the last movement of that symphony the four [illegible] reverberate very much as they do in this violin concerto.

In the Larghetto Mr. Burmester shone to excellent advantage; his exquisite tone, sympathetic and tender, gave all the poetry of this delightful part of the work. We could have liked a more Wieniawski boldness and fullness in the harmonics, but in everything else the artist was perfect.

In the ideal Rondo Mr. Burmester deserves cordial praise also; too many artists, recognizing the falling-off in the [illegible] work, try to magnify this weak movement into something [illegible] forcing the pace or by [illegible] vehemence of playing; not [illegible] artist; he gave it un[illegible] and if it was weaker [illegible] the work the fault was [illegible] not Mr. Burmester's. The [illegible] of the finale militates [illegible] who must often [illegible] concerto ended with its [illegible] Mr. Burmester was [illegible] and was evi[illegible] by the great audi[illegible] through this work as a soloist [illegible] to know just what to do [illegible] for a brother-artist. The [illegible] spite of the late arrival of Mr. Burmester from abroad and certain resultant difficulties of thorough rehearsal, a performance in which there was excellent balance and in which the soloist was much favored.

A true concerto should lean to the symphonic side, it should give an orchestral impression first of all, yet with a thread of solo woven into the warp and woof. Such it was on this occasion, yet every point of solo-playing was delicately brought into the foreground by a repression of orchestral force.

Less successful was the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" with which the concert ended. Here there was plenty of spirit but rather poor shading; everything seemed to run to extremes and even clearness was sometimes sacrificed. It was a mechanical performance of Wagner such as could not afford delight to those who know the great beauties of the work.

Louis C. Elson.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1898.

The program for the seventh concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was:

Symphony No. 9, in C major..................Schubert
Symphonic Poem, Lancelot and Elaine........MacDowell
Omphale's Spinning Wheel..................Saint-Saëns
Overture, Benvenuto Cellini....................Berlioz

Although Mr. Gericke, fortunately, is rapidly recovering from his recent severe illness, he was not in a condition that warranted his resumption of his duties as conductor at this concert, and therefore Franz Kneisel again assumed direction of the orchestra. It was a red-letter concert, the players being at their very best, and Mr. Kneisel leading with admirable skill and authority and with a fine and sympathetic appreciation of the characteristic color of the respective works. Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem had its second performance here on this occasion, the first having been given some eight years ago under Mr. Nikisch. It is more interesting for the charming effects of its instrumentation, the richness, variety and balance of its tone hues, than for the value of its musical ideas, which are vague and unsatisfying. Whether by chance or design, the concert gave special prominence to the oboe, not only in the second movement of the symphony but in the "Omphale" and the Berlioz overture, and the purity, fullness and smoothness of Mr. Lougy's tone, the elegance of his phrasing and perfection of his technic, again made themselves delightfully felt. At the next concert Willy Burmester is to make his first appearance in this country, playing the Beethoven violin concerto.

* * *

It is understood that the new Boston Music Hall is to be based somewhat upon the plan of the Music Hall in Leipsic. The erection of the structure will have to be hastened, for it is sixteen months only before the imperative closing of the old Music Hall. The report is current that many of the subscribers of five years ago, since which time nothing has been done in the matter, have not responded promptly to the demand for the unpaid amount of their subscriptions. Mr. Higginson, however, does not seem to have any misgivings about the final result.

Franz Kneizel is to lead the second matinee and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy on Friday and Saturday, December 16 and 17. So the illness of Mr. Gericke does not cause us the uneasiness it otherwise would, while at the same time we regret that he must suffer, and hope for his speedy recovery. Franz Kneizel is held in most affectionate regard here, and has made his name "one to conjure with" musically. His first appearance in Brooklyn was at the third concert in the second year of Mr. Gericke's direction, October 31, 1885, when he was but twenty years old, and his selection was the concerto by Beethoven. Even then he was a finished violinist.

His programs for the December concerts are well selected (and what it means to arrange a program is comprehended by but few). The magnificent Tschaikowsky symphony in E minor, Saint-Saëns' beautiful symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," with its rich and sensuous tone color, comprise the orchestral numbers for the matinee. For the evening Schumann's second symphony in C major, Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave" and Liszt's third symphonic poem "Les Preludes" will give ample opportunity to all instruments of the fine orchestra.

Willy Burmester will play at both concerts; in the afternoon Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, op. 61, and in the evening the Paganini D major concerto. Of course the latter, as he has a superstition that the playing of Paganini's music at his first appearance in a city brings him good luck. We are looking forward to hearing this artist, this youngest of the great violinists, this pupil of Joachim, whose technic is said to surpass everything since Paganini.

BROOKLYN LIFE

OL. XVII. NEW YORK, DECEMBER 17, 1898. No. 459.

As previously announced, Willy Burmester, the famous violin virtuoso, is to make his first appearance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy this week. This (Friday) afternoon he will play Beethoven's Concerto for Violin in D major and at the Saturday evening concert Paganini's Concerto for Violin in D major. Although Mr. Gericke is too ill to conduct, Franz Kneisel taking his place, the concerts bid fair to be quite as successful in point of attendance as if he were at his accustomed post.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

De 10

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eighth symphony concert was:

Symphony No. 5, E minor, op. 64............................. Tscharkousky
Concerto for violin, D major, op. 61.................................... Beethoven
Prelude to the Meistersinger".....Wagner
Soloist Mr. Willy Burmester.

Mr. Burmester appeared at the Friday rehearsal after a long ocean voyage, after travelling all night from New York to Boston, reheasing in the morning and appearing in public in the afternoon. Under the circumstances a fair judgment cannot be formed of his skill; a few first impressions only are here set down. Mr. Burmester is an artist who seems to be distinguished rather by delicacy and fine finish rather than by largeness of style or by vigor; the tone he produces is of exceeding sweetness; he bows with easy grace and on the side of technique he has nothing to learn. The difficulties of the concerto were conquered without an effort and with a most effective brilliancy, his intonation was not always pure—due to fatigue, perhaps—but there is little fault to be found with his taste, none with his skill. Scale passages flow from his bow with the limpid continuity of water, the one seeming fault of his charming art being the absence of power, of largeness, of virility. At present it is enough to say that he is a delightful artist, it is probable that he is fully able to do full justice to the largeness, dignity and nobility of the Beethoven concerto, but these symptoms were largely absent at the Friday concert a small prettiness and charming grace taking their place.

Mr. Kneisel gave a delightful reading of the Tscharkousky symphony, brilliant, finished and thoroughly adequate; and it is doubtful of Boston has listened to a more satisfactory reading of the Beethoven concerto on the side of the conductor and the orchestra.

There will be no concert next week.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Concert

The programme of the eighth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64.
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 61.
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Mr. Willy Burmester was the solo violinist.

Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony is, by a good deal, not the work that its immediate successor, the "Pathétique," is; it is, technically speaking, a fine piece of workmanship, it has its moments of almost greatness; but, as a whole, it fails to impress one as particularly strong. The slow movement reminds one terribly of Raff; and to remind one of Raff nowadays is not precisely a recommendation. The theme which threads its way through all the four movements is hardly strong enough to bear so much repetition; when, as in the last movement, it appears in the major mode, it sounds positively feeble. The performance, under Mr. Kneisel—who still takes Mr. Gericke's place,—was exceedingly fine both as a technical piece of execution and an artistic rendering of the music.

Finer still, perhaps, was the playing of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude; the great work never sounded more brilliant, more stoutly knit together, more instinct with genius.

Mr. Willy Burmester made his first bow in this country with the Beethoven concerto; on Thursday afternoon he was still on board the Saale; he arrived in Boston only in time to have an extra rehearsal called for Friday morning, and appeared before the audience in the afternoon. It did not seem to us, on Saturday evening, that his playing of the concerto quite warranted his high reputation as a violinist. No doubt, the work is a tremendous task for anyone; but that task has more than once been better accomplished here before than by him. His tone is warm and pleasing, if not very large; his technique sufficiently brilliant, though not always sure in the matter of intonation. What we liked best in him was a certain unassuming simplicity, an evident disposition to treat the music with respect; he played absolutely without trickery, without cheap display. But we could find little musical authoritativeness, little distinction of style in him; and, without these, the Beethoven concerto finds itself shorn of a good deal of its prestige. He made one happy "hit," though; his playing of the first phrases of the theme of the Rondo was capital, full of peasant downrightness of accent, and not in the least overdone. The audience seemed to enjoy his playing hugely; he was rapturously applauded and recalled several times.

The next programme—for Thursday afternoon, Dec. 22, and Friday evening, Dec. 23, there being neither concert nor rehearsal this week—is: Mozart: symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 31; first time)—— concerto for pianoforte; César Franck, "Les Chasseur maudit" (first time); Brahms, Academic overture. Mme. Helen Hopekirk will be the pianist.

[illegible]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1[illegible]

Mr. Gericke May Conduct the Concert Before Christmas

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke of the Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to improve but the hard case of Americanized grippe from which he has been suffering has left him weak and in such a condition that his friends prefer to omit his presence at a concert rather than permit him to take too much risk. No unfavorable symptoms have developed since Mr. Gericke's condition was last reported to the public, and it was hoped that he would be able to conduct the concert of Dec. 24. This he may be able to do, but he will not unless by that time he is pronounced well.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Sympathy Orchestra gave its second concert of the season at the Music Hall last night. One of the leading features of the occasion was the appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel in the new role of conductor in the place of Mr. Gericke, who is temporarily indisposed. Mr. Kneisel, who has always been known either as leader of the orchestra or chief of the celebrated Quartette organization that bears his name, proved himself fully capable of wielding the baton, and his directing evidenced careful study of and a thorough acquaintance with the complete score of the works presented. Nevertheless, he infused no particular individuality into his direction. This was, perhaps, more noticeable in Schubert's C major symphony, with which the concert was opened. This is the most important work of the kind since the time of Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven. Although of such length that if played with all the repeats it would take over an hour to perform, it is most interesting from first to last, and never once does the attention flag.

The rendition was excellent. Mr. Willy Burmester, the soloist of the evening, played the Mendelsshon Concerto instead of the somewhat tiresome Paganini Concerto. Mr. Burmester is an artist of no small capabilities, as his accurate technique shows; but his tone, although pure and sweet, lacks that breadth and force so necessary to the effective rendering of one of the greatest violin works ever written.

E. A. McDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," so-called after Tennyson's poem of the same name, was given its first hearing in Baltimore. It can scarcely be classed under the strict symphonic style of writing, being too free in form; it is, however, a very clever piece of writing, and exhibits great powers of conception and originality, if such a thing be possible nowadays, and a thorough knowledge of orchestral effects.

The overture to "Tannhauser" formed an effective conclusion to one of the most enjoyable concerts of the year.

THE SUN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Franz Kneisel Was The Conductor, In The Absence Of Director Gericke—Burmester's Pleasing Performance.

Franz Kneisel, the much-liked concert master and second in command of the forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, occupied the conductor's rostrum last night at the second concert of the series. Director Gericke has been ill and was unable to undertake the hardships of the monthly tournee of the orchestra.

Schubert's Symphony in C Major, MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," and the overture to Tannhauser constituted the orchestral part of the concert which Mr. Kneisel was called upon to interpret. His sincerity and his appreciative readings of the several numbers showed that his substitution must be regarded in no sense as a makeshift.

He had his men always well in hand, and the evidence of his ability as a conductor was a concert of unusual suggestiveness and beauty.

The Schubert Symphony had been heard before this season, well performed by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, but the repetition brought out beauties which are always worth the seeking in this symphony. The playing of the solo instruments in the wood wind choir, especially in the second movement of the symphony, was one of the events of the evening. The 'cellos, headed by the versatile Alwin Schroeder, showed exquisite unanimity of tone in many places.

Burmester was the soloist—a young man unheralded, but already enjoying a unique reputation in Europe. About three years ago he suddenly flashed into prominence in the Berlin concert field, and the astonishment at his remarkable performance called forth such enthusiastic comments as Paganini Redivivus.

Last night he played the well-known Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E Minor. The impression produced was favorable in the extreme. His methods are very unusual in the matter of many of the technical details of violin playing, but the results more than justify the procedure. His tone, while not extraordinary in volume, has the rarest carrying power, and is almost perfect in its purity. The immense amount of reserve force, always evident, makes the seemingly unsurmountable technical details the merest child's play for him. The soloist, as well as the conductor, were both enthusiastically recalled.

The American representative on the programme, Edward A. MacDowell, has gone to school so persistently to Germany as to lose not only his nationality, but also, in the excerpt last night, his originality. It was "Tristan and Isolde," with an admixture of other "Wagnerisms."

The audience was a large one, although somewhat reduced late in the evening by the adjournment of many of the fashionables to the Tuesday german.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 12, 1898.

Russia in the Symphony Concert —Mr. Burmester's Debut.

The eastern question still remains unsettled. It came up at Saturday's concert again in the shape of Tschaikowsky's E minor symphony.

The Russians look upon Tschaikowsky as being too "Cosmopolitan," to represent the true Muscovite vein, but we believe that new Russia can be best represented without steeping the compositions in Vodki, without giving the flavor of Caviar in every movement. Surely the Slavonic sadness is in this work, and if it is expressed with some degree of classical form, so much the better.

If R. Strauss & Co., manufacturers of dissonances, dealers in musical metaphysics, unresolved seventh chords, and tonal dynamite, had only stopped where Tschaikowsky did, one might have more hope of the ultra-modern school. The first movement was given with astonishing breadth, and revealed possibilities of conductorship in Mr. Kneisel that went beyond all expectations.

The second movement intensified the gloom of the composition; it vibrated between melodic brooding and fierce dissonance; the climaxes may be sensational, but they are thrilling nevertheless. Perhaps there was a trifle too much of the graveyard flavor in the movement, coming so soon after the Threnody of the "Symphonie Pathetique" by the same composer.

Tschaikowsky evidently discarded the proverb that a brave man dies but once, and gives us a mortuary report in almost every slow movement; for a little while we would let the bones, and the trombones, of the master rest. The horn playing in this movement was especially excellent.

As if to make amends for his touches of the charnel-house, the composer next gives a waltz movement. The Russians take kindly to the innovation of Berlioz, which brought the waltz into symphony, for Glazounow also introduces this dance in classical work, giving it to string quartette. It is not easy to see why the waltz should not have some prerogative in symphony; Father Haydn brought the minuet into the full sonata forms, (symphony, string quartette, etc.), with undeviating regularity, and the waltz is the child of the minuet; if one cares to study the transition, it can readily be found in the minuets of Schubert, which are thinly disguised waltzes.

The fury of the final movement is not of the Occident; the Russian has been scratched, and the Tartar has revealed himself. This movement is made up of military ferocity and vehement pageantry; it ought to be directed with a knout instead of with an ordinary baton! It is too prolix, yet it has moments which excite with a dancing dervish kind of frenzy. And this man is called "cosmopolitan!" Not even the waltz was European, for St. Vitus himself could not have danced some portions of it.

But the chief triumph of the work belongs to Mr. Kneisel, who has never conducted as he did in this symphony; not only was there clearness in every part, but there was also the necessary caprice, the sudden changes of shading, the general abandon which is the soul of this composition; it was a memorable performance, and the conductor, pro tempore, was recalled twice to the stand amid great applause.

Now entered the soloist of the concert, M. Willy Burmester of Hamburg, Helsingfors and Berlin. He played the solo part of Beethoven's great violin concerto, a severe yard-stick by which to measure any artist. Perhaps it would be unfair to judge of him irrevocably by this first appearance; he had just come off the ocean, he had passed through a most tempestuous voyage, he had been seasick, yet he had not thrown up his Boston engagement.

He seems a calm, musicianly and non-sensational performer, with a tone of marvellous purity, yet somewhat lacking in breadth. In the first movement of this work, a movement that is more Titanic than anything in the whole concerto repertoire, this was a defect, and the shortcoming could not be wholly atoned for by the limpid purity and sweetness of the tone nor by the brilliancy of the cadenza. Everything was sure, placid and reserved. In some of his work Mr. Burmester reminds of our own Franz Kneisel.

What a wonderful rhythmic undertone there is in this first movement! The four great blows which thunder so constantly through its measures might be given by the hammer of Thor himself! They are certainly more like "Destiny Knocking at the Door" than the famous figure of the beginning of the Fifth symphony.

It is said that Beethoven took this figure from the knocks of a drunken man who was barred out of his house in Vienna. It is almost certain that Schubert borrowed the idea from Beethoven and used it in his C major symphony, which was payed at the preceding concert, for in the last movement of that symphony the four blows reverberate very much as they do in this violin concerto.

In the Larghetto Mr. Burmester shone to excellent advantage; his exquisite tone, sympathetic and tender, gave all the poetry of this delightful part of the work. One would have liked a more Wieniawskian boldness and fullness in the harmonics, but in everything else the artist was perfect.

In the final Rondo Mr. Burmester deserves cordial praise also; too many artists, recognizing the falling-off in the power of the work, try to magnify this comparatively weak movement into something startling by forcing the pace or by a sudden magniloquence of playing; not so did this excellent artist; he gave it unaffectedly and purely, and if it was weaker than the rest of the work the fault was Beethoven's and not Mr. Burmester's. The sudden tameness of the finale militates against the artist, who must often wish that the concerto ended with its first movement, yet Mr. Burmester was recalled with much heartiness and was evidently much appreciated by the great audi-

[illegible] work was excellent. Here Mr. Kneisel was upon his native heath; often has he been through this work as a soloist and this led him to know just what to do when directing for a brother-artist. The result was, spite of the late arrival of Mr. Burmester from abroad and certain resultant difficulties of thorough rehearsal, a performance in which there was excellent balance and in which the soloist was much favored.

A true concerto should lean to the symphonic side, it should give an orchestral impression first of all, yet with a thread of solo woven into the warp and woof. Such it was on this occasion, yet every point of solo-playing was delicately brought into the foreground by a repression of orchestral force.

Less successful was the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" with which the concert ended. Here there was plenty of spirit but rather poor shading; everything seemed to run to extremes and even clearness was sometimes sacrificed. It was a mechanical performance of Wagner such as could not afford delight to those who know the great beauties of the work.

Louis C. Elson.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1898.

The program for the seventh concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was:

Symphony No. 9, in C major	Schubert
Symphonic Poem, Lancelot and Elaine	MacDowell
Omphale's Spinning Wheel	Saint-Saëns
Overture, Benvenuto Cellini	Berlioz

Although Mr. Gericke, fortunately, is rapidly recovering from his recent severe illness, he was not in a condition that warranted his resumption of his duties as conductor at this concert, and therefore Franz Kneisel again assumed direction of the orchestra. It was a red-letter concert, the players being at their very best, and Mr. Kneisel leading with admirable skill and authority and with a fine and sympathetic appreciation of the characteristic color of the respective works. Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem had its second performance here on this occasion, the first having been given some eight years ago under Mr. Nikisch. It is more interesting for the charming effects of its instrumentation, the richness, variety and balance of its tone hues, than for the value of its musical ideas, which are vague and unsatisfying. Whether by chance or design, the concert gave special prominence to the oboe, not only in the second movement of the symphony but in the "Omphale" and the Berlioz overture, and the purity, fullness and smoothness of Mr. Lougy's tone, the elegance of his phrasing and perfection of his technic, again made themselves delightfully felt. At the next concert Willy Burmester is to make his first appearance in this country, playing the Beethoven violin concerto.

* * *

It is understood that the new Boston Music Hall is to be based somewhat upon the plan of the Music Hall in Leipsic. The erection of the structure will have to be hastened, for it is sixteen months only before the imperative closing of the old Music Hall. The report is current that many of the subscribers of five years ago, since which time nothing has been done in the matter, have not responded promptly to the demand for the unpaid amount of their subscriptions. Mr. Higginson, however, does not seem to have any misgivings about the final result.

Franz Kneizel is to lead the second matinee and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy on Friday and Saturday, December 16 and 17. So the illness of Mr. Gericke does not cause us the uneasiness it otherwise would, while at the same time we regret that he must suffer, and hope for his speedy recovery. Franz Kneizel is held in most affectionate regard here, and has made his name "one to conjure with" musically. His first appearance in Brooklyn was at the third concert in the second year of Mr. Gericke's direction, October 31, 1885, when he was but twenty years old, and his selection was the concerto by Beethoven. Even then he was a finished violinist.

His programs for the December concerts are well selected (and what it means to arrange a program is comprehended by but few). The magnificent Tschaikowsky symphony in E minor, Saint-Saëns' beautiful symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," with its rich and sensuous tone color, comprise the orchestral numbers for the matinee. For the evening Schumann's second symphony in C major, Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave" and Liszt's third symphonic poem "Les Preludes" will give ample opportunity to all instruments of the fine orchestra.

Willy Burmester will play at both concerts; in the afternoon Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, op. 61, and in the evening the Paganini D major concerto. Of course the latter, as he has a superstition that the playing of Paganini's music at his first appearance in a city brings him good luck. We are looking forward to hearing this artist, this youngest of the great violinists, this pupil of Joachim, whose technic is said to surpass everything since Paganini.

BROOKLYN LIFE

OL. XVII. NEW YORK, DECEMBER 17, 1898. No. 459.

As previously announced, Willy Burmester, the famous violin virtuoso, is to make his first appearance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy this week. This (Friday) afternoon he will play Beethoven's Concerto for Violin in D major and at the Saturday evening concert Paganini's Concerto for Violin in D major. Although Mr. Gericke is too ill to conduct, Franz Kneisel taking his place, the concerts bid fair to be quite as successful in point of attendance as if he were at his accustomed post.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

Dec 10

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eighth symphony concert was:

Symphony No. 5, E minor, op. 64....... .... Tscharkousky

Concerto for violin, D major, op. 61..... .... Beethoven

Prelude to the Meistersinger"..... Wagner

Soloist Mr. Willy Burmester.

Mr. Burmester appeared at the Friday rehearsal after a long ocean voyage, after travelling all night from New York to Boston, reheasing in the morning and appearing in public in the afternoon. Under the circumstances a fair judgment cannot be formed of his skill; a few first impressions only are here set down. Mr. Burmester is an artist who seems to be distinguished rather by delicacy and fine finish rather than by largeness of style or by vigor; the tone he produces is of exceeding sweetness; he bows with easy grace and on the side of technique he has nothing to learn. The difficulties of the concerto were conquered without an effort and with a most effective brilliancy, his intonation was not always pure—due to fatigue, perhaps—but there is little fault to be found with his taste, none with his skill. Scale passages flow from his bow with the limpid continuity of water, the one seeming fault of his charming art being the absence of power, of largeness, of virility. At present it is enough to say that he is a delightful artist, it is probable that he is fully able to do full justice to the largeness, dignity and nobility of the Beethoven concerto, but these symptoms were largely absent at the Friday concert a small prettiness and charming grace taking their place.

Mr. Kneisel gave a delightful reading of the Tscharkousky symphony, brilliant, finished and thoroughly adequate; and it is doubtful of Boston has listened to a more satisfactory reading of the Beethoven concerto on the side of the conductor and the orchestra.

There will be no concert next week.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Concert

The programme of the eighth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64.

Beethoven: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 61.

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Mr. Willy Burmester was the solo violinist.

Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony is, by a good deal, not the work that its immediate successor, the "Pathétique," is; it is, technically speaking, a fine piece of workmanship, it has its moments of almost greatness; but, as a whole, it fails to impress one as particularly strong. The slow movement reminds one terribly of Raff; and to remind one of Raff nowadays is not precisely a recommendation. The theme which threads its way through all the four movements is hardly strong enough to bear so much repetition; when, as in the last movement, it appears in the major mode, it sounds positively feeble. The performance, under Mr. Kneisel—who still takes Mr. Gericke's place,—was exceedingly fine both as a technical piece of execution and an artistic rendering of the music.

Finer still, perhaps, was the playing of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude; the great work never sounded more brilliant, more stoutly knit together, more instinct with genius.

Mr. Willy Burmester made his first bow in this country with the Beethoven concerto; on Thursday afternoon he was still on board the Saale; he arrived in Boston only in time to have an extra rehearsal called for Friday morning, and appeared before the audience in the afternoon. It did not seem to us, on Saturday evening, that his playing of the concerto quite warranted his high reputation as a violinist. No doubt, the work is a tremendous task for anyone; but that task has more than once been better accomplished here before than by him. His tone is warm and pleasing, if not very large; his technique sufficiently brilliant, though not always sure in the matter of intonation. What we liked best in him was a certain unassuming simplicity, an evident disposition to treat the music with respect; he played absolutely without trickery, without cheap display. But we could find little musical authoritativeness, little distinction of style in him; and, without these, the Beethoven concerto finds itself shorn of a good deal of its prestige. He made one happy "hit," though; his playing of the first phrases of the theme of the Rondo was capital, full of peasant downrightness of accent, and not in the least overdone. The audience seemed to enjoy his playing hugely; he was rapturously applauded and recalled several times.

The next programme—for Thursday afternoon, Dec. 22, and Friday evening, Dec. 23, there being neither concert nor rehearsal this week—is: Mozart: symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 31; first time)— concerto for pianoforte; César Franck, "Les Chasseur maudit" (first time); Brahms, Academic overture. Mme. Helen Hopekirk will be the pianist.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1898

Mr. Gericke May Conduct the Concert Before Christmas

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke of the Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to improve but the hard case of Americanized grippe from which he has been suffering has left him weak and in such a condition that his friends prefer to omit his presence at a concert rather than permit him to take too much risk. No unfavorable symptoms have developed since Mr. Gericke's condition was last reported to the public, and it was hoped that he would be able to conduct the concert of Dec. 24. This he may be able to do, but he will not unless by that time he is pronounced well.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Sympathy Orchestra gave its second concert of the season at the Music Hall last night. One of the leading features of the occasion was the appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel in the new role of conductor in the place of Mr. Gericke, who is temporarily indisposed. Mr. Kneisel, who has always been known either as leader of the orchestra or chief of the celebrated Quartette organization that bears his name, proved himself fully capable of wielding the baton, and his directing evidenced careful study of and a thorough acquaintance with the complete score of the works presented. Nevertheless, he infused no particular individuality into his direction. This was, perhaps, more noticeable in Schubert's C major symphony, with which the concert was opened. This is the most important work of the kind since the time of Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven. Although of such length that if played with all the repeats it would take over an hour to perform, it is most interesting from first to last, and never once does the attention flag.

The rendition was excellent. Mr. Willy Burmester, the soloist of the evening, played the Mendelsshon Concerto instead of the somewhat tiresome Paganini Concerto. Mr. Burmester is an artist of no small capabilities, as his accurate technique shows; but his tone, although pure and sweet, lacks that breadth and force so necessary to the effective rendering of one of the greatest violin works ever written.

E. A. McDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," so-called after Tennyson's poem of the same name, was given its first hearing in Baltimore. It can scarcely be classed under the strict symphonic style of writing, being too free in form; it is, however, a very clever piece of writing, and exhibits great powers of conception and originality, if such a thing be possible nowadays, and a thorough knowledge of orchestral effects.

The overture to "Tannhauser" formed an effective conclusion to one of the most enjoyable concerts of the year.

THE SUN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Franz Kneisel Was The Conductor, In The Absence Of Director Gericke—Burmester's Pleasing Performance.

Franz Kneisel, the much-liked concert master and second in command of the forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, occupied the conductor's rostrum last night at the second concert of the series. Director Gericke has been ill and was unable to undertake the hardships of the monthly tournee of the orchestra.

Schubert's Symphony in C Major, MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," and the overture to Tannhauser constituted the orchestral part of the concert which Mr. Kneisel was called upon to interpret. His sincerity and his appreciative readings of the several numbers showed that his substitution must be regarded in no sense as a makeshift.

He had his men always well in hand, and the evidence of his ability as a conductor was a concert of unusual suggestiveness and beauty.

The Schubert Symphony had been heard before this season, well performed by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, but the repetition brought out beauties which are always worth the seeking in this symphony. The playing of the solo instruments in the wood wind choir, especially in the second movement of the symphony, was one of the events of the evening. The 'cellos, headed by the versatile Alwin Schroeder, showed exquisite unanimity of tone in many places.

Burmester was the soloist—a young man unheralded, but already enjoying a unique reputation in Europe. About three years ago he suddenly flashed into prominence in the Berlin concert field, and the astonishment at his remarkable performance called forth such enthusiastic comments as Paganini Redivivus.

Last night he played the well-known Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E Minor. The impression produced was favorable in the extreme. His methods are very unusual in the matter of many of the technical details of violin playing, but the results more than justify the procedure. His tone, while not extraordinary in volume, has the rarest carrying power, and is almost perfect in its purity. The immense amount of reserve force, always evident, makes the seemingly unsurmountable technical details the merest child's play for him. The soloist, as well as the conductor, were both enthusiastically recalled.

The American representative on the programme, Edward A. MacDowell, has gone to school so persistently to Germany as to lose not only his nationality, but also, in the excerpt last night, his originality. It was "Tristan and Isolde," with an admixture of other "Wagnerisms."

The audience was a large one, although somewhat reduced late in the evening by the adjournment of many of the fashionables to the Tuesday german.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1898.

BOSTON, Mass., December 11, 1898.

LAST evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the eighth in this season's series, was given with this program:

Symphony in E minor, No. 5............Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin..........................Beethoven
Prelude to Die Meistersinger....................Wagner

The soloist was Willy Burmester, who on this occasion made his first concert appearance in America.

Franz Kneisel conducted again, for although Mr. Gericke is rapidly recovering, it was not considered prudent that he should resume his duties as yet. This week the orchestra is to visit New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and Mr. Kneisel will continue to conduct until it returns. At the rehearsal and concert of the 22d and 23d it is beyond all reasonable doubt that Mr. Gericke will make his reappearance.

And just here it is due Mr. Kneisel to recognize warmly and sincerely the skill and the fine intelligence with which he has acquitted himself in the emergency he was suddenly called on to meet. It is no slight responsibility to take charge of the Symphony Orchestra at a moment's notice, and it is not often that a concertmaster can assume such a responsibility and go through the ordeal in as brilliantly successfully a manner as Mr. Kneisel has done. He has displayed every ability that goes toward the making of a conductor of the first rank, and with each succeeding effort of the past three weeks he has grown surprisingly, his reading of the Tschaikowsky Symphony last evening being perhaps the most admirable, most sympathetic and most satisfying that the work has ever had here. Dignity, authority, modesty, complete control over himself and the orchestra, artistic devotion and the power of winning and justifying confidence in him on the part of both players and public are prominent among the many admirable qualities of which he has shown himself at the conductor's stand to be the possessor.

Mr. Burmester has a small tone, but it is exquisitely pure and appealing. His technic is ample and beautiful in finish, and his style is chaste and almost fragile in its tender delicacy. His bowing is broad and free, and his work generally gracefully refined in points of taste. Perhaps on the whole his playing of the concerto had in it more of elegance than of depth, fire and largeness, and though it was very artistic in its way and free from any of the affectations that mark the mere virtuoso, was over sugary and seemed to suggest constantly that he would have found a more felicitious work for the display of his individuality of style in the more effeminate Mendelssohn concerto. Still it was all very charming in its way—frank, free from dryness, clean-cut in execution, smooth and without any attempt at mock heroics and trickery to win the applause of those who hear wth their eyes. What was most lacking were volume of tone and vigorous manliness of expresion. He won the hearty favor of his hearers, whose plaudits and recalls were fairly bestowed.

MAKE way for the violin virtuoso! In the lull between two pianists comes Willy Burmester, a famed adept upon the four strings that enthrall. This young man, of whom critical Germany thinks very well, plays for the first time this afternoon with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Carnegie Hall. He has, however, substituted the Mendelssohn for the Paganini concerto. To-morrow he plays the Beethoven concerto, a trying test of his musicianship, if not of his virtuosity.

Boston Symphony.

ITINERARY.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, December 14, at 7 A. M.
Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, December 14, at 2.
Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, December 15, at 8 P. M.
Matinee at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 16, at 3:30.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 17, at 8 P. M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, December 17, midnight.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 18, at 7 A. M., Providence Depot.

NEW YORK PROGRAMS.

Franz Kneisel—Conductor.

Wednesday Matinee, December 14.

Symphony No. 9, in C major....................Schubert
Concerto for violin..........................Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem, Launcelot and Elaine, op. 25, MacDowell
Overture to Tannhäuser..........................Wagner

Soloist, Willy Burmester.

Thursday Evening, December 15.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64......Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin in D major, op. 61........Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, No. 1, Omphale's Spinning Wheel, op. 31........................Saint-Saëns
Symphonic Poem No. 3, The Preludes..............Liszt

Soloist, Willy Burmester.

[illegible]

Erſtes Conzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters. — Wilhelm Gericke als Dirigent. — Zahlreicher Beſuch.

Seit der Einweihung der Muſik-Halle durch das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter hatte ſich in der Halle kein ſolch zahlreiches Publikum eingefunden, als geſtern Abend bei dem erſten Conzerte, das in dieſer Saiſon von den Boſtonern daſelbſt gegeben wurde. Verſchiedene Faktoren mögen dazu beigetragen haben: die Neugier, den neuen Dirigenten Wilhelm Gericke zu ſehen, der Wunſch, die beliebte Soliſtin Mme. Johanne Gadski zu hören oder der Umſtand, daß Waſhingtoner Muſikfreunde, welche an den Conzerten der Boſtoner ſich erfreuen wollen, nach Baltimore kommen müſſen, da bekanntlich das Orcheſter, um in Baltimore den Conzert-Cyklus zu geben, Waſhington aufgeben mußte. Immerhin darf aber doch wohl zur Ehre Baltimore's geſagt werden, daß die hieſigen Muſikfreunde durch den Beſuch des geſtrigen Conzertes den Beweis erbracht haben, daß ſie mit gutem Rechte darauf gedrungen haben, auch in dieſem Winter das Boſtoner Orcheſter hier in Baltimore begrüßen zu können. Der gute Beſuch iſt die beſte Anerkennung der Kunſt des Orcheſters und ein Beweis, daß man ſie zu würdigen verſteht, daß man fühlt, welch ſeltener und edler Genuß ein ſolches Orcheſter, welches das Schönſte, was die großen Meiſter ſchuſen, in vollendetſter Art zu exekutiren verſteht, zu bieten vermag.

Bei früheren Gelegenheiten iſt wiederholt darauf hingewieſen worden, daß der Grund des großen Erfolges des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters an erſter Stelle darin liegt, daß keine Zeit geſpart wird für die ſorgfältigſte Vorbereitung, für die Proben, was freilich darin wieder ſeine Urſache hat, daß ein Muſikfreund, wie der keine Geldopfer ſcheuende Boſtoner H. L. Higginſon, das Orcheſter gründete. Dazu kam, daß man ſeit Begründung des Orcheſters darauf bedacht war, ſo wenig wie nur irgend möglich Veränderungen unter den Orcheſter-Mitgliedern vorzunehmen. Dieſes Jahr erlitt das Orcheſter aber durch den Untergang des franzöſiſchen Dampfers „La Bourgogne" große Verluſte. Man hat aber die vakanten Stellen, welche hauptſächlich unter den Bläſern zu verzeichnen waren, mit bedeutenden Muſikern beſetzt, und das geſtrige Conzert bewies, daß beinahe die ſo oft geprieſene Einheit wieder geſchaffen iſt.

Die Leitung des Orcheſters liegt wieder in Händen des Hrn. Wilhelm Gericke, welcher bei der Gründung daſſelbe bereits dirigirte und auch hier in Baltimore wohlbekannt iſt. Für Das, was der Dirigent aus ſeinem eigenen Innern dem Orcheſter geben muß, dafür iſt er, wie er bereits früher und auch geſtern bewies, künſtleriſch wohl befähigt, und ſpielte das Orcheſter mit einer Verve und Vollendung, welche die höchſte Befriedigung gewährte.

Das Programm bot an Orcheſter-Nummern zunächſt Goldmark's Ouverture „im Frühling", ein in brillantem und modernen Style geſchriebenes Tonſtück; ferner Brahms' Variationen über ein Haydn'ſches Choral-Thema, eine Compoſition, welche an die Leiſtungsfähigkeit des Orcheſters die höchſten Anforderungen ſtellt, von den Boſtonern aber eine faſt tadelloſe Darlegung fand. Daſſelbe kann von der Schumann'ſchen Symphonie Nr. 2 in C-Dur geſagt werden, welche eine geradezu brillante Interpretation vor Allem in dem Scherzo und dem Finale fand und auch Hrn. Gericke zu höchſter Ehre gereichte.

Die Soliſtin des Abends war, wie geſagt, Mme. Johanna Gadski, welche als erſte Gabe die Arie der Eliſabeth „Dich theure Halle" aus Wagner's „Tannhäuſer" in trefflichſter Weiſe bot und dafür durch dreimaligen Hervorruf geehrt wurde. Eine wahre Ovation wurde ihr nach dem zweiten Solo zu Theil, für welches ſie die große Arie aus Weber's „Oberon": „Ocean, Du Ungeheuer" gewählt hatte und durch ihren Vortrag bewies, daß ſie des Tondichters Ideen mit echter Künſtlerſchaft erfaßt.

Das Conzert ſchloß bereits um 10 Uhr, und was beſonders betont zu werden verdient, iſt die Thatſache, daß die Beſucher bis zum Schluſſe ausharrten und das ſtörende

---

[illegible] das nächſte Conzert findet am 13. Dezember ſtatt und ſteht zu hoffen, daß Saal und Gallerie'n auch dann wieder faſt bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt ſind.

Recital der Frls. Sutro.

Die Geſchwiſter Sutro werden in Lehmann's Halle am Donnerſtag, 17. November, ein Conzert veranſtalten, für welches ein intereſſantes Programm aufgeſtellt worden iſt, das Original-Compoſitionen für zwei Klaviere von Gounod, Saint-Saens, Rudorff, Brahms, Wehle, Chopin, Rubinſtein, Reinecke, Weber, Liszt und Charminade umfaßt.

MUSIC HALL........MT. ROYAL AVE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

BURMESTER.

MR. WILLIAM GERICKE, Conductor.
SECOND CONCERT, TUESDAY EVENING, December 13, at 8.
PROGRAMME:
SCHUBERT Symphony No. 9; PAGANINI Concerto for Violin in D Major.
MACDOWELL Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," Op. 25.
WAGNER Overture to "Tannhauser."
Soloist, Mr. WILLY BURMESTER.
Seats now on sale at Albert's, 13 N. Charles St.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme announced for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Music Hall, on Tuesday evening, December 13, is an especially attractive one and quite up to the high standard maintained by this organization. In compliance with a very general request and because the plan seems to suit the majority of the patrons of the orchestra in every city, the symphony will be played first. Schubert's Symphony No. 9, in C major, is commonly known among musicians as the "Great Symphony" of Schubert. It was written in March, 1828, eight months before the composer's death, and was never performed during his lifetime.

One of the bitterest penalties paid by the renowned workers in the field of music is that the greatest tributes to their compositions almost invariably come after their death. A notable illus-

in Baltimore of the symphonic poem "Launcelot and Elaine," by Edward MacDowell, who bids fair to take the highest rank among American composers. A strong indication of Mr. MacDowell's reputation as a musician is given by his recent appointment as professor of music at Columbia University. "Launcelot and Elaine" was given its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Boston series, on January 10 and 11, 1890. It was written three years before at Wiesbaden and was performed soon after at Darmstadt. It was dedicated by the composer to his friend Templeton Strong, and was, of course, based upon Tennyson's famous poem. It is regarded by many excellent judges as Mr. MacDowell's greatest work.

The closing orchestral number needs only to be mentioned to arouse the old-time and perennial enthusiasm—Wagner's famous overture to "Tannhauser." If any evidence were needed of the popularity of this standard overture, it is amply given in the large number of performances it has received by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Boston series and watched the moon come up over the mountains and cut the towers of the cathedral out in white outline against the hillside and saw it change the statuary in the shrubbery to ghostly wraiths who stood apart from and above the gayety around them. Here and there were the smoky oil lamp of the street booths under which dark-skinned native women were dispensing strange sweets and many colored beverages. Fire balloons and sputtering rockets went up from one corner of the square, and below us the musicians placed, in a rectangle, their music stands with little lanterns to light the pages. The bass drum they put a dozen yards away in a position of well-merited isolation. The music was weird and fanciful, and full of suggestions of Spanish castanets and sinuous Carmencitas and Oteros. The national air of Porto Rico, "The Borinquen,"

---

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In compliance with an almost general request, Conductor William Gericke, in arranging the program for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on Tuesday evening, December 13, has placed as the opening number Schubert's symphony No. 9, in C major, the one which musicians have styled the "Great Symphony," which will be rentered entire.

It is said of this renowned symphony of Schubert that it was discovered by Schumann some ten years after Schubert's death, and was given its first public performance at the Gewandaus, in Leipzig, on March 22, 1839, under the direction of the great Mandelssohn.

The soloist for this concert makes his debut in Baltimore. Mr. Willy Burmester is a violinist of the greatest renown in Europe, but will be heard for the first time in America this season. He will play the "Paganini Concerto" in D major, a work possible only to an artist of almost unlimited technique.

Mr. Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," is the second orchestral number on the program, and will be heard for the first time in Baltimore.

It was a noteworthy fact in connection with the opening concert of the present series on election night, November 8, that the attendance was the largest in the history of the orchestra in Baltimore, except when Madame Melba sang.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The Commercial Advertiser Association.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 15, 1898.

The second matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon attracted a large audience, consisting, as all afternoon concerts do, chiefly of women. Had the male element been more numerous the well-deserved applause would have been greater, for the concert was most interesting and enjoyable. The programme was:

Symphony No. 9, in C major........Schubert
Concerto for Violin, in E minor, op. 64, Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25..............................MacDowell
Overture, "Tannhauser"..............Wagner

Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, Mr. Kneisel, the concert-master of the band, conducted, and he did so with great credit to himself and to the orchestra. He had his men under perfect control, and, so far as any one could judge, the concert was quite as successful as it would have been under the direction of Mr. Gericke. Boston is very fortunate in having so capable a man to take charge of its orchestra in time of need.

'The Schubert symphony, like all the works of that master, is full of melodious beauty, but the first two movements are strung out to such an inordinate length that long before they are ended the listener is wearied with them and asks for a change. The first movement especially, with its protracted introduction and its interminable working out, comes very near to being exceedingly tiresome, and nothing but the exquisite tonal coloring with which the band invested it saved it from being a bore. Copious editing would help the work immensely.

The work of the orchestra throughout the symphony was delicious. There is in it plentiful opportunities for the wood winds, and the rich, mellow tone of this choir was always beautiful and at times ravishing. The sourness and dryness which are the chief afflictions of cur local bands find no place in the one which comes from Boston, and the more one hears the latter the more one hopes that it will not be long before our own orchestras are improved in this respect. In the present justifiable enthusiasm over the vast improvement which Mr. Paur has wrought in our orchestral music it must not be forgotten that one man can no more make an orchestra than one swallow can a spring, a proof of which can be seen on the small difference, comparatively speaking, a change of conductors makes in the work of the Boston band.

It is to be hoped that another opportunity will be given in the near future to hear Mr. MacDowell's Launcelot and Elaine, which was played for the first time in this city. One hearing was sufficient to convince that it is a worthy successor to the long list of works in the various fields of music which have placed Mr. MacDowell in such an enviable position among to-day's composers. As the name implies, the familiar Arthurian legend has been the composer's inspiration, but happily it differs from the average symphonic poem that ambitious foreigners are turning out in that Mr. MacDowell has not undertaken to tell of the unrequited love of the unfortunate maiden in his music as others might have done, but has sought to idealize the moods aroused by the story rather to give expression to reality. The work is full of nobility and dignity and the thematic material has in it much beauty. The treatment is wholly modern, and if at times there are faint reminiscences of things which have gone before these are easily pardoned because they are employed skilfully and with great effect. The work is full of a genuine emotional sentiment and rises to telling climaxes.

Of Mr. Burmester little should be said until after he has been heard in the Beethoven concerto to-night. He was doubtless nervous, and it would be unfair to pass an opinion on him under such conditions. He played the Mendelssohn concerto with great style and finish, perhaps elegance should be the word, and exhibited a fine mastery of the technique of his instrument not only in the concerto but in a Paganini show piece used for an encore, but his tone, while exceedingly sweet and smooth and suave, was curiously small. In big Carnegie Hall, with the big orchestra behind him, it sounded almost tiny. His stopping was not always accurate, but that, like his tone, was due probably to nervousness. He bows easily and gracefully, has within the limits of his tone a good variety of color, but he seemed to lack greatly in virility. The Tannhäuser overture was played extremely well.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1898.

BOSTON, Mass., December 11, 1898.

LAST evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the eighth in this season's series, was given with this program:

Symphony in E minor, No. 5	Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin	Beethoven
Prelude to Die Meistersinger	Wagner

The soloist was Willy Burmester, who on this occasion made his first concert appearance in America.

Franz Kneisel conducted again, for although Mr. Gericke is rapidly recovering, it was not considered prudent that he should resume his duties as yet. This week the orchestra is to visit New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and Mr. Kneisel will continue to conduct until it returns. At the rehearsal and concert of the 22d and 23d it is beyond all reasonable doubt that Mr. Gericke will make his reappearance.

And just here it is due Mr. Kneisel to recognize warmly and sincerely the skill and the fine intelligence with which he has acquitted himself in the emergency he was suddenly called on to meet. It is no slight responsibility to take charge of the Symphony Orchestra at a moment's notice,, and it is not often that a concertmaster can assume such a responsibility and go through the ordeal in as brilliantly successfully a manner as Mr. Kneisel has done. He has displayed every ability that goes toward the making of a conductor of the first rank, and with each succeeding effort of the past three weeks he has grown surprisingly. his reading of the Tschaikowsky Symphony last evening being perhaps the most admirable, most sympathetic and most satisfying that the work has ever had here. Dignity, authority, modesty, complete control over himself and the orchestra, artistic devotion and the power of winning and justifying confidence in him on the part of both players and public are prominent among the many admirable qualities of which he has shown himself at the conductor's stand to be the possessor.

Mr. Burmester has a small tone, but it is exquisitely pure and appealing. His technic is ample and beautiful in finish, and his style is chaste and almost fragile in its tender delicacy. His bowing is broad and free, and his work generally gracefully refined in points of taste. Perhaps on the whole his playing of the concerto had in it more of elegance than of depth, fire and largeness, and though it was very artistic in its way and free from any of the affectations that mark the mere virtuoso, was over sugary and seemed to suggest constantly that he would have found a more felicitious work for the display of his individuality of style in the more effeminate Mendelssohn concerto. Still it was all very charming in its way—frank, free from dryness, clean-cut in execution, smooth and without any attempt at mock heroics and trickery to win the applause of those who hear wth their eyes. What was most lacking were volume of tone and vigorous manliness of expresion. He won the hearty favor of his hearers, whose plaudits and recalls were fairly bestowed.

MAKE way for the violin virtuoso! In the lull between two pianists comes Willy Burmester, a famed adept upon the four strings that enthrall. This young man, of whom critical Germany thinks very well, plays for the first time this afternoon with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Carnegie Hall. He has, however, substituted the Mendelssohn for the Paganini concerto. To-morrow he plays the Beethoven concerto, a trying test of his musicianship, if not of his virtuosity.

Boston Symphony.

ITINERARY.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, December 14, at 7 A. M.
Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, December 14, at 2.
Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, December 15, at 8 P. M.
Matinee at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 16, at 3:30.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 17, at 8 P. M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, December 17, midnight.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 18, at 7 A. M., Providence Depot.

NEW YORK PROGRAMS.

Franz Kneisel—Conductor.

Wednesday Matinee, December 14.

Symphony No. 9, in C major	Schubert
Concerto for violin	Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem, Launcelot and Elaine, op. 25,	MacDowell
Overture to Tannhäuser	Wagner

Soloist, Willy Burmester.

Thursday Evening, December 15.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64	Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin in D major, op. 61	Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, No. 1, Omphale's Spinning Wheel, op. 31	Saint-Saëns
Symphonic Poem No. 3, The Preludes	Liszt

Soloist, Willy Burmester.

Aus der Welt der Töne.

Erſtes Conzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters. — Wilhelm Gericke als Dirigent. — Zahlreicher Beſuch.

Seit der Einweihung der Muſik-Halle durch das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter hatte ſich in der Halle kein ſolch zahlreiches Publikum eingefunden, als geſtern Abend bei dem erſten Conzerte, das in dieſer Saiſon von den Boſtonern daſelbſt gegeben wurde. Verſchiedene Faktoren mögen dazu beigetragen haben: die Neugier, den neuen Dirigenten Wilhelm Gericke zu ſehen, der Wunſch, die beliebte Soliſtin Mme. Johanne Gadski zu hören oder der Umſtand, daß Waſhingtoner Muſikfreunde, welche an den Conzerten der Boſtoner ſich erfreuen wollen, nach Baltimore kommen müſſen, da bekanntlich das Orcheſter, um in Baltimore den Conzert-Cyklus zu geben, Waſhington aufgeben mußte. Immerhin darf aber doch wohl zur Ehre Baltimore's geſagt werden, daß die hieſigen Muſikfreunde durch den Beſuch des geſtrigen Conzertes den Beweis erbracht haben, daß ſie mit gutem Rechte darauf gedrungen haben, auch in dieſem Winter das Boſtoner Orcheſter hier in Baltimore begrüßen zu können. Der gute Beſuch iſt die beſte Anerkennung der Kunſt des Orcheſters und ein Beweis, daß man ſie zu würdigen verſteht, daß man fühlt, welch ſeltener und edler Genuß ein ſolches Orcheſter, welches das Schönſte, was die großen Meiſter ſchuſen, in vollendetſter Art zu exekutiren verſteht, zu bieten vermag.

Bei früheren Gelegenheiten iſt wiederholt darauf hingewieſen worden, daß der Grund des großen Erfolges des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters an erſter Stelle darin liegt, daß keine Zeit geſpart wird für die ſorgfältigſte Vorbereitung, für die Proben, was freilich darin wieder ſeine Urſache hat, daß ein Muſikfreund, wie der keine Geldopfer ſcheuende Boſtoner H. L. Higginſon, das Orcheſter gründete. Dazu kam, daß man ſeit Begründung des Orcheſters darauf bedacht war, ſo wenig wie nur irgend möglich Veränderungen unter den Orcheſter-Mitgliedern vorzunehmen. Dieſes Jahr erlitt das Orcheſter aber durch den Untergang des franzöſiſchen Dampfers „La Bourgogne" große Verluſte. Man hat aber die vakanten Stellen, welche hauptſächlich unter den Bläſern zu verzeichnen waren, mit bedeutenden Muſikern beſetzt, und das geſtrige Conzert bewies, daß beinahe die ſo oft geprieſene Einheit wieder geſchaffen iſt.

Die Leitung des Orcheſters liegt wieder in Händen des Hrn. Wilhelm Gericke, welcher bei der Gründung dasſelbe bereits dirigirte und auch hier in Baltimore wohlbekannt iſt. Für Das, was der Dirigent aus ſeinem eigenen Innern dem Orcheſter geben muß, dafür iſt er, wie er bereits früher und auch geſtern bewies, künſtleriſch wohl befähigt, und ſpielte das Orcheſter mit einer Verve und Vollendung, welche die höchſte Befriedigung gewährte.

Das Programm bot an Orcheſter-Nummern zunächſt Goldmark's Ouverture „im Frühling", ein in brillantem und modernen Style geſchriebenes Tonſtück; ferner Brahms' Variationen über ein Haydn'ſches Choral-Thema, eine Compoſition, welche an die Leiſtungsfähigkeit des Orcheſters die höchſten Anforderungen ſtellt, von den Boſtonern aber eine faſt tadelloſe Darlegung fand. Daſſelbe kann von der Schumann'ſchen Symphonie Nr. 2 in C-Dur geſagt werden, welche eine geradezu brillante Interpretation vor Allem in dem Scherzo und dem Finale fand und auch Hrn. Gericke zu höchſter Ehre gereichte.

Die Soliſtin des Abends war, wie geſagt, Mme. Johanna Gadski, welche als erſte Gabe die Arie der Eliſabeth „Dich theure Halle" aus Wagner's „Tannhäuſer" in trefflichſter Weiſe bot und dafür durch dreimaligen Hervorruf geehrt wurde. Eine wahre Ovation wurde ihr nach dem zweiten Solo zu Theil, für welches ſie die große Arie aus Weber's „Oberon": „Ocean, Du Ungeheuer" gewählt hatte und durch ihren Vortrag bewies, daß ſie des Tondichters Ideen mit echter Künſtlerſchaft erfaßt.

Das Conzert ſchloß bereits um 10 Uhr, und was beſonders betont zu werden verdient, iſt die Thatſache, daß die Beſucher bis zum Schluſſe ausharrten und das ſtörende vorzeitige Verlaſſen des Conzertſaales unterblieb. Das nächſte Conzert findet am 13. Dezember ſtatt und ſteht zu hoffen, daß Saal und Gallerie'n auch dann wieder faſt bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt ſind.

Recital der Frls. Sutro.

Die Geſchwiſter Sutro werden in Lehmann's Halle am Donnerſtag, 17. November, ein Conzert veranſtalten, für welches ein intereſſantes Programm aufgeſtellt worden iſt, das Original-Compoſitionen für zwei Klaviere von Gounod, Saint-Saens, Rudorff, Brahms, Wehle, Chopin, Rubinſtein, Reineke, Weber, Liszt und Charminade umfaßt.

MUSIC HALL........MT. ROYAL AVE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

BURMESTER.

MR. WILLIAM GERICKE, Conductor.
SECOND CONCERT, TUESDAY EVENING,
December 13, at 8.
PROGRAMME:
SCHUBERT Symphony No. 9; PAGANINI Concerto for Violin in D Major.
MACDOWELL Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," Op. 25.
WAGNER Overture to "Tannhauser."
Soloist, Mr. WILLY BURMESTER.
Seats now on sale at Albert's, 13 N. Charles St.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme announced for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Music Hall, on Tuesday evening, December 13, is an especially attractive one and quite up to the high standard maintained by this organization. In compliance with a very general request and because the plan seems to suit the majority of the patrons of the orchestra in every city, the symphony will be played first. Schubert's Symphony No. 9, in C major, is commonly known among musicians as the "Great Symphony" of Schubert. It was written in March, 1828, eight months before the composer's death, and was never performed during his lifetime.

One of the bitterest penalties paid by the renowned workers in the field of music is that the greatest tributes to their compositions almost invariably come after their death. A notable illus-

in Baltimore of the symphonic poem "Launcelot and Elaine," by Edward MacDowell, who bids fair to take the highest rank among American composers. A strong indication of Mr. MacDowell's reputation as a musician is given by his recent appointment as professor of music at Columbia University. "Launcelot and Elaine" was given its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Boston series, on January 10 and 11, 1890. It was written three years before at Wiesbaden and was performed soon after at Darmstadt. It was dedicated by the composer to his friend Templeton Strong, and was, of course, based upon Tennyson's famous poem. It is regarded by many excellent judges as Mr. MacDowell's greatest work.

The closing orchestral number needs only to be mentioned to arouse the old-time and perennial enthusiasm—Wagner's famous overture to "Tannhauser." If any evidence were needed of the popularity of this standard overture, it is amply given in the large number of performances it has received by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Boston series and watched the moon come up over the mountains and cut the towers of the cathedral out in white outline against the hillside and saw it change the statuary in the shrubbery to ghostly wraiths who stood apart from and above the gayety around them. Here and there were the smoky oil lamp of the street booths under which dark-skinned native women were dispensing strange sweets and many colored beverages. Fire balloons and sputtering rockets went up from one corner of the square, and below us the musicians placed, in a rectangle, their music stands with little lanterns to light the pages. The bass drum they put a dozen yards away in a position of well-merited isolation. The music was weird and fanciful, and full of suggestions of Spanish castanets and sinuous Carmencitas and Oteros. The national air of Porto Rico, "The Borinquen,"

---

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In compliance with an almost general request, Conductor William Gericke, in arranging the program for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on Tuesday evening, December 13, has placed as the opening number Schubert's symphony No. 9, in C major, the one which musicians have styled the "Great Symphony," which will be rentered entire.

It is said of this renowned symphony of Schubert that it was discovered by Schumann some ten years after Schubert's death, and was given its first public performance at the Gewandaus, in Leipzig, on March 22, 1839, under the direction of the great Mandelssohn.

The soloist for this concert makes his debut in Baltimore. Mr. Willy Burmester is a violinist of the greatest renown in Europe, but will be heard for the first time in America this season. He will play the "Paganini Concerto" in D major, a work possible only to an artist of almost unlimited technique.

Mr. Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," is the second orchestral number on the program, and will be heard for the first time in Baltimore.

It was a noteworthy fact in connection with the opening concert of the present series on election night, November 8, that the attendance was the largest in the history of the orchestra in Baltimore, except when Madame Melba sang.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The
Commercial Advertiser Association.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 15, 1898.

The second matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon attracted a large audience, consisting, as all afternoon concerts do, chiefly of women. Had the male element been more numerous the well-deserved applause would have been greater, for the concert was most interesting and enjoyable. The programme was:

Symphony No. 9, in C major	Schubert
Concerto for Violin, in E minor, op. 64,	Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25	MacDowell
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner

Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, Mr. Kneisel, the concert-master of the band, conducted, and he did so with great credit to himself and to the orchestra. He had his men under perfect control, and, so far as any one could judge, the concert was quite as successful as it would have been under the direction of Mr. Gericke. Boston is very fortunate in having so capable a man to take charge of its orchestra in time of need.

The Schubert symphony, like all the works of that master, is full of melodious beauty, but the first two movements are strung out to such an inordinate length that long before they are ended the listener is wearied with them and asks for a change. The first movement especially, with its protracted introduction and its interminable working out, comes very near to being exceedingly tiresome, and nothing but the exquisite tonal coloring with which the band invested it saved it from being a bore. Copious editing would help the work immensely.

The work of the orchestra throughout the symphony was delicious. There is in it plentiful opportunities for the wood winds, and the rich, mellow tone of this choir was always beautiful and at times ravishing. The sourness and dryness which are the chief afflictions of cur local bands find no place in the one which comes from Boston, and the more one hears the latter the more one hopes that it will not be long before our own orchestras are improved in this respect. In the present justifiable enthusiasm over the vast improvement which Mr. Paur has wrought in our orchestral music it must not be forgotten that one man can no more make an orchestra than one swallow can a spring, a proof of which can be seen on the small difference, comparatively speaking, a change of conductors makes in the work of the Boston band.

It is to be hoped that another opportunity will be given in the near future to hear Mr. MacDowell's Launcelot and Elaine, which was played for the first time in this city. One hearing was sufficient to convince that it is a worthy successor to the long list of works in the various fields of music which have placed Mr. MacDowell in such an enviable position among to-day's composers. As the name implies, the familiar Arthurian legend has been the composer's inspiration, but happily it differs from the average symphonic poem that ambitious foreigners are turning out in that Mr. MacDowell has not undertaken to tell of the unrequited love of the unfortunate maiden in his music as others might have done, but has sought to idealize the moods aroused by the story rather to give expression to reality. The work is full of nobility and dignity and the thematic material has in it much beauty. The treatment is wholly modern, and if at times there are faint reminiscences of things which have gone before these are easily pardoned because they are employed skilfully and with great effect. The work is full of a genuine emotional sentiment and rises to telling climaxes.

Of Mr. Burmester little should be said until after he has been heard in the Beethoven concerto to-night. He was doubtless nervous, and it would be unfair to pass an opinion on him under such conditions. He played the Mendelssohn concerto with great style and finish, perhaps elegance should be the word, and exhibited a fine mastery of the technique of his instrument not only in the concerto but in a Paganini show piece used for an encore, but his tone, while exceedingly sweet and smooth and suave, was curiously small. In big Carnegie Hall, with the big orchestra behind him, it sounded almost tiny. His stopping was not always accurate, but that, like his tone, was due probably to nervousness. He bows easily and gracefully, has within the limits of his tone a good variety of color, but he seemed to lack greatly in virility. The Tannhäuser overture was played extremely well.

The New York Times
"All the News That's Fit to Print."
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DEC. 15, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Second Matinee Concert at Carnegie Hall Yesterday Afternoon.

The second matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirteenth season in New York took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The audience was small and apathetic. The programme consisted of the following numbers: Schubert's symphony in C major, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, E. A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser." The fourth number, as usual, was unnecessary. The programme was long enough without it. The solo violinist was Mr. Willy Burmester of Berlin. Owing to the continued illness of Wilhelm Gericke, Franz Kneisel conducted the performance.

Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem had not been heard in New York before, and therefore as the novelty of the concert must have the first consideration. It requires only brief discussion, because it is free in form and intended to be a musical embodiment of the moods of Tennyson's idyll. It is, perhaps, a trifle prolix in parts. Sometimes composers seem to set themselves a time limit for symphonic poems, and they proceed to fill up the time, not always with the happiest results in the matter of artistic balance. But the prolixity in the work now under consideration is only in minor parts. As a whole the composition is admirable. It is clear in form and purpose, and it is without search after those weird effects of harmony and instrumentation which are just now in such high favor. Prof. MacDowell is a sane and healthy composer, and his music has no tendency toward the decadent school. As a musical reflection of Tennyson's poem the composition heard yesterday is fairly satisfying. It is melodious and picturesquely instrumented. On the whole it is music to be heard with pleasure.

Mr. Willy Burmester comes to us from Germany with a reputation exceedingly hard for any man to equal. If we were to say that the German critics have raved over him, we should not be guilty of gross exaggeration. He was originally announced to play yesterday a concerto by Paganini, and that is probably the sort of thing he ought to play. But to us who know the men sitting around him in the Boston Symphony Orchestra it seemed curious to see Kneisel conducting and Loeffler, Adamowski, Roth, Strube, and the like playing the accompaniment to Mr. Burmester's small and elegant treatment of the Mendelssohn concerto.

His tone is very small, so small that it was with the greatest difficulty that Mr. Kneisel could avoid drowning it. But it is a very pure and clear tone. The salient feature of the soloist's performance was its exquisite finish. He has technics to spare, and he applies them with intelligence. His working up of the cadenza in the first movement, for instance, was admirable, and we doubt if any one ever heard a saltato staccato played with more perfection. But the andante was simply refined; it had no depth of feeling and no breadth of style. The finale was played at a fast tempo and in a remarkably small and uninspiring style. In fact Mr. Burmester showed perfection only in his technics, but they enabled him to reveal only a small style. In response to recalls he played a technical show piece, quite out of place in a serious concert. It gave him an opportunity, however, to show a marvelous piece of legato playing in harmonics and a dazzling piece of run playing in octaves. Mr. Burmester's playing will interest all students of the violin, but it will probably not carry away the public. The work of the orchestra yesterday was quite up to its usual standard of excellence. Mr. Kneisel is so thorough a musician that there was no reason to fear the results of his conducting. He acquitted himself with the highest credit. His position was indeed a trying one, but his conscientiousness enabled him to sustain it. He had plainly studied the Schubert symphony with the greatest care, and his reading of it, while not wholly in accord with tradition in the quiet coloring of the opening movement, was that of a sympathetic and accomplished musician. The MacDowell work Mr. Kneisel presented in a finished form. He had rehearsed it with much care, and he brought out its beauties with a loving hand. Mr. Kneisel might easily become one of the most important conductors in the United States; but it is to be hoped that he will not have to do so. As a violinist, concertmeister, and quartet leader he does artistic work which cannot be spared. Fortunately Mr. Kneisel is so endowed with modest worth that there is no danger of his being stung by the conducting bee.

The programme for to-night consists of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto, Saint-Säens's "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the second symphony concert by the Boston Orchestra at Music Hall Tuesday evening, December 13, an excellent programme has been arranged by Conductor Gericke. Schubert's ninth symphony in C major will be rendered in its entirety as the opening number. This will be followed by Paganini's concerto for violin in D major, one movement to be played by Mr. W. Burmeister. At the second Berlin philharmonic concert, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, in October, Mr. Burmeister was the soloist and was recalled no less than eight times. It is said of him that he selects music by Paganini for his first performance in any city because it has always brought him good luck. There is also on the programme a symphonic poem by MacDowell, opus 25, entitled "Launcelot and Elaine," and the entertainment will conclude with Wagner's great overture to "Tannhauser," which is such a favorite with Sousa's Band

---

The World.
d by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PAR
New York.
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1898.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Willy Burmester, the German Violinist, Was a Disappointment as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its second visit to New York at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The occasion served to introduce Mr. Franz Kneisel as conductor to the local public. He fulfilled his task with absolute success. He controlled his players well, and his readings were altogether satisfactory from the musician's point of view. His manner was modest and suggested a recognition of the fact that he was acting ad interim for Mr. Gericke during the latter's illness. Mr. Kneisel is sober but forcible in his physical details of leading; his gestures are expressive and his beat is decisive.

The programme had for its orchestral numbers Schubert's C major symphony, Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25, and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhaeuser." The symphony was played with great finish and perfect rhythmic accuracy. In the second movement Mr. Longy, the first oboe player, was again a source of delight. In the marked march theme his exquisite time and smooth utterance were fully displayed.

The MacDowell composition had never before been played here. Barring occasional moments of prolixity and an intermittent lack of expressive matter, the opus is one worthy of the composer's eminence. It is scored in a masterly manner, with a full utilization of broad and massive modern methods. The horn passages are extremely beautiful, and it may be said that the orchestra's horn-players did full justice to their task. Mr. MacDowell uses Wagner's language at times—notably in the final figure allotted to the first violins—but these forms of musical speech are no longer individual. The poem is a rare bit of poetic music.

Mr. Willy Burmester, a violinist of great reputation in Germany, was the soloist. He was a great disappointment. His tone is small and weak, smaller than Sarasate's. It is pure, sweet and appealing, but it is wholly without virility. His methods are delicate and fragile. He has no interpretative powers. His attack lacks vigor; he has no faculties of emphasis and no appreciation of climax. He played Mendelssohn's concerto—a hackneyed composition—in a non-assertive way; with absolute accuracy, but without authority. Almost any one of the orchestra's first violins—Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Kunz or Strube—would have given a more impressive performance.

As an encore Mr. Burmester played a set of variations with a Paganini suggestion. In this the violinist revealed himself as an extraordinary technicist. Nothing like it has ever been heard here since Cesar Thomson's visit a few years ago. Flawless fingering, contempt for rapid passages, extraordinary staccato bowing and a legato and purity in harmonics were the features of his marvellous execution.

At Keith's such a performance would have been a triumph.

The Sun.
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert last night. The audience arrived late, presumably on account of the interruption to traffic on the cable cars. But late audiences are to be expected at other musical performances than the opera. "Die Walkuere" on Wednesday at the opera began in the presence of a slim gathering. Twenty minutes later the auditorium was full. The concert began last evening with Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony, the most Russian of all his writings. The orchestra played as admirably as usual. Only in some of the climaxes was there a noticeable deficiency in force. But Mr. Kneisel, who again conducted, brought the best results from the players at every other time. Saint-Saens's familiar "Rouet d'Omphale" was given with delicacy and a tempo that seemed somewhat more rapid than usual. "Les Preludes" of Liszt was the last orchestral number.

Willy Burmester was again the soloist. He played Beethoven's concerto in D major, and as encore a fugue by Bach. Herr Burmester showed again his unusual equipment on the technical side of his art—a possession which he never displays for its own sake merely. His tone is not large. That admits of no discussion. But he plays always with taste and refinement. Of his place among violinists there can be no doubt. Admirers of correct, finished and, from a technical point of view, exceptionally brilliant attainments will always find his playing delightful. In the Beethoven concerto he exhibited his respect for the classical nature of the work, and the dazzling movements he accomplished were always demanded by the nature of the work.

Mr. Kneisel conducted the accompaniment with the utmost sympathy, and the orchestra's share was worthy of the soloist's success.

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Willy Burmester, a violinist, who has lately arrived from Germany, was introduced to Baltimoreans at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Music Hall. Mr. Burmester was born in 1869, in Hamburg. He has studied under Joachim and other eminent instructors, and has played with success in Berlin, London and elsewhere. This is his first tour in the United States. He was advertised to play Paganini's concerto in D major, but Mendelssohn's violin concerto in E minor was substituted. As Paganini's selections are not heard as often as those of some other composers, many would have preferred his work, but the substitution made no great difference. The Mendelssohn concerto was more familiar to the majority, and for that reason was all the more enjoyed. Mr. Burmester gave it a splendid rendition. There was little or no evidence of the nervousness that is sometimes apparent when a player faces a strange audience. His tone was full and clear, his technique beautiful and his expression very refined. The exquisite andante movement was charmingly rendered. The audience applauded so warmly and the violinist was recalled with such earnestness that the young player no doubt at once felt that he was among friends. It is to be hoped that he will be heard again before the close of the season.

Owing to the illness of director Gericke, who is still suffering from the effects of typhoid fever, which has incapacited him some time since the orchestra was here, November 8th, Mr. Kneisel, the acomplished first violinist, conducted the orchestra. When he appeared his reception was most hearty During the fourteen years he has played with the orchestra here Mr. Kneisel has made many friends. It was the first time Baltimoreans had seen him as conductor. He led the band almost like a veteran, with great care and earnestness. and received the applause he won with becoming modesty. The orchestra played as it always does, in a wellnigh faultless style. Mr. Loeffler was the concert master.

The symphony was Schubert's ninth, his last and greatest work for the orchestra. In the working out some of the movements are long, but the work as a whole is so beautiful that it is impossible to become tired, especially when rendered as it was last night. The slow movement is the gem of the whole. There may be suggestions of Beethoven, but the symphony is all the better for that. Schubert was too original and too much of a genius to be much indebted to anybody. The strongly marked flavor of the gipsy music and its treatment is one of the most attractive features in the symphony. The rushing work for the violins in the finale is too difficult for many orchestras, but this movement was played last night with superb fire.

"Launcelot and Elaine," a symphonic poem by the eminent American musician, Mr. Edward McDowell was a novelty. The work possesses considerable merit, the whole full orchestra is drawn upon at times, but as a whole it fails to adequately express in music what Tennyson does with such pathos and beauty in verse.

The concluding selection was the overture to Tannhauser ,which was played with fine breadth and power.

The attendance was very large.

THE RECORD
Philadelphia. December 13. 1898.

Boston Symphony Concert—Academy of Music.

A violinist new to Philadelphia audiences made his bow at the Academy of Music last evening as the soloist of the Boston Symphony concert. Willy Burmester came to us heralded by many laudatory notices, which in great part are largely deserved. He is a master of technique, and the selection chosen last evening—Beethoven's concerto in D major—was a work calculated to show his mastership over his instrument. But, although nimble of finger, there is something lacking in Burmester's playing, an indescribable something which marks the playing of the thorough artist. Call it lack of personal magnetism, if you will. Still, his rendition of the piano passages were beautiful, and the way in which technical difficulties overcome marvelous. The forte phrases, however, were somewhat lacking in sonority. The violinist was recalled at the end of the concerto, and for an encore gave an example of musical pyrotechnics which brought much applause, but hardly added to his laurels as a musician. The programme included Tchaikovsky's symphony in D major, Saint-Saens' familiar symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes." Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke the performance was conducted by Franz Kneisel, and that with great ability.

The New York Times
"All the News That's Fit to Print."
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DEC. 16, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Second Evening Concert of the Thirteenth Season at Carnegie Hall.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the second in its series of evening performances took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The audience was much larger than that which attended the afternoon concert of the previous day, and, as is to be expected of an evening assembly, was much more courageous in the award of commendation. It was really enthusiastic in its testimonial of regard for Franz Kneisel, who again conducted, and who was shown in a manner beyond all possibility of misconstruction the depth of the esteem of New Yorkers for his artistic worth. It must have been an evening of much gratification for the admirable musician who has done so much for the high entertainment of sincere music lovers in this city.

The burst of loud and continued applause, which was plainly intended as a tribute to the conductor, followed the performance of the first number of the programme, Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, No. 5. This was one of the earliest of the famous Russian's works to be made known in New York, and at a time when the truthfulness of its reflection of Russian character was not understood, it was not appreciated. To-day it is known and admired by all music lovers, except those who are too old to get out of Mendelssohnian clothes. Mr. Kneisel's reading of the work was full of vigor, but the orchestra was at times sluggish and slovenly in its work. Whether it is that the members of this superb organization have come to think that anything they may do in New York is sure to meet with praise, or there are some members who do not relish playing under their own concertmeister, it is impossible to say. The latter seems to be the more likely. But it is beyond question that in some places last night there was neither precision nor unanimity. The gentlemen of Boston will have to keep right up to their own standard all the time in this hard-fisted town. When it pays for the best, it expects to get it.

The orchestral numbers, besides the Tschaikowsky work, were Saint-Säens's "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." In the former the orchestra played with excellent finish, and again Mr. Kneisel distinguished himself by a most effective working up of the crescendo in the Hercules episode, while M. Longey covered himself with glory by his delicious playing of the oboe solo at the end of the composition.

The soloist was again Willy Burmester, the German violinist, who played Beethoven's concerto. A second hearing of this player did not reveal any new or unexpected powers. His work is conspicuously fine in the perfection of its technical finish, while it never rises above elegance of utterance. The violinist's tone is so small that he could not possibly give the impression of largeness, and in addition to that it must be said that his reading of the Beethoven work was pretty, and nothing more. He was, of course, enthusiastically applauded—what soloist is not?—and for an encore number played a movement from one of Bach's violin sonatas in a clear-cut, rhythmic style.

NEW YORK HERALD.
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1898.

A NEW VIOLIN VIRTUOSO.

Mr. Willy Burmeister Makes His New York Debut at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinee—conducted by Mr. Franz Kneisel, for Mr. Gericke is still ailing—introduced Mr. Willy Burmeister, a violin virtuoso, whose worst fault is his reputation.

He has others, but it was his fame, principally achieved only a few years since in Berlin—one read at the time of "Paganini redivivus" and other hyperbolical drool—that seemed to stand in his way when he made his initial bow at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

Of Paganini it was seriously affirmed, for it isn't so long ago that people still believed in witchcraft, that his performance was not surprising, as the devil had been seen at his elbow directing his arm and guiding his bow. Mr. Willy Burmester's associations are not so disreputable. He would shiver if he saw our old friend from the Blocksberg, and he hasn't the slightest taste for the wild music that entranced the gentleman with the cloven foot during Walpurgis-Night.

A tall, slight, blond gentleman, with blond trousers and a blond tone is this Mr. Burmester. The Mendelssohn concerto, which he substituted for the Paganini violin concerto in D major, proved at least two things—his complete mastery over the technique of the instrument, his lack of breadth and strength and sentiment. He plays with admirable clearness always, and he has a knack of sustaining high tones with uncommon purity and sweetness. The tone itself, however, is deficient in roundness and volume, and the man's whole style is that of a miniaturist. It would, needless to say, be absurd to look for anything like sweet or a deep, passionate utterance in the interpretation of Mendelssohnian music. Mr. Burmester, however, never as much as hinted that he might possess these qualities. He was elegant, precise, refined if you will, but never an artist who can deeply stir the emotions of an audience.

It will be interesting to hear him play Beethoven, Tschaikowsky or Bruch. Technically, none of these composers will present to him the slightest difficulty. But will he make his listeners feel the music, or will he simply agreeably surprise them, as he did in the finale of the concerto—he played it like an etude—and in the Paganini—like da capo—which he gave in response to much polite applause?

Mr. Kneisel conducted Schubert's ninth symphony, the "Tannhäuser" overture, and a new Wagnerian paraphrase, entitled, "Launcelot and Elaine," by Mac Dowell, with a commendable mixture of feeling and repose. The accompaniment to the Mendelssohn concerto was not nearly so good. Here the Southern and the Northern temperaments seemed to clash.

THE MORNING HERALD

KNEISEL AND BURMESTER

Boston Orchestra's Concert Master As Director—First Appearance Here of a Famous Violinist.

Mr. Franz Kneisel has been an important part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra probably ever since this brilliant organization has been known to the concert-goers of Baltimore. As concert master, the local patrons of these affairs have been wont to look for his familiar features in the first violin chair at every performance. In addition to this, he has been lionized as a soloist of marked ability, and as the leader of the Kneisel Quartette won his way into the very hearts of those who appreciate artistic chamber music.

At the second concert of the season by the Orchestra, given in the Music Hall last night, Mr. Kneisel appeared in a new role, but one in which, with time, he will be as successful as he has been in those already referred to. Owing to the sudden illness of Mr. Gericke Mr. Kneisel was suddenly called upon to take up the baton, and his work last evening showed him to be the same careful and painstaking musician in that position as when he is leading the first violins.

The other feature of the concert was the appearance of Mr. Willy Burmester, a violinist who has won fame abroad as an artist, but who is as yet new to the people of this country. His first work was done in Boston, where he literally went from the steamship that brought him over to the concert hall to play his solo. At the Hub, it seems, the impression he created was rather favorable, but if his performance of last night is to be taken as a criterion the same can hardly be said of his first appearance in this city.

Mr. Burmester had been announced to play one movement of the Paganini concerto in D major, but for some reason this was changed to the well-known concerto in E minor by Mendelssohn. The familiarity of the composition and the frequency with which it is played both by professionals and amateurs made comparison an easy matter, and it can safely be said that Mr. Burmester hardly measures up to other foreign artists who have visited this city. He has thorough control of his instrument in an executive sense, as was shown by the clearness of his cadenza and purity of trills and scale passages—that is, when the latter could be heard. The violinist has a sweet and interesting tone, but it lacks breadth and volume. He is, no doubt, heard to much better advantage in a parlor than in a hall. Mr. Kneisel led the accompaniment in a conscientious manner, yet he could not prevent the orchestra, even in pianissimo, from drowning the soloist. The latter seems phlegmatic and rather devoid of enthusiasm, and these conditions made nil much that is beautiful in the second movement of the concerto.

The orchestra was in excellent form, despite the absence of its regular director, and Mr. Kneisel was given an ovation when he came upon the platform. His reading of the Schubert Ninth Symphony in C minor was in part rather pedagogic, causing an occasional drag in tempo. This, no doubt, was due to the director's preferring to follow closely the book rather than interpolate any individualism. His reading of "Launcelot and Elaine," termed a symphonic poem, by Edward McDowell, was more vigorous and decidedly intelligent. The composition, suggested by Tennyson's poem of the same title, comes markedly near the phantasy school. and for its peculiarities will hardly become popular. The concert concluded with the "Tannhauser" overture.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall in the first concert of its second series. Franz Kneisel directed in the absence of Wilhelm Gericke, who is still sick from the effects of a severe attack of Boston grip, which is said to be more virulent than the ordinary form. Mr. Kneisel's abilities as a conductor are well known. The orchestra can never play with any but a high degree of excellence. It was up to the best standards yesterday. The soloist was Willy Burmester, a violinist of great repute abroad, who was heard here for the first time. He played the Mendelssohn concerto for the violin, and not the Paganini number, which was first announced. He proved to be a virtuoso who justified the reputation which had preceded him here. He is above all things a player of marvellous technical powers. The ease with which he accomplished the difficulties of the number was remarkable, and with that was the suggestion of unrevealed powers. Nothing can be impossible to him in the way of technical achievement. The tone which he produces from the instrument is not large, nor is he a player of great temperament, as his performances yesterday revealed him. But he is a violinist of the first rank.

The orchestra played Schubert's Ninth Symphony, the overture to "Tannhäuser" and Edward Macdowell's symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine"—a gorgeously colored presentment of the Arthurian legend—and they were all given with the high degree of finish, tonal beauty and sympathy which is characteristic of the orchestra.

LE

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Dec. 13, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last Night's Concert at the Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their second concert of the present season at the Academy of Music last night, the programme being as follows:

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64; Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31; Liszt, symphonic poem, No. 3, "The Preludes;" soloist, Mr. Willy Burmester.

This magnificent orchestra comes to us all too seldom. Sometimes its concerts last an hour and three-quarters, sometimes a trifle longer. Last night it lasted two hours and twenty minutes, with very short intervals between the numbers, and provided music for assimilation of an unusually serious character. What Tschaikovsky's E minor Symphony might sound like in less competent hands is unpleasant to contemplate. It possesses little melodic beauty, save for a somewhat gloomy air of Slavonic suggestion, but the clever working out of the theme and the brilliancy of the instrumentation make it in the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a most delightful composition.

Following the symphony, Mr. Willy Burmester played Beethoven's Concerto for violin in D major, a work which is said to have been written for Clement in 1806 and finished in a great hurry.

Such might well have been the case. It is anything but melodious, and contains a great deal of repetition, but it opens up the road for every possible exercise known to the fingers of the violinist, and, as an academic test, might be admirable, but as a concert number it has never yet been popular, and is hardly likely at this time to become so. It did, however, enable Mr. Burmester to show that he was an artist of very exceptional ability. His tone seemed rather weak, but his technique is marvellous, and he plays with a self confidence and a straightforwardness that is musicianly and augurs well for his future. In response to an enthusiastic encore, he gave a brilliant arrangement of his own of Paganini's "Nel cor piu non mi sento."

The Saint-Saens (spinning wheel) symphonic poem was beautifully played, but the most delightful number of the evening was Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," illustrating a quotation from Lamartine's "Meditations Poetiques," touching life as a prelude to death. It was beautifully phrased throughout, and the magnificent finale was a fitting wind-up to the evening. Mr. Gericke, we regret to say, was too ill to conduct, and his place at the desk was taken by Mr. Franz Kneisel. It is not perhaps wise to speak too strongly of what he accomplished, from the observation afforded by one concert, but Mr. Kneisel certainly impressed us as a conductor with extraordinary magnetic power. He seemed to sway and dominate his orchestra at will, and never do we recollect their playing with so much feeling and so perfectly in accord with one another. As a rule, their playing is scholarly rather than poetic; last night it was both.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1898.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last night in Carnegie Hall, again under the direction of Mr. Kneisel, brought forward Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor and Beethoven's Violin Concerto, played by Mr. Willy Burmester, as its most important items. There were also two symphonic poems of slender and inconsequential substance, Saint-Saëns's representation of Omphale's Spinning Wheel and the struggles of Hercules in the bonds of feminine seductiveness, and Liszt's rambling illustrations to Lamartine's poetic meditation on the vicissitudes of life, "Les Préludes." The symphony gave by far the greatest pleasure to the admirers of the orchestra, and of the talented conductor pro tempore, for it was altogether a splendidly brilliant performance. It has had here interpretations of ruder, more barbaric power, but it has scarcely had a more beautiful one or one in which the larger outlines of the composer's inspiration have been more comprehensively and eloquently laid out, and its finer and subtler elements more conclusively set forth. Mr. Kneisel conducted it with an absolute knowledge of every detail of the score, which was minutely mirrored in the playing of the orchestra. Every theme, every strain of the complex polyphony, was presented in exactly the right light and right proportion, and the incessant modification of tempo that brought these things out in due relation to the whole was managed with incomparable skill. Not only in sheer sensuous tonal beauty, but in all the manifold effects of phrasing, contrast and splendid dramatic climax, it was a performance to be cherished and frequently recurred to in the memory. It was noble in all its aspects and obviously the outcome of a profound and noble musical impulse.

Mr. Willy Burmester was again the solo performer, and was again a sore disappointment to those who had expected disclosures of his power commensurate with the reputation that had preceded him to this country. He attempted the highest task that can be set before a violinist when he undertook to play Beethoven's concerto, but his equipment in tone and the higher musical qualities of a great artist are not such as to put him on terms of intimacy with this work. He played as he did on Wednesday, with a clear, sweet, but very small, tone, and a neat style, and, indeed, with a certain amount of elegance; but to the musical import of the work, particularly of the slow movements, he showed himself a stranger. It will not do to play Beethoven's concerto thus. Mr. Burmester was easily persuaded to come again to the front of the platform, and this time he had learned wisdom, or had had it taught him, for he played on his recall a piece worthy to be consorted with the concerto, a movement from one of Bach's solo sonatas; but this, too, he did in the miniature style and with the miniature tone that he had previously displayed, and not always in pure intonation.

Press

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Burmester's Success as a Soloist in a Taking Programme.

That ingenious, if not ingenuous, Lydian, Omphale, never spun a finer nor stronger thread of yellow flax than that tonal thread drawn out to subtlest pianissimo, but in golden purity, in Saint Saen's symphonic poem by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night. Nor did Omphale, nor Circe, nor any of those who gained an easy reputation of old weave a web of such superb texture as that this virtuoso organization did in tone colors in the Tschaikowsky symphony and in the Liszt "Preludes." The concert as an orchestral concert was one of the best the orchestra has given here, and a special edge was put on it by the appearance of Mr. Willy Burmester as the soloist, interpreting Beethoven's great violin concerto in D major. This he followed by a dexterous grotesquerie of Paganini, a study marked "nel cor piu non mi sento," with special caprices of technique by himself.

There was much to delight one with Burmester's work. He represents the school of sheer "good fiddling," to speak colloquially. His technique is flawless, his execution facile and his expression absolutely without affectation. His personality is quite colorless; he neither looks "like a butcher and plays like an angel," nor does he stand an Apollo, and play like a satyr. His effect was produced simply by the excellence of his technical training, which puts him thoroughly at ease amidst the greatest difficulties, and, although his tonal result is small, it is so fine, so pure, that in its utmost tenuity it preserves its quality and clarity. Curiously enough, however, he was out of pitch in the cadenza. In addition to the tone, the finish and gracefulness of his phrasing were notable and his trills particularly silvery swelling in perfection. In the broader passages, in the larghetto there was no sentimentality—he was as before, a skillful violinist, getting the best of results out of the instrument.

For an encore came the Paganini etude, and in this the violinist, as a kind of acrobatic contrast to the serenity of the concerto, did some wonderful excutant trembling. The exquisite bird-like effects of his harmonics, tone sublimated, were set off against rapid passages intertwisted with pizzicato and some marvelous scale work. With all this there was little magnetism, but the worth of the fiddler was demonstrated. Perhaps the real hero of the evening was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who, in the absence of Mr. Geriche, took the conductor's stand. It was evident that his sympathetic relations with the orchestra, his knowledge of its capabilities and his own lore were not without result. The Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5, came in for a splendid reading, while Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" was exquisitely rendered, and the canvas splashed with splendid color contrasts when Liszt was interpreted.

Unfortunately for the audience, the thermal conditions were such that, although quite a respectable storm is raised in "The Preludes" with a rush of wind on the string, it failed to cool the sirocco air of the Academy, and the enjoyment of art was, therefore, marred.

The World.

ed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1898.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT.

Violinist Burmester Again Proves that His Art Is Limited to Technical Display.

The Boston Orchestra gave its second evening concert at Carnegie Hall yesday, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony (E minor) was the solid number on the programme. This opus of the Russian composer is one which illustrates in its inequalities the varying qualities of his work. It fluctuates between inspiration and manufacture, between dignity and triviality, between majesty and vulgarity. There are moments in which the exuberance of spirits, the almost irrepressible tendency to vehement utterance, lead him to matter and treatment which are far distant from symphonic speech. But there is such a lavish gift of orchestral color, such a succession of charming melody framed into fascinating rhythms, in the opus that it is always superlatively interesting.

Mr. Kneisel and his players gave a splendid performance of the work. Judged by its own standard the orchestra seemed at times to lag a little in response to the leader's beat, but these slight deficiencies were not important. In the trio of the waltz the wood instruments exhibited their virtuosity in a most convincing manner. In the finale the horns, trumpets and tuba proclaimed the vigorous melody with a great volume of tone.

Mr. Willy Burmester made his second appearance as soloist. He selected Beethoven's concerto for his solo. He surmounted its technical difficulties, including those of the Laub cadenza, with ridiculous ease. He played with the extreme delicacy, the smoothness of cantabile and the elegance of utterance which were noted at his first appearance. But he was as far from a musical interpretation of Beethoven's music as a child would have been. He lacked everything—breadth of phrasing, force, dignity and authority.

---

delphia Inquirer

ESDAY - - - - DECEMBER 13, 189

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Franz Kneisel Conducts a Very Satisfactory Program

Owing to the continued illness of Mr. Gericke, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was under the direction of Concert Master Franz Kneisel at its second concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. From the opening bars of the symphony to the final chord of the last number confidence in the leader grew. His method was smooth and easy, avoiding startling effects and seeking rhythm rather than color. The test came with the opening number, the Tchaikowsky symphony, No. 5, in E minor. After that all was easy. The andante opens with a pulsing movement of strings and wood winds, which works its way from a simple pianissimo to a full sweep of the whole orchestra. This and the second movement, the andante cantabile, were magnificently played. A sonorous quality of tone was developed and the purely Slavic character of the theme was lost sight of in the magnificent blending of the harmonies.

The third movement, contrary to the custom of the symphony, was a waltz instead of the usual minuet. With the exception of Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony this is the only instance where a waltz is substituted for the regular scherzo of a symphony. The theme is a tripping, graceful one, and the beauty of the innovation was fully appreciated. The closing movement was disappointing, containing neither the depth nor character that was to be expected from that which went before. It is commonized by a redundant use of brasses and curious workings out of previous themes.

Willy Burmester was the soloist and he chose for his first appearance in this city the violin concerto in D major, opus 61, of Ludwig von Beethoven. This concerto stands at the very top of its class as the most difficult as well as the most beautiful. Its masterly figurations and wonderful cadenzas call on every power that a virtuoso can possess—and Willy Burmester met it and conquered. He has not large tone, in fact, volume was that in which he was chiefly deficient, but his technical work was perfect. Here the smooth work of Mr. Kneisel was distinctly felt, for the orchestration requires most delicate handling. For an encore Mr. Burmester played a Paganini number, full of brilliant pyrotechnics, but far less satisfying than the regular number.

Two symphonic poems closed the concert. The first was Saint-Saens "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," opus 31, followed by Franz Liszt's "The Preludes." This was rather a tame ending of what promised brilliantly, but they were nevertheless so pleasingly given that to criticise their calibre seems almost captious. This is particularly true of the marvelous manner with which the orchestra dealt with the involved and intricate treatment of the "Spinning Wheel." If the program was constructed on a descending scale the responsibility does not lie with either conductor or orchestra, who did their work admirably.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 13, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Kneisel as Conductor and Burmester as Soloist Score Great Successes.

The concert of last night, which introduced Franz Kneisel as conductor and Willy Burmester as soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music, was one of great interest. Mr. Kneisel established a new record, for the orchestra under his direction gave as near an approach to perfection as in any programme in which it has been heard. He not only accentuated all its possessions of precision in discipline and unchallenged excellence in ensemble technique, but he led it into new paths of broadness and virility of enthusiasm and spontaneity, with the result that the finale of the Liszt symphonic poem was the most heroic climax that the band has ever proclaimed here.

The programme was a notable one. It was built with a better appreciation of musical ethics than its immediate predecessors, and added to its interest by the introduction of Willy Burmester, a violinist, who some years ago began to make his reputation in Europe, and is this year engaged to play throughout America with all the principal orchestras. His reputation has been established principally by the adoption of those conservative methods which may be presumed upon only by the truly great artist, but which, nevertheless, place their immediate stamp upon their exponents. He played Beethoven's concerto for the violin in D major. His execution is the principal great surprise of his work. What weaknesses he displayed last night were confined to the utterance of a voice note, or the overreach in an ascending scale passage, or the shortness of his limit in octaves, but on the other hand his arpeggios were wonderfully balanced and scintillating; his cantabile, his staccati in cadenza, his harmonics and double stopping, and, above all, his triplets in chromatic scale were surprising in their accuracy. He was frequently unfortunate in the execution of his chord passages, and could not bring the true position on his D string. His tone is beautiful in its purity, but although tender and wooing like Sarasate's it does not take on any remarkable degree of power. As heard last night he appears to be a brilliant exponent of pyrotechniques in music rather than a heroic minstrel with his instrument.

Preceding the Beethoven concerto the orchestra presented Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 and concluded the programme with Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and Liszt's, "The Preludes." The reception accorded to Mr. Kneisel for his masterly performance was an expression of that appreciation which was unanimous, and his success marked the advent of another notable American conductor.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER

A NEW VIOLINIST.

Herr Willy Burmester, a German violinist who as compelled much attention in the musical centres Europe of late, played for the first time in New-ork at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchesra, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon. On the ame occasion Mr. Kneisel officiated for the first ime here as conductor of the orchestra, the illness Mr. Gericke having forced him into that exceedngly trying position. Mr. Kneisel is so firmly fixed the affections of all lovers of music of the high order that even so interesting an incident as s début in the character of a conductor may be assed over with the one remark that he who interpreted the highest order of music to us often and as eloquently as Mr. Kneisel has in concerts of chamber music could not fail in the province, notwithstanding that he was forced it by fortuitous circumstances—and he did not. the contrary, if critical comment were to be ributed according to the standard of merit inad of according to the measure invited by popuar curiosity, 'tis he who would monopolize to-day's brief discussion, instead of the newcomer.

Mr. Burmester did not make the effect that the heraldings from Europe justified the audience in expecting, except in the case of some Paganini variations (on "Non più cor mi sento"), which he played after a perfunctory recall. And as for these variations, it is to be hoped, for the sake of those who listen to music for the sake of something more than its technical tricks, that they will not be repeated. Herr Burmester can whistle marvellously with his harmonics and can imitate the plunking of a banjo excellently well, but let him bewilder as he can with these devices, he cannot make up for the disappointment caused by his tiny tone in the Mendelssohn concerto (which was his set piece), and his tinier conception of that hackneyed piece of music. His violin gave out only a trickle of sound—an amazingly neat trickle and generally a sweet, but only a trickle nevertheless. And there was a strange perversion of Mendelssohn's music at times, due to a taste and style which will doubtless come to notice again before the week is over, for he is to play with the orchestra this evening in the same hall and in Brooklyn on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Kneisel Will Direct.

Another large audience, and one thoroughly representative of the advanced musical culture of Baltimore, is already assured for the second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, at Music Hall, next Tuesday evening. Following is the complete programme:

Schubert, Symphony No. 9, in C major.
1. Andante—Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Andante con moto.
3. Scherzo—Allegro vivace, trio.
4. Finale—Allegro vivace.
Mendelssohn, concerto for violin.
Macdowell, Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25.
Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."
Soloist, Mr. Willy Burmester.

Mr. William Gericke, the conductor, who, on November 18, had a sudden and severe attack of grip, which confined him to the house for several weeks, is convalescent, but to insure his absolute and early recovery the performance Tuesday will be under the direction of Mr. Franz Kneisel Mr. Kneisel's abilities are well known in Baltimore, where he has often played both with the Boston Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartette. He has conducted the concerts of the Boston Orchestra both in that city and elsewhere since Mr. Gericke's illness, and acquitted himself to the entire satisfaction of both orchestra and audience.

The announcement that the programme of the second concert would open with the "Great Symphony" of Schubert, as it has been styled, was received with genuine pleasure by the patrons of the concerts. This symphony was written in March, 1828, and was never performed in Schubert's lifetime. The manuscript bears signs of having been written at a single sitting; the only correction in it is the insertion of a few measures in the scherzo. It was first performed March 22, 1839, under the direction of Felix Mendelssohn, and immediately sprang into popularity with the music-loving public.

The symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," by Edward MacDowell, suggested by Tennyson's poem of the same title, is perfectly free in form, and will not fail to interest the major portion of the audience. To be sure, the form sometimes runs parallel with symphonic tradition for awhile, as if in obedience to instinct rather than precalculation on the composer's part; but it would be a severe stretching of formulas to try to bring it wholly within the symphonic scheme. Still with and in spite of its freedom, the form of this composition is perfectly well balanced, and the development coherent.

It will be observed that Mr. Willy Burmester, the soloist, will play the concerto for violin, by Mendelssohn, instead of the one by Paganini, as first announced, but the audience will lose nothing by reason of this change. The concert will close with the great overture to "Tannhauser."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the winter's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on Tuesday evening will be under the direction of Mr. Franz Kneisel. This is by reason of the fact that Conductor Wilhelm Gericke, while convelescent, is not yet fully recovered from the attack of grip which prostrated him ten days after he conducted the first concert in this city. Mr. Kneisel, who is a graduate of the Vienna Conservatory, and has long been identified with the Boston Orchestra, is well and favorably known in this city. His success in conducting the concerts during Mr. Gericke's sickness has been spoken of as noteworthy by the press of Boston and New York.

Mr. Willy Burmester, the soloist, who is to play Mendelssohn's concerto, is a violin virtuoso of phenomenal acquirements, and has created sensational effects by his playing in most of the cul- of Europe.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Conductor Gericke's Programme for the Second Concert.

The second symphony concert by the Boston Orchestra at Music Hall will take place on Tuesday, December 13. Mr. Gericke, the conductor, has arranged an excellent programme. In compliance with a very general request and because the plan seems to suit the majority of the patrons of the orchestra in every city, the symphony will be played first. Schubert's Symphony No. 9, in C major, is commonly known among musicians as the "Great Symphony" of Schubert. The second orchestral number on the programme will be the first performance in Baltimore of the symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," by Edward MacDowell, who bids fair to take the highest rank among American composers. The closing orchestral number will be Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

The soloist for this concert will be a violinist of great renown in Europe, but known only by reputation in this country—Mr. Willy Burmester, who makes his debut in each city visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Burmester will play the Paganini concerto, a work possible only to an artist of almost unlimited technique. The only other public performance of this concerto in this city was by Caesar Thomson with this orchestra in 1893.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1898.

MR. BURMESTER HEARD AGAIN.

Mr. Willy Burmester insists on being measured by the highest possible standard.

Last evening, when he once more appeared at Carnegie Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he played Beethoven, and, being quite enthusiastically applauded, he took up Bach. Giants, these, which taxed the strength of Joachim and Wilhelmj.

Mr. Burmester was unquestionably in much better form than when he performed the day before. But he is nothing more than an Almain Sarasatè at the best. And that is much. He played the larghetto with quite a delicious qaulity of tone, and, fortunately, never sharpened, as he did in the opening movement. In the Bach music he tried to conceal the fact that his genre is small, and in consequence he forced the tone. Technically, his playing was nearly flawless.

Tschaikowski's fifth symphony was magnificently played. Mr. Kneisel again conducted as if he had never done anything else—and the most effective phases of the concert was reached in the symphonic poems—the one by Saint-Saens, the other by Liszt.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Music Hall next Tuesday evening. Willy Burmester will be the soloist. Director Gericke has arranged the following programme: Schubert symphony No. 9; Paganini's concerto for violin in D major; MacDowell symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," Op. 25, and Wagner Overture to "Tannhauser."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIV., NO. 171.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1898.

During the Boston engagement of the Ellis opera company, which is to begin at the Boston Theatre Jan. 23 and continue three weeks, Mme. Melba will for the first time here essay the role of Mimi in a splendid production of Puccinni's "La Boheme." Ternina and Krauss will be heard in a superb revival of the Nibelungen Ring operas, or rather the three chief operas of the Cyclus—"Die Walkure," "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung," which will be conducted by Walter Damrosch, admittedly the best conductor of German operas now in the United States. An interesting feature in connection with this announcement, is the engagement by Mr. Ellis of the entire membership of the New York Symphony orchestra, which is now the regularly attached instrumental body of the Ellis opera company. This means that the orchestral setting to every opera performed will be of the highest possible standard. Mr. Ellis' career as manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra unquestionably entitles him to an expert opinion as to the value of orchestras, and the New York Symphony orchestra was secured by him after a period of keen contest.

TON SUNDAY JOURNAL—
DECEMBER 11, 1898.

THE ELLIS OPERA.

Mr. Charles A. Ellis makes official announcement of a grand opera season in Boston under his direction at the Boston Theatre, beginning Monday evening, Jan. 23, continuing for three weeks and including 18 performances. The Ellis company is now giving a season of seven weeks at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, and the press is enthusiastic in praise. The company is made up of Melba, Ternina, Gadski, De Lussan, Olitzka, Alvarez, Kraus, Bonnard, Pandolfini Stehmann, Boudouresque, De Vries and Stury. The conductors will be Messrs. Damrosch, Seppilli and Fried. The repertoire will be selected from the following operas: "Aida," "Barber of Seville," "Carmen," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Die Meistersinger," "Faust," "Fidelio," "Flying Dutchman," "Pagliacci," "Iris," "La Bohème," "Les Hueguenots," "Lohengrin," "Lucia," "La Fille du Regiment," "Marriage of Figaro," "Manon," "Martha," "Mignon," "Romeo and Juliet," "Rigoletto," "Tannhauser," "Traviata," "Tristan ŏnd Isolde," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," "The Gutterdämmerung."

SUNDAY POST
DECEMBER 11.

THE ELLIS OPERA COMPANY.

Charles A. Ellis makes official announcement of a grand opera season in Boston under his direction at the Boston Theatre, beginning Monday evening, Jan. 23, continuing for three weeks, and including 18 performances.

The Ellis opera company is one of the most ambitious organizations of its character ever assembled. In addition to having as one of its chiefest singers Mme. Melba, it contains a list of principals who are both eminent and renownod.

The Ellis company is now giving a season of seven weeks at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, and the enthusiasm of press accounts seems to be justified by the universal interest which the staid Philadelphians are taking in their season of grand opera under Mr. Ellis's management.

In addition to presenting the name of Melba—and a magic name it is—the additional singers of his company will include: Mme. Gadski, De Lussan, Olitzka, Toronta, Mattfeld, Van Cauteren and Ternina. The tenors will include Messrs. Kraus, Bonnard, Pandolfini, Rissling, Van Hoose, Del Sol and Alvarez. The baritones and bassos will include Messrs. Bensuade, Stehmann, Boudouresque, De Vries, Rains, Viviani, Rosa and Stury. The conductors will be Walter Damrosch, Signor Armando Seppilli and Herr Fried. The instrumental settings of the opera will be furnished by the New York Symphony Orchestra, which is the regular orchestra of the Ellis opera company.

There will be a large chorus and ballet, and the stage will be under the competent direction of William Parry, who for years was the chief stage manager and producer of operas at the Metropolitan Opera House, and George Egener.

The repertoire will be selected from "Aida," "Barber of Seville," "Carmen," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Die Meistersinger," "Faust," "Fidelio," "Flying Dutchman," "I Pagliacci," "Iris," "La Boheme," "Les Huguenots," "Lohengrin," "Lucia," "La Fille du Regiment," "Marriage of Figaro," "Manon," "Martha," "Mignon," "Romeo et Juliette," "Rigoletto," "Tannhauser," "Traviata," "Tristan und Isolde," "Die Walkure," "Siegfried," "Die Gotterdammerung."

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Pape
OF NEW ENGLAND

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 18, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE ELLIS OPERA COMPANY.

Plans for the ambitious season of grand opera at the Boston Theatre, beginning Jan. 23, by the Ellis opera company, under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, are progressing with entire satisfaction, and there is assuredly in prospect a series of operatic representations that will give to this city principal singers of great renown, an operatic orchestra, admittedly the best of its kind in the United States; a chorus against which one adverse newspaper criticism has yet to be uttered, and an ensemble made possible by the influence of a most intelligent stage management.

During the engagement there will be certain performances that will be notable as such by which to judge of future representations. Mme. Melba will for the first time in Boston essay the role of Mimi in a splendid production of Puccinni's "La Boheme." Ternina and Kraus will be heard in a superb revival of the Nibelungen "Ring" operas, or rather the three principal operas of the Cyclus—"Die Walkure," "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung"—which will be conducted by Walter Damrosch, admittedly the best conductor of German opera now in the United States.

An interesting feature in connection with this announcement is the engagement by Mr. Ellis of the entire membership of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which is now the regularly attached instrumental body of the Ellis opera company. Too much importance cannot be attached to an engagement of this character, and its bearing upon the quality of the grand opera in prospect. It means that the orchestral setting to every opera performed will be of the highest possible standard, and that during this season Boston may lay claim to the possession of the most eminent body of instrumentalists in the United States engaged in grand operatic work. Mr. Ellis's career as manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra unquestionably entities him to an expert opinion as to the value of orchestras, and the New York Symphony Orchestra was secured by him after a period of keen contest. His presence in this city during the season announced is a distinct and valuable addition to the ensemble of the opera, and insures a certainty of instrumental support to the singers that is of vital importance.

The World.

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK R
New York.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1898.

Conductor Gericke Has Recovered.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recovered from his recent severe illness and has resumed his duties. During his temporary absence from the leader's desk his place was taken by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Transcript

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1898

Charles A. Ellis makes official announcement of a grand opera season in Boston under his direction at the Boston Theatre, beginning Monday evening, Jan. 23, continuing for three weeks and including eighteen performances. The Ellis company is now giving a season of seven weeks at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. In addition to Melba, the following additional singers of his company will include: Mmes. Gadski, De Lussan, Olitzka, Toronta, Mattfeld, Van Cauteren and Ternina. The tenors will include: Messrs. Kraus, Bonnard, Pandolfini, Rissling, Van Hoose, Del Sol and Alvarez. The baritones and bassos will include: Messrs. Bensuade, Stehmann, Boudouresque, De Vries, Rains, Viviani, Rosa and Stury. The conductors will be: Walter Damrosch, Signor Armando Sepilli and Herr Fried. The instrumental work will be done by the New York Symphony Orchestra, which is the regular orchestra of the Ellis opera company. There will be a large chorus and ballet, and the stage will be under the competent direction of William Parry (who for years was the chief manager and producer of operas at the Metropolitan Opera House) and George Egener. The repertory will be selected from the following operas: "Aida," "Barber of Seville," "Carmen," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Die Meistersinger," "Faust," "Fidelio," "Flying Dutchman," "I Pagliacci," "Iris," "La Bohème," "Les Huguenots," "Lohengrin," "Lucia," "La Fille du Regiment," "Marriageof Figaro," "Manon," "Martha," "Mignon," "Romeo et Juliette," "Rigoletto." "Tannhäuser," "La Traviata," "Tristan und Isolde," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung." As announcements come from time to time they will tell of the further development of plans for the Boston season.

DAILY ADVERTISER.
DECEMBER 12, 1898.

ELLIS OPERA SEASON.

Charles Ellis announces 18 performances of grand opera at the Boston Theatre beginning Jan. 23. This is the organization at the head of which is Mme. Melba. At present a season of seven weeks is in progress in Philadelphia.

Mr. Ellis, whose conduct of the Symphony Orchestra under Col. Higginson has made him a figure familiar to Boston lovers of music, was last season generously received during his partnership with Walter Damrosch, and who now asks a continuance of that favor for the Ellis Opera Company.

The company includes, beside Mme. Melba, Mmes. Gadski, De Lussan, Olitzka, Toronta, Mattfeld, Van Cautren and Ternina, and Messrs. Kraus, Bonnard, Pandelfini, Rissling, Van Hoose, Del Sol, Alvarez, tenors: and Messrs. Bensuade, Stehmann, Boudomasque, De Vries, Rains, Viviani, Rosa and Stury, baritones and basses.

The company has ready all the famous French, Italian and Wagner operas and the announcement of choice from among them will be made later. The New York Symphony Orchestra accompanies the troupe under the leadership of Walter Damrosch, Sig. Seppilli and Herr Fried.

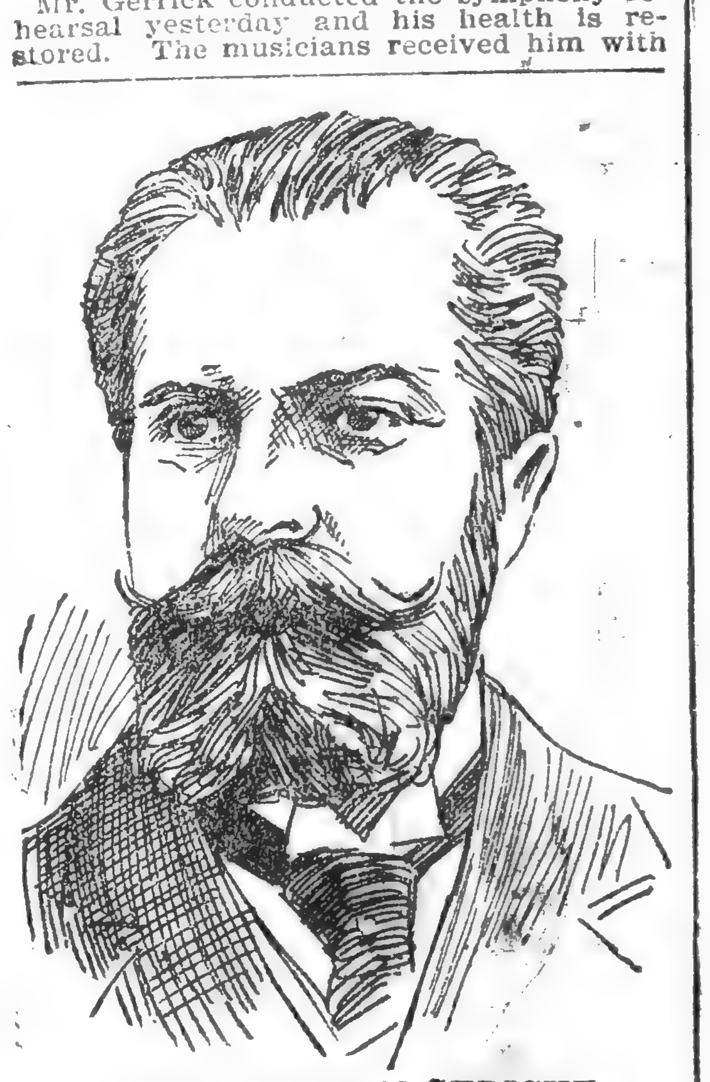
"This Country, with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."

Dec 21

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MR. GERICKE IMPROVED.

Mr. Gerrick conducted the symphony rehearsal yesterday and his health is restored. The musicians received him with great acclamations. The programme for this week needed to be changed because the orchestra parts of Frank's "Chafeur Maudit" did not arrive. The programme will be this:—



HERR WILHELM GERICKE,

Brahm's academic overture.
Beethoven's 5th piano concerto, "The Emperor," played by Mme. Hopekirk.
Bach's Pastorale, from the Christmas oratorio.
Mendelssohn's Italian symphony.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1898.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has entirely recovered from his recent illness and has resumed his duties with the orchestra.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the third and fourth of the series—took place at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening. A note on the program informed us that owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, Franz Kneisel would conduct both concerts. This was the program of the matinee:

Symphony No. 9, in C major	Schubert
Concerto (in one movement) for violin, in D major	Paganini
Symphonic poem, Launcelot and Elaine, op. 25 (First time in New York.)	MacDowell
Overture to Tannhauser	Wagner

Willy Burmester was the violin soloist, making his début in New York. He did not play the Paganini concerto as announced, substituting the familiar Mendelssohn in E minor. Mr. Burmester comes to us with a tremendous reputation for virtuosity which, it must be stated at once, is more than deserved. No technician, with the possible exception of César Thomson, has ever visited America. Burmester is a young man, slender, blond and extremely modest. He never obtrudes his personality, and about his playing is an atmosphere of repose, reticence and refinement that has not been matched since Sarasate was last here. He was ill on the voyage over, and at this matinee there was a reserve in his playing that was the result of disturbed health. He gave the familiar Mendelssohn with the utmost smoothness, the general conception being fine rather than broad. His tone is not large, but it is sweet, penetrating and musical, and his bowing, despite an angularity of attack, is almost miraculous; yet there was no sensational display in the concerto; all was solid, even academic.

The cadenza contained a few peculiarities, notably the slowness of the attack in the staccato arpeggios. The last movement was less brilliant than we expected, but it was superlatively smooth and musical. So far no attempt at mere display. But in the encore, a duo by Paganini for solo violin, the audience was fed to the full on the incredible. Such skips, double notes, runs in octaves, glissandi, trills, scales, harmonies and pizzicati we never heard. It sounded like a quartet party in full swing. It was a marvelous display, albeit the weakness of the music, from a severe viewpoint. Mr. Burmester was enthusiastically recalled. The accompaniment was nothing to boast of.

Mr. Kneisel led with authority and a complete knowledge of the score the Schubert symphony, the andante in particular being well played. The MacDowell music is twelve years old, but is fresh, sweet and poetic. It is in the composer's earlier manner, rich in color and most eloquent in the expression of chivalric love and the delirium of passion. Mr. MacDowell was even then a master of orchestration. The work was played with a due appreciation of its interesting content.

The program Thursday evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64	Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61	Van Beethoven
Symphonic Poem No. 1, Omphale's Spinning Wheel, op. 31,	Saint-Saens
Symphonic Poem No. 3, The Preludes	Liszt

Feminine, yet not without the note of sturdiness, was the interpretation of Beethoven's immortal concerto by Mr. Burmester. Naturally after Ysaye we are accustomed to a broad, virile, buoyant, passionate and dashing reading of the work, but Burmester preferred to give it to us as seen through his own glasses. It was not large, but it was extremely musical and fascinating because of the loving manner in which details were exposed. There was a wonderful cadenza in the first movement. The larghetto was tenderly delivered, the tone color being delicate, the phrasing expressive. The rondo was without breadth, but technically it was boldly played. For encore Burmester gave the G minor fugue from a Bach violin sonata in a way that delighted the purists. It was objective, ascetic in tone and the polyphony as clear as daylight.

Burmester is an individual artist, and his playing must be judged by his own standard. It is a high one. He achieved a great success in this city.

The Symphony, ever welcome as it is, was played with fire and freedom, the brass being very much in evidence. It cannot be truthfully said that the orchestra was on its best technical behavior, for there were slips and tonal inequalities, but Mr. Kneisel must be credited with doing excellent work and keeping his forces in hand. The superlatively fine playing of the first oboe, Mr. Longy, in the Saint-Saëns, was one of the artistic joys of the evening. He is an artist.

The band was heard at its brilliant best in Liszt's poem. There was plenty of applause from a large audience.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., December 19, 1898.

AFTER hearing two delightful Symphony concerts at the Academy, arranged and directed by Franz Kneisel, one wonders why the Boston Symphony Society sent abroad for a conductor. Mr. Kneisel evidently had the respect of the orchestra, for it was as completely with him as if he had been in command for years. His control was especially noticeable in the accompaniment to the violinist, which was read as an accompaniment should be, in perfect submission to the reading of the soloist. The same perfection in ensemble playing was heard that one finds in the Kneisel Quartet.

The reading of the music was dignified, impressive in its strength and full of fire and vigor. It was individual to a degree not often heard. Indeed the programs were marked by a rare individuality, for Burmester put his mark upon all that he played.

His mastery of the violin is as wonderful as Rosenthal's over the piano, but it is more characterful. Hypercriticism has said his tone is thin at times. I should rather call it fine and delicate, with the perfection of a flower. Burmester's interpretation of music is not riotous or tempestuous. A glance at the man would tell the reason. He is evidently refined, delicate in his perceptions and with a thorough mastery of himself. All this he puts into his work. It is an intellectual treat to hear him. One would gladly go again and again and listen to the shy, proud, nervous player, who impresses one by his gentlemanliness and ability.

He has all the marvelous skill in technic of those who make that their boast, but he has the mind to keep it subservient to the expression of the music which is vital with the power of reserve force and a classical purity of spirit.

The Friday matinee opened with the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5, in E minor, which is almost as sad as his sixth—his requiem—symphony, especially in the closing wail of the first movement. It is essentially Slavonic in character and was in strong contrast to the graceful beauty of Saint-Saëns' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," seldom given with such exquisite taste and beauty, and the magnificent "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz.

Burmester's selections for the afternoon was the Beethoven Concerto in D major. After the long orchestral introduction the solo instrument sounded light, but long before the player reached the marvelous cadenza the house was listening with an impressive stillness which showed a full appreciation of his masterful double stopping and manipulation. As to the accompaniment. It was perfect, with its echoes of the theme taken up by the different instruments and repeated pianissimo—echos of echos—which glided like wandering spirits, resting now with the flutes and again with the 'cellos.

The Saturday evening concert was ideal. Mr. Burmester substituted the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, and in three movements, or the Paganini Concerto in D major in one movement, therefore the management omitted the "Fingal's Cave" overture. The orchestral compositions were the noble Schumann Symphony in C major, never better given, especially in the adagio, and Liszt's grand symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The Mendelssohn Concerto was not as well calculated to display Mr. Burmester's ability as the Beethoven number of the afternoon, and his interpretation of it was different from any we have heard. But it was fine, and the mastery of technic displayed in the last, the allegro, movement was as remarkable as that shown in the afternoon. The artist responded to several recalls by bowing and finally played the Bach Chaconne without accompaniment. The accuracy of intonation and clearness of tone thus displayed were really wonderful.

Mr. Gericke, who is completely restored to health, will resume his duties as conductor at the public rehearsal and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

* * *

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1898

A MUNICIPAL OPERA HOUSE

Mayor Quincy Does Not Favor It, Although Mr. Gericke Would Like One

It is pleasing to learn that the plans for the new Music Hall are almost ready for the inspection of the stockholders and that they will be exhibited in a short time, although they will not be made public until the stockholders have had opportunity to examine them. It is very well established that the new building will be a music hall, pure and simple, and not an opera house, and that the concensus of interested and expert opinion is that Boston probably could support a music hall with profit, but that an opera house would be an exceedingly uncertain venture, as it could not certainly draw patronage for more than a few weeks in a year, while the erection of the building as an opera house would make impossible its effective use as a music hall, which must be long and narrow.

The project of a municipal opera house has been discussed more or less, and Mayor Quincy was asked his opinion. He said that the plan had never been considered. It would cost a great deal, he added, and at present the city had no funds to give to such a purpose. Incluentally. the mayor regretted that the present music hall was to be given up, because he thought a place of that character was needed in the down-town district. The city is now refitting Faneuil Hall, and that will make a good music hall, although a small one.

The idea of opera under municipal patronage was favored by some of the city's prominent musicians. William Gericke, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thought that it was quite feasible to give grand opera with a company of native singers, and that the company, if supported by the city, would be successful and would pay expenses in a year or two. At the outset it would not be necessary to build an opera house. some building now available might be used.

"There are," he continued, "plenty of fine singers in this country who would present grand opera successfully. But grand opera cannot be pushed; to give it properly takes time in rehearsing and in preparation."

B. J. Lang wanted opera, but it must be modest opera. Anything in this direction he would favor, he said. The way to start was from the ground, he thought, and the presentation of the most difficult operas might come in time. But, for the present, Mr. Lang wanted simple operas. "The giving of simple operas would be delightful," he explained, "operas which are normal, natural, mundane to the soil. We have many beautiful voices and tuneful voices, and we certainly have musical natures."

NEW YORK

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second matinee of the Boston symphony in this city took place on Wednesday last, and was notable as the final appearance here of Mr. Willy Burmeister, about whom so many press agents have been enthusiastic. He was heard in the Mendelssohn concerts, the other items on the programme being Schubert's C major symphony, the overture to "Tannhäuser," and MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25, given for the first time in New York. Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, Mr. Franz Kneisel conducted.

The Schubert symphony could have been much better given. The work of the orchestra is always of the first order, but both at this concert and at the two former ones this season there was a falling-off in the chiaroscuro of the instruments as to each other. The work of the violins, for instance, did not stand out as against that of the flutes, and their tones rather blurred than blended. Besides this, Mr. Kneisel as a conductor was not altogether satisfactory. His aims were too small, and the qualities that constitute his unequalled excellence as the first violin of the quartette that bears his name were in one sense a detriment to his success as a conductor. There was a lack of sensuous breadth and of geniality, especially noticeable in his reading of the symphony, and at no time did he bring out all the charm that belongs to Schubert's music, although he did not altogether overlook it.

The MacDowell symphony is a work of beauty and originality. It is a work, too, that cannot be judged on one hearing. Like all MacDowell's writings, it is full of scholarly thought, and there are one or two episodes of rare beauty. Ths orchestration is rich and effective, and the whole score bears evidence of the composer's intellectual strength. The somewhat languid poetry of the Arthurian romance is charmingly portrayed, and the whole work is a monument to American art. As to Burmeister, it was a matter of surprise that he was not better received. His tone is small, but his mastery of his instrument is wonderful. In fact, I doubt if there is an artist to-day who can equal him. Yet his technique is not of the Moritz Rosenthal sort. —technique for mere technique's sake. It is technique for the composition's sake, and it is always subordinate to the art ideal. He played beautifully. Mendelssohn is so often interpreted after a sickly sentimental fashion—a fashion altogether foreign to the composer's intention—that it was a rare treat to listen to work like Burmeister's. He is an artist beyond the ordinary—so far beyond, in fact, that most of his work is, and will remain, unintelligible to the crowd.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has now recovered from his illness, and has resumed his duties with the orchestra for this month's tour.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 177.

SATURDAY, DEC. 24, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

Academic Festival Overture	Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, E flat	Beethoven
Sinfonia from Christmas Oratorio	Bach
Symphony No. 4, "Italian"	Mendelssohn

Mme. Helen Hopekirk was the soloist.

Mr. Gericke, who resumed his place at the conductor's stand, completely recovered from his recent illness, was welcomed with a prolonged cordiality and fervor of plaudits that spoke sincerely the congratulations of the audience on his restoration to health and its pleasure in seeing him at his post once more. The programme was without novelties, but the familiar works were given with such finely sympathetic readings and with such finished and spirited performances by the orchestra that the concert was a delight from beginning to end. It is doubtful if the Brahms overture ever had here a more effective, beautifully colored and wholly interesting interpretation than Mr. Gericke accorded it last evening. The brilliant and joyous symphony was exquisitely read and played, and with a frankness of style and a broad and animated flexibility in regard to details that was fairly exhilarating.

Mme. Hopekirk's rendering of the exacting concerto was notably interesting, not only for the artistic feeling that distinguished it throughout, but for the grace and elegance of her technique, her keenly intelligent conception of the spirit of the work and her skill in setting it forth. The whole effort was charmingly characterized by an earnest devotion to the composer as the artist understood him, and although there have been given here broader and more vigorous presentations of the work, it would not be easy to remember one more refined, more conscientious and more sympathetic. Mme. Hopekirk was rewarded by warmly appreciative applause and hearty recalls. No artist could have reasonably desired finer assistance than was given by Mr. Gericke and his orchestra.

The programme for the next concert is: A Faust overture, Wagner; symphonic variations, Dvorak; Danse des Sylphes, Berlioz, and Symphony No 4, [illegible]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the third and fourth of the series—took place at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening. A note on the program informed us that owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, Franz Kneisel would conduct both concerts. This was the program of the matinee:

Symphony No. 9, in C major..............................Schubert
Concerto (in one movement) for violin, in D major......Paganini
Symphonic poem, Launcelot and Elaine, op. 25..........MacDowell
(First time in New York.)
Overture to Tannhauser ....Wagner

Willy Burmester was the violin soloist, making his début in New York. He did not play the Paganini concerto as announced, substituting the familiar Mendelssohn in E minor. Mr. Burmester comes to us with a tremendous reputation for virtuosity which, it must be stated at once, is more than deserved. No technician, with the possible exception of César Thomson, has ever visited America. Burmester is a young man, slender, blond and extremely modest. He never obtrudes his personality, and about his playing is an atmosphere of repose, reticence and refinement that has not been matched since Sarasate was last here. He was ill on the voyage over, and at this matinee there was a reserve in his playing that was the result of disturbed health. He gave the familiar Mendelssohn with the utmost smoothness, the general conception being fine rather than broad. His tone is not large, but it is sweet, penetrating and musical, and his bowing, despite an angularity of attack, is almost miraculous; yet there was no sensational display in the concerto; all was solid, even academic.

The cadenza contained a few peculiarities, notably the slowness of the attack in the staccato arpeggios. The last movement was less brilliant than we expected, but it was superlatively smooth and musical. So far no attempt at mere display. But in the encore, a duo by Paganini for solo violin, the audience was fed to the full on the incredible. Such skips, double notes, runs in octaves, glissandi, trills, scales, harmonies and pizzicati we never heard. It sounded like a quartet party in full swing. It was a marvelous display, albeit the weakness of the music, from a severe viewpoint. Mr. Burmester was enthusiastically recalled. The accompaniment was nothing to boast of.

Mr. Kneisel led with authority and a complete knowledge of the score the Schubert symphony, the andante in particular being well played. The MacDowell music is twelve years old, but is fresh, sweet and poetic. It is in the composer's earlier manner, rich in color and most eloquent in the expression of chivalric love and the delirium of passion. Mr. MacDowell was even then a master of orchestration. The work was played with a due appreciation of its interesting content.

The program Thursday evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64..................Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61 ....Van Beethoven
Symphonic Poem No. 1, Omphale's Spinning Wheel, op. 31,
Saint-Saens
Symphonic Poem No. 3, The Preludes.........................Liszt

Feminine, yet not without the note of sturdiness, was the interpretation of Beethoven's immortal concerto by Mr. Burmester. Naturally after Ysaye we are accustomed to a broad, virile, buoyant, passionate and dashing reading of the work, but Burmester preferred to give it to us as seen through his own glasses. It was not large, but it was extremely musical and fascinating because of the loving manner in which details were exposed. There was a wonderful cadenza in the first movement. The larghetto was tenderly delivered, the tone color being delicate, the phrasing expressive. The rondo was without breadth, but technically it was boldly played. For encore Burmester gave the G minor fugue from a Bach violin sonata in a way that delighted the purists. It was objective, ascetic in tone and the polyphony as clear as daylight.

Burmester is an individual artist, and his playing must be judged by his own standard. It is a high one. He achieved a great success in this city.

The Symphony, ever welcome as it is, was played with fire and freedom, the brass being very much in evidence. It cannot be truthfully said that the orchestra was on its best technical behavior, for there were slips and tonal inequalities, but Mr. Kneisel must be credited with doing excellent work and keeping his forces in hand. The superlatively fine playing of the first oboe, Mr. Longy, in the Saint-Saëns, was one of the artistic joys of the evening. He is an artist.

The band was heard at its brilliant best in Liszt's poem. There was plenty of applause from a large audience.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., December 19, 1898.

AFTER hearing two delightful Symphony concerts at the Academy, arranged and directed by Franz Kneisel, one wonders why the Boston Symphony Society sent abroad for a conductor. Mr. Kneisel evidently had the respect of the orchestra, for it was as completely with him as if he had been in command for years. His control was especially noticeable in the accompaniment to the violinist, which was read as an accompaniment should be, in perfect submission to the reading of the soloist. The same perfection in ensemble playing was heard that one finds in the Kneisel Quartet.

The reading of the music was dignified, impressive in its strength and full of fire and vigor. It was individual to a degree not often heard. Indeed the programs were marked by a rare individuality, for Burmester put his mark upon all that he played.

His mastery of the violin is as wonderful as Rosenthal's over the piano, but it is more characterful. Hypercriticism has said his tone is thin at times. I should rather call it fine and delicate, with the perfection of a flower. Burmester's interpretation of music is not riotous or tempestuous. A glance at the man would tell the reason. He is evidently refined, delicate in his perceptions and with a thorough mastery of himself. All this he puts into his work. It is an intellectual treat to hear him. One would gladly go again and again and listen to the shy, proud, nervous player, who impresses one by his gentlemanliness and ability.

He has all the marvelous skill in technic of those who make that their boast, but he has the mind to keep it subservient to the expression of the music which is vital with the power of reserve force and a classical purity of spirit.

The Friday matinee opened with the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5, in E minor, which is almost as sad as his sixth—his requiem—symphony, especially in the closing wail of the first movement. It is essentially Slavonic in character and was in strong contrast to the graceful beauty of Saint-Saëns' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," seldom given with such exquisite taste and beauty, and the magnificent "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz.

Burmester's selections for the afternoon was the Beethoven Concerto in D major. After the long orchestral introduction the solo instrument sounded light, but long before the player reached the marvelous cadenza the house was listening with an impressive stillness which showed a full appreciation of his masterful double stopping and manipulation. As to the accompaniment. It was perfect, with its echoes of the theme taken up by the different instruments and repeated pianissimo—echos of echos—which glided like wandering spirits, resting now with the flutes and again with the 'cellos.

The Saturday evening concert was ideal. Mr. Burmester substituted the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, and in three movements, or the Paganini Concerto in D major in one movement, therefore the management omitted the "Fingal's Cave" overture. The orchestral compositions were the noble Schumann Symphony in C major, never better given, especially in the adagio, and Liszt's grand symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The Mendelssohn Concerto was not as well calculated to display Mr. Burmester's ability as the Beethoven number of the afternoon, and his interpretation of it was different from any we have heard. But it was fine, and the mastery of technic displayed in the last, the allegro, movement was as remarkable as that shown in the afternoon. The artist responded to several recalls by bowing and finally played the Bach Chaconne without accompaniment. The accuracy of intonation and clearness of tone thus displayed were really wonderful.

Mr. Gericke, who is completely restored to health, will resume his duties as conductor at the public rehearsal and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

* * *

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1898

A MUNICIPAL OPERA HOUSE

Mayor Quincy Does Not Favor It, Although Mr. Gericke Would Like One

It is pleasing to learn that the plans for the new Music Hall are almost ready for the inspection of the stockholders and that they will be exhibited in a short time, although they will not be made public until the stockholders have had opportunity to examine them. It is very well established that the new building will be a music hall, pure and simple, and not an opera house, and that the concensus of interested and expert opinion is that Boston probably could support a music hall with profit, but that an opera house would be an exceedingly uncertain venture, as it could not certainly draw patronage for more than a few weeks in a year, while the erection of the building as an opera house would make impossible its effective use as a music hall, which must be long and narrow.

The project of a municipal opera house has been discussed more or less, and Mayor Quincy was asked his opinion. He said that the plan had never been considered. It would cost a great deal, he added, and at present the city had no funds to give to such a purpose. Incidentally, the mayor regretted that the present music hall was to be given up, because he thought a place of that character was needed in the down-town district. The city is now refitting Faneuil Hall, and that will make a good music hall, although a small one.

The idea of opera under municipal patronage was favored by some of the city's prominent musicians. William Gericke, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thought that it was quite feasible to give grand opera with a company of native singers, and that the company, if supported by the city, would be successful and would pay expenses in a year or two. At the outset it would not be necessary to build an opera house, some building now available might be used.

"There are," he continued, "plenty of fine singers in this country who would present grand opera successfully. But grand opera cannot be pushed; to give it properly takes time in rehearsing and in preparation."

B. J. Lang wanted opera, but it must be modest opera. Anything in this direction he would favor, he said. The way to start was from the ground, he thought, and the presentation of the most difficult operas might come in time. But, for the present, Mr. Lang wanted simple operas. "The giving of simple operas would be delightful," he explained, "operas which are normal, natural, mundane to the soil. We have many beautiful voices and tuneful voices, and we certainly have musical natures."

HOME

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second matinee of the Boston symphony in this city took place on Wednesday last, and was notable as the final appearance here of Mr. Willy Burmeister, about whom so many press agents have been enthusiastic. He was heard in the Mendelssohn concerts, the other items on the programme being Schubert's C major symphony, the overture to "Tannhäuser," and MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25, given for the first time in New York. Owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke, Mr. Franz Kneisel conducted.

The Schubert symphony could have been much better given. The work of the orchestra is always of the first order, but both at this concert and at the two former ones this season there was a falling-off in the chiaroscuro of the instruments as to each other. The work of the violins, for instance, did not stand out as against that of the flutes, and their tones rather blurred than blended. Besides this, Mr. Kneisel as a conductor was not altogether satisfactory. His aims were too small, and the qualities that constitute his unequalled excellence as the first violin of the quartette that bears his name were in one sense a detriment to his success as a conductor. There was a lack of sensuous breadth and of geniality, especially noticeable in his reading of the symphony, and at no time did he bring out all the charm that belongs to Schubert's music, although he did not altogether overlook it.

The MacDowell symphony is a work of beauty and originality. It is a work, too, that cannot be judged on one hearing. Like all MacDowell's writings, it is full of scholarly thought, and there are one or two episodes of rare beauty. The orchestration is rich and effective, and the whole score bears evidence of the composer's intellectual strength. The somewhat languid poetry of the Arthurian romance is charmingly portrayed, and the whole work is a monument to American art. As to Burmeister, it was a matter of surprise that he was not better received. His tone is small, but his mastery of his instrument is wonderful. In fact, I doubt if there is an artist to-day who can equal him. Yet his technique is not of the Moritz Rosenthal sort. —technique for mere technique's sake. It is technique for the composition's sake, and it is always subordinate to the art ideal. He played beautifully. Mendelssohn is so often interpreted after a sickly sentimental fashion—a fashion altogether foreign to the composer's intention—that it was a rare treat to listen to work like Burmeister's. He is an artist beyond the ordinary—so far beyond, in fact, that most of his work is, and will remain, unintelligible to the crowd.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has now recovered from his illness, and has resumed his duties with the orchestra for this month's tour.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIV., NO. 177.

SATURDAY, DEC. 24, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

Academic Festival Overture............Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, E flat....
Beethoven
Sinfonia from Christmas Oratorio.........Bach
Symphony No. 4, "Italian".......Mendelssohn

Mme. Helen Hopekirk was the soloist.

Mr. Gericke, who resumed his place at the conductor's stand, completely recovered from his recent illness, was welcomed with a prolonged cordiality and fervor of plaudits that spoke sincerely the congratulations of the audience on his restoration to health and its pleasure in seeing him at his post once more. The programme was without novelties, but the familiar works were given with such finely sympathetic readings and with such finished and spirited performances by the orchestra that the concert was a delight from beginning to end. It is doubtful if the Brahms overture ever had here a more effective, beautifully colored and wholly interesting interpretation than Mr. Gericke accorded it last evening. The brilliant and joyous symphony was exquisitely read and played, and with a frankness of style and a broad and animated flexibility in regard to details that was fairly exhilarating.

Mme. Hopekirk's rendering of the exacting concerto was notably interesting, not only for the artistic feeling that distinguished it throughout, but for the grace and elegance of her technique, her keenly intelligent conception of the spirit of the work and her skill in setting it forth. The whole effort was charmingly characterized by an earnest devotion to the composer as the artist understood him, and although there have been given here broader and more vigorous presentations of the work, it would not be easy to remember one more refined, more conscientious and more sympathetic. Mme. Hopekirk was rewarded by warmly appreciative applause and hearty recalls. No artist could have reasonably desired finer assistance than was given by Mr. Gericke and his orchestra.

The programme for the next concert is: A Faust overture, Wagner; symphonic variations, Dvorak; Danse des Sylphes, Berlioz, and Symphony No 4, Beethoven.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1898.

Mr. Gericke Conducts a Friday Symphony Concert.

The king has returned to his own again, and all who dwell on Boston earth, now live in plenty, joy and mirth, as the old royalists used to carol at the epoch of the restoration.

Mr. Gericke has been restored to health, and, after a prolonged combat with the grip, has returned to his conductorship unimpaired in ability and brilliancy.

It was peculiarly fitting, therefore, that the programme of last night's symphony concert should begin with an expression of joy, and this emotion found its vent in a hearty greeting by the audience, and immediately after, in a sprightly interpretation of Brahm's "Academic Overture," in which three student's songs are shaken up together in the liveliest manner.

The bassoon deserves an especial word of praise for the manner in which it clucked out—"Was komnit dort von der Heeh," a song quite as well known to the German student as "Upidee" is to the denizen of Harvard. There is no better proof of the value of the folk-song (even the students' Bacchanalian song) in classical music, than this employment of three jolly songs as themes in an overture of sonata movement form.

The overture is "academic" in about the same sense that "bloody Monday" is.

After this, there came the best of piano concertos, the "Emperor," the great Beethoven concerto in E-flat, No. 5.

This work has been fittingly called "a symphony with a thread of obbligato piano running through it; "it is the most masculine of all concertos, except, possibly, Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Ending like that work, with a rondo movement, it has infinitely more to say in its finale than the violin composition.

It is essentially a masculine work, and few female pianists have the ability to portray its virile power. Madame Hopekirk made a good impression in the work; there might have been more power in portions of the first and last movements, but everything was clear and intelligible, the interpretation had a commendable degree of surety and authority.

The orchestra did excellent work in the presentation of the superb themes of the first movement and in the dashing subject of the Rondo. The expression of the Adagio was excellently caught up by soloist and orchestra, and this became the most perfect part of the work.

The finale, with its duet for piano and kettle drum at the end, went with considerable dash. Madame Hopekirk was heartily recalled twice, at the conclusion. The "Pastoral Symphony" from the Bach "Christmas Oratorio," was a seasonable selection.

Remembering that "Symphony" in Bach's time meant only prelude, interlude or postlude, one can understand that this pastoral music is a free representation of the shepherds marching to the cradle of the Savior, a picture exactly like that given by Handel in the so-called "Pastoral Symphony" of the "Messiah."

This is, however, much the more developed work of the two, and, instead of the muted violins of the Anglo-German, we here listen to a duet of English horns, which is beautiful and tranquil in the highest degree.

Probably Bach here demanded the oboe di caccia, but that obsolete instrument is well replaced by the English horn (a larger oboe),in the modern score.

The work has a tranquility that carries one far away from the workaday world; it is cool, calm and bright, like the day in June that the poet sings of, and had a very different flavor from the rollicking overture which began the concert, and which, by the way, had some baleful touches of muted horn, which must have indicated "Katzenjammer," or worse yet, that fearful student disease called "Haarweh" ("Hair-ache") in which each particular hair has its own tale of sorrow.

The English horns were charmingly played, and the Pastorale was one of the gems of the concert. Once more we had our symphony at the end of the programme, after the Gerickian system which believes that the effect of a large musical work should not be disturbed by a lesser one following it. On this occasion the symphony was the "Italian," by Mendelssohn.

Not as great a work as the "Scotch" symphony, it yet has its moments of power, and its simple and pathetic slow movement, with its mournful viola color, loses none of its charm with age. We do not belong to the ranks of those who believe that Mendelssohn is ready to be laid upon the shelf; his direct melody (would that the moderns had just a little of it!) his clear form, his surety in counterpoint, all make him a model in these dissonant days.

Mendelssohn was under-passionate, but there is no fear of the latter-day composers catching this fault.

The first movement went with admirable dash and brilliancy and the three-noted figure out of which Mendelssohn evolves so many thoughts, was given with commendable power.

The reading of the slow movement, already described, was perfection; not a bit of sentimentality, no tendency to bathos, but the constant broadening which makes this movement a fit companion to the slow movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, was in every part.

Then come the "horns of Elfland faintly blowing" in the beautiful Scherzo. The final Saltarello is an anti-climax and one wishes that Mendelssohn had not spoiled his work by such a lame and impotent conclusion.

It was a strange affair to listen to a symphony concert on Friday night; as weird and uncanny as to eat beans and brown bread on Saturday morning or to have the Handel and Haydn sing "The Messiah" on the Fourth of July; nevertheless the result was an auspicious one. The orchestra seemed happy at the return of its leader and played with especial spirit, the public seemed overjoyed to have its conductor back again and applauded with notable vigor, and the programme reflected the joy of Christmastide from the jollity of the Brahms's overture to the presto caperings of the Mendelssohn "Saltarello;" wherefore the critic dips his pen in honey and joins in the jubilation.

Louis C. Elson.

Record. Dec. 24

Mr. Gericke Conducts a Friday Symphony Concert.

The king has returned to his own again, and all who dwell on Boston earth, now live in plenty, joy and mirth, as the old royalists used to carol at the epoch of the restoration.

Mr. Gericke has been restored to health, and, after a prolonged combat with the grip, has returned to his conductorship unimpaired in ability and brilliancy.

It was peculiarly fitting, therefore, that the programme of last night's symphony concert should begin with an expression of joy, and this emotion found its vent in a hearty greeting by the audience, and immediately after, in a sprightly interpretation of Brahm's "Academic Overture," in which three student's songs are shaken up together in the liveliest manner.

The bassoon deserves an especial word of praise for the manner in which it clucked out—"Was komnit dort von der Heeh," a song quite as well known to the German student as "Upidee" is to the denizen of Harvard. There is no better proof of the value of the folk-song (even the students' Bacchanalian song) in classical music, than this employment of three jolly songs as themes in an overture of sonata movement form.

The overture is "academic" in about the same sense that "bloody Monday" is.

After this, there came the best of piano concertos, the "Emperor," the great Beethoven concerto in E-flat, No. 5.

This work has been fittingly called "a symphony with a thread of obbligato piano running through it; "it is the most masculine of all concertos, except, possibly, Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Ending like that work, with a rondo movement, it has infinitely more to say in its finale than the violin composition.

It is essentially a masculine work, and few female pianists have the ability to portray its virile power. Madame Hopekirk made a good impression in the work; there might have been more power in portions of the first and last movements, but everything was clear and intelligible, the interpretation had a commendable degree of surety and authority.

The orchestra did excellent work in the presentation of the superb themes of the first movement and in the dashing subject of the Rondo. The expression of the Adagio was excellently caught up by soloist and orchestra, and this became the most perfect part of the work.

The finale, with its duet for piano and kettle drum at the end, went with considerable dash. Madame Hopekirk was heartily recalled twice, at the conclusion. The "Pastoral Symphony" from the Bach "Christmas Oratorio," was a seasonable selection.

Remembering that "Symphony" in Bach's time meant only prelude, interlude or postlude, one can understand that this pastoral music is a free representation of the shepherds marching to the cradle of the Savior, a picture exactly like that given by Handel in the so-called "Pastoral Symphony" of the "Messiah."

This is, however, much the more developed work of the two, and, instead of the muted violins of the Anglo-German, we here listen to a duet of English horns, which is beautiful and tranquil in the highest degree.

Probably Bach here demanded the oboe di caccia, but that obsolete instrument is well replaced by the English horn (a larger oboe),in the modern score.

The work has a tranquility that carries one far away from the workaday world; it is cool, calm and bright, like the day in June that the poet sings of, and had a very different flavor from the rollicking overture which began the concert, and which, by the way, had some baleful touches of muted horn, which must have indicated "Katzenjammer," or worse yet, that fearful student disease called "Haarweh" ("Hair-ache") in which each particular hair has its own tale of sorrow.

The English horns were charmingly played, and the Pastorale was one of the gems of the concert. Once more we had our symphony at the end of the programme, after the Gerickian system which believes that the effect of a large musical work should not be disturbed by a lesser one following it. On this occasion the symphony was the "Italian," by Mendelssohn.

Mendelssohn was under-passionate, but there is no fear of the latter-day composers catching this fault.

The first movement went with admirable dash and brilliancy and the three-noted figure out of which Mendelssohn evolves so many thoughts, was given with commendable power.

The reading of the slow movement, already described, was perfection; not a bit of sentimentality, no tendency to bathos, but the constant broadening which makes this movement a fit companion to the slow movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, was in every part.

Then come the "horns of Elfland faintly blowing" in the beautiful Scherzo. The final Saltarello is an anti-climax and one wishes that Mendelssohn had not spoiled his work by such a lame and impotent conclusion.

It was a strange affair to listen to a symphony concert on Friday night; as weird and uncanny as to eat beans and brown bread on Saturday morning or to have the Handel and Haydn sing "The Messiah" on the Fourth of July; nevertheless the result was an auspicious one. The orchestra seemed happy at the return of its leader and played with especial spirit, the public seemed overjoyed to have its conductor back again and applauded with notable vigor, and the programme reflected the joy of Christmastide from the jollity of the Brahms's overture to the presto caperings of the Mendelssohn "Saltarello;" wherefore the critic dips his pen in honey and joins in the jubilation.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible]
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program of the ninth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall yesterday evening, was:

Brahms: Akademische Ouvertüre, opus 80.
Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73.
J. S. Bach: Sinfonia ("Hirten-Musik") from the Christmas Oratorio.
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian," opus 90.
Mme. Helen Hopekirk was the pianist.

Mr. Gericke was most enthusiastically received on his return to his post after his severe illness; like many a man to whom convalescence is also rest he showed no signs of what he had just been through, but seemed fresh and alert as ever. Certainly his beat has lost none of its vigor.

Brahms's "Academic" was admirably read and played: with great clearness and finish, with conspicuous brilliancy; the whole was held together as with bands of steel, while, in more than one passage, we felt a to us new touch of poetry. In the Bach Pastoral we think Mr. Gericke has at last found the right reading; by this we do not mean that he may not have found it long ago, for, if the piece was played during his first directorship here, we forget the performance, but that his reading seems to us to have at least one manifest advantage over any we had heard from other conductors. This Pastoral of Bach's has long passed for one of the most difficult things in the orchestra's repertory; on more than one occasion we have been led to remark upon the inherent difficulty of the Siciliano rhythm, that succession of dotted triplets which it is so hard to make flow smoothly in too slow a tempo. We are tempted to repeat once more the old story of Ferdinand David's coming to the station—or was it coach-office then?—in Leipzig, to receive Liszt, on his arrival from Frankfort. "You look tired," said Liszt, after the first greetings were over. "Yes," replied David, "I am; we have been working all the afternoon, trying to get the orchestra to play a dotted triplet, and we can't do it;" "Curious!" said Liszt, "that's the very thing Ferdinand Hiller told me, when he saw me off in Frankfort!" To our thinking, this movement of Bach's has always been taken too slow here before, making it all but impossible for the orchestra to play the peculiar rhythm smoothly and well together; Mr. Gericke takes it at a tempo at which the rhythm, so to speak, plays itself, the orchestra cannot miss it; in a word, he takes it at the natural tempo. The performance was exquisite, and showed forth all the divine beauty of the music. Perhaps Mr. Gericke now and then forced a forte somewhat heroically out of the pastoral mood; but there is doubtless warrant for this in the score, which we have not seen for some years.

But the crown of the concert was the playing of the "Italian" symphony! At last, at last we had a true Mendelssohnish "Allegro vivace!" How that first movement bubbled and sparkled, like water from a live spring, like the opening of champagne! Neither did this brisk tempo bring the least unclearness with it, the least negligence or inexpressiveness in phrasing, the least blurring of details. That was the movement as one feels that Mendelssohn himself must have conceived it, full of life and vigor, bright with Italian sunshine. The slow movement, too, was admirably done; a little too large a tone from the violins at times, perhaps, but nothing that could be called coarseness. The minuet went to a charm; only we felt that, in that wonderful middle passage for horns and bassoons, Mr. Gerricke's "expressive" holding back the rhythm was rather de trop; it brought the passage dangerously near to the male part-song mood—a thing of which one does not like to be reminded. But the playing of the finale was a wonder; to us, a complete refutation of all that has been said against this movement from time to time. So played, this Saltarello of Mendelssohn's is simply intoxicating. Especially fine was the way in which the contrast was brought out when the music falls from the lightly skipping Roman Saltarello into the more smoothly flowing, more demonic Neapolitan Tarantella; there was something almost uncanny in those intertwining triplet-passages! Ah! the club to kill Mendelssohn with has not been hewn yet!

There was much that was very fine indeed in Mme. Hopekirk's playing of Beethoven's "Emperor." If she did not quite reach the heroic level of some parts of the first movement, her playing was in general excellently appreciative of the true character of the music, straightforward, not trying to do too much. By the way, it occurs to us that it might be well, in view of the enormously increased tone of the modern pianoforte, to modify those "piano" and "Fp" marks in the orchestral parts in the long octave-passage of the solo instrument; as now played, one does not hear the descending counter scales of the strings after the first accent. Mme. Hopekirk's playing of the Adagio was distinctly good; notably where the pianoforte takes the principal theme, near the middle of the movement: full of feeling, but stopping short of sentimentality. In the final rondo we liked her less; she seemed to us to miss the humor of that "espressivo" chromatic phrase in the first theme, and, upon the whole, to try to make too much of certain effects. Toward the end, too, we should have liked a heartier, a more unreserved plunging into the ebullient rhythm; one felt the pianist to be somewhat over-prudently on her guard against her fingers running away with her. There are moments when Beethoven throws the reins upon his steed's neck, and becomes regardless of "distinction." But it was, as a whole, an excellent performance of one of the greatest works ever written, and was warmly applauded by the audience.

The next programme is: Wagner, Eine Faust-Ouvertüre; Dvorak, symphonic variations; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, December 24, 1898.

MUSICAL BALTIMORE.

BALTIMORE, MD., Dec. 19, 1898.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Tuesday has called forth the most varied comments. Every one agreed that the work of Franz Kneisel as temporary director was satisfactory in all respects. He had his men in good command and conducted admirably. The especially problematical part of the concert seemed to center in the soloist—Burmester. Many in the audience found his tone too small, and his interpretation lacking in enthusiasm. These critics claimed that there were many in the orchestra who could have played the Mendelssohn Concerto as well as he.

I do not believe it. His tone although small had the most peculiarly perfect carrying power and possessed a purity and roundness of quality that was entrancing. As far as his alleged lack of temperament is concerned, his manly and unsentimental manner of playing was in delightful contrast to the mawkishness of the usual violinist. In spite of the diversified opinions the young artist received a most encouraging and flattering reception.

The symphony undertaken was the Schubert in C. It went off in excellent shape and Mr. Kneisel found himself quite the lion of the hour. The other numbers were the Tannhaeuser Overture and the MacDowell Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine."

WILLY BURMEISTER AGAIN.

On Thursday evening of last week, Willy Burmester was again the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall. In the unique concert by Beethoven the best possible opportunity was offered to him to reveal his musicianship, of which he had given but scant proof on the previous occasion.

While he displayed somewhat more breadth of style, he failed to convince. The first movement was played accurately, but with little warmth of feeling. One received the impression as if he were saving his strength for the cadenza only, for which he selected that of Ferdinand Laub, a very un-Beethovenish conglomeration of technical difficulties. The whole cadenza business is a nuisance and should be dropped entirely.

Burmester is a virtuoso of a small pattern only, and MUSICAL AMERICA has a right to ask how it is possible that such mediocre artists can acquire a reputation in musical Germany. There is not a trace of magnetism in his personality, and with all his pyrotechnics he fails to find the way to the public's heart. New York audiences may occasionally be deceived by a brilliant display of technic, but as a rule they save their enthusiasm for artists of soul and brains.

AUGUST SPANUTH.

MUSICAL BROOKLYN.

BROOKLYN, Dec. 20, 1898.

With Franz Kneisel as conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave two concerts at the Academy of Music last week under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. For the Friday matinee the programme included Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Saint Saëns symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Willy Burmester played the Beethoven concerto. At the Saturday night concert the orchestra played the Schumann Symphony in C major, and Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Préludes." Mr. Burmester, who was again the soloist, played the Mendelssohn concerto and the Bach chaconne in G minor. Both concerts gave high pleasure to large audiences. The Brooklyn critics united with those in Manhattan in praise of Kneisel's conducting, and the beauty of Mr. Burmester's tone.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1898.

Mr. Gericke Conducts a Friday Symphony Concert.

The king has returned to his own again, and all who dwell on Boston earth, now live in plenty, joy and mirth, as the old royalists used to carol at the epoch of the restoration.

Mr. Gericke has been restored to health, and, after a prolonged combat with the grip, has returned to his conductorship unimpaired in ability and brilliancy.

It was peculiarly fitting, therefore, that the programme of last night's symphony concert should begin with an expression of joy, and this emotion found its vent in a hearty greeting by the audience, and immediately after, in a sprightly interpretation of Brahm's "Academic Overture," in which three student's songs are shaken up together in the liveliest manner.

The bassoon deserves an especial word of praise for the manner in which it clucked out—"Was komnit dort von der Hoeh," a song quite as well known to the German student as "Upidee" is to the denizen of Harvard. There is no better proof of the value of the folk-song (even the students' Bacchanalian song) in classical music, than this employment of three jolly songs as themes in an overture of sonata movement form.

The overture is "academic" in about the same sense that "bloody Monday" is.

After this, there came the best of piano concertos, the "Emperor," the great Beethoven concerto in E-flat, No. 5.

This work has been fittingly called "a symphony with a thread of obbligato piano running through it; "it is the most masculine of all concertos, except, possibly, Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Ending like that work, with a rondo movement, it has infinitely more to say in its finale than the violin composition.

It is essentially a masculine work, and few female pianists have the ability to portray its virile power. Madame Hopekirk made a good impression in the work; there might have been more power in portions of the first and last movements, but everything was clear and intelligible, the interpretation had a commendable degree of surety and authority.

The orchestra did excellent work in the presentation of the superb themes of the first movement and in the dashing subject of the Rondo. The expression of the Adagio was excellently caught up by soloist and orchestra, and this became the most perfect part of the work.

The finale, with its duet for piano and kettle drum at the end, went with considerable dash. Madame Hopekirk was heartily recalled twice, at the conclusion. The "Pastoral Symphony" from the Bach "Christmas Oratorio," was a seasonable selection.

Remembering that "Symphony" in Bach's time meant only prelude, interlude or postlude, one can understand that this pastoral music is a free representation of the shepherds marching to the cradle of the Savior, a picture exactly like that given by Handel in the so-called "Pastoral Symphony" of the "Messiah."

This is, however, much the more developed work of the two, and, instead of the muted violins of the Anglo-German, we here listen to a duet of English horns, which is beautiful and tranquil in the highest degree.

Probably Bach here demanded the oboe di caccia, but that obsolete instrument is well replaced by the English horn (a larger oboe),in the modern score.

The work has a tranquility that carries one far away from the workaday world; it is cool, calm and bright, like the day in June that the poet sings of, and had a very different flavor from the rollicking overture which began the concert, and which, by the way, had some baleful touches of muted horn, which must have indicated "Katzenjammer," or worse yet, that fearful student disease called "Haarweh" ("Hair-ache") in which each particular hair has its own tale of sorrow.

The English horns were charmingly played, and the Pastorale was one of the gems of the concert. Once more we had our symphony at the end of the programme, after the Gerickian system which believes that the effect of a large musical work should not be disturbed by a lesser one following it. On this occasion the symphony was the "Italian," by Mendelssohn.

Not as great a work as the "Scotch" symphony, it yet has its moments of power, and its simple and pathetic slow movement, with its mournful viola color, loses none of its charm with age. We do not belong to the ranks of those who believe that Mendelssohn is ready to be laid upon the shelf; his direct melody, (would that the moderns had just a little of it!) his clear form, his surety in counterpoint, all make him a model in these dissonant days.

Mendelssohn was under-passionate, but there is no fear of the latter-day composers catching this fault.

The first movement went with admirable dash and brilliancy and the three-noted figure out of which Mendelssohn evolves so many thoughts, was given with commendable power.

The reading of the slow movement, already described, was perfection; not a bit of sentimentality, no tendency to bathos, but the constant broadening which makes this movement a fit companion to the slow movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, was in every part.

Then come the "horns of Elfland faintly blowing" in the beautiful Scherzo. The final Saltarello is an anti-climax and one wishes that Mendelssohn had not spoiled his work by such a lame and impotent conclusion.

It was a strange affair to listen to a symphony concert on Friday night; as weird and uncanny as to eat beans and brown bread on Saturday morning or to have the Handel and Haydn sing "The Messiah" on the Fourth of July; nevertheless the result was an auspicious one. The orchestra seemed happy at the return of its leader and played with especial spirit, the public seemed overjoyed to have its conductor back again and applauded with notable vigor, and the programme reflected the joy of Christmastide from the jollity of the Brahms's overture to the presto caperings of the Mendelssohn "Saltarello;" wherefore the critic dips his pen in honey and joins in the jubilation.

Louis C. Elson.

Record

Mr. Gericke Conducts a Friday Symphony Concert.

The king has returned to his own again, and all who dwell on Boston earth, now live in plenty, joy and mirth, as the old royalists used to carol at the epoch of the restoration.

Mr. Gericke has been restored to health, and, after a prolonged combat with the grip, has returned to his conductorship unimpaired in ability and brilliancy.

It was peculiarly fitting, therefore, that the programme of last night's symphony concert should begin with an expression of joy, and this emotion found its vent in a hearty greeting by the audience, and immediately after, in a sprightly interpretation of Brahm's "Academic Overture," in which three student's songs are shaken up together in the liveliest manner.

The bassoon deserves an especial word of praise for the manner in which it clucked out—"Was komnit dort von der Hoeh," a song quite as well known to the German student as "Upidee" is to the denizen of Harvard. There is no better proof of the value of the folk-song (even the students' Bacchanalian song) in classical music, than this employment of three jolly songs as themes in an overture of sonata movement form.

The overture is "academic" in about the same sense that "bloody Monday" is.

After this, there came the best of piano concertos, the "Emperor," the great Beethoven concerto in E-flat, No. 5.

This work has been fittingly called "a symphony with a thread of obbligato piano running through it; "it is the most masculine of all concertos, except, possibly, Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Ending like that work, with a rondo movement, it has infinitely more to say in its finale than the violin composition.

It is essentially a masculine work, and few female pianists have the ability to portray its virile power. Madame Hopekirk made a good impression in the work; there might have been more power in portions of the first and last movements, but everything was clear and intelligible, the interpretation had a commendable degree of surety and authority.

The orchestra did excellent work in the presentation of the superb themes of the first movement and in the dashing subject of the Rondo. The expression of the Adagio was excellently caught up by soloist and orchestra, and this became the most perfect part of the work.

The finale, with its duet for piano and kettle drum at the end, went with considerable dash. Madame Hopekirk was heartily recalled twice, at the conclusion. The "Pastoral Symphony" from the Bach "Christmas Oratorio," was a seasonable selection.

Remembering that "Symphony" in Bach's time meant only prelude, interlude or postlude, one can understand that this pastoral music is a free representation of the shepherds marching to the cradle of the Savior, a picture exactly like that given by Handel in the so-called "Pastoral Symphony" of the "Messiah."

This is, however, much the more developed work of the two, and, instead of the muted violins of the Anglo-German, we here listen to a duet of English horns, which is beautiful and tranquil in the highest degree.

Probably Bach here demanded the oboe di caccia, but that obsolete instrument is well replaced by the English horn (a larger oboe),in the modern score.

The work has a tranquility that carries one far away from the workaday world; it is cool, calm and bright, like the day in June that the poet sings of, and had a very different flavor from the rollicking overture which began the concert, and which, by the way, had some baleful touches of muted horn, which must have indicated "Katzenjammer," or worse yet, that fearful student disease called "Haarweh" ("Hair-ache") in which each particular hair has its own tale of sorrow.

The English horns were charmingly played, and the Pastorale was one of the gems of the concert. Once more we had our symphony at the end of the programme, after the Gerickian system which believes that the effect of a large musical work should not be disturbed by a lesser one following it. On this occasion the symphony was the "Italian," by Mendelssohn.

Mendelssohn was under-passionate, but there is no fear of the latter-day composers catching this fault.

The first movement went with admirable dash and brilliancy and the three-noted figure out of which Mendelssohn evolves so many thoughts, was given with commendable power.

The reading of the slow movement, already described, was perfection; not a bit of sentimentality, no tendency to bathos, but the constant broadening which makes this movement a fit companion to the slow movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, was in every part.

Then come the "horns of Elfland faintly blowing" in the beautiful Scherzo. The final Saltarello is an anti-climax and one wishes that Mendelssohn had not spoiled his work by such a lame and impotent conclusion.

It was a strange affair to listen to a symphony concert on Friday night; as weird and uncanny as to eat beans and brown bread on Saturday morning or to have the Handel and Haydn sing "The Messiah" on the Fourth of July; nevertheless the result was an auspicious one. The orchestra seemed happy at the return of its leader and played with especial spirit, the public seemed overjoyed to have its conductor back again and applauded with notable vigor, and the programme reflected the joy of Christmastide from the jollity of the Brahms's overture to the presto caperings of the Mendelssohn "Saltarello;" wherefore the critic dips his pen in honey and joins in the jubilation.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1898

Music Hall : Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program of the ninth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall yesterday evening, was:

Brahms: Akademische Ouvertüre, opus 80.
Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73.
J. S. Bach: Sinfonia ("Hirten-Musik") from the Christmas Oratorio.
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian," opus 90.

Mme. Helen Hopekirk was the pianist.

Mr. Gericke was most enthusiastically received on his return to his post after his severe illness; like many a man to whom convalesence is also rest he showed no signs of what he had just been through, but seemed fresh and alert as ever. Certainly his beat has lost none of its vigor.

Brahms's "Academic" was admirably read and played: with great clearness and finish, with conspicuous brilliancy; the whole was held together as with bands of steel, while, in more than one passage, we felt a to us new touch of poetry. In the Bach Pastoral we think Mr. Gericke has at last found the right reading; by this we do not mean that he may not have found it long ago, for, if the piece was played during his first directorship here, we forget the performance, but that his reading seems to us to have at least one manifest advantage over any we had heard from other conductors. This Pastoral of Bach's has long passed for one of the most difficult things in the orchestra's repertory; on more than one occasion we have been led to remark upon the inherent difficulty of the Siciliano rhythm, that succession of dotted triplets which it is so hard to make flow smoothly in too slow a tempo. We are tempted to repeat once more the old story of Ferdinand David's coming to the station—or was it coach-office then?—in Leipzig, to receive Liszt, on his arrival from Frankfort. "You look tired," said Liszt, after the first greetings were over. "Yes," replied David, "I am; we have been working all the afternoon, trying to get the orchestra to play a dotted triplet, and we can't do it;" "Curious!" said Liszt, "that's the very thing Ferdinand Hiller told me, when he saw me off in Frankfort!" To our thinking, this movement of Bach's has always been taken too slow here before, making it all but impossible for the orchestra to play the peculiar rhythm smoothly and well together; Mr. Gericke takes it at a tempo at which the rhythm, so to speak, plays itself, the orchestra cannot miss it; in a word, he takes it at the natural tempo. The performance was exquisite, and showed forth all the divine beauty of the music. Perhaps Mr. Gericke now and then forced a forte somewhat heroically out of the pastoral mood; but there is doubtless warrant for this in the score, which we have not seen for some years.

But the crown of the concert was the playing of the "Italian" symphony! At last, at last we had a true Mendelssonish "Allegro vivace!" How that first movement bubbled and sparkled, like water from a live spring, like the opening of champagne! Neither did this brisk tempo bring the least unclearness with it, the least negligence or inexpressiveness in phrasing, the least blurring of details. That was the movement as one feels that Mendelssohn himself must have conceived it, full of life and vigor, bright with Italian sunshine. The slow movement, too, was admirably done; a little too large a tone from the violins at times, perhaps, but nothing that could be called coarseness. The minuet went to a charm; only we felt that, in that wonderful middle passage for horns and bassoons, Mr. Gerricke's "expressive" holding back the rhythm was rather de trop; it brought the passage dangerously near to the male part-song mood—a thing of which one does not like to be reminded. But the playing of the finale was a wonder; to us, a complete refutation of all that has been said against this movement from time to time. So played, this Saltarello of Mendelssohn's is simply intoxicating. Especially fine was the way in which the contrast was brought out when the music falls from the lightly skipping Roman Saltarello into the more smoothly flowing, more demonic Neapolitan Tarantella; there was something almost uncanny in those intertwining triplet-passages! Ah! the club to kill Mendelssohn with has not been hewn yet!

There was much that was very fine indeed in Mme. Hopekirk's playing of Beethoven's "Emperor." If she did not quite reach the heroic level of some parts of the first movement, her playing was in general excellently appreciative of the true character of the music, straightforward, not trying to do too much. By the way, it occurs to us that it might be well, in view of the enormously increased tone of the modern pianoforte, to modify those "piano" and "Fp" marks in the orchestral parts in the long octave-passage of the solo instrument; as now played, one does not hear the descending counter scales of the strings after the first accent. Mme. Hopekirk's playing of the Adagio was distinctly good; notably where the pianoforte takes the principal theme, near the middle of the movement: full of feeling, but stopping short of sentimentality. In the final rondo we liked her less; she seemed to us to miss the humor of that "espressivo" chromatic phrase in the first theme, and, upon the whole, to try to make too much of certain effects. Toward the end, too, we should have liked a heartier, a more unreserved plunging into the ebullient rhythm; one felt the pianist to be somewhat over-prudently on her guard against her fingers running away with her. There are moments when Beethoven throws the reins upon his steed's neck, and becomes regardless of "distinction." But it was, as a whole, an excellent performance of one of the greatest works ever written, and was warmly applauded by the audience.

The next programme is: Wagner, Eine Faust-Ouvertüre; Dvorak, symphonic variations; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

New York, December 24, 1898.

MUSICAL BALTIMORE.

BALTIMORE, MD., Dec. 19, 1898.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Tuesday has called forth the most varied comments. Every one agreed that the work of Franz Kneisel as temporary director was satisfactory in all respects. He had his men in good command and conducted admirably. The especially problematical part of the concert seemed to center in the soloist—Burmester. Many in the audience found his tone too small, and his interpretation lacking in enthusiasm. These critics claimed that there were many in the orchestra who could have played the Mendelssohn Concerto as well as he.

I do not believe it. His tone although small had the most peculiarly perfect carrying power and possessed a purity and roundness of quality that was entrancing. As far as his alleged lack of temperament is concerned, his manly and unsentimental manner of playing was in delightful contrast to the mawkishness of the usual violinist. In spite of the diversified opinions the young artist received a most encouraging and flattering reception.

The symphony undertaken ~~was~~ the Schubert in C. It went off in excellent shape and Mr. Kneisel found himself quite the lion of the hour. The other numbers were the Tannhaeuser Overture and the MacDowell Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine."

WILLY BURMEISTER AGAIN.

On Thursday evening of last week, Willy Burmester was again the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall. In the unique concert by Beethoven the best possible opportunity was offered to him to reveal his musicianship, of which he had given but scant proof on the previous occasion.

While he displayed somewhat more breadth of style, he failed to convince. The first movement was played accurately, but with little warmth of feeling. One received the impression as if he were saving his strength for the cadenza only, for which he selected that of Ferdinand Laub, a very un-Beethovenish conglomeration of technical difficulties. The whole cadenza business is a nuisance and should be dropped entirely.

Burmester is a virtuoso of a small pattern only, and MUSICAL AMERICA has a right to ask how it is possible that such mediocre artists can acquire a reputation in musical Germany. There is not a trace of magnetism in his personality, and with all his pyrotechnics he fails to find the way to the public's heart. New York audiences may occasionally be deceived by a brilliant display of technic, but as a rule they save their enthusiasm for artists of soul and brains.

AUGUST SPANUTH.

MUSICAL BROOKLYN.

BROOKLYN, Dec. 20, 1898.

With Franz Kneisel as conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave two concerts at the Academy of Music last week under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. For the Friday matinee the programme included Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Saint Saëns symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Willy Burmester played the Beethoven concerto. At the Saturday night concert the orchestra played the Schumann Symphony in C major, and Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Préludes." Mr. Burmester, who was again the soloist, played the Mendelssohn concerto and the Bach chaconne in G minor. Both concerts gave high pleasure to large audiences. The Brooklyn critics united with those in Manhattan in praise of Kneisel's conducting, and the beauty of Mr. Burmester's tone.

[77]

FADED TEXT

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, DEC. 24, 1898.

Mr Gericke Heartily Greeted at the Symphony Concerts—Notes About the Attractions at Local Theaters.

Mr William Gericke returned to his desk at the Symphony rehearsal Thursday afternoon and also conducted the concert last evening, the program of which consisted of Brahms' "Academic" overture, Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, Bach's "Shepherds' Music" and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony. Mrs Helen Hopekirk was the soloist. Mr Gericke showed but slight traces of his recent illness, and he directed his men with as much verve and authority as ever. He was most warmly greeted when he first appeared, and received applausive encouragement at the close of each orchestral number. Mrs Hopekirk is an artist whose interpretations command attention from the most critical. She possesses a temperament which assured a conscientious and sympathetic treatment of a composer's work, a technical skill surpassed by few and a delightful touch in which is combined delicacy and clearness of tone production. She is slightly deficient in the power necessary to cope with an orchestral fortissimo, but with this exception her playing is that of an artist of the foremost rank.

Beethoven's fifth concerto is immensely difficult, even more so than Rubinstein's fourth concerto, and is much less heard in concert than the latter piece, partly because the piano is less prominent as a solo instrument in the Beethoven score. Mrs Hopekirk played the brilliant introductory cadenza with great spirit, and later on the ascending scales were given with most pleasing effect, the piano retaining its proper place as a part of the whole orchestra and not as a solo instrument. The beautiful harmonies of the second movement appeared to be perfect in their cantabile quality, the staccato chords in pianissimo being specially deserving of praise. In the last movement the running passages in the earlier part were deftly executed, and the development of the second theme, the working out of the varying characteristics of the same, and the closing coda were each interpreted in a most artistic and sympathetic manner. The orchestral work was admirable as a rule. Mme Hopekirk was heartily applauded at the close of each movement in the concerto.

The Brahms overture was given with commendable warmth and vigor, the finale being notably good in precision and clarity of tone by the string contingent. The performance of the Bach music calls for no special notice save general commendation for excellence throughout. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony was grandly interpreted as a whole, although the brasses at times sounded rather harsh in the second movement. This week's program will comprise "Faust" overture, Wagner; "Dance of the Sylphs," Berlioz; symphonic variations, Dvorak; symphony No. 4, Beethoven.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
Dec OF NEW ENGLAND 24

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the present season was given in Music Hall last evening, instead of Saturday evening, as is usual, the latter being the eve of Christmas.

Mr. Gericke conducted for the first time in several weeks, and he was most cordially welcomed on his return to his duties by the audience. It was pleasant to see him back again, and it is also gratifying to know that in emergencies we have such a satisfactory associate director as is Mr. Kneisel.

The concert opened with Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture," op. 80, a composition in which German university students' songs are used as themes, these being handled contrapuntally, with great skill, and in which one notices many original and beautiful effects in instrumentation. In form it is strict, but nevertheless fresh and vigorous. The performance was an excellent one.

Following this came Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in E flat, No. 5, with Mme. Helen Hopekirk as the soloist. This concerto has long held the highest rank among compositions of its class, and only those written by Brahms and Tschaikowski can lay any claim to equal rank with the so-called "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven. The performances of this work by celebrated artists here have been numerous during the last twenty-five years, and its many beauties are doubtless familiar to all music lovers.

Mme. Hopekirk has been heard rarely of late years, and her appearances are always welcome. She played with evident surety as to the requirements of the concerto, and with entire absence of affectation of any sort, and made a highly satisfactory impression with her audience, for she had many recalls at the close of the performance.

Bach's "Shepherd's Music," from his Christmas oratorio, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, completed the programme. The excellence of the orchestra was never shown to better advantage than in the "Shepherd's Music," which, though written nearly 200 years ago, is still a most difficult music to render properly, as the contrapuntal treatment is so clear that shortcomings in any part would mar the whole performance. Mendelssohn's symphony still delights one with its melodic charm, its graceful scoring without trombones, and it is easy of comprehension. The programme of the next rehearsal and concert will include Wagner's "Faust" overture, Dvorak's symphonic variations and Beethoven's fourth symphony in B flat. There is to be no soloist.

Boston Journal.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1898.

BACK AGAIN.

Mr. Gericke Conducts Symphony.

No Lack of His Old Strength.

Mrs. Helen Hopekirk in the Cast.

The program of the ninth Symphony Concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture............Brahms
Concerto for Piano No. 5, in E-flat major .... Beethoven
Sinfonia (Shepherd's music) from the Christmas Oratorio, Part II.......Bach
Symphony No. 4..................Mendelssohn

Mr. Gericke was welcomed most heartily after his absence on account of sickness. He certainly showed no lack of strength or authority in his conducting. After the Christmas music of Bach he was given a wreath, and again there was applause.

The program was different from the one originally announced. The parts of Cèsar Franck's "Chasseur Maudit" did not come in time for rehearsal. Personally I was not sorry; for Franck is not a great master in program-music. It is in absolute music, as in his string quartet, piano quintet, symphony, or in oratorio, as in "The Beatitudes," that the purity and the mastery, the beauty and the power of his art are fully displayed.

There was a slip near the beginning of the Academic overture, but as a whole the performance of the orchestra was distinguished by precision, and in the smooth, genteel symphony of Mendelssohn by appropriate elegance. With the exception of the great concerto, the program as a program did not appeal to me. The overture was read with uncommon discrimination, but the music itself is dryly academic. Curiosity might be repaid if it were possible to give Bach's sinfonia as it was written. Franz tinkered it, but my objection is to the inherent character of the music. We have an ingenious piece that overshoots the mark and presents us with shepherds who are too thoroughly acquainted with counterpoint to be naive. The suggestion is of the class-room, not of the star-lighted flock watched by simple men that heard suddenly the angelic salutation. And then there is the symphony by Mendelssohn. We are far from the musician of the overtures to "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Fingal's Cave" and the cantata, "The Walpurgis Night." I am inclined to believe that Mendelssohn wrote this symphony with his hands in kid gloves. It is all very pretty; all highly respectable; there is not a blot on the manuscript; there is not an erasure; and I see the composer turning to some high-born dame and saying in well-bred tones "I think, Countess Wuerstberg, you will like this. There is nothing in it to shock your sensibilities. See how nicely the pilgrims march. And here in my saltarello you will find no vulgarity. The dancers are persons of excellent family and exemplary morals."

Mrs. Hopekirk gave a pleasant performance of the Emperor concerto.

Philip Hale.

ELLIS OPERA.

The grand opera at the Boston Theatre by the Ellis Opera Company, under the direction of C. A. Ellis, will begin on Monday evening, Jan. 23, continuing for three weeks. It will include Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday matinees.

During the season of eighteen performances there are not likely to be any repetitions, as the repertory which has been published in these columns is selected from such a wide range of operatic works.

Mme. Melba's promised rendition of Mimi in "La Boheme," will arouse expectation, and this production by the company will be one of the most interesting features of the season. Mme. Melba will not be the only interesting character of this work, for Mlle. de Lussan (who first established her claim to operatic eminence in this city) will sing Musette. Sig. Pandolfini, the leading Italian tenor of the organization, will sing Rudolph, and Bensaude, who created the part of Marcello when the opera was first produced, under the direction of the composer, will sing the role here. The orchestra has been thoroughly rehearsed in the work—in fact, the first production of "La Boheme" by the Ellis company occurs in Philadelphia on the evening of Dec. 30. Mme. Melba journeyed to Italy during the past summer and spent some time studying the role with Puccini.

The great interest which the anticipated performance of the "Nibelungen Ring" will undoubtedly arouse will be heightened by the fact that the heroic soprano parts will be sung by Ternina (a truly great artist, whose first recognition in America was accorded her in Boston). Mme. Gadski, one of the most eminent of all Wagnerian lyric sopranos, will also be heard in the Wagnerian roles with which her reputation is associated, and we are again to hear Herr Kraus in the heroic tenor parts.

Walter Damrosch will conduct the German performances, and the New York Symphony Orchestra (organized and drilled by Mr. Damrosch) have his direction.

Particulars regarding the sale of season tickets will shortly be announced.

The Boston Traveler
Year—Vol. LIV. Dec 24

Christmas-tide pushed the Symphony a day ahead, this year, and last evening came the usual Saturday night concert. This was the programme:

Academic Festival Overture........Brahms
Concerto for Piano No. 5, in E-flat major ....Beethoven
Sinfonia (Shepherd's music) from the Christmas Oratoria, Part II.........Bach
Symphony No. 4................Mendelssohn

Mr. Gericke returned from his extended illness, and was very cordially greeted. There was little exciting work for him to do, which was perhaps best under the circumstances. As a whole the concert was—if not dull—at least uninspiring. Mrs Helen Hopekirk, the soloist, played the great "Emperor" concerto with smoothness and elegance, but not with imperial strength. The Mendelssohn symphony is not much more than sweetly graceful and daintily melodious. The one supremely fine thing in it, the trio for horns in the third movement, was played exquisitely. In fact, everything was well done, but there seemed to be little of the contagion of enthusiasm in the air.

⁂

A deep interest now centers in the forthcoming productions of grand opera at the Boston Theatre by the Ellis Opera Company under the direction of Charles A. Ellis. The season will begin on Monday evening, Jan. 23, continuing for three weeks. It will include Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday matinees.

Mme. Melba's promised rendition of Mimi in "La Boheme" will unquestionably arouse great expectation, and this production by the company will be one of the most interesting features of the season. Mme. Melba will not be the only interesting character of this work, for Mlle. de Lussan (who first established her claim to operatic eminence in this city) will essay the role of Musette. Sig. Pandolfini, the leading Italian tenor of the organization, will sing Rudolph, and Bensaude, who created the part of Marcello when the opera was first produced, under the direction of the composer, will sing the role here. The orchestra has been thoroughly rehearsed in the work—in fact, the first production of "La Boheme" by the Ellis company occurs in Philadelphia on the evening of Dec. 30. Mme. Melba is deeply interested in her character in this opera, so much so in fact that she journeyed to Italy during the past summer and spent some time studying the role with Puccini.

The great interest which the anticipated performance of the "Nibelungen Ring" will undoubtedly arouse will be heightened by the fact that the heroic soprano parts will be sung by Ternina (a truly great artist, whose first recognition in America was accorded her in Boston). Ternina now stands admittedly the first Wagnerian soprano of the present time, and her reappearance in this city must undoubtedly awaken great expectations. Mme. Gadski, one of the most eminent of all Wagnerian lyric sopranos, will also be heard in the Wagnerian roles with which her reputation is associated, and we are again to hear Herr Kraus in the heroic tenor parts.

Walter Damrosch has been secured by Mr. Ellis to conduct the German performances, and the fact that the New York Symphony Orchestra (the body organized and drilled by Mr. Damrosch to its present accomplished state) will interpret the musical scores under his direction, should ensure eloquent treatment by them of the intricate measures of Wagner's instrumentation. Particulars regarding the sale of season tickets will shortly be announced.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIV., NO. 178.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1898.

The season of grand opera at the Boston Theatre, by the Ellis opera company, under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, will begin on Monday evening, Jan. 23, continuing for three weeks. It will include Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday matinee. During the 18 performances there are not likely to be any repetitions, as the repertoire, which has been published in these columns, is selected from such a wide range of operatic works that repetition is not necessary. Mme. Melba's promised rendering of Mimi in "La Boheme" will unquestionably arouse great expectation, and this production by the company will be one of the most interesting features of the season. Mme. Melba will not be the only interesting characters of this work, for Mlle. de Lussan (who first established her claim to operatic eminence in this city) will essay the role of Mussette. Sig. Pandolfini, the leading Italian tenor of the organization, will sing Rudolph, and Bensaude, who created the part of Marcello when the opera was first produced, under the direction of the composer, will sing the role here. The orchestra has been thoroughly rehearsed in the work; in fact, the first production of "La Boheme' by the Ellis company occurs in Philadelphia on the evening of Dec. 30. The great interest which the anticipated performance of the "Nibelungen Ring" will undoubtedly arouse will be heightened by the fact that the heroic soprano parts will be sung by Ternina, now admittedly the first Wagnerian soprano of the present time. Mme. Gadski will also be heard in the Wagnerian roles, and we are again to hear Herr Kraus in the heroic tenor parts. Walter Damrosch has been secured by Mr. Ellis to conduct the German performances with the New York Symphony orchestra under his direction. Particulars regarding the sale of season tickets will shortly be announced

---

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 25, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

ELLIS OPERA COMPANY.

Charles W. Strine, representing Charles A. Ellis, the proprietor of the Ellis opera company, whose season of grand opera at the Boston Theatre, beginning Jan. 23, has been announced, is in this city and gives some interesting facts in connection with what he says will be a most ambitious and satisfactory season of grand opera.

Bostonians should feel an especial interest in the extensive project now exclusively controlled by their townsman, Mr. Ellis, whose reputation as the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has unquestionably given us much confidence in whatever promises he may make. It is therefore within the bound of reason to expect from his prospectus a series of great operatic performances that will establish this organization as a regular institution in this city.

"The fact," said Mr. Strine, "that Mme. Melba is the chief lyric soprano of Mr. Ellis's company is assurance that Boston, during her grand opera season, shall have unquestionably the greatest singer of her time in characters now inseparably associated with her fame. There can be no new tribute paid to Melba, except to say that her marvellous voice this year even surpasses itself, and that means that it almost surpasses perfection.

"In Mme. Ternina, Mr. Ellis believes, and has no doubt that Bostonians will justify him, that he has the greatest heroic soprano in the world. Her eminent gifts were first recognized by the music lovers of this city, and the most critical consensus of European opinion unanimously accords to Mme. Ternina the highest place on the pedestal of heroic singing. Her presence in the organization makes possible the magnificent revivals of the 'Nibelungen Ring,' which Mr. Ellis promises, and assures to Boston the opportunity of hearing 'Tristan and Isolde,' by Kraus and Ternina, given as it possibly cannot be given anywhere in the world today, unless these two singers are associated in its production.

"Mlle. De Lussan, who returns to her country after having heightened her reputation as a grand operatic artist in Europe, will be heard in a series of characters best suited to her especial talents, while Mme. Gadski, who needs no new allusion to her unusual gifts, will be the chief German lyric soprano of the company.

"Regarding tenors it is only necessary to state that Mr. Ellis's company is most eminently endowed. Alvarez is the first tenor of the Grand Opera at Paris, and beyond any possibility of question one of the greatest artists of his time. In M. Bonnard we shall have a French tenor with all the virtues and few of the defects of his school. Ernest Kraus, as the chief interpreter of heroic German tenor parts, needs no new comment, and Sig. Pandolfini, a highly gifted Italian, will undoubtedly fulfil the promises made in his behalf.

"It is not possible, in the brief confines of a prospectus, to call attention to each singer individually, but I am sure Bostonians may be confident in the fact that the ensemble of the company is as near the very highest standard as it is possible to bring it; the stage direction of the operas is in the most capable hands, and the orchestra is unquestionably the best operatic organization in the country. There is no reason why the season announced should not eclipse in result, as well as in promise, many of the brilliant seasons of grand opera gone before."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 26, 1898.

ELLIS OPERA.

The grand opera at the Boston Theatre by the Ellis Opera Company, under the direction of C. A. Ellis, will begin on Monday evening, Jan. 23, continuing for three weeks. It will include Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday matinees.

During the season of eighteen performances there are not likely to be any repetitions, as the repertory which has been published in these columns is selected from such a wide range of operatic works.

Mme. Melba's promised rendition of Mimi in "La Boheme," will arouse expectation, and this production by the company will be one of the most interesting features of the season. Mme. Melba will not be the only interesting character of this work, for Mlle. de Lussan (who first established her claim to operatic eminence in this city) will sing Musette. Sig. Pandolfini, the leading Italian tenor of the organization, will sing Rudolph, and Bensaude, who created the part of Marcello when the opera was first produced, under the direction of the composer, will sing the role here. The orchestra has been thoroughly rehearsed in the work—in fact, the first production of 'La Boheme' by the Ellis company occurs in Philadelphia on the evening of Dec. 30. Mme. Melba journeyed to Italy during the past summer and spent some time studying the role with Puccini.

The great interest which the anticipated performance of the "Nibelungen Ring" will undoubtedly arouse will be heightened by the fact that the heroic soprano parts will be sung by Ternina (a truly great artist, whose first recognition in America was accorded her in Boston). Mme. Gadski, one of the most eminent of all Wagnerian lyric sopranos, will also be heard in the Wagnerian roles with which her reputation is associated, and we are again to hear Herr Kraus in the heroic tenor parts.

Walter Damrosch will conduct the German performances, and the New York Symphony Orchestra (organized and drilled by Mr. Damrosch) has his direction.

Particulars regarding the sale of season tickets will shortly be announced.

...Journal.

...DAY, DECEMBER 25, 1898.

The Ellis Opera Company, under the direction of Mr. Charles A. Ellis, will begin a season of three weeks at the Boston Theatre Monday evening, Jan. 23. Performances will be given on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday evenings, and at Saturday matinees.

During the entire season there will not, in all probability, be any repetitions, for the repertory, which has already been published in the Journal, is large, and Mr. Ellis is anxious to present to the Boston public as many operas as possible.

Melba's first appearance here as Mimi in Puccini's "La Bohème" will be one of unusual interest. She studied the part with the composer last summer in Italy. Miss de Lussan will appear as Musette, Pandolfini, the leading Italian tenor of the organization, as Rudolph, and Bensaude will be the Marcello. The first production of "La Bohème" by the Ellis company will be at Philadelphia Dec. 30.

Ternina, the great dramatic soprano, will sing the chief heroic parts in the Wagnerian operas. Gadski, the eminent lyric soprano, will be associated with her, and Kraus will sing the heroic tenor parts.

Mr. Seppelli will conduct the French and Italian operas, and Mr. Walter Damrosch will conduct the performances in German. The orchestra will be the New York Symphony.

Particulars regarding the sale of season tickets will shortly be announced.

We are without opera this week, but the season is to be resumed next Monday, with Melba as Lucia. On Wednesday, "Tristan and Isolde" is announced with Kraus and Ternina. On Friday evening we are to have Puccini's "La Bohème," with Melba and De Lussan, and "Lohengrin" at the Saturday matinee, with Gadski and Kraus.

Damrosch's "Manila Te Deum" will be given here January 10 with Gadski, Van Hoose and Rains, and an alto to be announced, under the direction of the composer with the Choral Society Chorus and the New York Symphony Orchestra.

JAMES FITCH THOMSON.

Oct 24

MUSICAL AMERICA

Ellis Opera for Boston.—It is officially announced that the Ellis Grand Opera Company will begin on Monday evening, January 23, a season of eighteen performances. The operas will be selected from the following list: "Aïda," "The Barber of Seville," "Carmen," "Die Meistersinger," "Faust," "The Flying Dutchman," "Iris," "La Boheme," "Lohengrin," "Lucia," "La Fille du Regiment," "Marriage of Figaro," "Manon," "Martha," "Romeo and Juliet," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," "Tannhäuser," "Traviata."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 25, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

It has always seemed to us that a man should play Beethoven's "Emperor" or E flat pianoforte concerto rather than a woman, even though she should have more than the average strength and sustained tension of her sex. Whoever has heard and felt the majestic fire of the broken chords which usher in the first movement, the deep emotion of the andante, and the sturdy joy of the rondo in such a rendering as Mr. Baermann gives—and he stands for us as the ideal player of Beethoven—will understand just what we mean and why we did not find Mme. Hopekirk's performance, in the ninth Symphony programme, fully satisfying. We must not be thought to undervalue what that artist accomplished. Far from it. Her fine taste, her sensibility, her clear thought, her evident determination not to strain her powers, her delicate and accurate technique and her faithful spirit, all deserved and won respect and admiration. In a small room and with a small orchestra, we should probably have found more magnetism and been more impressed. What we missed was just that personal difference—and this, we admit, not every man could make up to us, while a stronger and more ardent woman, like Miss Aus der Ohe, might surpass some men. We wanted the opening allegro to strike deeper and rest on a broader foundation, the andante to be more concentrated, and the finale to rejoice with the eagerness of naive bonhomie and not to be merely content with a smile of gentle pleasure. To find fault would be to complain of Mme. Hopekirk for her birth and temperament; and we wish to congratulate her on accomplishing so much by just use of her natural equipment and her well matured art. As the score for Franck's "Chasseur Maudit" had not arrived, it was necessary to change the programme a little. It began therefore with the "Academic" overture of Brahms, which we think we have never heard so finely and perspicuously read, and ended with a brilliant rendering of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, which had a more animated spirit for its gayer and lighter moods than is often imparted to it. The other orchestral number was the pastoral symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," which was exquisitely read—particularly the Shepherds music quartette for oboes, English horn and clarinet. Mr. Gericke, who had quite a tribute of welcome paid him on his reappearance, conducted. The next programme is this: Wagner, A Faust Overture; Dvorak, Symphonic Variations; Beethoven, Symphony No. 4.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

Dec ESTABLISHED 1813. 31

The Symphony Concert.

The program of the tenth symphony concert was:

Faust Overture .... Wagner
Symphonic variations, op. 78 .... Dvorak
Minuet and waltz from "Damnation of Faust" .... Berlioz
Symphony No. 4, B flat major, op. 60 .... Beethoven

There was nothing new in the program, but it was most interesting nevertheless, and it gave the orchestra an opportunity to show what it could do in the way of rare delicacy and finish. The Dvorak variations were first given by Mr. Gericke and the present is the first occasion on which they have since been played. The work impresses one by its geniality, and by the unpretentious way in which its learning is dealt out; it is a small thing, very carefully designed and polished; it had its little touch of sadness and its dash of gayety, and neither was conventional. It was delightfully read and interpreted by Mr. Gericke and his orchestra, but a still finer finish was given to the Berloiz selections. The minuet was given the right touch of saucy daintiness and the waltz in its airy delicacy might have been a direct importation from fairy land.

The program for the next concert is: Overture, "Freischutz," Weber; Concerto for violin, No. 5, A minor, Vieuxtemps; Waltzes, Brahms, orchestrated by W. Gericke; Symphony No. 1, D minor, op. 21, Sinding, first time. The soloist will be Miss Olive Mead.

The Leader

Established. 1875.

NOVEMBER, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, once again under the direction of their incomparable leader, Wm. Gericke, has entered upon a season of great promise. Programmes, leader and artists are all that could be desired, and the crowded audiences at their performances furnish abundant evidence that all is as it should be. That the public are becoming educated to the appreciation of only the best music is proven by Richelieu's test—"they applaud—and in the right place!"

·LIFE·

HAPPILY for the musical public, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is with us again. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands for more than good music. It stands for the best in selection; and in spirit and execution the very highest attainable. Every concert by this masterly company means to the lover of music an artistic and intellectual revel.

In fact, LIFE has but one serious grievance against these past masters in their art, and that is their reprehensible persistence in making Boston their home

Why not come to New York?

We may, to the Boston eye, be rich, conglomerate and shallow, but we know good music when it comes our way, and more of it we earnestly desire.

Dec. 12, 1898

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURES AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance by the Orchestra and Mrs. Jacoby, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season at Infantry Hall last evening. An excellent programme was presented and its performance was a most finished and satisfactory one. Mr. Gericke, recovered from his recent illness, again appeared at the conductor's desk. In spite of the attractive programme and the superb playing, the audience was the smallest one that has been seen in years at a symphony concert.

There are unmistakable signs that musical entertainments of a high class are not wanted in Providence. The great solo artists who come here play to empty benches, and the city has such an unenviable reputation in this regard that no manager who understands his business will place a concert here. Through the stimulus of pride in a local organization unexcelled in its class, aided by a numerous and influential membership, the concerts of the Arion Club filled Infantry Hall for years. But the past season or two has shown a diminution of interest and the last concert of the club was given to the smallest audience in its history. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received a fair patronage here in the past—not the full house that greets it in every other city all over the country, but still a fair patronage. This season the attendance has fallen off materially, though the quality of the concerts certainly has not. It is to be feared that Conductor Gericke does not know how to cater to our taste. There is too much of Mozart and Mendelssohn, of Tschaikowsky and Wagner. What is needed to arouse our enthusiasm is six trombones in a row blowing "Comrades" or "After the Ball" for all they are worth. It is a mistake, too, that the programmes are so arranged that encores cannot be given. Room for at least three after each number should be provided. For there is no use in going to a concert unless you can get your money's worth.

The small attendance of last night was doubtless due to the fact that none of these attractive novelties were offered. The programme appealed to none save a few musical cranks, who are not of the slightest importance. From their point of view it was a good enough programme, and it included the following numbers:

Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" .... Peter Cornelius
Recitative, "Ach, sie hort nicht," and Aria, "Ach ich habe sie verloren," from "Orpheus" .... Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck
Symphonic Poem No. 3, "The Preludes" .. Franz Liszt
Air: "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila" ...... Camille Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian," Op. 90 .... Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy
- I. Allegro vivace (A major)
- II. Andante con moto (D minor)
- III. Con moto moderato (A major)
- IV. Saltarello: Presto (A minor)

The three instrumental numbers were effectively contrasted as well as interesting in themselves. The overture is a brilliant piece of orchestration. Though that is the predominant feature it is by no means lacking in pleasing melodies or variety of treatment. Composed 40 years ago it yet presents much of the modern style, not only in the fullness and richness of its instrumentation, but also in its varied and sometimes intricate rhythms. It was played with great spirit.

The poetic subject of Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," is the following passage from Lamartine's "Meditations Poetiques:"

"What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by death? Love forms the enchanted daybreak of every life; but what is the destiny where the first delights of happiness are not interrupted by some storm, whose fatal breath dissipates its fair illusions, whose fell lightning consumes its altar; and what wounded spirit, when one of these tempests is over, does not seek to rest its memories in the sweet calm of country life? Yet man does not resign himself long to enjoy the beneficent tepidity which first charmed him on Nature's bosom; and, when 'the trumpet's loud clangor has called him to arms,' he rushes to the post of danger, whatever may be the war that calls him to the ranks, to find in battle the full consciousness of himself and the complete possession of his strength."

The form of the composition is necessarily of the freest sort, and the text is useful as a hint to the meaning of the music. The classic formulas of the musical art were irksome to Liszt, who is always at his best in this sort of improvisation. The music is suggestive and sometimes beautiful, but it would not typify human life without its harsh discords and its unresolved cadences suggestive of the problems we are compelled to leave unanswered. Of its performance by the players nothing but praise can be said.

Mendelssohn's bright "Italian" symphony, one of the best of his orchestral compositions, made a most satisfactory finish to the programme. All the admirable Mendelssohnian characteristics are found in this symphony; the spontaneous flow of genuine melody; the unerring sense of proportion and instrumental color; the exquisite and polished workmanship. In this perhaps the best playing of the evening was done, the exhibition of technical perfection and unanimity of purpose being of the highest character. Mr. Gericke read the symphony in a sympathetic and wholly admirable manner.

The soloist was Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, a contralto whose fine voice has brought her rapidly into prominence during the past two years. Certainly she possesses unusual vocal gifts, and she handles her voice with considerable skill. If she yet lacks something of artistic repose it may be forgiven in view of her really sound attainments and her undeniable promise. She sang the aria of Orpheus, an ancient battle-horse of contraltos, exceedingly well, and received several hearty recalls. In the great air of Delilah she was somewhat less successful. The tempo was too slow, for one thing, and the effect sought was not reached by occasional spasmodic accelerandos. Still, her great voice rang out splendidly at the climax, and liberal applause was again forthcoming.

A briefer interval than usual intervenes between this concert and the next of the series, the date for the fourth concert being Wednesday evening, Jan. 11.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last evening, included Wagner's "Faust" overture, Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme, Op. 78, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps and Waltz of the Sylphs, from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and Beethoven's fourth symphony in B flat, Op. 60.

Dvorak's symphonic variations have been played here before, but only once, and then under Mr. Gericke in 1889; so they were practically new to most of the audience last evening. There are twenty-seven variations, with a fugue finale, of which seven were omitted at the concert. The scoring is most brilliant as a rule, the treatment is often contrapuntal, and while the whole composition may not be among the best that Dvorak has given us, still there is much of interest for the listeners. The other numbers are all well-known compositions, and need no especial mention at this time. The orchestra gave an excellent performance of the symphony, and the beauties of Berlioz's instrumentation were never more clearly shown than in the two numbers from the "Damnation of Faust." Here the orchestra was unsurpassable.

The programme of the next rehearsal and concert includes a new symphony by Sinding, Mr. Gericke's orchestration of Brahms's waltzes and Weber's "Freischutz" overture.

Miss Olive Mead, violinist, will be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 1, 1899.

At the Symphony.

There was no soloist at the last symphony offerings, yet Music hall was more than usually crowded at the rehearsal, proving that, after all, it is the music which attracts, not the soloist. Mr Gericke conducted with his accustomed acumen; he neither looks nor directs the worse for his recent prolonged sickness.

Wagner opened the program with his "Faust' overture. It is more valuable as a hint as to what the master might have accomplished with a music-drama based on the Goethe poem than as a concert piece, yet it is always pleasant to hear when interpreted by artists like our symphony players. Then followed Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme, which Mr Gericke introduced to our public during his former term of conductorship. They were finely played as a matter of course; whether it was worth while musically to revive them while so many admirable works remain unheard in our symphony concerts is another question. But after all, has not an orchestral conductor a right to demonstrate his prepossessions, if not his prejudices?

It was interesting to hear something again of Hector Berlioz' curious work, "The Damnation of Faust," well remembered by those who recall the Henschel time. Last week's selections were the minuet of the will o' the wisps and the sylphs' dance, both presented with grace, facility and expression. Beethoven's fourth symphony, following the fantastic but effective music of Berlioz, seemed to be more impressive than usual. One would say that the artist rejoiced to turn once more to the interpretation of the grand master, who can never grow "hackneyed" to true music lovers.

Miss Olive Mead, the brilliant young violinist, will be the soloist at the next rehearsal and concert. The home artiste is assigned Vieuxtemps' fifth concerto for violin. The program offering will include Weber's "Freischutz" overture, an orchestration by Mr Gericke of waltzes by Brahms, and as a novelty in Boston Sinding's symphony No. 1 in D minor.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1899.

Perfection of playing it was, more than anything else, which sustained interest to the end of the tenth Symphony programme, which an unusual number of listeners deserted while it was in progress. For that programme was ultra-conventional,—three of its numbers being more than familiar, almost hacknied indeed, while the fourth was the resuscitation of a work introduced by Mr. Gericke almost ten years ago and since ignored by his successors. This was Dvorak's set of nearly thirsty "symphonic" variations on a theme of his own. Justice. In justice we must say that this long train of variations—seven of which were omitted—passes quickly, for its theme is pleasant and brief, and the individual numbers are also short, quite diversified in character, often bright in tone and light in movement none being really heavy, while there is a quiet ecclasiastical manner in one or two, and the fugued finale soon forgets its mathematical form for animation and vigor. The other numbers—all orchestral—were Wagner's "Faust" overture, the Will o' the Wisps minuet and Sylphs waltz, in the "Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, and Beethoven's fourth symphony. The performance of all was thoroughly fine in apprehension and interpretation, and the gloomy shades of the Wagner, the fairy romances of the Berlioz and the wholesome, natural moods of the Beethoven were in turn beautifully and faithfully expressed. And what a joy it was to hear the kettledrums truly played in the softer parts of the first movement of the symphony!

The next programme stands thus: Weber, Overture, "Freischutz"; Vieuxtemps, Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor; Brahms, Waltzes, orchestrated by W. Gericke; Sinding, Symphony No. 1, in D minor, Op. 11, (first time). Soloist, Miss Olive Mead.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1898.

The Ellis Opera Company, under the direction of Mr. Charles A. Ellis, will begin a season of three weeks at the Boston Theatre Monday evening, Jan. 23. Performances will be given on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday evenings, and at Saturday matinees.

During the entire season there will not, in all probability, be any repetitions, for the repertory, which has already been published in the Journal, is large, and Mr. Ellis is anxious to present to the Boston public as many operas as possible.

Melba's first appearance here as Mimi in Puccini's "La Bohème" will be one of unusual interest. She studied the part with the composer last summer in Italy. Miss de Lussan will appear as Musette, Pandolfini, the leading Italian tenor of the organization, as Rudolph, and Bensaude will be the Marcello. The first production of "La Bohème" by the Ellis company will be at Philadelphia Dec. 30.

Ternina, the great dramatic soprano, will sing the chief heroic parts in the Wagnerian operas. Gadski, the eminent lyric soprano, will be associated with her, and Kraus will sing the heroic tenor parts.

Mr. Seppelli will conduct the French and Italian operas, and Mr. Walter Damrosch will conduct the performances in German. The orchestra will be the New York Symphony.

Particulars regarding the sale of season tickets will shortly be announced.

We are without opera this week, but the season is to be resumed next Monday, with Melba as Lucia. On Wednesday, "Tristan and Isolde" is announced with Kraus and Ternina. On Friday evening we are to have Puccini's "La Bohème," with Melba and De Lussan, and "Lohengrin" at the Saturday matinee, with Gadski and Kraus.

Damrosch's "Manila Te Deum" will be given here January 10 with Gadski, Van Hoose and Rains, and an alto to be announced, under the direction of the composer with the Choral Society Chorus and the New York Symphony Orchestra.

JAMES FITCH THOMSON.

MUSICAL AMERICA

Ellis Opera for Boston.—It is officially announced that the Ellis Grand Opera Company will begin on Monday evening, January 23, a season of eighteen performances. The operas will be selected from the following list: "Aïda," "The Barber of Seville," "Carmen," "Die Meistersinger," "Faust," "The Flying Dutchman," "Iris," "La Boheme," "Lohengrin," "Lucia," "La Fille du Regiment," "Marriage of Figaro," "Manon," "Martha," "Romeo and Juliet," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," "Tannhäuser," "Traviata."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 25, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

It has always seemed to us that a man should play Beethoven's "Emperor" or E flat pianoforte concerto rather than a woman, even though she should have more than the average strength and sustained tension of her sex. Whoever has heard and felt the majestic rise of the broken chords which usher in the first movement, the deep emotion of the andante, and the sturdy joy of the rondo in such a rendering as Mr. Baermann gives—and he stands for us as the ideal player of Beethoven—will understand just what we mean and why we did not find Mme. Hopekirk's performance, in the ninth Symphony programme, fully satisfying. We must not be thought to undervalue what that artist accomplished. Far from it. Her fine taste, her sensibility, her clear thought, her evident determination not to strain her powers, her delicate and accurate technique and her faithful spirit, all deserved and won respect and admiration. In a small room and with a small orchestra, we should probably have found more magnetism and been more impressed. What we missed was just that personal difference—and this, we admit, not every man could make up to us, while a stronger and more ardent woman, like Miss Aus der Ohe, might surpass some men. We wanted the opening allegro to strike deeper and rest on a broader foundation, the andante to be more concentrated, and the finale to rejoice with the eagerness of naive bonhomie and not to be merely content with a smile of gentle pleasure. To find fault would be to complain of Mme. Hopekirk for her birth and temperament; and we wish to congratulate her on accomplishing so much by just use of her natural equipment and her well matured art. As the score for Franck's "Chasseur Maudit" had not arrived, it was necessary to change the programme a little. It began therefore with the "Academic" overture of Brahms, which we think we have never heard so finely and perspicuously read, and ended with a brilliant rendering of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, which had a more animated spirit for its gayer and lighter moods than is often imparted to it. The other orchestral number was the pastoral symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," which was exquisitely read—particularly the Shepherds music quartette for oboes, English horn and clarinet. Mr. Gericke, who had quite a tribute of welcome paid him on his reappearance, conducted. The next programme is this: Wagner, A Faust Overture; Dvorak, Symphonic Variations; Beethoven, Symphony No. 4.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program of the tenth symphony concert was:

Faust Overture ....Wagner
Symphonic variations, op. 78 ....Dvorak
Minuet and waltz from "Damnation of Faust" ....Berlioz
Symphony No. 4, B flat major, op. 60 .... Beethoven

There was nothing new in the program, but it was most interesting nevertheless, and it gave the orchestra an opportunity to show what it could do in the way of rare delicacy and finish. The Dvorak variations were first given by Mr. Gericke and the present is the first occasion on which they have since been played. The work impresses one by its geniality, and by the unpretentious way in which its learning is dealt out: it is a small thing, very carefully designed and polished; it had its little touch of sadness and its dash of gayety, and neither was conventional. It was delightfully read and interpreted by Mr. Gericke and his orchestra, but a still finer finish was given to the Berloiz selections. The minuet was given the right touch of saucy daintiness and the waltz in its airy delicacy might have been a direct importation from fairy land.

The program for the next concert is: Overture, "Freischutz," Weber; Concerto for violin, No. 5, A minor, Vieuxtemps; Waltzes, Brahms, orchestrated by W. Gericke; Symphony No. 1, D minor, op. 21, Sinding, first time. The soloist will be Miss Olive Mead.

The Leader

Established. 1875.

NOVEMBER, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, once again under the direction of their incomparable leader, Wm. Gericke, has entered upon a season of great promise. Programmes, leader and artists are all that could be desired, and the crowded audiences at their performances furnish abundant evidence that all is as it should be. That the public are becoming educated to the appreciation of only the best music is proven by Richelieu's test—"they applaud—and in the right place!"

·LIFE·

HAPPILY for the musical public, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is with us again. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands for more than good music. It stands for the best in selection; and in spirit and execution the very highest attainable. Every concert by this masterly company means to the lover of music an artistic and intellectual revel.

In fact, LIFE has but one serious grievance against these past masters in their art, and that is their reprehensible persistence in making Boston their home

Why not come to New York?

We may, to the Boston eye, be rich, conglomerate and shallow, but we know good music when it comes our way, and more of it we earnestly desire.

Dec. 12, 1898

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURES AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance by the Orchestra and Mrs. Jacoby, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season at Infantry Hall last evening. An excellent programme was presented and its performance was a most finished and satisfactory one. Mr. Gericke, recovered from his recent illness, again appeared at the conductor's desk. In spite of the attractive programme and the superb playing, the audience was the smallest one that has been seen in years at a symphony concert.

There are unmistakable signs that musical entertainments of a high class are not wanted in Providence. The great solo artists who come here play to empty benches, and the city has such an unenviable reputation in this regard that no manager who understands his business will place a concert here. Through the stimulus of pride in a local organization unexcelled in its class, aided by a numerous and influential membership, the concerts of the Arion Club filled Infantry Hall for years. But the past season or two has shown a diminution of interest and the last concert of the club was given to the smallest audience in its history. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received a fair patronage here in the past—not the full house that greets it in every other city all over the country, but still a fair patronage. This season the attendance has fallen off materially, though the quality of the concerts certainly has not. It is to be feared that Conductor Gericke does not know how to cater to our taste. There is too much of Mozart and Mendelssohn, of Tschaikowsky and Wagner. What is needed to arouse our enthusiasm is six trombones in a row blowing "Comrades" or "After the Ball" for all they are worth. It is a mistake, too, that the programmes are so arranged that encores cannot be given. Room for at least three after each number should be provided. For there is no use in going to a concert unless you can get your money's worth.

The small attendance of last night was doubtless due to the fact that none of these attractive novelties were offered. The programme appealed to none save a few musical cranks, who are not of the slightest importance. From their point of view it was a good enough programme, and it included the following numbers:

Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"..... ....Peter Cornelius
Recitative, "Ach, sie hort nicht," and Aria, "Ach ich habe sie verloren," from "Orpheus" ....Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck
Symphonic Poem No. 3, "The Preludes".. .... Franz Liszt
Air: "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila"......Camille Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian," Op. 90..........Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy
I. Allegro vivace (A major)
II. Andante con moto (D minor)
III. Con moto moderato (A major)
IV. Saltarello: Presto (A minor)

The three instrumental numbers were effectively contrasted as well as interesting in themselves. The overture is a brilliant piece of orchestration. Though that is the predominant feature it is by no means lacking in pleasing melodies or variety of treatment. Composed 40 years ago it yet presents much of the modern style, not only in the fullness and richness of its instrumentation, but also in its varied and sometimes intricate rhythms. It was played with great spirit.

The poetic subject of Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," is the following passage from Lamartine's "Meditations Poetiques:"

"What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by death? Love forms the enchanted daybreak of every life; but what is the destiny where the first delights of happiness are not interrupted by some storm, whose fatal breath dissipates its fair illusions, whose fell lightning consumes its altar; and what wounded spirit, when one of these tempests is over, does not seek to rest its memories in the sweet calm of country life? Yet man does not resign himself long to enjoy the beneficent tepidity which first charmed him on Nature's bosom; and, when 'the trumpet's loud clangor has called him to arms,' he rushes to the post of danger, whatever may be the war that calls him to the ranks, to find in battle the full consciousness of himself and the complete possession of his strength."

The form of the composition is necessarily of the freest sort, and the text is useful as a hint to the meaning of the music. The classic formulas of the musical art were irksome to Liszt, who is always at his best in this sort of improvisation. The music is suggestive and sometimes beautiful, but it would not typify human life without its harsh discords and its unresolved cadences suggestive of the problems we are compelled to leave unanswered. Of its performance by the players nothing but praise can be said.

Mendelssohn's bright "Italian" symphony, one of the best of his orchestral compositions, made a most satisfactory finish to the programme. All the admirable Mendelssohnian characteristics are found in this symphony; the spontaneous flow of genuine melody; the unerring sense of proportion and instrumental color; the exquisite and polished workmanship. In this perhaps the best playing of the evening was done, the exhibition of technical perfection and unanimity of purpose being of the highest character. Mr. Gericke read the symphony in a sympathetic and wholly admirable manner.

The soloist was Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, a contralto whose fine voice has brought her rapidly into prominence during the past two years. Certainly she possesses unusual vocal gifts, and she handles her voice with considerable skill. If she yet lacks something of artistic repose it may be forgiven in view of her really sound attainments and her undeniable promise. She sang the aria of Orpheus, an ancient battle-horse of contraltos, exceedingly well, and received several hearty recalls. In the great air of Delilah she was somewhat less successful. The tempo was too slow, for one thing, and the effect sought was not reached by occasional spasmodic accelerandos. Still, her great voice rang out splendidly at the climax, and liberal applause was again forthcoming.

A briefer interval than usual intervenes between this concert and the next of the series, the date for the fourth concert being Wednesday evening, Jan. 11.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1899.

(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last evening, included Wagner's "Faust" overture, Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme, Op. 78, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps and Waltz of the Sylphs, from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and Beethoven's fourth symphony in B flat, Op. 60.

Dvorak's symphonic variations have been played here before, but only once, and then under Mr. Gericke in 1889; so they were practically new to most of the audience last evening. There are twenty-seven variations, with a fugue finale, of which seven were omitted at the concert. The scoring is most brilliant as a rule, the treatment is often contrapuntal, and while the whole composition may not be among the best that Dvorak has given us, still there is much of interest for the listeners. The other numbers are all well-known compositions, and need no especial mention at this time. The orchestra gave an excellent performance of the symphony, and the beauties of Berlioz's instrumentation were never more clearly shown than in the two numbers from the "Damnation of Faust." Here the orchestra was unsurpassable.

The programme of the next rehearsal and concert includes a new symphony by Sinding, Mr. Gericke's orchestration of Brahms's waltzes and Weber's "Freischutz" overture.

Miss Olive Mead, violinist, will be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 1, 1899.

At the Symphony.

There was no soloist at the last symphony offerings, yet Music hall was more than usually crowded at the rehearsal, proving that, after all, it is the music which attracts, not the soloist. Mr Gericke conducted with his accustomed acumen; he neither looks nor directs the worse for his recent prolonged sickness.

Wagner opened the program with his "Faust" overture. It is more valuable as a hint as to what the master might have accomplished with a music-drama based on the Goethe poem than as a concert piece, yet it is always pleasant to hear when interpreted by artists like our symphony players. Then followed Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme, which Mr Gericke introduced to our public during his former term of conductorship. They were finely played as a matter of course; whether it was worth while musically to revive them while so many admirable works remain unheard in our symphony concerts is another question. But after all, has not an orchestral conductor a right to demonstrate his prepossessions, if not his prejudices?

It was interesting to hear something again of Hector Berlioz' curious work, "The Damnation of Faust," well remembered by those who recall the Henschel time. Last week's selections were the minuet of the will o' the wisps and the sylphs' dance, both presented with grace, facility and expression. Beethoven's fourth symphony, following the fantastic but effective music of Berlioz, seemed to be more impressive than usual. One would say that the artist rejoiced to turn once more to the interpretation of the grand master, who can never grow "hackneyed" to true music lovers.

Miss Olive Mead, the brilliant young violinist, will be the soloist at the next rehearsal and concert. The home artiste is assigned Vieuxtemps' fifth concerto for violin. The program offering will include Weber's "Freischutz" overture, an orchestration by Mr Gericke of waltzes by Brahms, and as a novelty in Boston Sinding's symphony No. 1 in D minor.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1899.

Perfection of playing it was, more than anything else, which sustained interest to the end of the tenth Symphony programme, which an unusual number of listeners deserted while it was in progress. For that programme was ultra-conventional,—three of its numbers being more than familiar, almost hacknied indeed, while the fourth was the resuscitation of a work introduced by Mr. Gericke almost ten years ago and since ignored by his successors. This was Dvorak's set of nearly thirsty "symphonic" variations on a theme of his own. Justice. In justice we must say that this long train of variations—seven of which were omitted—passes quickly, for its theme is pleasant and brief, and the individual numbers are also short, quite diversified in character, often bright in tone and light in movement none being really heavy, while there is a quiet ecclasiastical manner in one or two, and the fugued finale soon forgets its mathematical form for animation and vigor. The other numbers—all orchestral—were Wagner's "Faust" overture, the Will o' the Wisps minuet and Sylphs waltz, in the "Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, and Beethoven's fourth symphony. The performance of all was thoroughly fine in apprehension and interpretation, and the gloomy shades of the Wagner, the fairy romances of the Berlioz and the wholesome, natural moods of the Beethoven were in turn beautifully and faithfully expressed. And what a joy it was to hear the kettledrums truly played in the softer parts of the first movement of the symphony!

The next programme stands thus: Weber, Overture, "Freischutz"; Vieuxtemps, Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor; Brahms, Waltzes, orchestrated by W. Gericke; Sinding, Symphony No. 1, in D minor, Op. 11, (first time). Soloist, Miss Olive Mead.

[illegible]ERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
[illegible]DAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1899.

Wagner's "Faust" Overture at the Symphony Concert.

Although the programme of Saturday contained nothing that was entirely new and considerable that was old, it was not lacking in variety and it displayed our orchestra at its very best.

There was no soloist to share the honors; it is pleasant to banish the petted prima donna, the sensational pianist, or the pyrotechnical violinist, from the concerts once in a while, and to listen to an orchestra pure and simple, although the general public is not yet educated up to this point, and the absence of a solo artist always has an appreciable effect upon the size of the audience.

The concert began with Wagner's "Faust" overture, in which a hungry and unrecognized genius vents his bitterness by picturing a dissatisfied and pessimistic philosopher. The work was inspired by hearing Beethoven's ninth symphony in Paris, and was intended as a first movement of a great "Faust" symphony. This may be the explanation of the fact that we have here a Faust without a Marguerite.

The work was shelved by the authorities of the Conservatoire concerts in Paris, as being too vague and puzzling, a verdict with which many latter day auditors will agree; even in metaphysical Germany it found a very cold reception at its advent.

We must differ totally from the dictum of the programme book, which says (speaking of the revision of the overture in 1855)—"It was only on the publication of the Liszt-Wagner correspondence that it was discovered that Liszt, on this occasion, had earnestly advised his friend 'to put some Gretchen into it'—for the sake of musical form and contrast. So the melodious second theme of the woodwind may refer to Gretchen after all."

To utterly do away with such a misleading statement, let us quote Wagner's reply to Liszt's suggestion:—

"I must indeed work it over—but only as to the instrumentive modulation; the theme which you desire cannot possibly be introduced now; that would make it an entirely new composition, which I have no desire to undertake. But if I publish it, I shall give it the correct title—'Faust in Solitude,' or 'The Solitary Faust,' a tone poem for orchestra."

In the letter which Wagner sent to Liszt along with the revised score, he again explicitly states "of Gretchen there can be no question." There is something nobler in the work than the mere picture of love; it is, like the last movement of the ninth symphony, the protest of struggling humanity, a presentation of the "Welt-schmerz," and the statement that the auditor may search for a Marguerite in its measures only belittles the composition. Its motto, full of the human struggle against destiny, ought to be sufficient to give a clue to the work:—

"Der Gott der mir im Busen wohnt,
Kann tief mein Innerstes erregen.
Der ueber allen meinen Kraeften thront,
Er kann nach aussen nichts bewegen,
Und so ist mir das Dasein eine Last,
Der Tod erwuenscht, das Leben mir verhasst."

It was altogether the best and clearest performance of the difficult work that Boston has ever heard; it was so intelligible that it received a greater amount of applause than we remember ever to have been accorded to it.

Dvorak's Orchestral Variations, Op. 78, also received a fine interpretation. Without attaining to the Brahms level, there is much of dignity and very much of orchestra skill in this work. The instrumental forces are presented in ever-changing combinations, and there is never any of that turgidity which mars many of the modern orchestral exhibits. Trombone, horn, flute, clarinet, in short, every instrument except the kettledrum, was "drest in a little brief authority" and had its opportunity of display, wherefore the work became a set of obligato passages, an admirable catalogue of the individual excellences of our great orchestra. The fugal finale was rather a fugato than a fugue, and ended, in anything but a fugal manner, with a sort of Slavonic frenzy.

There were two Fausts upon the programme, one the earnest character portrayed by Goethe, whose depths have only been sounded by Schumann and Wagner, amidst all the musical onslaughts that have been made upon the poem; the other a sort of "Faust-voyageur" evolved from various sources by Berlioz, who causes his hero to travel extensively in every locality where there is a chance of collecting good musical material.

He goes into Hungary on this quest, and manages to get the excellent dance and march music as a result of the trip. The dance of Sylphs he obtained on the banks of the Elbe; this was performed at this concert with a daintiness that it has not had in our concerts in a very long time, the delicacy of the muted violins and the sweetness of the harp harmonics being almost phenomenal. The Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps was also superbly played, its mighty crescendos and its abrupt transitions being given to perfection.

Following the usual Gerickian rule, the symphony ended the programme; it was Beethoven's fourth, one of the most capricious of the nine, and one which possesses as many technical difficulties as any of the set. The mighty sweeps of tone in the first movement were given with appropriate power, Mr. Gericke no longer fearing a fierce fortissimo, and the pretty display of woodwind in the subordinate theme, especially the canon between bassoon and clarinet, being in charming contrast.

The careful manner in which the kettle drums avoided becoming obtrusive in the returning passage at the end of the development deserves cordial commendation; it is so easy to overdo this passage. [illegible] adagio is consi[illegible] gem of this symphony; it is certainly a movement of great breadth, and the art of writing such lofty slow movements seems to be lost; but at this concert it did not seem to make its usual effect, although exquisitely read and played; could this have been because of the neutralising effect of the Berlioz numbers?

The Minuet contains some of the boldest syncopations that even Beethoven ever employed, and Mr. Gericke read these in a masterly manner, not being afraid of the false accents, but allowing the 3-4 rhythm to change into a semblance of 2-4, where the composer had placed his short slurs and indications of bizarre phrasing.

The finale was taken at a furious pace, the "non troppo" attached to the "allegro" being on this occasion obliterated. It was well enough for the violins, who galloped along with the conductor bravely, but when their figure was transferred to the contrabasses, in the coda, there was some blurring; at the speed at which matters were going the passage became an impossibility for them.

It is a dreadful contrabass passage altogether; like a wasp this symphony bears its sting in its tail, and the deep strings have the premonition of that trying close upon their minds through all the work. Weber, who scathingly satirized this work, once pictured the contrabasses in an indignation meeting, complaining that "Mr. Beethoven made them caper and run about like giddy young violins," and the point was not badly taken. That it did not cause the composer to recede from his views in indicated by the difficult contrabass passages in the Trio of the Scherzo of his next symphony. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 1, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Concert Without a Novelty or a Soloist—From Beethoven to Wagner; From Berlioz to Dvorak—Fine Performance of a Comparatively Uninteresting Program.

The program of the tenth Symphony Concert given in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

A Faust-Overture	Wagner
Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 78	Dvorák
From "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24, a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps. b Waltz of Sylphs.	Berlioz
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major	Beethoven

The performance last night lent an external interest to a program that was for the most part inherently dull. Mr. Gericke began by presenting a remarkably clear reading of Wagner's overture, which was written when the eminent composer, like John Ford in the poem, was in doleful dumps. Mr. Apthorp tells the story about Lizst and his advice "to put some Gretchen into it," and he adds: "So the melodious second theme of the wood wind may refer to Gretchen, after all." I do not think this is probable; for Wagner, in a letter written after he had received the advice from Lizst, wrote to a friend as follows: "Woman hovers before him (Faust) only as an indefinite, shapeless object of his yearning; as such, intangible and unattainable. Hence his despair, his curse on all the torturing semblance of the beautiful, his headlong plunge into the mad smart of sorcery." But, after all, it makes little difference whether there is any musical reference to Faust or not; for this overture is to express and create a mood rather than to indulge in musical character drawing. We all have heard it when it seemed as indefinite and shapeless as woman seemed to Faust. Last night it was played as clearly as though it were designed to illustrate an analytical lecture; and thus the overture was less intolerable.

Dvorák's piece consists of "a theme, 27 variations and a fugued finale." I am sorry that Mr. Gericke omitted seven of the variations, for it might have been a pleasant task to decide whether the seven are really worse than the other twenty. I should like to live twenty years longer, so as to learn in 1919 the precise position of Dvorák in the musical world of that year. Now he is a puzzling personage. I admire him when his butcher's blood surges in him and he sees everything red; but he has written a mass of things that are prejudicial to his reputation. He has been handicapped in several ways; first by poverty; then by commissions from English festivals and publishers; and then by a pedagogic position in New York. The early Dvorák writing recklessly the music that he felt was a finer fellow than the manufacturer of "St. Ludmila" and the celebrated Congo-Indian-Krehbielian symphony. He was then honest in his music, without affectation, without friends urging him to boost a theory. These symphonic variations seem to me for the most part tawdry and meretricious. There are echoes of all styles—you hear even Meyerbeer. The orchestration seemed tinsel and fog as soon as the numbers from "The Damnation of Faust" were played.

The pieces by Berlioz preceded Beethoven's fourth symphony; and the famous line of Berlioz concerning the melody of the slow movement of this symphony was at once brought to mind: Michael watching the rising of worlds from the threshold of the empyrean. The more I hear the symphony, the more I am inclined to find the line of Berlioz greater than the symphony itself. For with the exception of this slow movement, the symphony cannot justly be reckoned among the most distinguished works of the composer. There is too much of the formula; there is too much of what is called in the compositions of lesser men—padding. I know that Sir George Grove likens the work to "a graceful Greek maiden between two Norse or Scandinavian heroes, an idyll of Theocritus between 'Hamlet' and 'Lear' "; but the greater your admiration of the symphony, the less happy are these comparisons, although Grove may have been knighted for achieving them. No, the line of Berlioz is a higher flight of imagination than that of the music which evoked the thought of the archangel.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 1.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 1, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor and Orchestra Are Heard at Their Best.

Wagner, Dvorak, Berlioz and Beethoven the Composers Whose Works Served for the Tenth Concert of the Series—The Symphony Is Read in a Refreshing Manner.

The tenth in the series of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place in Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

A "Faust" overture	Wagner
Symphonic variations on an original theme, op. 78	Dvorak
Minuet of Will-o'-the Wisps and Waltz of Sylphs	Berlioz
Symphony, No. 4, in B flat	Beethoven

There was nothing new among these selections, unless indeed the Dvorak theme and variations may be so considered, they having been given here only once before under Mr. Gericke's dirction, about nine years ago; but the concert was delightfully interesting from beginning to end in regard to both the deeply thoughtful and effective readings Mr. Gericke accorded the works and the exceptionally fine playing of the orchestra.

The Wagner overture never had a clearer, more richly-colored and more convincingly logical interpretation here than was given it last evening, nor were its themes more admirably contrasted and its varying sentiments more emotionally emphasized. It was a splendidly brilliant presentation of a work that is oftener made tiresome than edifying, and for once held the attention thoroughly absorbed throughout.

The Dvorak variations are 27 in number, but of these only 20 were given. They show the composer at his best, and such is the steadily sustained interest of the work, such the fertile ingenuity of the treatment to which the theme is subjected, and such the fluent charm of the orchestration, that it is surprising the composition has not had a more frequent hearing at these concerts. There is a sustained dignity in it that Dvorak does not always succeed in achieving in so long an effort, and even in the inevitable polka rhythm that finds vent in one of the variations, he escapes vulgarity.

Twenty orchestral variations might easily become a somewhat heavy dose for one instalment; but Mr. Gericke, by the skill with which he caused each variation to tell its particular story in its own particular way, and the artistic sympathy with which he found the appropriate tempo and tone-color for every new development, as well as the beauty and authority of the phrasing, to say nothing of the exquisite finish of the orchestral rendering, deprived the work of anything provocative of tiresomeness, and made listening to it a wholly satisfying pleasure.

The two Berlioz pieces were also charmingly read and played, the first with a singularly impressive and effective accentuation and the second with fascinating delicacy; and the unaccustomed accelerated pace at which Mr. Gericke took it seemed to intensify its tender, thistle-down lightness.

The symphony, perhaps the most richly melodious of the wonderful nine, is the one that, oddly enough, was stigmatized by Weber as barren of everything except dissonances that tortured the ears and unmeaning noise that deafened them; though later he made ample reparation when he wrote to Beethoven regarding the production of "Fidelio" in Dresden, saying: "Each performance will be a feast to me, affording me the opportunity of offering to your lofty spirit a homage welling from my deepest heart, which is full of blended admiration and love for you."

That this symphony, of all others, should have ever seemed vague and iconoclastic is almost inconceivable, and gives rise to curious reflections regarding the clarity, tunefulness and moderation of Cesar Frank and Richard Strauss to future generations.

The symphony was read along purely conservative lines. This, however, goes without saying, for Mr. Gericke is not afflicted with that new and distressing form of megalocephalic disease, conductorosis, whose symptoms are a mania to bring the music of the old masters up to date and to make it say what it has never said before, and what they could not by any possibility have meant it to say; the culmination of the indisposition being an ambition to glorify the conductor and to show how superior he is to the composer. Hence, last evening's reading was large and healthy in spirit, pure in taste and reverent in its respect to the master, and consequently beyond reproach. In most regards the concert was, perhaps, the best of the season thus far, and the audience was very applausive.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber; concerto for violin, No. 5, in A minor, Vieuxtemps; waltzes, Brahms, orchestrated by Wilhelm Gericke; symphony No. 1, in D minor, op. 21, Sinding, first time. Miss Olive Mead is to be the soloist.

It was a gala afternoon at the Symphony rehearsal Friday, and everybody wore a holiday air. A few of the many noticed in the front rows were Mrs. Oliver Ames, who looked exceedingly handsome, and who had with her mother Mrs. West, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, Sr., and her daughter Miss Belle Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Grew, Mrs. DeForest Danielson, Mrs. James B. Case, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Mrs. Andrew G. Weeks, Mrs. Charles H. Drew and Miss Drew, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. S. Reed Anthony, Mrs. Francis Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Morss, Jr., Miss Dorothy Allen, Miss Susan W. Shaw, Mrs. F. L. Emerson, Mrs. William Lindsey, Mrs. John Osborn and Miss Alice Ward.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1898.

BOSTON, Mass., December 25, 1898.

THE musical week brought forth but one concert, that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening, and for which the program was:

Academic Festival Overture	Brahms
Concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat	Beethoven
Sinfonia from Christmas Oratorio, part II	Bach
Symphony, No. 4, Italian	Mendelssohn

The soloist was Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

Mr. Gericke conducted and was welcomed with great and prolonged heartiness, it being his first appearance, except at the public rehearsal of the day before, since his recent severe illness, and the vigor of this manifestation of pleasure at his return, as well as its manifest sincerity, evidently moved him deeply. The grip had done nothing to impair the energy, brilliancy and authority of his conducting. After the performance of the Bach selection he was presented with a huge Christmas wreath, and there was another storm of plaudits.

Originally César Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" was announced for performance, but the orchestral parts not having arrived in time for rehearsal a change in the program was rendered necessary. This is scarcely to be regretted, for the first presentation here of the Franck work by Theodore Thomas and his orchestra last season aroused no very great admiration for the music and left no notably edifying impression on the mind regarding what it was all about.

Mr. Gericke's reading of the Brahms overture made that somewhat stiffly perfunctory work sound almost genial. He did not try to find in it any more than lay clearly on the surface, and read it in a frank, laissez faire spirit that seemed to bring more out of it and to impart a brighter interest to it than I can recall in connection with any earlier performance.

For once the Bach "Pastoral" was given without the usual hiccupy jerkiness in the persistent dotted triplets, for Mr. Gericke took it at a pace that obviated the difficulty, rendered phrasing more satisfying and caused the music to move flowingly and smoothly instead of in the prudishly solemn tempo that makes it a weariness to the soul and an exasperating monotony of rhythm afflicted with the rickets. It would perhaps have been even more interesting if it had been played as Bach wrote it, for Robert Franz's additional orchestration "in the spirit of the composer" constantly troubles one because it is so rich and so modern in spots, and consequently so much at variance with that same spirit. I must confess that I much prefer the pastoral in "The Messiah," on the ground that it is more naïve and more suggestive of simple shepherds, of a peaceful night under the open sky, and that it leaves the mind undisturbed of ingenious contrapuntal devices that savor of the midnight lamp rather than of the stars. All which I admit is as flat burglary as ever was committed. However, this expression of a mere personal sentiment reflects in nowise on the beauty and the effectiveness of the rendering that Mr. Gericke vouchsafed, though it might be urged that here and there he imparted a too heroic color to it.

Best of all was the sparkling performance of the pretty and bubbling Mendelssohn Symphony, of which the opening movement was given with exhilarating vivacity and emphasis. Even the genteel Pilgrims' March took on an unaccustomed interest under the thoughtful and charmingly colored treatment it received, and the brilliancy of the reading and playing of the finale was something very much in the nature of a revelation of the possibilities of the movement in respect to expression and rhythmic swing.

Madame Hopekirk's performance of the "Emperor" concerto, though lacking now and then in the largeness and the fire for which the work calls, was on the whole notably interesting for the artistic feeling that distinguished it throughout, for the player's intelligent conception of it and for her skill in making it clear to her hearers. Fluent grace and elegance of technic, purity of taste and loftiness of feeling were delightfully prominent features in the effort, and admirable was the frank devotion to the composer as well as the artist's fine discretion in refraining from mere display and in not attempting to do too much. Especially praiseworthy was the playing of the adagio, in which sentiment never sank to sentimentality. Although more vigorously heroic interpretations of the concerto have been heard here, it would not be easy to recall to memory one more refined, more conscientious and more sympathetic than that of Madame Hopekirk

* * *

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1899.

Wagner's "Faust" Overture at the Symphony Concert.

Although the programme of Saturday contained nothing that was entirely new and considerable that was old, it was not lacking in variety and it displayed our orchestra at its very best.

There was no soloist to share the honors; it is pleasant to banish the petted prima donna, the sensational pianist, or the pyrotechnical violinist, from the concerts once in a while, and to listen to an orchestra pure and simple, although the general public is not yet educated up to this point, and the absence of a solo artist always has an appreciable effect upon the size of the audience.

The concert began with Wagner's "Faust" overture, in which a hungry and unrecognized genius vents his bitterness by picturing a dissatisfied and pessimistic philosopher. The work was inspired by hearing Beethoven's ninth symphony in Paris, and was intended as a first movement of a great "Faust" symphony. This may be the explanation of the fact that we have here a Faust without a Marguerite.

The work was shelved by the authorities of the Conservatoire concerts in Paris, as being too vague and puzzling, a verdict with which many latter day auditors will agree; even in metaphysical Germany it found a very cold reception at its advent.

We must differ totally from the dictum of the programme book, which says (speaking of the revision of the overture in 1855)—"It was only on the publication of the Liszt-Wagner correspondence that it was discovered that Liszt, on this occasion, had earnestly advised his friend 'to put some Gretchen into it'—for the sake of musical form and contrast. So the melodious second theme of the woodwind may refer to Gretchen after all."

To utterly do away with such a misleading statement, let us quote Wagner's reply to Liszt's suggestion:—

"I must indeed work it over—but only as to the instrumentive modulation; the theme which you desire cannot possibly be introduced now; that would make it an entirely new composition, which I have no desire to undertake. But if I publish it, I shall give it the correct title—'Faust in Solitude,' or 'The Solitary Faust,' a tone poem for orchestra."

In the letter which Wagner sent to Liszt along with the revised score, he again explicitly states "of Gretchen there can be no question." There is something nobler in the work than the mere picture of love; it is, like the last movement of the ninth symphony, the protest of struggling humanity, a presentation of the "Welt-schmerz," and the statement that the auditor may search for a Marguerite in its measures only belittles the composition. Its motto, full of the human struggle against destiny, ought to be sufficient to give a clue to the work:—

"Der Gott der mir im Busen wohnt,
Kann tief mein Innerstes erregen.
Der ueber allen meinen Kraeften thront,
Er kann nach aussen nichts bewegen,
Und so ist mir das Dasein eine Last,
Der Tod erwuenscht, das Leben mir verhasst."

It was altogether the best and clearest performance of the difficult work that Boston has ever heard; it was so intelligible that it received a greater amount of applause than we remember ever to have been accorded to it.

Dvorak's Orchestral Variations, Op. 78, also received a fine interpretation. Without attaining to the Brahms level, there is much of dignity and very much of orchestra skill in this work. The instrumental forces are presented in ever-changing combinations, and there is never any of that turgidity which mars many of the modern orchestral exhibits. Trombone, horn, flute, clarinet, in short, every instrument except the kettledrum, was "drest in a little brief authority" and had its opportunity of display, wherefore the work became a set of obligato passages, an admirable catalogue of the individual excellences of our great orchestra. The fugal finale was rather a fugato than a fugue, and ended, in anything but a fugal manner, with a sort of Slavonic frenzy.

There were two Fausts upon the programme, one the earnest character portrayed by Goethe, whose depths have only been sounded by Schumann and Wagner, amidst all the musical onslaughts that have been made upon the poem; the other a sort of "Faust-voyageur" evolved from various sources by Berlioz, who causes his hero to travel extensively in every locality where there is a chance of collecting good musical material.

He goes into Hungary on this quest, and manages to get the excellent dance and march music as a result of the trip. The dance of Sylphs he obtained on the banks of the Elbe; this was performed at this concert with a daintiness that it has not had in our concerts in a very long time, the delicacy of the muted violins and the sweetness of the harp harmonics being almost phenomenal. The Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps was also superbly played, its mighty crescendos and its abrupt transitions being given to perfection.

Following the usual Gerickian rule, the symphony ended the programme; it was Beethoven's fourth, one of the most capricious of the nine, and one which possesses as many technical difficulties as any of the set. The mighty sweeps of tone in the first movement were given with appropriate power, Mr. Gericke no longer fearing a fierce fortissimo, and the pretty display of woodwind in the subordinate theme, especially the canon between bassoon and clarinet, being in charming contrast.

The careful manner in which the kettle drums avoided becoming obtrusive in the returning passage at the end of the development deserves cordial commendation; it is so easy to overdo this passage.

The Adagio is considered the gem of this symphony; it is certainly a movement of great breadth, and the art of writing such lofty slow movements seems to be lost; but at this concert it did not seem to make its usual effect, although exquisitely read and played; could this have been because of the neutralizing effect of the Berlioz numbers?

The Minuet contains some of the boldest syncopations that even Beethoven ever employed, and Mr. Gericke read these in a masterly manner, not being afraid of the false accents, but allowing the 3-4 rhythm to change into a semblance of 2-4, where the composer had placed his short slurs and indications of bizarre phrasing.

The finale was taken at a furious pace, the "non troppo" attached to the "allegro" being on this occasion obliterated. It was well enough for the violins, who galloped along with the conductor bravely, but when their figure was transferred to the contrabasses, in the coda, there was some blurring; at the speed at which matters were going the passage became an impossibility for them.

It is a dreadful contrabass passage altogether; like a wasp this symphony bears its sting in its tail, and the deep strings have the premonition of that trying close upon their minds through all the work. Weber, who scathingly satirized this work, once pictured the contrabasses in an indignation meeting, complaining that "Mr. Beethoven made them caper and run about like giddy young violins," and the point was not badly taken. That it did not cause the composer to recede from his views in indicated by the difficult contrabass passages in the Trio of the Scherzo of his next symphony. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 1, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Concert Without a Novelty or a Soloist—From Beethoven to Wagner; From Berlioz to Dvorak—Fine Performance of a Comparatively Uninteresting Program.

The program of the tenth Symphony Concert given in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

A Faust-Overture .... Wagner
Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 78 .... Dvořák
From "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24,
a Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.
b Waltz of Sylphs. Berlioz
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major.... Beethoven

The performance last night lent an external interest to a program that was for the most part inherently dull. Mr. Gericke began by presenting a remarkably clear reading of Wagner's overture, which was written when the eminent composer, like John Ford in the poem, was in doleful dumps. Mr. Apthorp tells the story about Lizst and his advice "to put some Gretchen into it," and he adds: "So the melodious second theme of the wood wind may refer to Gretchen, after all." I do not think this is probable; for Wagner, in a letter written after he had received the advice from Lizst, wrote to a friend as follows: "Woman hovers before him (Faust) only as an indefinite, shapeless object of his yearning; as such, intangible and unattainable. Hence his despair, his curse on all the torturing semblance of the beautiful, his headlong plunge into the mad smart of sorcery." But, after all, it makes little difference whether there is any musical reference to Faust or not; for this overture is to express and create a mood rather than to indulge in musical character drawing. We all have heard it when it seemed as indefinite and shapeless as woman seemed to Faust. Last night it was played as clearly as though it were designed to illustrate an analytical lecture; and thus the overture was less intolerable.

Dvořák's piece consists of "a theme, 27 variations and a fugued finale." I am sorry that Mr. Gericke omitted seven of the variations, for it might have been a pleasant task to decide whether the seven are really worse than the other twenty. I should like to live twenty years longer, so as to learn in 1919 the precise position of Dvořák in the musical world of that year. Now he is a puzzling personage. I admire him when his butcher's blood surges in him and he sees everything red; but he has written a mass of things that are prejudicial to his reputation. He has been handicapped in several ways; first by poverty; then by commissions from English festivals and publishers; and then by a pedagogic position in New York. The early Dvořák writing recklessly the music that he felt was a finer fellow than the manufacturer of "St. Ludmila" and the celebrated Congo-Indian-Krehbielian symphony. He was then honest in his music, without affectation, without friends urging him to boost a theory. These symphonic variations seem to me for the most part tawdry and meretricious. There are echoes of all styles—you hear even Meyerbeer. The orchestration seemed tinsel and fog as soon as the numbers from "The Damnation of Faust" were played.

The pieces by Berlioz preceded Beethoven's fourth symphony; and the famous line of Berlioz concerning the melody of the slow movement of this symphony was at once brought to mind: Michael watching the rising of worlds from the threshold of the empyrean. The more I hear the symphony, the more I am inclined to find the line of Berlioz greater than the symphony itself. For with the exception of this slow movement, the symphony cannot justly be reckoned among the most distinguished works of the composer. There is too much of the formula; there is too much of what is called in the compositions of lesser men—padding. I know that Sir George Grove likens the work to "a graceful Greek maiden between two Norse or Scandinavian heroes, an idyll of Theocritus between 'Hamlet' and 'Lear'"; but the greater your admiration of the symphony, the less happy are these comparisons, although Grove may have been knighted for achieving them. No, the line of Berlioz is a higher flight of imagination than that of the music which evoked the thought of the archangel.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 1.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 1, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor and Orchestra Are Heard at Their Best.

Wagner, Dvorak, Berlioz and Beethoven the Composers Whose Works Served for the Tenth Concert of the Series—The Symphony Is Read in a Refreshing Manner.

The tenth in the series of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place in Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

A "Faust" overture.................. Wagner
Symphonic variations on an original theme, op. 78.............................. Dvorak
Minuet of Will-o'-the Wisps and Waltz of Sylphs.................................. Berlioz
Symphony, No. 4, in B flat.......... Beethoven

There was nothing new among these selections, unless indeed the Dvorak theme and variations may be so considered, they having been given here only once before under Mr. Gericke's dirction, about nine years ago; but the concert was delightfully interesting from beginning to end in regard to both the deeply thoughtful and effective readings Mr. Gericke accorded the works and the exceptionally fine playing of the orchestra.

The Wagner overture never had a clearer, more richly-colored and more convincingly logical interpretation here than was given it last evening, nor were its themes more admirably contrasted and its varying sentiments more emotionally emphasized. It was a splendidly brilliant presentation of a work that is oftener made tiresome than edifying, and for once held the attention thoroughly absorbed throughout.

The Dvorak variations are 27 in number, but of these only 20 were given. They show the composer at his best, and such is the steadily sustained interest of the work, such the fertile ingenuity of the treatment to which the theme is subjected, and such the fluent charm of the orchestration, that it is surprising the composition has not had a more frequent hearing at these concerts. There is a sustained dignity in it that Dvorak does not always succeed in achieving in so long an effort, and even in the inevitable polka rhythm that finds vent in one of the variations, he escapes vulgarity.

Twenty orchestral variations might easily become a somewhat heavy dose for one instalment; but Mr. Gericke, by the skill with which he caused each variation to tell its particular story in its own particular way, and the artistic sympathy with which he found the appropriate tempo and tone-color for every new development, as well as the beauty and authority of the phrasing, to say nothing of the exquisite finish of the orchestral rendering, deprived the work of anything provocative of tiresomeness, and made listening to it a wholly satisfying pleasure.

The two Berlioz pieces were also charmingly read and played, the first with a singularly impressive and effective accentuation and the second with fascinating delicacy; and the unaccustomed accelerated pace at which Mr. Gericke took it seemed to intensify its tender, thistle-down lightness.

The symphony, perhaps the most richly melodious of the wonderful nine, is the one that, oddly enough, was stigmatized by Weber as barren of everything except dissonances that tortured the ears and unmeaning noise that deafened them; though later he made ample reparation when he wrote to Beethoven regarding the production of "Fidelio" in Dresden, saying: "Each performance will be a feast to me, affording me the opportunity of offering to your lofty spirit a homage welling from my deepest heart, which is full of blended admiration and love for you."

That this symphony, of all others, should have ever seemed vague and iconoclastic is almost inconceivable, and gives rise to curious reflections regarding the clarity, tunefulness and moderation of Cesar Frank and Richard Strauss to future generations.

The symphony was read along purely conservative lines. This, however, goes without saying, for Mr. Gericke is not afflicted with that new and distressing form of megalocephalic disease, conductorosis, whose symptoms are a mania to bring the music of the old masters up to date and to make it say what it has never said before, and what they could not by any possibility have meant it to say; the culmination of the indisposition being an ambition to glorify the conductor and to show how superior he is to the composer. Hence, last evening's reading was large and healthy in spirit, pure in taste and reverent in its respect to the master, and consequently beyond reproach. In most regards the concert was, perhaps, the best of the season thus far, and the audience was very applausive.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber; concerto for violin, No. 5, in A minor, Vieuxtemps; waltzes, Brahms, orchestrated by Wilhelm Gericke; symphony No. 1, in D minor, op. 21, Sinding, first time. Miss Olive Mead is to be the soloist.

It was a gala afternoon at the Symphony rehearsal Friday, and everybody wore a holiday air. A few of the many noticed in the front rows were Mrs. Oliver Ames, who looked exceedingly handsome, and who had with her mother Mrs. West, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, Sr., and her daughter Miss Belle Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Grew, Mrs. DeForest Danielson, Mrs. James B. Case, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Mrs. Andrew G. Weeks, Mrs. Charles H. Drew and Miss Drew, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. S. Reed Anthony, Mrs. Francis Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Morss, Jr., Miss Dorothy Allen, Miss Susan W. Shaw, Mrs. F. L. Emerson, Mrs. William Lindsey, Mrs. John Osborn and Miss Alice Ward.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1898.

BOSTON, Mass., December 25, 1898.

THE musical week brought forth but one concert, that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening, and for which the program was:

Academic Festival Overture.................................. Brahms
Concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat........................ Beethoven
Sinfonia from Christmas Oratorio, part II..................... Bach
Symphony, No. 4, Italian............................... Mendelssohn

The soloist was Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

Mr. Gericke conducted and was welcomed with great and prolonged heartiness, it being his first appearance, except at the public rehearsal of the day before, since his recent severe illness, and the vigor of this manifestation of pleasure at his return, as well as its manifest sincerity, evidently moved him deeply. The grip had done nothing to impair the energy, brilliancy and authority of his conducting. After the performance of the Bach selection he was presented with a huge Christmas wreath, and there was another storm of plaudits.

Originally César Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" was announced for performance, but the orchestral parts not having arrived in time for rehearsal a change in the program was rendered necessary. This is scarcely to be regretted, for the first presentation here of the Franck work by Theodore Thomas and his orchestra last season aroused no very great admiration for the music and left no notably edifying impression on the mind regarding what it was all about.

Mr. Gericke's reading of the Brahms overture made that somewhat stiffly perfunctory work sound almost genial. He did not try to find in it any more than lay clearly on the surface, and read it in a frank, laissez faire spirit that seemed to bring more out of it and to impart a brighter interest to it than I can recall in connection with any earlier performance.

For once the Bach "Pastoral" was given without the usual hiccupy jerkiness in the persistent dotted triplets, for Mr. Gericke took it at a pace that obviated the difficulty, rendered phrasing more satisfying and caused the music to move flowingly and smoothly instead of in the prudishly solemn tempo that makes it a weariness to the soul and an exasperating monotony of rhythm afflicted with the rickets. It would perhaps have been even more interesting if it had been played as Bach wrote it, for Robert Franz's additional orchestration "in the spirit of the composer" constantly troubles one because it is so rich and so modern in spots, and consequently so much at variance with that same spirit. I must confess that I much prefer the pastoral in "The Messiah," on the ground that it is more naïve and more suggestive of simple shepherds, of a peaceful night under the open sky, and that it leaves the mind undisturbed of ingenious contrapuntal devices that savor of the midnight lamp rather than of the stars. All which I admit is as flat burglary as ever was committed. However, this expression of a mere personal sentiment reflects in nowise on the beauty and the effectiveness of the rendering that Mr. Gericke vouchsafed, though it might be urged that here and there he imparted a too heroic color to it.

Best of all was the sparkling performance of the pretty and bubbling Mendelssohn Symphony, of which the opening movement was given with exhilarating vivacity and emphasis. Even the genteel Pilgrims' March took on an unaccustomed interest under the thoughtful and charmingly colored treatment it received, and the brilliancy of the reading and playing of the finale was something very much in the nature of a revelation of the possibilities of the movement in respect to expression and rhythmic swing.

Madame Hopekirk's performance of the "Emperor" concerto, though lacking now and then in the largeness and the fire for which the work calls, was on the whole notably interesting for the artistic feeling that distinguished it throughout, for the player's intelligent conception of it and for her skill in making it clear to her hearers. Fluent grace and elegance of technic, purity of taste and loftiness of feeling were delightfully prominent features in the effort, and admirable was the frank devotion to the composer as well as the artist's fine discretion in refraining from mere display and in not attempting to do too much. Especially praiseworthy was the playing of the adagio, in which sentiment never sank to sentimentality. Although more vigorously heroic interpretations of the concerto have been heard here, it would not be easy to recall to memory one more refined, more conscientious and more sympathetic than that of Madame Hopekirk

* * *

[80]

The Arts in Providence.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave your critic occasion to ease his mind on the musical character of our city. Although every little helps, a great deal more could have been said without hitting our good people too hard. The remarks of your critic may be amended by the statement that in all probability the Boston organization will not return again next season.

The state of things in music is really disheartening, and how the few good musicians still have the courage to do any more than they are actually obliged to is as much surprising as it is creditable to them, for they lack all spiritual as well as financial assistance. Nothing in the line of music rising the least little bit above the common and vulgar is sure of the least success. Lectures which would meet with the greatest encouragement and large patronage in any decent city are but little successful. The chamber concerts given by the late Miss Broome, as good as they were, appealed only to 40 or 50 people, and barely paid expenses. The Kneisel Quartet, the foremost organization of its kind, has not returned this season for obvious reasons; and what, pray, is a musical city without this peer of all music? And so it is with the Arion and everything else. But is it different in the field of letters and the beautiful arts? The demand for trash is just as great there. The remarks of your paper on the quality of our theatre-goers will be gladly endorsed by every fair-minded intelligent man. Speaking about this degrading of the artistic taste to a prominent artist, the knight of the brush spoke of the art lovers of Providence as a "damned lot of dubbs." Not very complimentary, but nevertheless true.

But what is the cause of it? In music this is answered easily. The low standard here, the lack of interest in high-class entertainments, is due to the absence of amateurs in the proper sense of the word. No professional musician or a musical organization can exist and grow unless it is supported by a healthy body of amateurs, lovers of music, who cultivate it for the pure love of it, for its beauty, its pleasures and the refinement it affords. This class is entirely lacking here in large numbers. As soon as a pupil becomes acquainted enough with some instrument to make a fair bluff at it, out comes the shingle, and a new educator of the people is created, who perhaps is able to keep one lesson ahead of the pupil.

If we look through the directory we find singing and instrumental teachers by the hundred. What do they know? What can they teach? Can they build up a taste for the high and beautiful in a rising generation? No! How many of these would-be teachers are able to analyze the smallest music piece? How many can tell the key of a piece or name the scales with the proper signature; not to speak of anything beyond these rudiments! It does not make any difference how much the earnest musician raises the standard of music; the fake pulls it down according to the strong law of self-protection—for a high standard of music is his doom. It does not make any difference how much money the city spends for musical education in schools; the work is not carried on outside of the four walls in the proper way.

Glancing through musical papers we see reports of musical clubs in the smallest cities. Where are ours? Where is the Chopin Club? Why don't we have any? Because we have no amateurs who care to elevate themselves; they all are satisfied with what they know. The late Robert Bonner worked all his life to maintain an amateur orchestra. Why did he not succeed? Why will the present organization not succeed? Because there are not enough amateurs to belong to it. Anybody who can draw a bow over a fiddle, anybody who can blow an instrument is a teacher or professional, even if sometimes the cats would not envy them for the tones they produce. Every amateur thus turning a questionable professional is a loss as a supporter of higher class entertainment. He stops educating himself, he begins to make money, he calls himself "professor" and thinks he knows it all. But all musical entertainments must depend for their support upon those who are somewhat musically educated. But how many of these people go to concerts as, for instance, the Boston Symphonic? The fingers on two hands are sufficient to count them. And how does that number compare with the number in the directory, not to speak of the "moonshiners" who follow their trade in the dark, for a trade it has become and ceased to be an art.

The standard of art is the standard of culture and refinement of a city, and no matter how rich it is, how many millionaires it has, as long as it has no art-life it is a large village of well-to-do ignoramuses. It is not the money bogy that counts in the civilization of a race, but the intellect. The only remedy is that people contemplating the musical education of their children look for decent teachers, which does not necessarily mean a high-priced one; teachers who are able to infuse that love for good music into the children which is the best safeguard against all humbug. If they don't, if they don't support our home teachers more, the name of Providence will soon vanish from the list of cities where music has a home. The Boston musicians will rush by here, no virtuoso will play again in that inspiring barn on South Main street, no educated musician will settle here and those that are here will look for more cheerful and enthusiastic places as many have done. And then Providence will be a fine place. The drama will dance cancan with the rather French play and its still more rotten representatives, to the music of the hurdy-gurdy playing the latest coon songs, and the beautiful arts will be worshipped on the beefy models of the leg show.

AN ART CRANK.

Providence, Dec. 31, 1898.

(These be stinging words indeed, but the sting is in their truth.—Ed.)

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 2, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Wagner: Eine Faust-Ouvertüre.
Dvorak: Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, opus 78.
Berlioz: { Menuet des Feu-Follets / Valse des Sylphes } from "La Damnation de Faust," opus 24.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.

One of the most wonderful performances of the "Faust-Overture" that we have ever listened to! In point of technical perfection it left nothing to be desired, while it revealed a, to us, quite new conception of the work. It should be remembered that Wagner at first intended this overture to be the first movement of a "Faust" symphony; this accounts fully enough for its unusually symphonic character, the strongly romantic vein that runs through it being quite as satisfactorily accounted for by its title and the composer's individuality. In his reading of the overture Mr. Gericke does justice to both phases of the composition: to its quasi-classical symphonic side and its more romantic essence. The clearness with which the polyphonic web of the work was shown forth was perfect in its way; then, what a fine idea it was, remembering Wagner's chosen motto from Goethe's "Faust," "Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren!" to keep the expression in the first part and working out of the Allegro restrained within the bounds of moody contemplation, and let loose all the violence of passion in the third part! Far from impairing the general unity of the composition, this somehow held it together as with bands of steel; never before has this work seemed to us so finely homogenous, so entirely noble.

Dvorak's symphonic variations—not heard here since they were first played under Mr. Gericke in 1889—made a very good impression indeed. The work, to be sure, is not to be ranked in the same class with Bach's passacaglia and chaconne, with Beethoven's "Diabelli" variations, or Schumann's études symphoniques; it is hardly serious, hardly profound enough for that. But, in their lighter, often more whimsically fantastic vein, these variations keep well within the bounds of symphonic dignity; they are both pleasing and interesting, full of solid work of a sort, and of enchanting effects of color. In short, we incline to class these variations with the better works of a man who often rather confounds one with the enormous distance that separates his second-rate things from his fine ones. The playing was admirable in the extreme.

Berlioz's minuet of will-o'-the-wisps was played with great technical perfection, but, as it struck us, with too little disinvoltura of accent, too little sharpness of contrast. We have heard it go more effectively. The graceful little waltz of sylphs rather missed fire, too, in spite of the daintiest playing. We have been thinking over this lack of effectiveness, which perhaps may be accounted for as follows: The waltz has usually been heard here, as on Saturday evening, coming immediately after the minuet; so there was no strangeness in this juxtaposition. But, if we mistake not, it has generally been heard here at a somewhat slower tempo. Now, Mr. Gericke's tempo was so nearly that indicated by Berlioz in the score—the dotted quarter-note equalling fifty-four of the metronome—as to be virtually correct. But, in the "Damnation de Faust," this tempo is determined by that of the preceding chorus of gnomes and sylphs, the composer's direction being: "Three measures of this movement like one of the preceding tempo;" indeed, the theme of the waltz is nothing more nor less than a new, quasi-microscopic version of the theme of the chorus, and this unity of tempo, the same rate of beat persisting throughout, is unquestionably important to the proper effect. But, when the waltz is given immediately after the minuet of will-o'-the-wisps, this element of unity of tempo falls away of itself; the tempo, with the beat at fifty-four, somehow sounds hurried and scrambling, compared with that of the minuet, and the fairy-like daintiness of effect is lost. In how far a conductor would be authorized in slackening the tempo of the waltz, to fit it to its new surroundings, may be a matter of opinion. All we can say is that, coming after the minuet, the waltz sounds better to us at a less rapid tempo than that indicated by the composer; whereas, in its proper place in the whole work, the composer's tempo is not to be disputed.

Beethoven's ever-wonderful and beautiful B-flat symphony was played as wellnigh to perfection as one could well desire. When such a work is so given, one takes off his hat!

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz;" Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin, No. 5, in A minor, opus 37; Brahms, waltzes (orchestrated by W. Gericke); Sinding, symphony No. 1, in D minor, opus 21 (first time in Boston). Miss Olive Mead will be the solo violinist.

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

A Fine Playing of Some Old Favorites—Wagner, Beethoven, Berlioz and Dvorak Are Represented.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, tenth concert. The programme:

A Faust-Overture........................Wagner
Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 78....................Dvorak
From "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24,
a Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.
b Waltz of Sylphs.
Berlioz
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major.....Beethoven

There was nothing new in the concert, and nothing even unfamiliar, save the Dvorak variations, but everything was well chosen and harmonious, and the fine reading of Mr. Gericke and the splendid playing of the orchestra made it a time of hearty and rational enjoyment to everyone. The "Faust" overtures was for once clear as crystal, while nothing was lost in the way of a heroic effect. It is not Wagner at his best, because all his fiery genius was called forth by his music-dramas, but it is interesting as showing the work of the master when he essayed the symphonic form.

Twenty of the 27 Dvorak variations were played, and the number might have been reduced still further without harm. But many of them are brilliant and beautiful and all have a charm and virility of orchestration that the composer does not always display. The playing was everything that could be desired. Particularly beautiful and fascinating, too, was the way Mr. Gericke brought out the always lovely minuet and waltz from Berlioz's "Faust." I have never heard more exquisite nuances than those he impressed upon the first of the movements.

The performance of the Beethoven Symphony No. 4 necessarily arouses thoughts of Weber's fierce attacks upon it when it was new, especially since Mr. Apthorp calls attention to the matter in the programme book. If it is incomprehensible to us that he found it full of dissonances and unmeaning noise, let us simply look at the case of Wagner. In our own lifetime we have seen merciless abuse and ridicule heaped upon his music. No longer than 15 years ago one of the stock jokes of the paragraphers and the comic papers was that which combined cat-concerts and "Tristan," for instance. That day has passed. Wagner may be slated as dull and tedious by some, but not even the most pronounced Wagnerphobe nowadays dreams of calling him cacophanous or unintelligible. It is quite likely that young Mr. Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" will some time be regarded as a model of simplicity and form. To return to the Beethoven symphony, it was extraordinarily well done. Its great inherent beauty was never better shown, and that Mr. Gericke is still a master of the Beethoven style was very evident.

WILDER D. QUINT.

4

The Boston Traveler

NEW MUSIC HALL

The Capital Stock Will Be Increased from $200,000 to $500,000.

A call has been issued for a meeting of the stockholders of the corporation formed for the purpose of building a new Music Hall. At this meeting the stockholders will be asked to vote an increase of the capital stock from $200,000 to $500,000.

This is in accordance with the plan outlined in a circular of 1893, in which it was stated that when outstanding subscriptions were called in the capital stock would be increased, if such was the wish of the subscribers. That the increase will be voted is assured, but it is not certain when the rather more than $100,000 needed will be paid in.

At present the funds of the company amount to $402,500—the subscriptions of 406 persons. As soon as possible, more stock will be sold, but how long it will take to dispose of the necessary amount cannot now be predicted.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson and three other gentlemen have just purchased 12,060 feet of land adjoining the new Music Hall property on the west. It was inferred from this that the purchase was authorized by the Music Hall corporation and that a finer building was to be erected than that originally projected, but such is not the case. Mr. Edward W. Hooper is authority for the statement that the corporation had nothing whatever to do with the purchase.

It was, however, thought by Mr. Higginson and the gentlemen associated with him that the time might come when the corporation would need this additional land, and so they, of their own motion, clubbed together and bought it.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 3.

TUESDAY, JAN. 3, 1899.

NEW MUSIC HALL PROJECT.

Capital Stock to Be Increased to Half a Million.

Corporation Now Has Over $400,000—A Large Additional Lot of Land Available if Needed—The Building to Be of the Simplest Construction and Fireproof.

A call has been issued for a meeting of the stockholders of the corporation formed for the purpose of building a new Music Hall. At this meeting the stockholders will be asked to vote an increase of the capital stock from $200,000 to $500,000.

This is in accordance with the plan outlined in a circular of 1893, in which it was stated that when outstanding subscriptions were called in the capital stock would be increased, if such was the wish of the subscribers. That the increase will be voted is assured, but it is not certain when the rather more than $100,000 needed will be paid in.

At present the funds of the company amount to $402,500—the subscriptions of 406 persons. As soon as possible, more stock will be sold, but how long it will take to dispose of the necessary amount cannot now be predicted.

Col. Henry L. Higginson and three other gentlemen have just purchased 12,060 feet of land adjoining the new Music Hall property on the west. It was inferred from this that the purchase was authorized by the Music Hall corporation, and that a finer building was to be erected than that originally projected, but such is not the case. Mr. Edward W. Hooper is authority for the statement that the corporation had nothing whatever to do with the purchase.

It was, however thought by Mr. Higginson and the gentlemen associated with him that the time might come when the corporation would need this additional land, and so they, of their own motion, clubbed together and bought it. If, later on, it is found that the corporation need this land, it will be able to get it, but the corporation is neither legally nor in any other way under obligation to take it, nor are Mr. Higginson and his associates under any obligation to hold it any longer than they care to.

Some idea of the size of the property now held by the corporation may be gained from the statement that it is big enough to hold the present Music Hall, the Tremont Temple and Horticultural Hall, and on the lot just purchased could be put the Unitarian building and Masonic Temple. The corporation land cost, with taxes for five years, nearly $200,000.

As to the Music Hall building, Mr. Hooper states that the original plans have been adhered to, although, of course, they are subject to modifications. The plans will not be presented at the coming meeting of stockholders, and may not be for a considerable period thereafter. The building, when erected, will be twice as long as it is wide. In other words, its construction will be of the simplest in outline, but of the best so far as acoustic properties are concerned. It will be fireproof, too.

Mr. McKim wanted to build the hall in the form of a Greek theatre, but this was objected to because of the expense, and also because of the fear that in a building of that form the music could not be heard to the best advantage. Even for a comparatively simple hall there will be none too much money.

In the interior construction the hall will be something of a novelty in Boston. There will be but one balcony, and above this will be a number of boxes, so that seats near the roof will be among the most desirable in the building.

Because of the lack of funds the new building will not include a small hall, in addition to the main auditorium. If the ned for it should be strongly felt, it will be built on the land just purchased. It may be said here that the Music Hall corporation tried to buy some of the land which has passed into the possession of Mr. Higginson and his friends, but gave up the attempt because it was necessary to take the 12,060 feet or none.

"The Country, with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It"

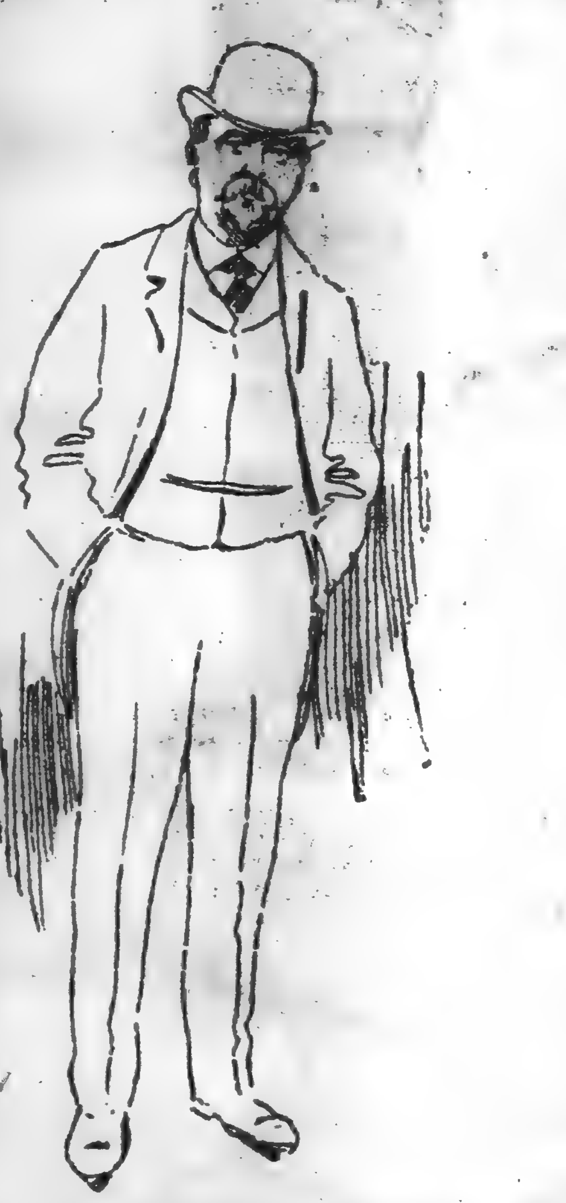
BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

A call has been issued for a meeting of the stockholders of the new music hall corporation, and they will be asked to increase the capital stock to $500,000. At present the funds of the company amount to $402,500—the subscriptions of 406 persons.

Col. H. L. Higginson and three others have bought an additional lot of land adjoining the new music hall property of the west.

Because of lack of funds the new building will not include a small hall, in addition to the main auditorium, and if need for such hall should be largely felt it will be built on the land just purchased.



COL. H. L. HIGGINSON.

Some idea of the size of the property now held by the corporation may be gained from the statement that it is big enough to hold the present Music Hall, the Tremont Temple and Horticultural Hall, and on the lot just purchased could be put the Unitarian building and Masonic Temple. The corporation land cost, with taxes for five years, nearly $200,000.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN 8, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening in Music Hall, Miss Olive Mead was the soloist. She gave an admirable performance of Vieuxtemps's violin concerto No. 5 in A minor, a work, while of no great depth musically, still it gives abundant opportunities for technical display of every sort.

In breadth of tone, clearness of phrasing and intonation Miss Mead has improved greatly since she played here last season. Her playing also displays much greater warmth and feeling than before, and, altogether, she gave a performance highly creditable to herself as an artist and which gave great enjoyment to the audience. She was recalled again and again at the close of the performance.

The orchestral numbers included Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," several of Brahms's waltzes, scored for orchestra by Mr. Gericke, and a new symphony by Christian Sinding, in D minor, No. 1, op. 21, given at this concert for the first time in Boston. The composer is a Norwegian and is still living. This symphony is said to have attracted considerable attention at the time it was originally produced in Berlin on Oct. 18, 1895.

On a first hearing, the symphony does not appear in any way to be a work of genius. The themes of all the movements are unmelodic and not well contrasted, the working out exceedingly dull and the instrumentation, as a rule, too heavy and unbalanced. There are a few places of interest, but take the work as a whole, it is unsatisfactory, at a first hearing.

Mr. Gericke's scoring of the Brahms waltzes is exceedingly clever, and the playing was superb at every point. At the next rehearsal and concert Mr. Emil Sauer will be the soloist, and the orchestral selections will include a Mozart symphony, one movement from a symphony by Converse and Wagner's overture "Flying Dutchman."

Emil Sauer will be the soloist at the Symphony concert next week. He is also announced for a piano recital at Music Hall on Friday afternoon, Jan. 20. The Morning Post of London in a recent criticism thus spoke of him: "A sovereign master of the keys, he knows no difficulties; he plays with them, and we know not what most to admire—the æsthetic delicacy of his touch, his spiritual delivery or the depth of feeling which he lends to all he plays."

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

HERE'S A RED-HOT CARD.

Mr. Fred P. Bacon's Very Pointed Queries About the New Music Hall.

To the Stockholders in the New Boston Music Hall Association:

Before you give your consent to the acceptance of the plans for a new music hall on the land owned by your association will you please read and consider the following:

Do you know that Mr. Henry L. Higginson, in an open letter published in the Boston daily papers June 21, '93, at the time the subscriptions were being asked in this matter, wrote: "May I suggest that a new hall can readily, and without much greater expense, be built so as to be used for opera, and thus command a larger rental (it may well have open boxes, as in Carnegie Hall, New York, and seats of various grades at different prices). At the present time it is very difficult to get any theatre in Boston for opera or any other large occasional entertainment." Is this not equally true today?

Do you know that the bulk of the subscriptions were obtained in anticipation that "the new home for the Symphony concerts" was also to be a home for opera?

Do you know that the decision to build a music hall without a stage suited for opera has already been made without authority from the stockholders?

Do you know that neither Mr. Henry L. Higginson nor Mr. C. E. Cotting, president and treasurer of your corporation, contributed a dollar to the original stock subscription?

Do you realize that, while you are about to invest your money to guarantee "a home for the Symphony Orchestra" on twenty-four afternoons and twenty-four evenings of each year for a problematical number of years, you are given no guarantee that there will be any Symphony Orchestra to occupy this home in future years?

Do you realize that the orchestral "craze" of the present day has well nigh reached the limit of that which preceded it over the concerts of the Harvard Symphony Orchestra?

Do you realize that the extravagant and autocratic maintenance of the Symphony Orchestra has dwarfed Boston as a musical city and discouraged all other enterprises of a musical character here by establishing a standard which cannot be met by legitimate managerial methods?

Do you realize that the building now contemplated by your corporation will, in all human probability, be the only building of its character to be built by the present generation of musical enthusiasts in this city?

Do you reailze that, unless the building contemplated is so arranged that it will be a profitable investment, it will, sooner or later, become the property of those who will sacrifice all sentiment and ignore the intent of its originators and make the property pay, whatever use may be necessary to accomplish this result?

Does it seem to you that the administration of the old Music Hall property during the Higginson-Cotting regime has been in keeping with the purposes of those who built and dedicated it to music?

Do you know that nearly $50,000 over the assessed value was paid for the land bought by the new Boston Music Hall Association, and that nearly double that sum in interest, taxes and incidental expenses has been wasted in order that Mr. Henry L. Higginson should be enabled to dispose of his interests in the old Music Hall property before the construction of the new hall should be begun?

Ought not the stockholders in this corporation to choose men of broader ideas, of more public spirit, and with more artistic tastes to represent them in carrying out the purposes for which you have invested your money than the present officers of your company?

Do you realize that an opera house, with preparatory schools, can be established upon your property, and with such an opportunity "opera for the people" be made a lasting feature of Boston musical life?

Do you realize the small chance of good results in the construction of a music hall compared with those possible in building an opera house, on account of the almost universal abandonment of music hall building in the last quarter of a century?

Do you realize that if the property of your corporation is property handled, no further subscriptions are needed, and that every new stockholder accepted now or hereafter reduces the return to the original investors?

I submit the above in the interest of musical Boston, having no personal end to gain, and trust you will pardon the liberty I take in calling your attention to these matters.

FRED P. BACON.
619 Tremont building, Boston.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1899

THAT NEW MUSIC HALL

Differences of Opinion Whether It Should be Built so as to Allow of the Performance of Grand Opera

An opposition has been started to the plans for the new Music Hall, as at present outlined, on the ground that it should be constructed in such a way as to allow of the performance of grand opera there, as well as to fulfil its primary function as a music hall. It is asserted that the building might be constructed in such a way as to give a place, such as this city is now without, where grand opera might be given with every accessory for the full enjoyment and comfort of the spectators, and where the value of the performance itself would not be detracted from by the character of the building in which it was given.

Mr. E. W. Hooper was the only one of the committee on the new building seen today who was willing to give any opinion on the matter. He said that the purpose for which the money had been subscribed was, first and foremost, to give a home for the Symphony Orchestra, and that this was incompatible with the construction of an opera house. The plans, as at present outlined, contemplated the construction of a long building, modelled on the lines of the best foregn music halls, and as good results could not be obtained with a building as shallow as an opera house should be. With a music hall the idea was to develop the acoustic properties to the exclusion of everything else, while in an opera house it was necessary to see as well as to hear.

Mr. Hooper said the sentiment of the subscribers was of such a nature that if there were any determined attempt to bring out the opera house idea, the plan must fall to the ground, as some of the largest subscribers were unalterably opposed to anything of the kind. However, that was for the subscribers themselves to decide, as they had a perfect right to vote for anything they wanted. Henry L. Higginson and C. E. Cotting, the president and treasurer of the association, refused to discuss the matter.

Emil Sauer will be the soloist at the Symphony concert next week. He is also announced for a pianoforte recital at Music Hall on Friday afternoon, Jan. 20. Born in 1862, Emil Sauer received his training in piano playing from his mother. In 1876 Rubinstein heard him and recommended him to his brother; Sauer thereupon became a stipendiary of Nikolaus Rubinstein. He made his début in North Germany and the Rhineland, and in the following year went to London. In 1883 he completed a concert tour in Spain and Italy, and in 1884 received his last artistic consecration in Weimar from Liszt, who thoroughly recognized the endowments of the young pianist. He made his Berlin début in 1885. Vienna praised him after his appearance in eleven concerts, and Eduard Hanslick, in his lately published work "From a Musician's Diary" (Modern Opera, VI., pt., p. 326), thus expresses himself: "This still young man played Henselt's Piano Concerto in F minor with great virtuosity, beautiful touch and warm, almost girlishly tender sentiment. His passages and ornaments, breathed out in the loveliest pianissimo, attracted attention. Later Sauer in four concerts completed alone a thoroughly many-sided programme and proved himself an artist of the first rank. While brilliant and powerful in all problems of energetic bravura, he yet played most beautifully in the tender, musing poetry of Schumann and Chopin. In this Sauer is a genuine troubadour of the piano." In 1894, '95 and '96 he again sought England and gave a series of eight recitals in London.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 8, 1899.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The young violinist, Miss Olive Mead, was the soloist at the Symphony concerts last week, the artist playing the Vieuxtemps A minor concerto. Mr Gericke's orchestral arrangement of waltzes by Brahms, the "Freischutz" overture and, for the first time here, Christian Sinding's D minor symphony, were the other numbers on the program. Mr Gericke conducted. Miss Mead's interpretation of the Vieuxtemps concerto was excellent, when considered as a whole, and to her lack of experience doubtless may be ascribed some deflections from the true pitch while playing the unaccompanied cadenza. Her tones were generally pure, her execution was facile and she showed correct phrasing, but it seemed as if the necessary breadth of treatment was lacking, and Miss Mead also unquestionably gave evidence that with maturity she should rank with the most prominent of her sex in her chosen profession. She was most heartily greeted and the applause was very liberal at the close of her performance.

The Sinding symphony shows the composer's love for melodies of the northland, the themes throughout the work being of a Scandinavian character, vigorous and at times harsh. With these he has blended a Wagnerian coloring which is original in instrumental treatment, but the elaborate scoring almost reduces the intended effects to a musical chaos. It is skilful orchestration, but eccentric and not specially interesting to the average musical ear. The work was performed with commendable skill, the episodic parts of the second movement being beautifully sustained by the various parts of the orchestra.

The familiar Weber overture may be dismissed with a general commendation. It was the most satisfactory number of the evening, judging from the applause. Mr Gericke's orchestration of the Brahms waltzes gave great enjoyment and the Symphony men interpreted the dainty music with most delightful effect.

Emil Sauer will be the piano soloist this week, playing Henselt's F minor piano concerto. The orchestral numbers will include Mozart's D major symphony, one movement from a symphony by Converse, these selections for the first time here, and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 8.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 8, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Mead as Soloist Appears to Good Advantage.

Her Performance a Notably Fine One, Both Technically and Intellectually—A Sinding Symphony Heard for the First Time Here—A Number of Waltzes Given.

The programme for the 11th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was:

Overture, "Der Freischutz"..............Weber
Concerto for violin, No. 5, A-minor..Vieuxtemps
Waltzes, op. 39.......................Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke).
Symphony, No. 1, in D-minor, op. 21....Sinding

The soloist was Miss Olive Mead.

The symphony was given for the first time here on this occasion. For a work of the extreme modern school, it is remarkably clear; that is, it presents nothing that baffles the understanding on a single hearing. It is more notable for wild vigor and for stormy outbursts of passion than for any distinguishing grace of fancy or flexibility of imagination. There is much of tempest, of solid masses of brassy tone, of fiery restlessness and of exciting impulsiveness, but little that appeals to a sense of the beautiful or a feeling for the tender. Its themes are strongly marked, and in their way melodious; the orchestration is rich and brilliant, the composer's utterances are always frank, and there is from beginning to end of the symphony no suggestion of the prevailing tendency of modern musical art to seek mere novelty of effect at any cost.

The faults of the work, at least on a first hearing, appear to be a too persistent noisiness, an excess of passionateness without enough of a less fiery order to provide necessary contrasts. The result is something of monotony. It might aptly be called a battle symphony, by reason of its stirring boisterousness, its blare of trumpet and its almost savage impetuosity of style. There are, however, some dull moments, probably caused by the nearly unrelieved burliness that is characteristic of the work as a whole, but the listener is not soothed to slumbers by them, or, if he be, it is not for long—the noise would not permit that. A tremendously spirited reading and performance of the symphony was given, but the audience was not moved to more than complimentary enthusiasm.

The Brahms waltzes, according to the symphony programme book, were scored by Mr. Gericke during his previous visit to Boston, and in that form were originally intended for performance by a small orchestra in a private house. For last night's performance, in the more spacious Music Hall, parts for trumpets and trombones were added here and there. These waltzes, of which 14 out of the original 16 were subjected to orchestral treatment, are not in themselves especially enlivening, though it may be granted that, despite their seriousness, they are almost wickedly gay, nay, frivolous, for Brahms. It is true that they were never meant for dancers, and it would be wrong to blame the composer, because they are not what he never intended them to be, but with the idea of waltzes in one's mind, little collops of symphony, instead, inevitably prove disappointing. Heard as Brahms wrote them, for the pianoforte for four hands, they are nearly unbearably depressing.

Mr. Gericke's orchestration in its charm of varied tone-color, its alternate force and delicacy, its clever rhythmic accentuation, and its fine compactness, puts quite another face on the music, and gives a swing and a brilliancy to the music that now and then makes it, if not exhilarating, quite pleasing and interesting. But it is, at best, only heavy blithesomeness. The performance was delightful in the grace, finish and spirit imparted to it by Mr. Gericke, and the applause that rewarded it was hearty and prolonged.

The Vieuxtemps concerto is a very exacting one for even the most skilled and most experienced performer. That Miss Mead ventured to attack it shows her courage; that she played it so well was her justification. She has grown in her art since she was last heard here. Her style has broadened, her technique has increased, her musical feeling has become more mature, and she has attained to a larger artistic independence. She played last night with splendid volume of pure tone, masculine energy, a keenly intelligent understanding of the work, and with brilliantly fluent and able technique. Now and then, in some of the more "cruelly acrobatic passages," there was a momentary lack of clearness and a slight lapse in intonation; but more famous players have been known to make the same slips in the same places. Taken altogether, the young artist's performance was a notably fine one, both technically and intellectually, and fully deserved the storm of vigorous plaudits and the recalls that followed it.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in D major, "Parisian," Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, Henselt; one movement from a symphony by Converse (first time), and overture, "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. The soloist is to be Mr. Emil Saur.

MUSICAL COURIER COMPANY.
(Incorporated under the laws of the State of New York.)
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1899.

The program of the tenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture, Faust	Wagner
Symphonic Variations, op. 78	Dvorak
The Damnation of Faust—
Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps	Berlioz
Waltz of Sylphs	Berlioz
Symphony No. 4, in B flat	Beethoven

Mr. Gericke gave an exceptionally clear reading of the Wagner overture, a work whose interest heretofore to the general hearer has depended very much on the mood in which he has listened to it, but on this occasion the interpretation was so lucid and so logical that it seemed somewhat odd that the overture should have ever appeared to be a wearisome tangle of pretentions incoherency.

Only twenty of the twenty-seven variations on an original theme by Dvorák were given. Such is the steadily sustained interest of the work, such the fertile ingenuity of the treatment to which the theme is subjected, and such the fluent variety and charm of the orchestration, that it is surprising the composition has not had a more frequent hearing here, the only other performance it has had having been given under Mr. Gericke nine years ago.

Twenty orchestral variations at one dose might easily become a cruelly thoughtless infliction, but Mr. Gericke so cleverly caused each variation to tell its story in its own particular way and so sympathetically found the most effective tempo and tone color for every new development, to say nothing of the exquisite finish with which the work was played, that the interest never went wandering in search of temporary oblivion.

The whole program was played in a manner that justifies pronouncing the concerts the best of the season thus far. Next week we are to hear Sinding's Symphony No. in D minor, op. 21, for the first time, and some waltzes by Brahms, orchestrated by Mr. Gericke. Olive Mead is to be the soloist, and will play Vieuxtemps' Concerto No. 5, in A minor.

* * *

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, Md., December 30, 898.

THE first Germania Maennerchor concert took place last Monday under the direction of the new conductor, E. Boeckner, for the good Germanians love variety almost as well as beer, and one never knows who will wield the baton next.

Miss Effie Stewart, from New York, met with great success, and her admirable voice and method were universally praised. Mr. Kalisch played some piano selections and Mr. Wiley breathed successfully through the "Two Grenadiers," for, as yet, singing means to him not expression of the soul, but expression of the diaphragm.

The second Boston Symphony Concert was not the unalloyed treat that the first was to us, under Gericke; still, considering that Mr. Kneisel has been heretofore "concertmeister" and not "kapellmeister,' we cannot expect him to be absolutely "meister" of the situation. He did admirably well with that colossal C major Symphony of Schubert's—the one which Schubert himself never heard played. What a sad thought!

Mr. Burmester was the soloist, and selected the Mendelssohn instead of the Paganini concerto, to the great disappointment of our Baltimore violinists. His tone is small, surprisingly small, but pure and velvety, and his technic is dazzlingly faultless. He took the last movement in a cyclonic tempo, to the evident disapproval of Mr. Kneisel, who lagged behind with the orchestra, as though he were pulling a ton of coal uphill. Why did he show so little consideration for Burmester? At times the heavy accompaniment absolutely engulfed that poor, helpless solo instrument. The MacDowell number was listened to with interest, because it was new to all.

Mr. Randolph and Mr. van Hulsteyn were the soloists at the fifth recital, and gave much genuine enjoyment with their artistic reading of the Bach Sonata. Of Mr. van Hulsteyn's solo numbers the "Polonaise," by Wieniawski, made the best impression, and Mr. Randolph pleased most in the Liszt Concert Etude and the Brahms Rhapsody. The Dvorák Sonata has very few points of beauty and many wearisome, unintelligible movements, which stamp it, on the whole, as an uninteresting work.

HOW PAGANINI PLAYED.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its programs, with historical and descriptive notes attached, in pamphlet form. These notes are by William F. Apthorp and are singularly instructive, especially in the analyses, which frequently let a broad glare of sunshine into an erstwhile darkened intellect. The concerto for violin in D major, by Paganini, is described as follows:

> Paganini, most wonderful of violinists and eccentric of men, relates that on one occasion in Vienna one of the audience affirmed "that my performance was not surprising, as he had seen the devil at my elbow directing my arm and guiding my bow." Later, at Prague, Paganini published a letter from his mother to disprove the rumor that he was the son of the devil. A short monograph of Paganini recently appeared in England, whose author disputes the generally accepted description of him. Mr. Weiss, who writes from personal observation, says:
>
> "So many mistaken ideas exist about this remarkable man's appearance that some description by one who was with him frequently may not be uninteresting. The sketch by Sir Edwin Landseer (see Grove's Dictionary) is hardly more than a clownish caricature. It gives the idea of a man whose personal appearance is entirely neglected, and whose hair is left in the most disheveled condition. Paganini was proud of his appearance; and, although he was so thin that his clothes hung upon him as on a scarecrow, his hair was always carefully combed and brushed, and, I may add, put into paper every night. He was not what would be called a tall man; for, as I have seen him standing side by side with my father, I can declare that he was under 5 feet 10 inches in height. He was, as I have said, exceedingly thin, and his arms and hands unnaturally long. His bony fingers seemed to stretch from one end of the violin keyboard to the other without an effort, and it has been asserted that, without such a length of finger, he never could have played the passages he is known to have executed. He wore his hair (of which he was very proud) in long ringlets over his shoulders. Its color was a rich brown (not black, as some have stated), and, although he looked many years older than his age (forty-seven), he was proud that he had not got a gray hair on his head."
>
> Paganini differed from other violinists chiefly, first, by his manner of tuning the instrument; second, by a management of the bow entirely peculiar to himself; third, by his use of the left hand in the singing passages; fourth, by the frequent employment of harmonious sounds; and, fifth, by the art of combining in the violin the simultaneous effects of a mandolin, harp, or other instrument of the kind, so that two different performers seemed to be playing.

This concerto, which has brown hair, not black, was written because Paganini was fond of his appearance. It was about 5 feet 10 inches in length and was always carefully combed and brushed. It is a base libel to intimate that it was left in a disheveled condition, because it wore its hair in long ringlets upon its neck. It was forty-seven years old and had not a gray hair on its head, and was supposed to have been possessed by the devil. It certainly sounds devilish. Paganini wrote all his music according to the above rules of genteel harmony.

It is claimed by those musicians who seek the mysterious in music that Paganini secured his marvelous effects by tuning his instrument in various unusual intervals, instead of the customary fifths. This sounds plausible, but is scarcely to be credited in view of the fact that the music written for the violin by Paganini can be played with the instrument tuned as we tune it. To play his etudes, dances, concertos and transcriptions one requires primarily enormous technical ability, but we have yet to hear of the violinist who plays them with his instrument tuned otherwise than in fifths. It is extremely doubtful if Paganini ever changed the adjustment of his violin, beyond occasionally lowering the G string or raising the E. Why should he?

With his wonderful technical command over the finger-board and knowledge of the manifold harmonic effects, of intricate bowing, it was scarcely necessary. If it had been advisable he would have left the secret with some trustworthy friend, that it might not be lost to those succeeding generations who should desire to play his compositions. Paganini was zealous in his work to promote the violin to the highest point of eminence as a solo instrument; to serve this end he composed, played and gave himself over to deep research. Had there been any secrets of tuning which he found advisable to use in his own playing, he would have left them behind him, and also have written music which required them, in order properly to be played.

Let these Paganini myths cease. We can afford to regard him as a marvelous, erratic man, without surrounding him with a red, yellow and green halo of sensationalism and superstition, which sprung into being as a result of the ignorance of the times in which he lived. We are glad to know, however, that his fingers and arms were so unnaturally long that he wrote the D major concerto, although he looked many years older than his age. This is valuable information, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra can feel justly proud to have so successfully elucidated the absorbing question of: "How Paganini Played; or, the Sensitive Personality of the D Major Concerto."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(Providence Telegram, December 29, 1898.)

The soloist was Mrs. Jacoby, whose voice is a splendid organ, and whose use of it is exceptionally intelligent and gratifying, even if her archness of manner detracts somewhat from the effectiveness of her performance. Mrs. Jacoby delights her hearers by her vocalism. She was recalled and recalled, and of course everybody would have been exceedingly pleased had she or the Symphony government been willing to grant just one more selection, but the general call for more was met by a stiff-backed denial that proved positive and complete.

Those who have subscribed for ten or more shares of the stock for the new music hall are as follows: William S. Bigelow, G. T. W. Braman, Martin Brimmer, Shepherd Brooks, Miss Charlotte Bowditch, Mrs. Frances G. Blake, John C. Bancroft, J. Arthur Beebe, Franklin H. Beebe, Francis Y. Balch, T. Dennie Boardman, J. R. Coolidge, Louis Cabot, Arthur A. Carey, Eben S. Draper, Lewis S. Dabney, trustee of Alice B. Chase; William Endicott, Jr., R. D. Evans. Miss Sarah B. Fay, John L. Gardner, Henry S. Grew, Globe Newspaper Company, Edward W. Hooper, Charles Head, H. H. Hunnewell, Mrs. Aug. Hemenway, Jr., Aug. Hemenway, Reginald Gray and George S. Hale, trustees; Eben D. Jordan, Kidder, Peabody & Co., Henry T. Kidder, David P. Kimball, Mrs. William C. Loring, Miss Georgina Lowell, Henry Lee, Mrs. Harriet J. Morse, Mortimer P. Mason, W. Powell Mason, Albert A. Pope, Mrs. Julia B. Paine, Miss Alice F. Perkins, Mrs. Annie T. Phillips, Henry F. Sears, B. Schlesinger, J. Montgomery Sears, James P. Stearns, Quincy A. Shaw, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Ware, Samuel P. Warren, Mrs. Ellen H. Weld, Charles G. Weld, Josiah Wheelwright, Andrew C. Wheelwright, Miss Mary Lee Ware and Miss Pauline Shaw.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 8, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Christian Sinding's Symphony in D Minor Performed for the First Time in Boston — Miss Olive Mead, Violinist.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to 'Der Freischütz"	Weber
Concerto for Violin, No. 5 in A minor Miss Olive Mead.	Vieuxtemps
Waltzes, op. 39 (Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)	Brahms
Symphony No. 1, in D minor (First time in Boston.)	Sinding

The program-book stated that Sinding's symphony was "first brought out at Kroll's in Berlin by the Royal Orchestra, under Felix Weingartner's direction, on Oct. 18, 1895."

No doubt the compiler referred solely to the first performance in Berlin, or possibly Germany; for the symphony was played before that date. It was performed in Christiania, in April, 1890, in Chicago, Dec. 9, 1893, under Theodore Thomas's direction; and Mr. Seidl produced it in New York at a Philharmonic concert Feb. 10, 1894.

Sinding's name is not unknown to the concert-goers of this city. His piano quartet was performed here late in 1891 at a Kneisel concert, with Busoni as the pianist. Busoni had played the piano part in Leipzig in 1887, when the work provoked discussion, strife, and—what is worse—pamphlets. Then Sinding's piano trio has been played here. His latest work of large dimensions is a violin concerto which is even now advertised in German music papers.

This symphony is a forbidding work; not one that will be popular until the taste of the public is educated up to full appreciation of the austere, the grim, I may say the ugly. There is not one "pretty" strain in any movement; there is not a simply sensuous suggestion. We hear much today of the reign of pessimism in music; but this pessimism generally takes a neurotic and not displeasing form. The nerves of Sinding are in healthy, normal condition. He can stand the wildest sounds of orchestral shock and fury, and he is happiest when he is disagreeing musically with predecessors, colleagues and audience. But he is not a bit of a poseur. Here is honest music, if there be such a thing. The man is terribly in earnest. He is of an artistic race; one brother is a distinguished sculptor, and another is a painter of repute; and I have read somewhere that Christian has decided views on economics and politics, leaning heavily toward Socialism. However this may be, his is a strong individuality. He has studied Wagner—and who of this generation has not?—but he talks confidently with his own voice; he talks loudly, and he is given to screaming.

The first movement and the third seem to me the strongest. The first movement is most impressive in its stern, unyielding, pitiless rush. There is the technic of the prize fighter. The blows strike irresistibly, and there is little time for breathing. The composer knocks you down at the very start with his first theme; he is merciless throughout. And he is original in his attack, although a master of all the traditions and formulas. The second movement is sombre, with the color that we have learend to associate with Norwegian music and scenery. I do not know whether the themes of this Andante or the following scherzo are suggested by folk-song or taken frankly from popular melodies; but I am inclined to think they are of Sinding's own invention. Again, there is fury, again there is sour disdain. There is little contemplation; there is little contrast. The scherzo is by no means gay. There is not even the reckless irony or the coarse jollity of the Beethoven of the scherzos. And again there is felt the lack of contrast. The finale falls below the level of the other movements in construction as well as invention. It is like a huddled collection of fragments of defiance.

All in all, a striking work. It does not woo you; it does not appeal to you; but it is the forcible expression of strong conviction, and it commands respect, yes, admiration.

⁂

The other numbers of the program do not call for extended comment. We have had the "Freischütz" and "Euryanthe" overtures this season, and now we may look joyfully toward the "Oberon." This may be followed by the "Consecration of the House" overture or possibly the "King Stephen."

Miss Mead played most respectably the concerto in A minor by Vieuxtemps. Her tone has gained in breadth and she shows an aplomb that older violinists may well envy.

Two or three of the waltzes written by Brahms for the piano for four hands in 1867 have some intrinsic beauty. The others recall Sar Peladan's remark: that the music of Brahms reminds him of a gipsy dancing in a strait-laced corset. Yes, Brahms was a great master—of syncopation. What would he have done without it? Mr. Gericke's orchestration lent interest to what was otherwise extremely dreary.

Philip Hale.

MUSICAL COURIER COMPANY.
(Incorporated under the laws of the State of New York.)
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1899.

The program of the tenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture, Faust	Wagner
Symphonic Variations, op. 78	Dvorak
The Damnation of Faust
Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps	Berlioz
Waltz of Sylphs	Berlioz
Symphony No. 4, in B flat	Beethoven

Mr. Gericke gave an exceptionally clear reading of the Wagner overture, a work whose interest heretofore to the general hearer has depended very much on the mood in which he has listened to it, but on this occasion the interpretation was so lucid and so logical that it seemed somewhat odd that the overture should have ever appeared to be a wearisome tangle of pretentions incoherency

Only twenty of the twenty-seven variations on an original theme by Dvorák were given. Such is the steadily sustained interest of the work, such the fertile ingenuity of the treatment to which the theme is subjected, and such the fluent variety and charm of the orchestration, that it is surprising the composition has not had a more frequent hearing here, the only other performance it has had having been given under Mr. Gericke nine years ago.

Twenty orchestral variations at one dose might easily become a cruelly thoughtless infliction, but Mr. Gericke so cleverly caused each variation to tell its story in its own particular way and so sympathetically found the most effective tempo and tone color for every new development, to say nothing of the exquisite finish with which the work was played, that the interest never went wandering in search of temporary oblivion.

The whole program was played in a manner that justifies pronouncing the concerts the best of the season thus far. Next week we are to hear Sinding's Symphony No. in D minor, op. 21, for the first time, and some waltzes by Brahms, orchestrated by Mr. Gericke. Olive Mead is to be the soloist, and will play Vieuxtemps' Concerto No. 5, in A minor.

* * *

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, Md., December 30, 1898.

THE first Germania Maennerchor concert took place last Monday under the direction of the new conductor, E. Boeckner, for the good Germanians love variety almost as well as beer, and one never knows who will wield the baton next.

Miss Effie Stewart, from New York, met with great success, and her admirable voice and method were universally praised. Mr. Kalisch played some piano selections and Mr. Wiley breathed successfully through the "Two Grenadiers," for, as yet, singing means to him not expression of the soul, but expression of the diaphragm.

The second Boston Symphony Concert was not the unalloyed treat that the first was to us, under Gericke; still, considering that Mr. Kneisel has been heretofore "concertmeister" and not "kapellmeister,' we cannot expect him to be absolutely "meister" of the situation. He did admirably well with that colossal C major Symphony of Schubert's—the one which Schubert himself never heard played. What a sad thought!

Mr. Burmester was the soloist, and selected the Mendelssohn instead of the Paganini concerto, to the great disappointment of our Baltimore violinists. His tone is small, surprisingly small, but pure and velvety, and his technic is dazzlingly faultless. He took the last movement in a cyclonic tempo, to the evident disapproval of Mr. Kneisel, who lagged behind with the orchestra, as though he were pulling a ton of coal uphill. Why did he show so little consideration for Burmester? At times the heavy accompaniment absolutely engulfed that poor, helpless solo instrument. The MacDowell number was listened to with interest, because it was new to all.

Mr. Randolph and Mr. van Hulsteyn were the soloists at the fifth recital, and gave much genuine enjoyment with their artistic reading of the Bach Sonata. Of Mr. van Hulsteyn's solo numbers the "Polonaise," by Wieniawski, made the best impression, and Mr. Randolph pleased most in the Liszt Concert Etude and the Brahms Rhapsody. The Dvorák Sonata has very few points of beauty and many wearisome, unintelligible movements, which stamp it, on the whole, as an uninteresting work.

HOW PAGANINI PLAYED.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its programs, with historical and descriptive notes attached, in pamphlet form. These notes are by William F. Apthorp and are singularly instructive, especially in the analyses, which frequently let a broad glare of sunshine into an erstwhile darkened intellect. The concerto for violin in D major, by Paganini, is described as follows:

> Paganini, most wonderful of violinists and eccentric of men, relates that on one occasion in Vienna one of the audience affirmed "that my performance was not surprising, as he had seen the devil at my elbow directing my arm and guiding my bow." Later, at Prague, Paganini published a letter from his mother to disprove the rumor that he was the son of the devil. A short monograph of Paganini recently appeared in England, whose author disputes the generally accepted description of him. Mr. Weiss, who writes from personal observation, says:
>
> "So many mistaken ideas exist about this remarkable man's appearance that some description by one who was with him frequently may not be uninteresting. The sketch by Sir Edwin Landseer (see Grove's Dictionary) is hardly more than a clownish caricature. It gives the idea of a man whose personal appearance is entirely neglected, and whose hair is left in the most disheveled condition. Paganini was proud of his appearance; and, although he was so thin that his clothes hung upon him as on a scarecrow, his hair was always carefully combed and brushed, and, I may add, put into paper every night. He was not what would be called a tall man; for, as I have seen him standing side by side with my father, I can declare that he was under 5 feet 10 inches in height. He was, as I have said, exceedingly thin, and his arms and hands unnaturally long. His bony fingers seemed to stretch from one end of the violin keyboard to the other without an effort, and it has been asserted that, without such a length of finger, he never could have played the passages he is known to have executed. He wore his hair (of which he was very proud) in long ringlets over his shoulders. Its color was a rich brown (not black, as some have stated), and, although he looked many years older than his age (forty-seven), he was proud that he had not got a gray hair on his head."
>
> Paganini differed from other violinists chiefly, first, by his manner of tuning the instrument; second, by a management of the bow entirely peculiar to himself; third, by his use of the left hand in the singing passages; fourth, by the frequent employment of harmonious sounds; and, fifth, by the art of combining in the violin the simultaneous effects of a mandolin, harp, or other instrument of the kind, so that two different performers seemed to be playing.

This concerto, which has brown hair, not black, was written because Paganini was fond of his appearance. It was about 5 feet 10 inches in length and was always carefully combed and brushed. It is a base libel to intimate that it was left in a disheveled condition, because it wore its hair in long ringlets upon its neck. It was forty-seven years old and had not a gray hair on its head, and was supposed to have been possessed by the devil. It certainly sounds devilish. Paganini wrote all his music according to the above rules of genteel harmony.

It is claimed by those musicians who seek the mysterious in music that Paganini secured his marvelous effects by tuning his instrument in various unusual intervals, instead of the customary fifths. This sounds plausible, but is scarcely to be credited in view of the fact that the music written for the violin by Paganini can be played with the instrument tuned as we tune it. To play his etudes, dances, concertos and transcriptions one requires primarily enormous technical ability, but we have yet to hear of the violinist who plays them with his instrument tuned otherwise than in fifths. It is extremely doubtful if Paganini ever changed the adjustment of his violin, beyond occasionally lowering the G string or raising the E. Why should he?

With his wonderful technical command over the finger-board and knowledge of the manifold harmonic effects, of intricate bowing, it was scarcely necessary. If it had been advisable he would have left the secret with some trustworthy friend, that it might not be lost to those succeeding generations who should desire to play his compositions. Paganini was zealous in his work to promote the violin to the highest point of eminence as a solo instrument; to serve this end he composed, played and gave himself over to deep research. Had there been any secrets of tuning which he found advisable to use in his own playing, he would have left them behind him, and also have written music which required them, in order properly to be played.

Let these Paganini myths cease. We can afford to regard him as a marvelous, erratic man, without surrounding him with a red, yellow and green halo of sensationalism and superstition, which sprung into being as a result of the ignorance of the times in which he lived. We are glad to know, however, that his fingers and arms were so unnaturally long that he wrote the D major concerto, although he looked many years older than his age. This is valuable information, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra can feel justly proud to have so successfully elucidated the absorbing question of: "How Paganini Played; or, the Sensitive Personality of the D Major Concerto."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(Providence Telegram, December 29, 1898.)

The soloist was Mrs. Jacoby, whose voice is a splendid organ, and whose use of it is exceptionally intelligent and gratifying, even if her archness of manner detracts somewhat from the effectiveness of her performance. Mrs. Jacoby delights her hearers by her vocalism. She was recalled and recalled, and of course everybody would have been exceedingly pleased had she or the Symphony government been willing to grant just one more selection, but the general call for more was met by a stiff-backed denial that proved positive and complete.

Those who have subscribed for ten or more shares of the stock for the new music hall are as follows: William S. Bigelow, G. T. W. Braman, Martin Brimmer, Shepherd Brooks, Miss Charlotte Bowditch, Mrs. Frances G. Blake, John C. Bancroft, J. Arthur Beebe, Franklin H. Beebe, Francis Y. Balch, T. Dennie Boardman, J. R. Coolidge, Louis Cabot, Arthur A. Carey, Eben S. Draper, Lewis S. Dabney, trustee of Alice B. Chase; William Endicott, Jr., R. D. Evans, Miss Sarah B. Fay, John L. Gardner, Henry S. Grew, Globe Newspaper Company, Edward W. Hooper, Charles Head, H. H. Hunnewell, Mrs. Aug. Hemenway, Jr., Aug. Hemenway, Reginald Gray and George S. Hale, trustees; Eben D. Jordan, Kidder, Peabody & Co., Henry T. Kidder, David P. Kimball, Mrs. William C. Loring, Miss Georgina Lowell, Henry Lee, Mrs. Harriet J. Morse, Mortimer P. Mason, W. Powell Mason, Albert A. Pope, Mrs. Julia B. Paine, Miss Alice F. Perkins, Mrs. Annie T. Phillips, Henry F. Sears, B. Schlesinger, J. Montgomery Sears, James P. Stearns, Quincy A. Shaw, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Ware, Samuel P. Warren, Mrs. Ellen H. Weld, Charles G. Weld, Josiah Wheelwright, Andrew C. Wheelwright, Miss Mary Lee Ware and Miss Pauline Shaw.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 8, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Christian Sinding's Symphony in D Minor Performed for the First Time in Boston — Miss Olive Mead, Violinist.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischütz"	Weber
Concerto for Violin, No. 5 in A minor	Vieuxtemps
Miss Olive Mead.
Waltzes, op. 39	Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Symphony No. 1, in D minor	Sinding
(First time in Boston.)

The program-book stated that Sinding's symphony was "first brought out at Kroll's in Berlin by the Royal Orchestra, under Felix Weingartner's direction, on Oct. 18, 1895."

No doubt the compiler referred solely to the first performance in Berlin, or possibly Germany; for the symphony was played before that date. It was performed in Christiania, in April, 1890, in Chicago, Dec. 9, 1893, under Theodore Thomas's direction; and Mr. Seidl produced it in New York at a Philharmonic concert Feb. 10, 1894.

Sinding's name is not unknown to the concert-goers of this city. His piano quartet was performed here late in 1891 at a Kneisel concert, with Busoni as the pianist. Busoni had played the piano part in Leipzig in 1887, when the work provoked discussion, strife, and—what is worse—pamphlets. Then Sinding's piano trio has been played here. His latest work of large dimensions is a violin concerto which is even now advertised in German music papers.

This symphony is a forbidding work; not one that will be popular until the taste of the public is educated up to full appreciation of the austere, the grim, I may say the ugly. There is not one "pretty" strain in any movement; there is not a simply sensuous suggestion. We hear much today of the reign of pessimism in music; but this pessimism generally takes a neurotic and not displeasing form. The nerves of Sinding are in healthy, normal condition. He can stand the wildest sounds of orchestral shock and fury, and he is happiest when he is disagreeing musically with predecessors, colleagues and audience. But he is not a bit of a poseur. Here is honest music, if there be such a thing. The man is terribly in earnest. He is of an artistic race; one brother is a distinguished sculptor, and another is a painter of repute; and I have read somewhere that Christian has decided views on economics and politics, leaning heavily toward Socialism. However this may be, his is a strong individuality. He has studied Wagner—and who of this generation has not?—but he talks confidently with his own voice; he talks loudly, and he is given to screaming.

The first movement and the third seem to me the strongest. The first movement is most impressive in its stern, unyielding, pitiless rush. There is the technic of the prize fighter. The blows strike irresistibly, and there is little time for breathing. The composer knocks you down at the very start with his first theme; he is merciless throughout. And he is original in his attack, although a master of all the traditions and formulas. The second movement is sombre, with the color that we have learend to associate with Norwegian music and scenery. I do not know whether the themes of this Andante or the following scherzo are suggested by folk-song or taken frankly from popular melodies; but I am inclined to think they are of Sinding's own invention. Again, there is fury, again there is sour disdain. There is little contemplation; there is little contrast. The scherzo is by no means gay. There is not even the reckless irony or the coarse jollity of the Beethoven of the scherzos. And again there is felt the lack of contrast. The finale falls below the level of the other movements in construction as well as invention. It is like a huddled collection of fragments of defiance.

All in all, a striking work. It does not woo you: it does not appeal to you; but it is the forcible expression of strong conviction, and it commands respect, yes, admiration.

⁂

The other numbers of the program do not call for extended comment. We have had the "Freischütz" and "Euryanthe" overtures this season, and now we may look joyfully toward the "Oberon." This may be followed by the "Consecration of the House" overture or possibly the "King Stephen."

Miss Mead played most respectably the concerto in A minor by Vieuxtemps. Her tone has gained in breadth and she shows an aplomb that older violinists may well envy.

Two or three of the waltzes written by Brahms for the piano for four hands in 1867 have some intrinsic beauty. The others recall Sar Peladan's remark: that the music of Brahms reminds him of a gipsy dancing in a strait-laced corset. Yes, Brahms was a great master—of syncopation. What would he have done without it? Mr. Gericke's orchestration lent interest to what was otherwise extremely dreary.

Philip Hale.

DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1899.

Sinding's Symphony--Olive Mead's Violin Performance.

The concert of Saturday began with Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, a work which never grows stale. Weber's overtures reconcile two opposite schools, the operatic style and the classical sonata-form; using the latter almost as established by Mozart, Weber takes his themes (chief theme, subordinate, etc.) directly from his opera, just as Rossini, Sullivan, and the whole tribe of medley overtures do, but the result is something far in advance of the medley overture.

A dramatic style is therefore to be desired in the interpretation of these overtures and this was present in every measure of Mr. Gericke's reading. The extreme adagio of the introduction, the impressive pause before the coda, the mighty chords with which this finale began, and the brilliancy of the subordinate theme, were all given with due effect and great applause followed the conclusion of the number.

The horn quartette did not blend as perfectly as we have heard it. What an amount of hymn-singing this same quartette is responsible for! Many a church which looks upon an opera with horror as being part of the wickedness of the "play-house," revels in "Jewett" sung to the words of "My Jesus, as Thou Wilt" and is contented to sing "Softly Fades the Twilight Ray" to "Leise, Leise" from this same opera, while "Guidance" as it is sweetly warbled by the church choir awakens no suspicion in the deacon's breast that he is hearing "Solo, profugo, rejetto," from "Martha" as it is transformed into "Jesus, Blessed Mediator."

After the first few measures of the horn quartette the instruments obtained a better balance of tone and the rest of the overture was a most effective performance, that wonderful pizzicato A on the contrabasses ushering in the premonitions of evil in a very impressive manner and the Coda, as already intimated, gave a superb climax.

Now followed Vieuxtemps' violin concerto in A minor. Poor Vieuxtemps! his very name indicates that he belongs to an old, a bygone time! The cultured musical world no longer cares much for mere violin exercises even when named a "concerto." Mendelssohn's concerto is far in advance of this gathering of technical difficulties, while the three Bs of violin concerto composition, Beethoven, Brahms and Bruch, are upon a wholly different level.

But the work served to show what an excellent performer Miss Olive Mead is. She displayed a sympathetic tone, an intonation invariably pure (one slight lapse in a high position does not invalidate this statement) and some splendid double-stopping. The cadenza introduced a great amount of the last-named execution and some commendable work on the G string; as a whole the impression made was one of suavity, delicacy and absolute surety, rather than of majestic power, but the lack of the latter quality may be ascribed to the character of the work itself.

Miss Mead captured her public entirely and was applauded to the echo, being recalled over and over again, a tribute fairly won by her artistic worth.

The next number was an arrangement of Brahms' waltzes (Op. 39, originally a piano work for four hands) for orchestra, by Mr. Gericke himself. One feels inclined to give the lion's share of the praise of this work to Mr. Gericke; Brahms never fully caught up the spirit of either the Viennese waltzers or the gipsy phrenetics of Buda-Pesth; he gives their tunes and syncopates them to the St. Vitus point, but it required the dainty and sparkling orchestration and the free reading accorded by Mr. Gericke to galvanize matters into a semblance of life.

With a conservative use of the orchestra, Mr. Gericke has managed to achieve some charming effects,—a good lesson to some of our cis-Atlantic experimentalists in new tone colors. There was some ingenious use of the wood-wind, and some combinations of flute and harp were especially bright. But Brahms knows nothing of Milton's

> "Midnight shout and revelry,
> Tipsy dance and jollity."

His dancers seem rather like Hook's, who "looked as if they were hired to do it and were doubtful about being paid." There is no spontaneous mirth, and mere rickets do not constitute caprice.

At the close of the number, or rather the set of short numbers, the conductor-composer was given the heartiest tribute and recalled to the stand with enthusiasm.

The concert ended with a new work, Sinding's D minor symphony, a composition that has made a stir abroad. We are in some doubt as to whether the work was a symphony or a Bass Tuba Concerto, so constantly was the deeper brass called into the foreground. It is, however, a symphony in regular form, which is something to be grateful for nowadays, and it presented an amount of development of figures that indicated ingenuity and sometimes inspiration.

Sinding is a Norwegian, and it was, therefore, natural to expect something of the Scandinavian melancholy in this work; but it frequently went across the boundary line into the realms of deepest woe. The first movement plunged into the heart of matters at once, and gave a powerful and resolute phrase in the very first measures. Afterwards, there came very much reiteration, a dwelling on short figures which were not attractive, either in themselves or in their development.

In fact, Mr. Sinding seems to revel in frank ugliness, and deliberately to discard grace and beauty. The brutality of the Bass Tuba is constantly thrust upon the auditor, not with a definite meaning, such as Wagner gave it in the Hunding-motive, but with a strange ferocity which, as yet, seems meaningless to us. Everywhere there was "Sturm und Drang," combat and fury. The woodwind was used "a la Russe" in its deepest register, and added to the prevalent gloom.

The Andante gave a more pensive sorrow, a tender brooding that reminded in its character, (not in its treatment or themes, for Sinding is no plagiarist), of Cowen's Scandinavian symphony; the dreamy solitude of the northern fiords and forests is in this movement; and, even on a first hearing, many beauties are revealed. The romantic tone-color of the horn is prominent here, and a clarinette theme, [illegible] a soft tremolo of violins, was pe-

The Scherzo was rather bizarre than playful; there was much reiteration, a few touches of mystery, and a rushing contrabass passage that reminded of Beethoven.

The finale again became pessimistic; once more tuba and trombone began their portentous growls, while the bassoon, in deep register, added to the sombre tints. There were a few canonic touches in this that showed the learned side of the composer; but, as a whole, Mr. Sinding was in no mood for contrapuntal display, and his tempest stormed along to the very coda.

As a whole, therefore, the picture was about as bright as a painting of the lowest shaft of a coal-mine at midnight with the lights out would be. We fear doing injustice to such a work; one needs to be in sympathy with its mood to properly appreciate it; to a person who thinks that all life is wretchedness, and that the whole world is awry, this symphony must seem a "chef d'oeuvre." Certainly, Mr. Sinding has a mastery over his orchestral forces, and says what he desires to say in an emphatic and unmistakable manner.

The symphony was finely read and played, and especial credit must be given to the brasses. It is pleasant to find Mr. Gericke giving novelties in these concerts; if we desire to reap the full benefit of our noble orchestra, we must hear the works on which Europe is debating, even if they be not always beautiful; we must be able to compare the various new developments in the orchestral field with each other, after which, we will probably turn to the older classics with renewed zest. The next concert is to continue this presentation of new works with a performance of a movement of a new symphony by an American composer,—Converse.

Emil Sauer, who will appear on this occasion, is to perform the Henselt piano-concerto, a work sufficiently unfamiliar to become a novelty to Boston concert-goers.

In an excellent article on the imperfections of our scale which appeared in the programme book of the concert above reviewed, the writer, without a word of explanation, makes use of the unfamiliar vibration system of the French, instead of the system established by Newton and adopted by England and America. This may puzzle the readers of Tyndall, Zahm, Blaserna, Pole, Helmholtz, and other standard authorities, who all use the Newtonian system. The vibration numbers used in the article in question are twice those ordinarily used in this country.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 8, 1899.

The eleventh Symphony programme presented a new work of strenuous and engrossing character—the symphony in D minor written by the Norwegian composer, Christian Sinding. It is his twenty-fourth numbered opus, and has been received into decided favor in many musical centres since Weingartner brought it out in Berlin, some three years ago. It has originality, distinction, power, passion and mastery; but it is not easy to hear, because it is almost always imperative, vehement, loud-sounding and exciting. The orchestration presents no new combinations and does not perplex.

It speaks clearly and determinedly; and yet its forcefulness almost dazes the listener at times, until he longs for some relaxation of the tense demand which is made upon his nerves. There are softer moods and gentle themes, to be sure; but underneath them is ever the sound of the orchestra's deepest voices, while there hangs over them a menace of stormy outbreaks not far away. The bold independence with which Sinding announces his themes does not fail him in his insistence upon them; and his rushing, huge volumes of tone often seem to exhaust themselves in some tremendous crash. Yet it must not be thought that such urgent music is without its poetry, although this is the poetry of a land where heavy shadows are cast from beetling cliffs into the pleasant valleys and where avalanche and rocky mass impend and fall. But there is no violence in the loudest bursts—they stop just short of that—and there is a sensitive feeling for the value of such instruments as the bassoon, the oboe, and the viola, to which is frequently made the unexpected and telling assignment of some new fashion of the theme or some important comment upon it. The symphony must be exceedingly difficult to master and to manage, and in the flying phases of the rapid scherzo the band seemed sometimes inclined to hurry in their excitement, and then again to hold back a little, as if even their virtuosity could hardly compass their enjoined duties. The symphony, being new, was of course received with Boston hesitancy and doubt, which a second hearing might relieve, if it could be accorded. As for the playing, it was superb, upon the whole, and we have rarely found such enthusiasm and ardor in any of Mr. Gericke's leading.

The concert began with an admirable reading of the "Der Freischutz" overture, the mysterious, sullen, under phrases of which were exquisitely tempered to their places. Mr. Gericke also gave his own delightful and really romantic orchestration of the Brahms four-hand pianoforte waltzes, opus 39. The composer shows in them that ability (which he seems to have misprized afterward) to be simple, sweet, melodious, cheerful, buoyant and swayingly rhythmical. But as now represented, these charming waltzes owed more to Mr. Gericke than to their author; for the treatment was deliciously light in poise, choice of tone, color, distribution of emphasis and subject, and often beautifully fanciful or brilliant, as the case might be. There was a hearty recognition of the dainty work and the real delight it gave.

Miss Olive Mead, whose violin-playing shows a notable advance in its technical command as well as in the individuality which she imparts to it, performed the fifth concert of Vieusctemps so excellently as to win great approval from the critical together with unstinted favor from the audience in general. She has gained in freedom and firmness of statemcilt, in keenness and brilliancy of execution, and in fulness and solidity of expressive tone—this without hardening her manner or detracting from sweetness and accuracy.

The next programme is full of interesting promise for it names with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, two novelties—the "Parisian" symphony of Mozart and one movement from a symphony of Converse. Nor is this all. Mr Emil Sauer, of whose pianism wonderful things have been said of late, is to make his Boston debut—his own recital being set for a week later. His concerto will be one of Henselt, which offers large opportunity for display for technique, for recognition of half classic forms and for clear, unaffected expressiveness.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, January 7, 1899.

BOSTON, MASS., Jan. 3, 1899.

The programme of the tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows: "A Faust Overture," Wagner; Symphonic Variations, Op. 78, Dvorâk; minuet of "Will o' the Wisps" and "Dance of Sylphs," Berlioz, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. The Faust overture has never been played in Boston to my recollection with that clearness and definite exposition of the composer's evident intention as it was on this occasion. What more could be done with its material I can't imagine. In the reading of Wagner's compositions Mr. Gericke is a master. He gives them all the sway that is demanded within the bounds of normal production.

There are those who believe that the music of Wagner is the symbol of noise and confusion and that unless at times it is rent asunder and discharged at the listener as from the mouth of a 13-inch cannon the conductor has not a just appreciation of this great master.

During the reign of Nikisch, and of Paur also, his music under their baton was too often turned into an infernal din, while its passsion was torn to tatters. Wagner was a musician of the most delicate sensibilities, and never intended that his music should be so misinterpreted. This he has said himself.

Let us be thankful that in Gericke we have an interpreter who will keep alive the true spirit of the composer and through comparative performance teach the public to distinguish between a presentation and a distortion of this eminent composer's masterpieces.

Through superb playing, all that is of value in the Dvorâk Variations was brought forth, barely worth the effort, however, while the charming and fascinating numbers by Berlioz were exquisitely rendered. To praise the reading of the Beethoven symphony is but to repeat what one must always say of Gericke's conception of the classics. There are two points, however, in the playing of the orchestra that Gericke does not demand of the players nowadays as he did during his first term. First, there is an absence to a certain degree of that repose that before was so preeminently characteristic of the efforts of the orchestra. Gericke seems to have lost in a marked degree that delicacy in the pianissimo effects, that wonderful gradation in dynamic contracts, and that marvelous perfection in the sempre pianissimo of former days. Is it that his musical sensibilities are somewhat blunted in these later days? It was the absence of these refined elements in the playing of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven at the first concert this season that made his interpretation of that work infinitely superior to that of Theodore Thomas'. Thomas showed us that this delightful art is not lost. Come, come, Mr. Gericke, we cannot have the Boston Symphony Orchestra take off its hat to the Chicago Band in the performance of the classics. Thomas is a much older man than you, but the infinite variety of his art does not stale. The second point that I would refer to is the loudness of the wind band in the pianissimo passages. Take, for instance, where the diminuendo of the strings has reached a point of extreme softness and delicacy, a mere breath. Then comes in the wood-wind alone, perhaps, with their parts marked PPP. Do the players accomplish this effect? Not by any means. Not once this season have they entered in such a place with a power less than mezzo forte. It is as shocking to the sensitive ear in such a case as if the bass drummer struck a blow upon his instrument. Oh, the charm of former days, when this benediction of the wood-wind was merely breathed. The players have not lost the art. They only need to be restrained.

"This Country, with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."
BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MORE MUSIC HALL STOCK.

A specially called meeting of the corporation which is to build the new Music Hall for Boston was held in the Tremont building at 11 A.M.

Col. Higginson called the meeting to order, and immediately brought up the matter of increasing the capital of the company from $200,000 to $500,000. He explained the need in the new plans adopted since the McKim model was rejected.

"The directors," said Col. Higginson, "have decided to make this a music hall alone. The plan to run a music hall and a theatre, too, was rejected as unwise. It would be very expensive, and the best purposes would not be served. Mr. McKim is now working on a new model, which will be ready for exhibition in a few days."

Mr. Cotting presented the resolution to increase the capital stock, and a stockholder asked Col. Higginson to explain about the additional land. Col. Higginson said that the directors had felt afraid to allow the land to get into the hands of persons outside the company, on account of the danger of an unharmonious building being erected next the hall. Accordingly, three of them with their own money purchased this land.

"The hall will probably never need this land," said Col. Higginson, "but if it does, the land is at the service of the company, at the cost price."

The resolution was passed unanimously, as was another offered by W. C. Loring, to the effect that any shares left after the stockholders had taken up as many of the increased capital stock as they should care to, should be offered to public subscription at par.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1899

MORE MUSIC HALL STOCK

It Is Voted to Increase It to $500,000

New Plan of the Building Nearly Ready

Work of Construction Soon to Be Started

All Was Harmonious at the Meeting Today

A special meeting of the stockholders of the New Music Hall Association was held, this morning, in the public committee room in the Tremont Building, and the action requested by the directors was taken without even an intimation that the plan of the directors, as informally presented through the press, for a simple Music Hall, without provision for the performance of opera, was distasteful to any stockholder. Those present were Major Henry L. Higginson, Charles E. Cotting, W. S. Bigelow, Edward W. Hooper, E. P. Beebe, C. P. Curtis, Henry S. Grew, Mrs. L. G. Kendall, F. H. Beebe, Henry F. Sears, John Ritchie, W. L. Parker, H. C. Richards, Henry Pickering and William Caleb Loring.

Major Higginson, as president, presided, and the records of the last annual meeting of the stockholders, which was held on Feb. 16, 1898, were read and approved. In accordance with the call, Mr. Loring presented a motion that the capital stock of the corporation be increased from $200,000 to $500,000, and another that the treasurer be authorized to open subscription books for the sale of such stock as might not be subscribed for by present stockholders—this in accordance with the law governing the issue of stock by corporations organized to make money, as this one technically is. Both motions were passed unanimously.

Colonel Higginson explained that the land for the new building, which is at Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, was bought in 1893, and that all taxes had been paid on it; that a plan for a building to be erected thereon had been drawn by Mr. McKim, but that it included some innovations, and the directors were afraid to adopt it. Another, he said, is being prepared and will be ready to show the stockholders within a short time; about $250,000 will be needed for the work. The directors thought best to have only a music hall, as one in which opera and theatrical performances could be given would cost much more to erect and maintain, and returns from such were a matter of doubt. Regarding the additonal piece of land which had been bought recently, Major Higginson said that the purchase was made by three of the directors as individuals, and that their object was to get adjoining property into friendly hands; if the corporation should at any time want the land, it could have it at cost.

Edward W. Hooper, representing the committee appointed to receive subscriptions, stated that there had been 406 subscribers whose subscriptions amounted to $402,500, of which $208,000 had ben paid in. Up to date only thirty-three persons had paid nothing at all, and of these the subscriptions of eighteen amounted to only $100 each, while of the remainder that of James Stevenson, for $10,000, was the only one which exceeded $1000. In the opinion of Mr. Hooper, nineteen-twentieths of the amount subscribed would materialize in cash. Before the adjournment, which came within half an hour of the opening of the meeting, Major Higginson said that the directors must get to work at once on the new building, as it would be ready for occupancy by April 1, 1900. A meeting of the stockholders will be called as soon as the plans are ready to show. As will be seen in the foregoing figures, the amount of new capital required, above that subscribed for, is only about $100,000, and no fear is expressed that it will not be immediately forthcoming.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1899.

Sinding's Symphony--Olive Mead's Violin Performance.

The concert of Saturday began with Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, a work which never grows stale. Weber's overtures reconcile two opposite schools, the operatic style and the classical sonata-form; using the latter almost as established by Mozart, Weber takes his themes (chief theme, subordinate, etc.) directly from his opera, just as Rossini, Sullivan, and the whole tribe of medley overtures do, but the result is something far in advance of the medley overture.

A dramatic style is therefore to be desired in the interpretation of these overtures and this was present in every measure of Mr. Gericke's reading. The extreme adagio of the introduction, the impressive pause before the coda, the mighty chords with which this finale began, and the brilliancy of the subordinate theme, were all given with due effect and great applause followed the conclusion of the number.

The horn quartette did not blend as perfectly as we have heard it. What an amount of hymn-singing this same quartette is responsible for! Many a church which looks upon an opera with horror as being part of the wickedness of the "play-house," revels in "Jewett" sung to the words of "My Jesus, as Thou Wilt" and is contented to sing "Softly Fades the Twilight Ray" to "Leise, Leise" from this same opera, while "Guidance" as it is sweetly warbled by the church choir awakens no suspicion in the deacon's breast that he is hearing "Solo, profugo, rejetto," from "Martha" as it is transformed into "Jesus, Blessed Mediator."

After the first few measures of the horn quartette the instruments obtained a better balance of tone and the rest of the overture was a most effective performance, that wonderful pizzicato A on the contrabasses ushering in the premonitions of evil in a very impressive manner and the Coda, as already intimated, gave a superb climax.

Now followed Vieuxtemps' violin concerto in A minor. Poor Vieuxtemps! his very name indicates that he belongs to an old, a bygone time! The cultured musical world no longer cares much for mere violin exercises even when named a "concerto." Mendelssohn's concerto is far in advance of this gathering of technical difficulties, while the three Bs of violin concerto composition, Beethoven, Brahms and Bruch, are upon a wholly different level.

But the work served to show what an excellent performer Miss Olive Mead is. She displayed a sympathetic tone, an intonation invariably pure (one slight lapse in a high position does not invalidate this statement) and some splendid double-stopping. The cadenza introduced a great amount of the last-named execution and some commendable work on the G string; as a whole the impression made was one of suavity, delicacy and absolute surety, rather than of majestic power, but the lack of the latter quality may be ascribed to the character of the work itself.

Miss Mead captured her public entirely and was applauded to the echo, being recalled over and over again, a tribute fairly won by her artistic worth.

The next number was an arrangement of Brahms' waltzes (Op. 39, originally a piano work for four hands) for orchestra, by Mr. Gericke himself. One feels inclined to give the lion's share of the praise of this work to Mr. Gericke; Brahms never fully caught up the spirit of either the Viennese waltzers or the gipsy phrenetics of Buda-Pesth; he gives their tunes and syncopates them to the St. Vitus point, but it required the dainty and sparkling orchestration and the free reading accorded by Mr. Gericke to galvanize matters into a semblance of life.

With a conservative use of the orchestra, Mr. Gericke has managed to achieve some charming effects,—a good lesson to some of our cis-Atlantic experimentalists in new tone colors. There was some ingenious use of the wood-wind, and some combinations of flute and harp were especially bright. But Brahms knows nothing of Milton's

> "Midnight shout and revelry,
> Tipsy dance and jollity."

His dancers seem rather like Hook's, who "looked as if they were hired to do it and were doubtful about being paid." There is no spontaneous mirth, and mere rickets do not constitute caprice.

At the close of the number, or rather the set of short numbers, the conductor-composer was given the heartiest tribute and recalled to the stand with enthusiasm.

The concert ended with a new work, Sinding's D minor symphony, a composition that has made a stir abroad. We are in some doubt as to whether the work was a symphony or a Bass Tuba Concerto, so constantly was the deeper brass called into the foreground. It is, however, a symphony in regular form, which is something to be grateful for nowadays, and it presented an amount of development of figures that indicated ingenuity and sometimes inspiration.

Sinding is a Norwegian, and it was, therefore, natural to expect something of the Scandinavian melancholy in this work; but it frequently went across the boundary line into the realms of deepest woe. The first movement plunged into the heart of matters at once, and gave a powerful and resolute phrase in the very first measures. Afterwards, there came very much reiteration, a dwelling on short figures which were not attractive, either in themselves or in their development.

In fact, Mr. Sinding seems to revel in frank ugliness, and deliberately to discard grace and beauty. The brutality of the Bass Tuba is constantly thrust upon the auditor, not with a definite meaning, such as Wagner gave it in the Hunding-motive, but with a strange ferocity which, as yet, seems meaningless to us. Everywhere there was "Sturm und Drang," combat and fury. The woodwind was used "a la Russe" in its deepest register, and added to the prevalent gloom.

The Andante gave a more pensive sorrow, a tender brooding that reminded in its character, (not in its treatment or themes, for Sinding is no plagiarist), of Cowen's Scandinavian symphony; the dreamy solitude of the northern fiords and forests is in this movement; and, even on a first hearing, many beauties are revealed. The romantic tone-color of the horn is prominent here, and a clarinette theme, against a soft tremolo of violins, was pe- [illegible]

The scherzo was rather bizarre than playful; there was much reiteration, a few touches of mystery, and a rushing contrabass passage that reminded of Beethoven.

The finale again became pessimistic; once more tuba and trombone began their portentous growls, while the bassoon, in deep register, added to the sombre tints. There were a few canonic touches in this that showed the learned side of the composer; but, as a whole, Mr. Sinding was in no mood for contrapuntal display, and his tempest stormed along to the very coda.

As a whole, therefore, the picture was about as bright as a painting of the lowest shaft of a coal-mine at midnight with the lights out would be. We fear doing injustice to such a work; one needs to be in sympathy with its mood to properly appreciate it; to a person who thinks that all life is wretchedness, and that the whole world is awry, this symphony must seem a "chef d'oeuvre." Certainly, Mr. Sinding has a mastery over his orchestral forces, and says what he desires to say in an emphatic and unmistakable manner.

The symphony was finely read and played, and especial credit must be given to the brasses. It is pleasant to find Mr. Gericke giving novelties in these concerts; if we desire to reap the full benefit of our noble orchestra, we must hear the works on which Europe is debating, even if they be not always beautiful; we must be able to compare the various new developments in the orchestral field with each other, after which, we will probably turn to the older classics with renewed zest. The next concert is to continue this presentation of new works with a performance of a movement of a new symphony by an American composer,—Converse.

Emil Sauer, who will appear on this occasion, is to perform the Henselt piano-concerto, a work sufficiently unfamiliar to become a novelty to Boston concert-goers.

In an excellent article on the imperfections of our scale which appeared in the programme book of the concert above reviewed, the writer, without a word of explanation, makes use of the unfamiliar vibration system of the French, instead of the system established by Newton and adopted by England and America. This may puzzle the readers of Tyndall, Zahm, Blaserna, Pole, Helmholtz, and other standard authorities, who all use the Newtonian system. The vibration numbers used in the article in question are twice those ordinarily used in this country.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 8, 1899.

The eleventh Symphony programme presented a new work of strenuous and engrossing character—the symphony in D minor written by the Norwegian composer, Christian Sinding. It is his twenty-fourth numbered opus, and has been received into decided favor in many musical centres since Weingartner brought it out in Berlin, some three years ago. It has originality, distinction, power, passion and mastery; but it is not easy to hear, because it is almost always imperative, vehement, loud-sounding and exciting. The orchestration presents no new combinations and does not perplex.

It speaks clearly and determinedly; and yet its forcefulness almost dazes the listener at times, until he longs for some relaxation of the tense demand which is made upon his nerves. There are softer moods and gentle themes, to be sure; but underneath them is ever the sound of the orchestra's deepest voices, while there hangs over them a menace of stormy outbreaks not far away. The bold independence with which Sinding announces his themes does not fail him in his insistence upon them; and his rushing, huge volumes of tone often seem to exhaust themselves in some tremendous crash. Yet it must not be thought that such urgent music is without its poetry, although this is the poetry of a land where heavy shadows are cast from beetling cliffs into the pleasant valleys and where avalanche and rocky mass impend and fall. But there is no violence in the loudest bursts—they stop just short of that—and there is a sensitive feeling for the value of such instruments as the bassoon, the oboe, and the viola, to which is frequently made the unexpected and telling assignment of some new fashion of the theme or some important comment upon it. The symphony must be exceedingly difficult to master and to manage, and in the flying phases of the rapid scherzo the band seemed sometimes inclined to hurry in their excitement, and then again to hold back a little, as if even their virtuosity could hardly compass their enjoined duties. The symphony, being new, was of course received with Boston hesitancy and doubt, which a second hearing might relieve, if it could be accorded. As for the playing, it was superb, upon the whole, and we have rarely found such enthusiasm and ardor in any of Mr. Gericke's leading.

The concert began with an admirable reading of the "Der Freischutz" overture, the mysterious, sullen, under phrases of which were exquisitely tempered to their places. Mr. Gericke also gave his own delightful and really romantic orchestration of the Brahms four-hand pianoforte waltzes, opus 39. The composer shows in them that ability (which he seems to have misprized afterward) to be simple, sweet, melodious, cheerful, buoyant and swayingly rhythmical. But as now represented, these charming waltzes owed more to Mr. Gericke than to their author; for the treatment was deliciously light in poise, choice of tone, color, distribution of emphasis and subject, and often beautifully fanciful or brilliant, as the case might be. There was a hearty recognition of the dainty work and the real delight it gave.

Miss Olive Mead, whose violin-playing shows a notable advance in its technical command as well as in the individuality which she imparts to it, performed the fifth coucert of Vieusctemps so excellently as to win great approval from the critical together with unstinted favor from the audience in general. She has gained in freedom and firmness of statement, in keenness and brilliancy of execution, and in fulness and solidity of expressive tone—this without hardening her manner or detracting from sweetness and accuracy.

The next programme is full of interesting promise for it names with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, two novelties—the "Parisian" symphony of Mozart and one movement from a symphony of Converse. Nor is this all. Mr Emil Sauer, of whose pianism wonderful things have been said of late, is to make his Boston debut—his own recital being set for a week later. His concerto will be one of Heuselt, which offers large opportunity for display for technique, for recognition of half classic forms and for clear, unaffected expressiveness.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, January 7, 1899.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 3, 1899.

The programme of the tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows: "A Faust Overture," Wagner; Symphonic Variations, Op. 78, Dvorâk; minuet of "Will o' the Wisps" and "Dance of Sylphs," Berlioz, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. The Faust overture has never been played in Boston to my recollection with that clearness and definite exposition of the composer's evident intention as it was on this occasion. What more could be done with its material I can't imagine. In the reading of Wagner's compositions Mr. Gericke is a master. He gives them all the sway that is demanded within the bounds of normal production.

There are those who believe that the music of Wagner is the symbol of noise and confusion and that unless at times it is rent asunder and discharged at the listener as from the mouth of a 13-inch cannon the conductor has not a just appreciation of this great master.

During the reign of Nikisch, and of Paur also, his music under their baton was too often turned into an infernal din, while its passsion was torn to tatters. Wagner was a musician of the most delicate sensibilities, and never intended that his music should be so misinterpreted. This he has said himself.

Let us be thankful that in Gericke we have an interpreter who will keep alive the true spirit of the composer and through comparative performance teach the public to distinguish between a presentation and a distortion of this eminent composer's masterpieces.

Through superb playing, all that is of value in the Dvorâk Variations was brought forth, barely worth the effort, however, while the charming and fascinating numbers by Berlioz were exquisitely rendered. To praise the reading of the Beethoven symphony is but to repeat what one must always say of Gericke's conception of the classics. There are two points, however, in the playing of the orchestra that Gericke does not demand of the players nowadays as he did during his first term. First, there is an absence to a certain degree of that repose that before was so pre-eminently characteristic of the efforts of the orchestra. Gericke seems to have lost in a marked degree that delicacy in the pianissimo effects, that wonderful gradation in dynamic contracts, and that marvelous perfection in the sempre pianissimo of former days. Is it that his musical sensibilities are somewhat blunted in these later days? It was the absence of these refined elements in the playing of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven at the first concert this season that made his interpretation of that work infinitely superior to that of Theodore Thomas'. Thomas showed us that this delightful art is not lost. Come, come, Mr. Gericke, we cannot have the Boston Symphony Orchestra take off its hat to the Chicago Band in the performance of the classics. Thomas is a much older man than you, but the infinite variety of his art does not stale. The second point that I would refer to is the loudness of the wind band in the pianissimo passages. Take, for instance, where the diminuendo of the strings has reached a point of extreme softness and delicacy, a mere breath. Then comes in the wood-wind alone, perhaps, with their parts marked PPP. Do the players accomplish this effect? Not by any means. Not once this season have they entered in such a place with a power less than mezzo forte. It is as shocking to the sensitive ear in such a case as if the bass drummer struck a blow upon his instrument. Oh, the charm of former days, when this benediction of the wood-wind was merely breathed. The players have not lost the art. They only need to be restrained.

"This Country, with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."
BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MORE MUSIC HALL STOCK.

A specially called meeting of the corporation which is to build the new Music Hall for Boston was held in the Tremont building at 11 A.M.

Col. Higginson called the meeting to order, and immediately brought up the matter of increasing the capital of the company from $200,000 to $500,000. He explained the need in the new plans adopted since the McKim model was rejected.

"The directors," said Col. Higginson, "have decided to make this a music hall alone. The plan to run a music hall and a theatre, too, was rejected as unwise. It would be very expensive, and the best purposes would not be served. Mr. McKim is now working on a new model, which will be ready for exhibition in a few days."

Mr. Cotting presented the resolution to increase the capital stock, and a stockholder asked Col. Higginson to explain about the additional land. Col. Higginson said that the directors had felt afraid to allow the land to get into the hands of persons outside the company, on account of the danger of an unharmonious building being erected next the hall. Accordingly, three of them with their own money purchased this land.

"The hall will probably never need this land," said Col. Higginson, "but if it does, the land is at the service of the company, at the cost price."

The resolution was passed unanimously, as was another offered by W. C. Loring, to the effect that any shares left after the stockholders had taken up as many of the increased capital stock as they should care to, should be offered to public subscription at par.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1899

MORE MUSIC HALL STOCK

It Is Voted to Increase It to $500,000

New Plan of the Building Nearly Ready

Work of Construction Soon to Be Started

All Was Harmonious at the Meeting Today

A special meeting of the stockholders of the New Music Hall Association was held, this morning, in the public committee room in the Tremont Building, and the action requested by the directors was taken without even an intimation that the plan of the directors, as informally presented through the press, for a simple Music Hall, without provision for the performance of opera, was distasteful to any stockholder. Those present were Major Henry L. Higginson, Charles E. Cotting, W. S. Bigelow, Edward W. Hooper, E. P. Beebe, C. P. Curtis, Henry S. Grew, Mrs. L. G. Kendall, F. H. Beebe, Henry F. Sears, John Ritchie, W. L. Parker, H. C. Richards, Henry Pickering and William Caleb Loring.

Major Higginson, as president, presided, and the records of the last annual meeting of the stockholders, which was held on Feb. 16, 1898, were read and approved. In accordance with the call, Mr. Loring presented a motion that the capital stock of the corporation be increased from $200,000 to $500,000, and another that the treasurer be authorized to open subscription books for the sale of such stock as might not be subscribed for by present stockholders—this in accordance with the law governing the issue of stock by corporations organized to make money, as this one technically is. Both motions were passed unanimously.

Colonel Higginson explained that the land for the new building, which is at Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, was bought in 1893, and that all taxes had been paid on it; that a plan for a building to be erected thereon had been drawn by Mr. McKim, but that it included some innovations, and the directors were afraid to adopt it. Another, he said, is being prepared and will be ready to show the stockholders within a short time; about $250,000 will be needed for the work. The directors thought best to have only a husic hall, as one in which opera and theatrical performances could be given would cost much more to erect and maintain, and returns from such were a matter of doubt. Regarding the additonal piece of land which had been bought recently, Major Higginson said that the purchase was made by three of the directors as individuals, and that their object was to get adjoining property into friendly hands; if the corporation should at any time want the land, it could have it at cost.

Edward W. Hooper, representing the committee appointed to receive subscriptions, stated that there had been 406 subscribers whose subscriptions amounted to $402,500, of which $208,000 had ben paid in. Up to date only thirty-three persons had paid nothing at all, and of these the subscriptions of eighteen amounted to only $100 each, while of the remainder that of James Stevenson, for $10,000, was the only one which exceeded $1000. In the opinion of Mr. Hooper, nineteen-twentieths of the amount subscribed would materialize in cash. Before the adjournment, which came within half an hour of the opening of the meeting, Major Higginson said that the directors must get to work at once on the new building, as it would be ready for occupancy by April 1, 1900. A meeting of the stockholders will be called as soon as the plans are ready to show. As will be seen in the foregoing figures, the amount of new capital required, above that subscribed for, is only about $100,000, and no fear is expressed that it will not be immediately forthcoming.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1899.

MORE STOCK.

New Music Hall Stockholders Vote to Increase—Col. Higginson Explains About Purchase of Land.

A specially-called meeting of the corporation which is to build the new Music Hall for Boston was held yesterday morning in the Tremont Building at 11 o'clock.

Col. Henry L. Higginson called the meeting to order, and the call and records were read by Mr. C. U. Cotting, the clerk. Col. Higginson immediately brought up the matter of increasing the capital of the company from $200,000 to $500,000. He explained the need in the new plain adopted since the McKim model was rejected.

"The Directors," said Col. Higginson, "have decided to make this a music hall alone. The plan to run a music hall and a theatre too was rejected as unwise. It would be very expensive and the best purposes would not be served. The Directors have turned aside from that plan entirely. Mr. McKim is now working on a new model, which will be ready for exhibition in a few days."

Mr. Cotting presented the resolution to increase the capital stock, and a stockholder asked Col. Higginson to explain what the additional land that had been bought was, and why it had been bought. Col. Higginson said that while the Directors had no money belonging to the company with which to purchase the land between the company's land and the Children's Hospital, they still felt afraid to allow the land to get into the hands of persons outside the company, on account of the danger that a manufacturing business, or a building that would be detrimental to the interests of the Music Hall, might be established there. Accordingly, three of the Directors had on their own account and with their own money purchased this land, which they now held.

"The hall will probably never need this land," said Col. Higginson, "but if it does, the land is at the service of the company, at the cost price."

The resolution was passed unanimously, as was another offered by William Caleb Loring, to the effect that any shares left after the stockholders had taken up as many of the increased capital stock as they should care to, should be offered to public subscription at par. The meeting then adjourned.

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

First Performance of Sinding's Symphony In D Minor—Miss Olive Mead Was the Soloist.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, eleventh concert. Miss Olive Mead, soloist. The programme:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Concerto for violin, No. 5 in A minor......
Vieuxtemps
Miss Olive Mead.
Waltzes, op. 39.......................Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Symphony No. 1, in D minor...........Sinding
(First time in Boston.)

At last, several years after New York and Chicago, Boston has heard Sinding's much-discussed symphony in D minor. It should have been given long ago, not merely because it has been a marked work for several years (and we reasonably expect to get such things early), but also because the work of any reviewer would now be greatly simplified if this were his third hearing, say. The massive and magnificent work demands it. I say "massive and magnificent" because of those two adjectives I am tolerably certain. But of the fullness of its meaning, its complete musical value and its chances of long life it will not do to speak with any decision on first acquaintance.

First of all, the symphony makes an impression of great nobility, of the utmost sincerity, of sound technique, and, it must be confessed, of a deal of boisterous passion and a strong tinge of deep gloom. It would be sour milk for musical babes. Of sweetness and light there is practically nothing. It is like the sterner part of Norway whence it sprung. Indeed, it is an easy matter to make it "programme music" of the intensest sort. The first movement with its wild waving sweep suggests the ocean voyages of the old Norsemen; the slow movement a lament for some great chief who never came back; the third a tournament of rough sports, and the last a triumphant paean for victories won. Such a plotting-out may be beside the mark, but if there is any Norwegian color in music, this symphony has it in plenty. Intrinsically the first and last movements are the best. It was read with power and played admirably.

Miss Olive Mead, now become a young woman, played the Vieuxtemps Concerto with considerable breadth and beauty of expression. She has gained in freedom and in power, and her intonation is very much more secure. I have heard mature violinists of the male department play this concerto with less effect.

Many of the Brahms' waltzes were extremely beautiful, some of them tender and appealing and a few dull and scholastic. But as a whole they were well worth hearing again. Mr. Gericke's really fine instrumentation of them is a considerable part of their present interest. The venerable "Freischutz" received the best of treatment, as a matter of course.

WILDER D. QUINT.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.

DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 8, 1899.

Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, the 69th performance in this city and the 1638th of the organization, is announced for next Wednesday evening, Jan. 11, at 8 o'clock.

It has never been the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to openly resent scant attendance, from a commercial point of view. While an absolute decision has not been reached as to future seasons in this city, yet the statement is made that the present lukewarm interest in a series of concerts which, to say the least, need no apology as to their high standing, will sooner or later have a negative effect. As is always the case, the patrons of these concerts 10 years ago are the patrons to-day, but, contrary to the result in every other city visited by the orchestra, there has not been the healthy increase of new-comers.

The programme next Wednesday evening opens with the Third Symphony of Brahms, who is regarded by a majority of musicians as the greatest modern composer of recent years. The second orchestral selection, played some ten days ago at the Boston concerts for the first time, is the "Symphonic Variations" of Dvorak, an exceedingly intricate and difficult but fascinating work, and played with the finish and precision only possible to such an organization as this.

The third orchestral selection will no doubt arouse the greatest enthusiasm of the evening, for although brief and airy in style, there is yet an opportunity to display the wonderful virtuosity of the orchestra to a remarkable degree. The selection is in two parts, the "Minuet of Will o' Wisps," and the "Waltz of the Sylphs" from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz. Although these two fascinating bits may properly be classed as programme music, still they never fail to catch the fancy of an audience. The closing orchestral number will be the ever-popular Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," by Wagner.

The soloist will be the English baritone, Theodore Byard, who has recently come to this country, and who achieved success at a recent concert of the orchestra in Cambridge. Mr. Byard will sing an aria from "Herodiade," by Massenet, and a group of songs with piano.

This programme is quite up to the standard of those given, not only at home, but in New York and the other cities visited by the orchestra, and the Providence public is assured that the orchestra always maintains its same high standard of performance in the concerts given in this city.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 15, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Boston Appearance of Emil Sauer, the Eminent European Pianist.

The twelfth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. Emil Sauer, pianist, was the soloist. The programme included Mozart's symphony, No. 31, in D (the "Parisian"); Heuselt's concerto in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 16; one movement from a new symphony in D minor, by Frederick S. Converse, and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman"

The interesting feature of this concert was the appearance of the distinguished European pianist, Emil Sauer, who has not been heard here before. The advance press notices, and the more or less reliable critical notices of him from European journals, were of such an extravagant nature that curiosity as to him and his abilities was at the highest point, and this was the cause of the "overflow" audience noticed at this concert. Mr. Sauer chose Heuselt's F minor concerto, a work which appeared more than fifty years ago, and at the time considered the most difficult of any work of the kind. It is still interesting to hear, though it bears somewhat the marks of age, and is surpassed by several works of its class written in the past few years.

Mr. Sauer played the concerto with great brilliancy of technic and in the second movement showed great poetic feeling, and it was here that the pianist's work was the most satisfactory. There were times in the first and last movements where the tone of the piano was obscure, and there was a feeling that the performer could not obtain the necessary powerful and penetrating tone that he desired. But in lighter passages his technic was clearness and beauty of which one rarely hears. The "all around" abilities of Mr Sauer can scarcely be judged by this performance; there will be better opportunity for this in his recital this coming week. It can be said here that his performance was convincing at every point. One can think of only a few occasions where greater artistic powers or technical proficiency were shown; that there have been such from a very few does not in the least detract from the merits of his performance.

Mr. Sauer received an immense ovation and numerous were the recalls in recognition of his abilities. The orchestral numbers were all finely played. The movement from the D minor symphony of Frederick S. Converse, who came from Newton and is a product of the Rheinberger School of Composition, is really meritorious for one just out of his student days. If the other movements of the symphony are as good, there is a work of promise, certainly. There will be no rehearsal and concert the coming week.

[illegible]

MONDAY, JANUARY 9, 1899.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eleventh Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Vieuxtemps: Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor, opus 37.
Brahms: Waltzes, opus 39 (scored for Orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke).
Sinding: Symphony No. 1, in D minor, opus 21.
(First time in Boston.)
Miss Olive Mead was the solo violinist.

A splendid performance of the "Freischütz" overture! The horn quartet in the introduction was given in just the right poetic, sylvan mood; with, now and then, just enough "brassiness" of tone on the accents to recall the fanfare of hunting-horns, yet, with all due delicacy of playing, quite free from the parlor sentimentality of the male-part song. We cannot remember hearing the sinister entrance of the low clarinets upon the tremolo of the strings made so effective before. The allegro went to a charm, and the coda was worked up with true Weberish brilliancy.

Brahms's waltzes, scored from the four-hand pianoforte original by Mr. Gericke, are delightful. They show Brahms in his most genial mood: frank, cheerful, almost dainty, but with no suggestion of the finicking. One could not help a certain sense of the musical material being a thought too slight for the orchestral vehicle; this is almost inevitable. Still Mr. Gericke's orchestration is kept within such modest limits that this drawback is reduced to its practical minimum. And we certainly did not feel any such unfitness, any such falsifying of the composer's individuality, as has often struck us in similar modern orchestral versions of pianoforte things by Schumann. The instrumentation is full of the richest glow of color, but it allows Brahms to remain unmistakably Brahms. Mr. Gericke's handling of the orchestra has a certain individuality about it; it is quite free from the super-refinement of some modern French masters, yet equally removed from the rather ponderous gorgeousness of men like Goldmark. With all its modern richness, it has something of the light transparency of Mozart. The waltzes were admirably played.

And so at last we have heard the much-talked-of Sinding symphony! A most stertorous sea-monster of a symphony it seems, at the first hearing; full of rude howling and Berserker rage; a most unkempt work! And, withal, not entirely free from serio-comic suggestion. It made us think of Bayard Taylor's—or was it R. H. Stoddard's?—parody on Browning, ending "The beast done with its bellowing, all but!" One wishes at times that these strenuous young composers would take greater pains to scrape the Bayreuth label off their musical luggage! There are passages in this symphony which lead one to suspect that the composer had an eye upon the position of assistant showman to the "Niebelungen" menagerie. All this is very flippant treatment of a serious new work; but, que voulez-vous? the thing is so infinitely dreary and tedious in its uncouthness that the critic must moisten his clay with something, were it only unseemly levity. Yet, to speak seriously, we could not escape a suspicion all the while that the music was somewhat distorted from its true character by he rendering. We felt about it somewhat as we did—mutatis mutandis—about the recent performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique." Not that we imagine for a moment that this symphony of Sinding's will ever take rank with the "Pathétique" as a work of genius; we cannot fancy any performance in the world doing that for it! But that there seemed to us to be a certain elemental violence and uncurbed ferocity, so to speak, in the music that were not fully reflected in the playing. And let us say here that we do not at all think that the work was too finely played; nothing can be too finely played. We cannot agree with those—Mr. J. F. Runciman among them—who deem roughness of execution a necessary factor of temperamental vehemence of impression. We do not think that, for instance, Mr. Paur's performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" was more impressive and moving than Mr. Gericke's because the former was rough, and the latter, highly finished. No doubt there are rough performances that take strongly hold upon you, and finished ones that leave you cold; everyone must have had such experiences. But we do not believe that any performance is grand and impressive merely because of its roughness, any more than we think that any performance is ineffective simply because of its high finish. Of the two conductors of their own works who seem to have left the strongest impression of temperamental vigor upon their hearers, Wagner and Verdi, both were equally noted for their almost exorbitant demands for a highly finished and filed-down style. What we should have liked in the Sinding symphony was all the perfection of playing which it actually got, with something more added.

Vieuxtemps's A minor concerto seems to us the work of his that has the most life still left in it. It is not only its perfect freedom of form, its manifestly unacademic character, that serve to keep it young, but a certain genuineness of melodic inspiration which, springing from something deeper than the passing fashion of a day, is able to outlive that fashion. We have heard the story told that one of the themes in the slow movement is an authentic old church melody by a Flemish composer—by Orlando Lasso, Hobrecht, Willaert, Josquin, who knows?—but we surely could recognize nothing of that character in the movement in question. If Vieuxtemps really made use of any such theme, he must have decked it out with so many modern passing-notes as quite to veil its original physiognomy. Miss Mead played the concerto admirably well; with perhaps still somewhat too much of the beginner's formality and lack of virtuoso abandon in the more brilliant passage-work, but in a finely musical spirit, with warm, searching tone, sympathetic feeling, and perfect clearness. A performance much to be praised, and worthily appreciated by the audience.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in D major, No. 31, "Parisian"; Henselt, concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, opus 16; Converse, movement from a symphony (first time); Wagner, overture to "Der fliegen de Holländer." Mr. Emil Sauer will be the pianist.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.

DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1899.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth symphony concert was given last evening in Infantry Hall before an audience somewhat larger than that of two weeks ago. While any increase at all may, perhaps, be regarded as a hopeful symptom the attendance still remains light, appreciably less than in past seasons and far below the support which a city of the size and wealth of Providence might reasonably be expected to extend to such a course of unrivalled musical entertainments. The programme attractive in both its quality and its variety, contained the following numbers:

Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90.....
..........................Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro con brio (F major).
II. Andante (C major).
III. Poco Allegretto (C minor).
IV. Allegro (F minor).
Air, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade"..
..........................Jules Massenet
Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme,
Op. 78....................Antonin Dvorak
Songs with pianoforte:
(a) "Marie"...................Robert Franz
(b) "Ein Ton"...............Peter Cornelius
(c) "Rencontre"..............Gabriel Faure
(d) "To Anthea"......................Hatton
(a) Minuet of "Will-'o-the-Wisps"..
(b) Waltz of Sylphs............Hector Berlioz
From "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.
Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg"....................Richard Wagner

This was essentially a "modern" programme, though there was certainly no lack of contrast to be felt. The concert began with a remarkably solid and finished performance of Brahms's symphony in F. While this is undoubtedly Brahms's greatest work, as a whole, in the symphonic form, it contains nothing that can match, for sheer musical beauty, with the second and third movements of his symphony in E-minor. The famous "cross-relation" in the opening allegro has caused no end of discussion, and much ink has been shed in the endeavor to explain, or to find a meaning in, this apparently deliberate violation of a simple musical law. Mr. Apthorp, in his programme notes, makes his contribution thus: "It seems to me that it can only be explained on the supposition of some underlying dramatic principle in the movement, such as the bringing together of two opposing forces—Light and Darkness, Good and Evil, or perhaps only Major and Minor—for on purely musical grounds the thing has little sense or meaning." It may be said, in passing, that the harmonic peculiarity referred to is not to be detected save by trained musical ears. Still, that it had some significance to the composer's mind can hardly be doubted, and in the lack of an authoritative key to the riddle Mr. Apthorp's guess is as good as any. Certainly the opening and closing movements of this symphony are suggestive of strife, and the impression is not lessened by the complexity of rhythms invariably employed by Brahms when, as here, he essayed lofty flights. The second and third movements are episodical in character and much simpler in form.

Why any composer of ability and renown should waste his time in writing "variations on an original theme," or, for that matter, on any theme whatever, is an insoluble mystery. If Ysaye or Paderewski favored their audiences with a set of five-finger exercises by way of showing how fast they could make their fingers go, they would be justly hooted off the platform. And your "variations" are nothing but a similar trick of dexterity on the part of composers. "I am a juggler, gentlemen! see how many eggs I can take out of this hat!" Nor has Dvorak's "original theme" the saving grace of being beautiful in itself. The orchestra was afforded an opportunity for much display of virtuosoship, and that was all.

The dainty and charming excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" were exquisitely played, and received the warmest applause of the evening. Wagner's massive and stately prelude to the "Meistersingers," with its wonderful polophony and elaborately rich harmony—always a welcome concert number—brought the programme to a brilliant and satisfactory close.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Theodore Byard, the English baritone, who sang with much taste, and received a very cordial welcome. His voice is not of the mellowest; indeed, the tone is "hard" at times, but it does not lack for range or power, and he has the art of delivery. He was heard to best advantage in the group of songs with piano, and quite deserved the recalls which followed. Mr. Gericks accompanied him at the piano with admirable sympathy and skill.

The fifth concert of the series will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 1.

[95]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1899.

The program for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was:

Overture, Der Freischutz	Weber
Concerto for Violin, No. 5, A minor	Vieuxtemps
Waltzes, op. 39	Brahms
Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.
Symphony, No. 1, D minor	Sinding

Miss Olive Mead was the soloist.

The symphony was performed on this occasion for the first time in Boston. The "Freischütz" overture had been heard here before.

Sinding's work, though wholly in the most advanced modern vein, has at least the merit of clearness. There is in it nothing that perplexes the understanding even on a first hearing. It is, however, not attractive on a brief acquaintance, and is almost phenomenally singular in its barrenness of anything resembling beauty or suggesting grace or tenderness of sentiment. He starts out at a tremendously fiery pace, and scarcely relaxes it for a moment. There is tempest and flood in excess, but little of clear sky and sunshine. The work as a whole is more notable for its sustained wild vigor, its frenzied outbursts of passionateness, its massive, brazen utterances of anger and what may be perhaps aptly called its frank brutality. His hair is dishevelled, his eyes are flashing fire, he holds a lighted torch which he waves frantically aloft, he foams at the mouth and shouts and screams anarchy. There is no simulation in it. All is fair and above board; and from the opening to the close of the symphony there is not even a suggestion of the prevailing tendency of contemporary musical art to seek mere novelty of effect at any sacrifice of the conventionalities.

This persistent turmoil, this excess of fury, without enough of a less boisterous nature to provide necessary contrasts, at length becomes monotonous. Then, too, despite all the excitements, there are dull moments caused by the unrelieved burliness characteristic of the work as a whole; but one is not soothed to slumber by them, or if one be it is not for long. The noise would not admit of that. And yet the symphony is not without a certain impressive nobility of spirit. It even charms in some inexplicable way. It seizes you with a firm hold, and, struggle as you may, it carries you irresistibly along with it. When it is all over you breathe more freely, and strangely enough, your sense of relief is mingled with respect. Curious music this.

A tremendously spirited presentation of the work was given, but the audience was not moved to more than perfunctorily complimentary plaudits.

Mr. Gericke's orchestration of the Brahms waltzes shows the hand of a skilled and experienced musician. It is rich, discreet and thoroughly charming in effect. With the exception of some two or three of the fourteen waltzes performed, the music is not very exhilarating, and the quality of their blithesomeness is of an order well calculated to eclipse the gaiety of nations. The performance was exquisite in grace and finish, and the applause that rewarded Mr. Gericke was cordial and prolonged.

The tryingly difficult Vieuxtemps Concerto was admirably played by Miss Mead. The young artist's style is broad and intelligent, her technic brilliant, her musical feeling sincere, her tone large and pure, and she plays with masculine energy and an ardor and a confidence worthy a more mature and more experienced artist.

* * *

EMIL SAUER, PIANIST.

In Salon Music and as a Salon Player He Awakened Great Enthusiasm at the Twelfth Symphony Concert Last Evening, in Music Hall.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, at Music Hall, last evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 31, in D major, Parisian,"	Mozart
Concerto in F minor	Henselt
Mr. Sauer.
First Movement of Symphony in D minor, Op. 7	F. S. Converse
(First time.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner

Either one of the allegros of Mozart's Parisian symphony might serve as an overture to a theatre comedy. It would put the audience in good spirits; and rustling, and half-smothered laughter, and whispering in the ear of beauty would work the music no serious harm. The andantino is hopelessly weak and dull; it is old-fashioned without any charm of quaintness.

* * *

Mr. Frederick S. Converse was born in Newton, and he began his studies there and in Boston and Cambridge. Then, like a good New Englander, he went to Munich to enjoy the advice of Papa Rheinberger. (I wish that he had stopped for a year or two in Paris or Brussels on his way home.)

The symphony, of which the first movement was played last night, was performed at the Munich Hoch-Schule, July 14, 1898—I quote from the program-book—when the composer was 27 years old. I should like to hear the whole work; such a hearing would be fairer to Mr. Converse.

There are good things in this allegro, and there are things that show too plainly the cramping influence of the music school. First of all there is a "go" to the allegro that is the delightful enthusiasm of youth. The first theme is announced frankly, and while it is not of striking originality, yet it makes its way effectively, and it has character, irrespective of fitness or unfitness for development. This opening is one of the best portions of the work. I do not care so much for the introduction of the second theme or the orchestral manner in which it is ushered in. There is a serious disturbance of the flow of thought without any recompensing effect. Soon comes a strong reminder of "Carmen"—a melodic and harmonic reminder of an impassioned and extremely characteristic denunciation thrown by Don José at the woman who is tired of him. Do not misunderstand me; I do not for a moment accuse Mr. Converse of conscious imitation. Technically the allegro shows native ingenuity and faithful study. The composer has a distinct calling, and he has a right to ask for criticism and applause. He naturally wrote this work, standing in awe of the Faculty, heeding professorial teaching and admonition. Now that he is away from the school, I hope that he will speak more freely and in more modern language. The chief objections that may be brought against this allegro are lack of contrast in orchestration and too much respect for the minutiae and the iteration of development. Practice and the study of works by French and Russian composers will assist Mr. Converse in orchestral expression—would that we could hear these works more frequently! And the very care exercised in a mastery of development according to Rheinberger will give freedom in fancy, provided the tools at hand are used by one that wishes to work after his own pattern and not merely to follow approved and orthodox models.

* * *

Mr. Emil Sauer made his first appearance in this city. The verdict of the audience was overwhelmingly in his favor. Enthusiasm was at its height. Now that the shouting has died away, let us calmly discuss Mr. Sauer.

He chose a concerto that once enjoyed the doubtful reputation of being the most difficult work in piano literature. Today technic is as free as grace, and this concerto no longer stuns or dismays on account of mechanical devices. To me the concerto is an abominable specimen of salon music. The elegance is thin veneer. Emotion is sentimentalism. The waltz in the finale would be vulgar in a comic opera of the tailor-made variety.

To say that Mr. Sauer gave a most admirable performance of this wax-flower and patchouli music is not the tribute that a great pianist should crave.

It would be foolish and false to deny his just claims. His playing is characterized by true strength and exquisite polish. His repose, his authority, are admirable, remarkable. His touch in cantabile seems dry—but touch is not wholly the affair of the pianist. In this respect he can be limited, yes, he is sometimes hampered. But in rapid passages, in octaves and arpeggios, in arabesques, in lace work, Mr. Sauer justly excites the liveliest approbation.

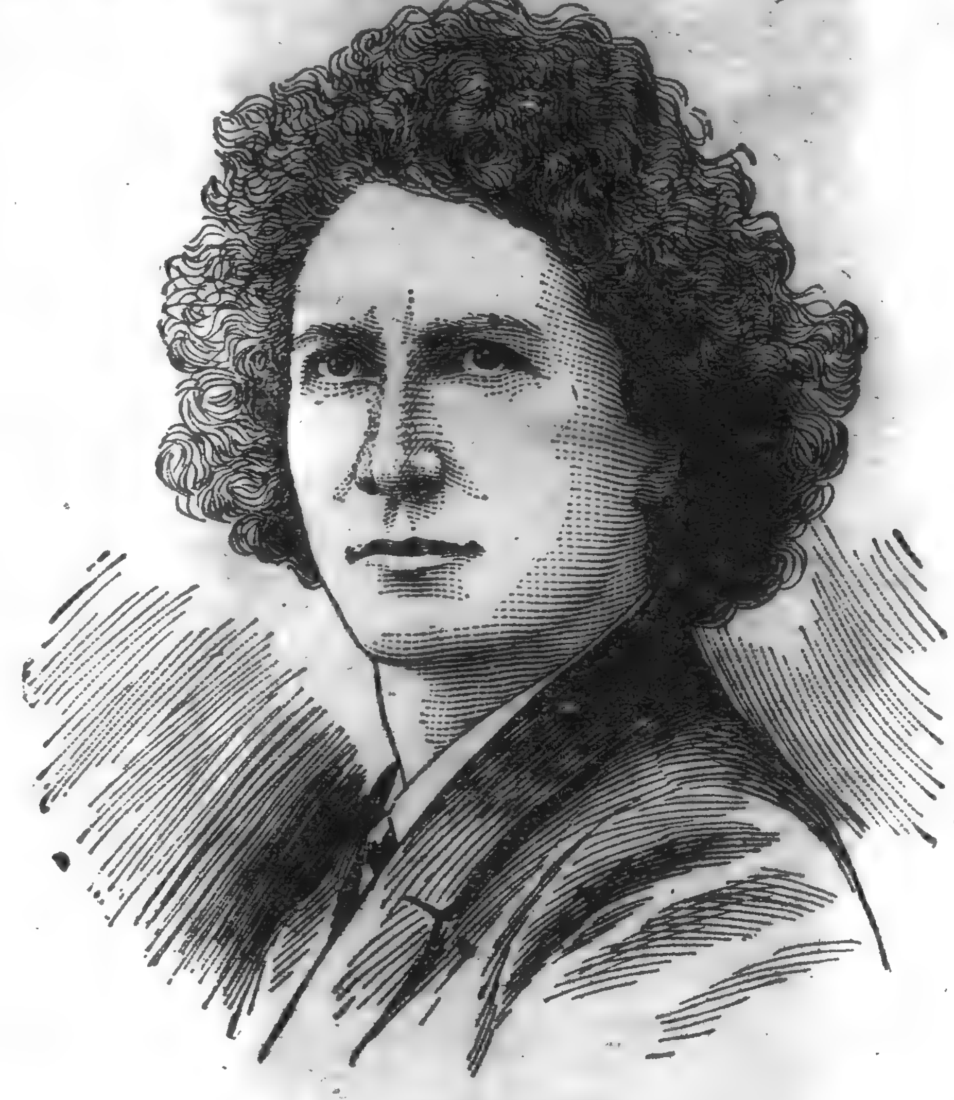
It would be interesting to know how much his personality contributed to his success last night. Truly is he a wondrous apparition! 'Tis a strange face, worthy of study; a face not wholly pleasing. Nor is it impertinent to ask if his success would have been instantaneous, if he had appeared without his Absalomic hair, if he had come upon the stage with a close crop.

The applause was so imperious that Mr. Sauer violated a rule of the Symphony Orchestra, as did de Pachmann and Sauret on former occasions. He gave an encore number—theme and variations by Schubert-Tausig, I am told; for I do not know the long-winded piece. I am sorry that he broke this reasonable rule, for a symphony concert should not be turned into a piano recital. At the same time the delicacy of his technic, as well as his quiet authority and absolute sureness, were again in evidence.

But not once last evening did Mr. Sauer put his fingers on the heart. Not once did he cause me to forget the dreary hall, the large audience, the properly dressed orchestra and conductor. It is true that the pieces he chose are without appeal to any emotion. The dominating thought that followed his performance was the thought of extreme elegance—a quality which is desirable and all that, but one that is not the distinguishing characteristic of a truly great pianist.

Mr. Sauer then stands revealed at present as a salon player of the very first rank. Let us hope that his performance at the recital this week, when the program will test him in many ways, will prove him to be more than a rarely accomplished salon-player.

Philip Hale.



EMIL SAUER,

NOTES.

There will be no Symphony rehearsal or concert this week. The program of Jan. 27-28 will include Tschaikowsky's fantaisie-ouverture "Romeo and Juliet;" selections from Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung;" Schumann's symphony No. 3. Mr. Evan Williams, tenor, will sing two arias.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 15, 1899.

Sauer at the Symphony.

The feature of the 12th symphony program was the first appearance in this city of the German pianist Emil Sauer, whose fulsome advance heralding had aroused great curiosity as to the real position the artist occupied in the musical world, for the preliminary notices sent for publication rather overshadowed in effusive praise the eminations usually received from interested managers and their nonconservative associates. It may be frankly stated at once, though, that Sauer needs no such undignified methods in his behalf, for his art is so wonderful and his accomplishments so brilliant that it is an insult to the man to "boom" him in the style of a freak or museum curio. Sauer has peculiarities, and few geniuses are without some odd traits of character, but his oddities seem to be perfectly natural to the man, and not to be affectations. His hair is long and circles his head like a halo, he is attenuated in form, modest in demeanor, tall and rather ungraceful. But the man is soon forgotten in admiration for the artist.

He chose Henselt's F minor concerto as one of the selections for his debut in New York earlier in the week, and the same piece was used here. The author was a celebrated pianist in the first half of the present century, and the composition is specially noticeable for the fullness and elaborateness of the piano part in which technical difficulties abound in profusion. The composition contains more of elaboration than inspiration, as if the composer had constructed complications in fingering for his own amusement and for the discomfiture of fellow artists.

Sauer's technical gifts and control of finger evidently is equal to any pianist who has been heard here in many years. His touch is sure, whether in pianissimo or fortissimo passages, either single, in chords or in octaves. He colors his tones beautifully, and his whole exhibition showed masterly powers as a virtuoso who strives to give the effects intended by the composer, and not to interpose the individual at the expense of the author's ideas.

As the artist is announced to give a concert in this city next Friday, and a better judgment of his skill can be formed from listening to his interpretations of works by different authors, there is no need to give a detailed description of Sauer's symphony performance. There are no striking contrasts in the concerto, and the performance, although masterly in the extreme and probably not to be excelled by any living pianist evidently did not give the auditors a chance to judge of the full powers possessed by this splendid artist. His reception was quite cordial, but at the close of his performance the applause was tumultuous, recall following recall many times, indicating that he had gained a triumph by artistic merit.

The orchestra played admirably throughout the concert. A pleasing feature of the program was the performance of a movement from the D minor symphony written by Mr F. S. Converse of Newton, Mass, a graduate from Harvard. The young composer has written a very commendable work, and there is much originality shown in his treatment of the opening passage work given to different instruments, against which he introduces a background of staccato chords in the basses and trombones. The conclusion theme is also worthy of mention for its clever combinations of the earlier phases. It is to be hoped that the full symphony will be given, and then a better opinion can be gained of the whole work and the composer's abilities.

The other numbers on the program were Mozart's melodious "Parisian" symphony, which was played with the greatest delicacy, vivacity and sympathy, and the "Flying Dutchman" overture, effective and dignified in treatment and as a whole splendidly interpreted.

The concerts will be omitted this week. Mr Evan Williams will be the soloist at the next concert, and the instrumental selections will comprise the overture from "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," Wagner, and Schumann's third symphony.

—A meeting of the stockholders of the New Music hall association was held Wednesday, and the action requested by the directors was taken without even an intimation that the plan of the directors, as informally presented through the press, for a simple Music hall, without provision for the performance of opera, was distasteful to any stockholder. Those present were Maj Henry L. Higginson, Messrs Charles E. Cotting, W. S. Bigelow, Edward W. Hooper, E. Pierson Beebe, C. P. Curtis, Henry S. Grew, F. H. Beebe, Henry F. Sears, John Ritchie, W. L. Parker, H. C. Richards, Henry Pickering and William Caleb Loring.

—Mr E. Pierson Beebe, the treasurer, gratefully acknowledges additional subscriptions from and donations to the industrial school for Crippled and Deformed Children: Messrs Robert Codman, Frederick Guild, Mrs Francis Cabot, Mr Edward I. Browne, Mrs R. C. Heaton, Miss S. E. Smith, Mrs E. G. Cutler, Miss E. Hammond, Mrs G. N. Talbot, Mrs S. R. Anthony, Mrs C. T. Lovering, Mrs J. C. Inches, Mrs J. A. Phipps, Miss Mary Whitney, Miss A. L. Storrs, Mrs Susan G. Page, Hon Roger Wolcott, Mr Jacob H. Hecht, Miss C. T. Endicott, Mr A. Shuman, Mrs W. K. Sears, Mrs E. B. Bryant, Miss E. E. Beebe, Mr Louis Curtis, Miss G. G. Cowing, Mr Joseph S. Bigelow, Mr Albert S. Bigelow, Mrs A. P. Gardner, Mrs J. McGrath, Mrs J. E. Lodge, Mr Charles L. Young, Mrs Jacob Pfaff, Mrs Thomas P. Beal, Mrs Otis Shepard, Mr T. C. Hollander, Mrs Bryce Allan, Mrs D. D. Addison, Mrs William S. Tilson, Mrs F. C. Manning, Mrs D. D. Slade and Miss Annie Lyman. It is desired to increase the industrial facilities of the school and further subscriptions will be appreciated.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1899.

The program for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was:

Overture, Der Freischutz	Weber
Concerto for Violin, No. 5, A minor	Vieuxtemps
Waltzes, op. 39 Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.	Brahms
Symphony, No. 1, D minor	Sinding

Miss Olive Mead was the soloist.

The symphony was performed on this occasion for the first time in Boston. The "Freischütz" overture had been heard here before.

Sinding's work, though wholly in the most advanced modern vein, has at least the merit of clearness. There is in it nothing that perplexes the understanding even on a first hearing. It is, however, not attractive on a brief acquaintance, and is almost phenomenally singular in its barrenness of anything resembling beauty or suggesting grace or tenderness of sentiment. He starts out at a tremendously fiery pace, and scarcely relaxes it for a moment. There is tempest and flood in excess, but little of clear sky and sunshine. The work as a whole is more notable for its sustained wild vigor, its frenzied outbursts of passionateness, its massive, brazen utterances of anger and what may be perhaps aptly called its frank brutality. His hair is dishevelled, his eyes are flashing fire, he holds a lighted torch which he waves frantically aloft, he foams at the mouth and shouts and screams anarchy. There is no simulation in it. All is fair and above board; and from the opening to the close of the symphony there is not even a suggestion of the prevailing tendency of contemporary musical art to seek mere novelty of effect at any sacrifice of the conventionalities.

This persistent turmoil, this excess of fury, without enough of a less boisterous nature to provide necessary contrasts, at length becomes monotonous. Then, too, despite all the excitements, there are dull moments caused by the unrelieved burliness characteristic of the work as a whole; but one is not soothed to slumber by them, or if one be it is not for long. The noise would not admit of that. And yet the symphony is not without a certain impressive nobility of spirit. It even charms in some inexplicable way. It seizes you with a firm hold, and, struggle as you may, it carries you irresistibly along with it. When it is all over you breathe more freely, and strangely enough, your sense of relief is mingled with respect. Curious music this.

A tremendously spirited presentation of the work was given, but the audience was not moved to more than perfunctorily complimentary plaudits.

Mr. Gericke's orchestration of the Brahms waltzes shows the hand of a skilled and experienced musician. It is rich, discreet and thoroughly charming in effect. With the exception of some two or three of the fourteen waltzes performed, the music is not very exhilarating, and the quality of their blithesomeness is of an order well calculated to eclipse the gaiety of nations. The performance was exquisite in grace and finish, and the applause that rewarded Mr. Gericke was cordial and prolonged.

The tryingly difficult Vieuxtemps Concerto was admirably played by Miss Mead. The young artist's style is broad and intelligent, her technic brilliant, her musical feeling sincere, her tone large and pure, and she plays with masculine energy and an ardor and a confidence worthy a more mature and more experienced artist.

* * *

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL—JANUARY 15, 1

EMIL SAUER, PIANIST.

In Salon Music and as a Salon Player He Awakened Great Enthusiasm at the Twelfth Symphony Concert Last Evening, in Music Hall.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, at Music Hall, last evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 31, in D major, Parisian,"	Mozart
Concerto in F minor Mr. Sauer.	Henselt
First Movement of Symphony in D minor, Op. 7 (First time.)	F. S. Converse
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner

Either one of the allegros of Mozart's Parisian symphony might serve as an overture to a theatre comedy. It would put the audience in good spirits; and rustling, and half-smothered laughter, and whispering in the ear of beauty would work the music no serious harm. The andantino is hopelessly weak and dull; it is old-fashioned without any charm of quaintness.

* * *

Mr. Frederick S. Converse was born in Newton, and he began his studies there and in Boston and Cambridge. Then, like a good New Englander, he went to Munich to enjoy the advice of Papa Rheinberger. (I wish that he had stopped for a year or two in Paris or Brussels on his way home.)

The symphony, of which the first movement was played last night, was performed at the Munich Hoch-Schule, July 14, 1898—I quote from the program-book—when the composer was 27 years old. I should like to hear the whole work; such a hearing would be fairer to Mr. Converse.

There are good things in this allegro, and there are things that show too plainly the cramping influence of the music school. First of all there is a "go" to the allegro that is the delightful enthusiasm of youth. The first theme is announced frankly, and while it is not of striking originality, yet it makes its way effectively, and it has character, irrespective of fitness or unfitness for development. This opening is one of the best portions of the work. I do not care so much for the introduction of the second theme or the orchestral manner in which it is ushered in. There is a serious disturbance of the flow of thought without any recompensing effect. Soon comes a strong reminder of "Carmen"—a melodic and harmonic reminder of an impassioned and extremely characteristic denunciation thrown by Don José at the woman who is tired of him. Do not misunderstand me: I do not for a moment accuse Mr. Converse of conscious imitation. Technically the allegro shows native ingenuity and faithful study. The composer has a distinct calling, and he has a right to ask for criticism and applause. He naturally wrote this work, standing in awe of the Faculty, heeding professorial teaching and admonition. Now that he is away from the school, I hope that he will speak more freely and in more modern language. The chief objections that may be brought against this allegro are lack of contrast in orchestration and too much respect for the minutiae and the iteration of development. Practice and the study of works by French and Russian composers will assist Mr. Converse in orchestral expression—would that we could hear these works more frequently! And the very care exercised in a mastery of development according to Rheinberger will give freedom in fancy, provided the tools at hand are used by one that wishes to work after his own pattern and not merely to follow approved and orthodox models.

***

Mr. Emil Sauer made his first appearance in this city. The verdict of the audience was overwhelmingly in his favor. Enthusiasm was at its height. Now that the shouting has died away, let us calmly discuss Mr. Sauer.

He chose a concerto that once enjoyed the doubtful reputation of being the most difficult work in piano literature. Today technic is as free as grace, and this concerto no longer stuns or dismays on account of mechanical devices. To me the concerto is an abominable specimen of salon music. The elegance is thin veneer. Emotion is sentimentalism. The waltz in the finale would be vulgar in a comic opera of the tailor-made variety.

To say that Mr. Sauer gave a most admirable performance of this wax-flower and patchouli music is not the tribute that a great pianist should crave.

It would be foolish and false to deny his just claims. His playing is characterized by true strength and exquisite polish. His repose, his authority, are admirable, remarkable. His touch in cantabile seems dry—but touch is not wholly the affair of the pianist. In this respect he can be limited, yes, he is sometimes hampered. But in rapid passages, in octaves and arpeggios, in arabesques, in lace work, Mr. Sauer justly excites the liveliest approbation.

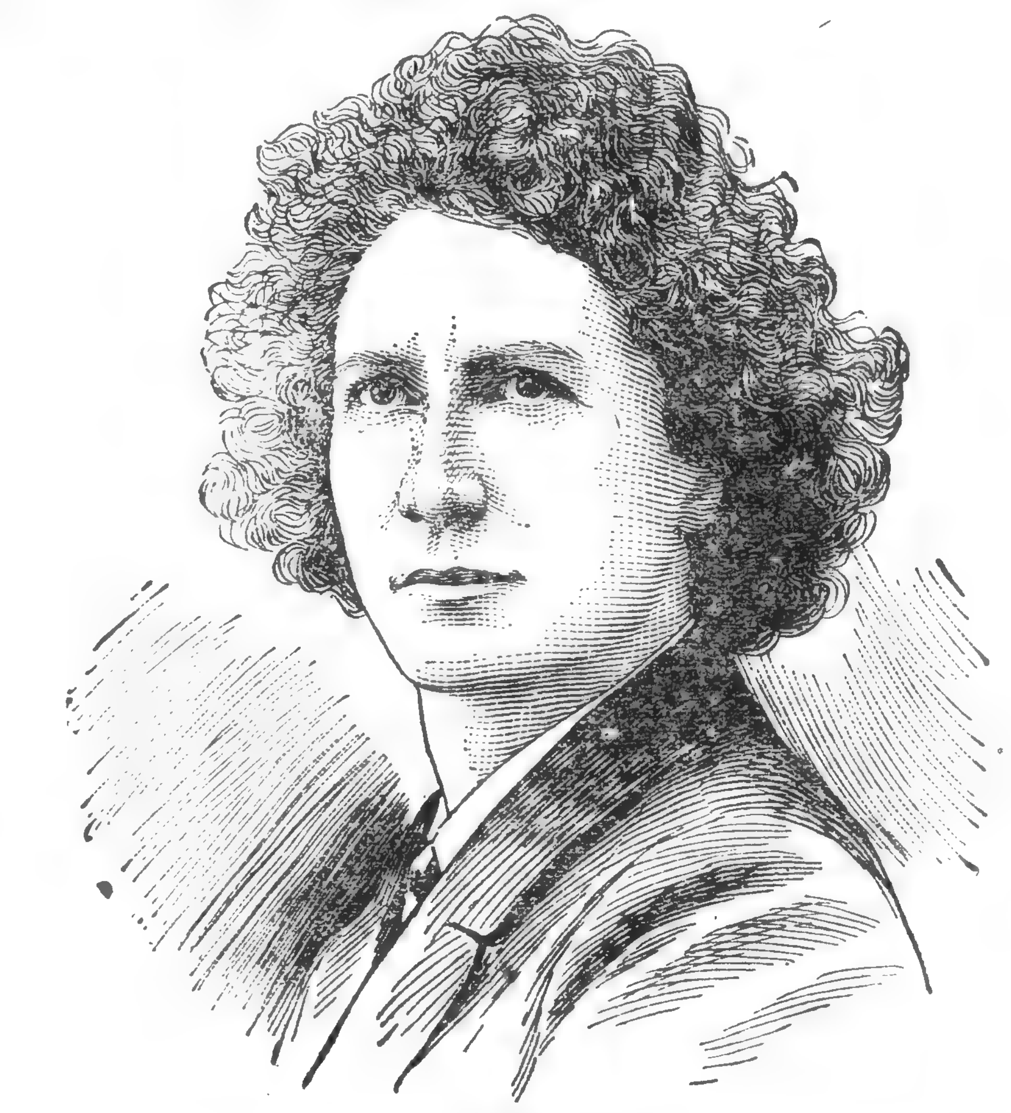
It would be interesting to know how much his personality contributed to his success last night. Truly is he a wondrous apparition! 'Tis a strange face, worthy of study; a face not wholly pleasing. Nor is it impertinent to ask if his success would have been instantaneous, if he had appeared without his Absalomic hair, if he had come upon the stage with a close crop.

The applause was so imperious that Mr. Sauer violated a rule of the Symphony Orchestra, as did de Pachmann and Sauret on former occasions. He gave an encore number—theme and variations by Schubert-Tausig, I am told; for I do not know the long-winded piece. I am sorry that he broke this reasonable rule, for a symphony concert should not be turned into a piano recital. At the same time the delicacy of his technic, as well as his quiet authority and absolute sureness, were again in evidence.

But not once last evening did Mr. Sauer put his fingers on the heart. Not once did he cause me to forget the dreary hall, the large audience, the properly dressed orchestra and conductor. It is true that the pieces he chose are without appeal to any emotion. The dominating thought that followed his performance was the thought of extreme elegance—a quality which is desirable and all that, but one that is not the distinguishing characteristic of a truly great pianist.

Mr. Sauer then stands revealed at present as a salon player of the very first rank. Let us hope that his performance at the recital this week, when the program will test him in many ways, will prove him to be more than a rarely accomplished salon-player.

Philip Hale.



EMIL SAUER,

NOTES.

There will be no Symphony rehearsal or concert this week. The program of Jan. 27-28 will include Tschaikowsky's fantaisie-ouverture "Romeo and Juliet;" selections from Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung;" Schumann's symphony No. 3. Mr. Evan Williams, tenor, will sing two arias.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 15, 1899.

Sauer at the Symphony.

The feature of the 12th symphony program was the first appearance in this city of the German pianist Emil Sauer, whose fulsome advance heralding had aroused great curiosity as to the real position the artist occupied in the musical world, for the preliminary notices sent for publication rather overshadowed in effusive praise the eminations usually received from interested managers and their nonconservative associates. It may be frankly stated at once, though, that Sauer needs no such undignified methods in his behalf, for his art is so wonderful and his accomplishments so brilliant that it is an insult to the man to "boom" him in the style of a freak or museum curio. Sauer has peculiarities, and few geniuses are without some odd traits of character, but his oddities seem to be perfectly natural to the man, and not to be affectations. His hair is long and circles his head like a halo, he is attenuated in form, modest in demeanor, tall and rather ungraceful. But the man is soon forgotten in admiration for the artist.

He chose Henselt's F minor concerto as one of the selections for his debut in New York earlier in the week, and the same piece was used here. The author was a celebrated pianist in the first half of the present century, and the composition is specially noticeable for the fullness and elaborateness of the piano part in which technical difficulties abound in profusion. The composition contains more of elaboration than inspiration, as if the composer had constructed complications in fingering for his own amusement and for the discomfiture of fellow artists.

Sauer's technical gifts and control of finger evidently is equal to any pianist who has been heard here in many years. His touch is sure, whether in pianissimo or fortissimo passages, either single, in chords or in octaves. He colors his tones beautifully, and his whole exhibition showed masterly powers as a virtuoso who strives to give the effects intended by the composer, and not to interpose the individual at the expense of the author's ideas.

As the artist is announced to give a concert in this city next Friday, and a better judgment of his skill can be formed from listening to his interpretations of works by different authors, there is no need to give a detailed description of Sauer's symphony performance. There are no striking contrasts in the concerto, and the performance, although masterly in the extreme and probably not to be excelled by any living pianist evidently did not give the auditors a chance to judge of the full powers possessed by this splendid artist. His reception was quite cordial, but at the close of his performance the applause was tumultuous, recall following recall many times, indicating that he had gained a triumph by artistic merit.

The orchestra played admirably throughout the concert. A pleasing feature of the program was the performance of a movement from the D minor symphony written by Mr F. S. Converse of Newton, Mass, a graduate from Harvard. The young composer has written a very commendable work, and there is much originality shown in his treatment of the opening passage work given to different instruments, against which he introduces a background of staccato chords in the basses and trombones. The conclusion theme is also worthy of mention for its clever combinations of the earlier phases. It is to be hoped that the full symphony will be given, and then a better opinion can be gained of the whole work and the composer's abilities.

The other numbers on the program were Mozart's melodious "Parisian" symphony, which was played with the greatest delicacy, vivacity and sympathy, and the "Flying Dutchman" overture, effective and dignified in treatment and as a whole splendidly interpreted.

The concerts will be omitted this week. Mr Evan Williams will be the soloist at the next concert, and the instrumental selections will comprise the overture from "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," Wagner, and Schumann's third symphony.

—A meeting of the stockholders of the New Music hall association was held Wednesday, and the action requested by the directors was taken without even an intimation that the plan of the directors, as informally presented through the press, for a simple Music hall, without provision for the performance of opera, was distasteful to any stockholder. Those present were Maj Henry L. Higginson, Messrs Charles E. Cotting, W. S. Bigelow, Edward W. Hooper, E. Pierson Beebe, C. P. Curtis, Henry S. Grew, F. H. Beebe, Henry F. Sears, John Ritchie, W. L. Parker, H. C. Richards, Henry Pickering and William Caleb Loring.

—Mr E. Pierson Beebe, the treasurer, gratefully acknowledges additional subscriptions from and donations to the industrial school for Crippled and Deformed Children: Messrs Robert Codman, Frederick Guild, Mrs Francis Cabot, Mr Edward I. Browne, Mrs R. C. Heaton, Miss S. E. Smith, Mrs E. G. Cutler, Miss E. Hammond, Mrs G. N. Talbot, Mrs S. R. Anthony, Mrs C. T. Lovering, Mrs J. C. Inches, Mrs J. A. Phipps, Miss Mary Whitney, Miss A. L. Storrs, Mrs Susan G. Page, Hon Roger Wolcott, Mr Jacob H. Hecht, Miss C. T. Endicott, Mr A. Shuman, Mrs W. K. Sears, Mrs E. B. Bryant, Miss E. E. Beebe, Mr Louis Curtis, Miss G. G. Cowing, Mr Joseph S. Bigelow, Mr Albert S. Bigelow, Mrs A. P. Gardner, Mrs J. McGrath, Mrs J. E. Lodge, Mr Charles L. Young, Mrs Jacob Pfaff, Mrs Thomas P. Beal, Mrs Otis Shepard, Mr T. C. Hollander, Mrs Bryce Allan, Mrs D. D. Addison, Mrs William S. Tilson, Mrs F. C. Manning, Mrs D. D. Slade and Miss Annie Lyman. It is desired to increase the industrial facilities of the school and further subscriptions will be appreciated.

DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1899.

Emil Sauer as Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

The unusually large crowd which gathered in Music Hall showed that even the unpleasant weather conditions had no effect upon the music lovers of this section on such an event as that of Saturday evening. The crowds of patient waiters in the outside aisles were in themselves a tribute to Mr. Sauer's fame, for it was plain that the soloist was the chief attraction. Yet the other features of the programme were also well worthy of consideration.

The concert began with Mozart's dainty "Parisian symphony" in D major. Then came the first movement of a new symphony by a local composer. Then the brilliant Henselt concerto in F minor, with Emil Sauer at the keyboard, and the Wagner overture, "The Flying Dutchman," continued and ended the "fireworks." A Tausig arrangement of one of Schubert's themes was given by Mr. Sauer after frenzied recalls.

Of the Parisian symphony, it could hardly be said that it had the charm of novelty to Symphony audiences. It was given more than a decade ago, and again about five years later, and afterwards under Mr. Paur in 1895.

As was the case with the Flying Dutchman overture, there was an opportunity to compare the work of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's two successors—and predecessors—if anyone had been inclined to indulge in that delicate task. The kindly and amiable critic, however, without much pangs of conscience, may leave that task to the more sanguinary brothers of his profession with perfect safety to Mr. Gericke's fame.

The delicacy and quaint prettiness of the symphony, it may be remarked, were given with rare and admirable fidelity. The composition suited the people for whom it was written.

Wolfgang Mozart had a kindly feeling towards the Parisians, who had hailed him delightedly as an infant prodigy earlier in his meteoric career. So, when he scribbled off this symphony for a people who delighted in Watteau and Greuze, and who had not developed their sterner demands for David and the realistic exhibition of death struggles at the place of the guillotine), he did exactly what he aimed to do—hit the popular taste. This daintiness, this artificial but delicate prettiness, were almost perfectly presented by the orchestra. The orchestration of the Wagner overture was also nearly faultless.

Of Mr. Converse's symphony, but the first movement was given. This is not too ambitious for a first public attempt in that direction. The orchestration had some decidedly attractive features. It impressed one generally as the work of a hard student, who had devoted so much time to a study of the best composers, that he had no distinctive style of his own. The symphony seemed to have been evolved from that study, but much taste and discrimination seemed apparent in the process of natural selection. Still, the fault is one from which even more ambitious or self-assertive American composers than Mr. Converse have not managed to escape.

The audience was evidently pleased, and there was some inclination apparent to call the composer to the front by persistent applause. Mr. Converse modestly and wisely declined to show himself, and Mr. Sauer, his forest of hair nodding graciously above him like an Olympian nimbus, came forward instead.

If Saturday night was to have been the only occasion for Mr. Sauer's appearance in this city, there would have been grounds for grievous complaint. A pianist of his European reputation could afford to be judged in something better than Henselt's concerto, although some pianists at Symphony concerts in this city have failed partly or wholly in that very test. Still, the Henselt concerto, while showing the intellectual side of a pianist and putting him through his technical paces to a wonderful degree, does not call for the deepest and most thoroughly artistic work of the true musician.

In technic Mr. Sauer is really wonderful, but so are certain other well known pianists. His finger-work is about as rapid as the changes of a kinetoscope picture, so that the twinkling rapidity of movement almost tires the eye.

One specially noteworthy feature of Mr. Sauer's playing is his arm-work, in contrast to the wrist or finger-work. While Henselt's concerto does not call for much sledge-hammer key-driving, there are certain accented notes that demand special force in fore-arm work; and the clearness and vigor of Mr. Sauer's playing in such passages certainly were of a kind superior to those of most of his predecessors in this city. If this were his only showing, however, there would not be much more to be said. He is a pianist of marvellous technic; but the world does not often feel the lack of such players. Each generation produces a number of such showy performers.

This is not Mr. Sauer's last word, however. He has another recital this week. Possibly on his second appearance he may display more power to appeal to something besides the intellect, the eye or the ear. The real, human pathos of genuine and showy emotion, as expressed by the soul of the artist, remain to be heard. Judgment may be suspended in the interval.

The unwritten rule of the Symphony was broken by the allowance of a concert number not on the programme. It displayed no new qualities of the pianist, and therefore was wholly unnecessary. If the "encore fiend" is to exercise a sway at the Symphony concerts as well as at his chosen field of comic opera, there will be reason to regret the innovation. Mr. Sauer showed his absolute physical command of the piano; but as he had already shown that in the efflorescent Henselt concerto, where was the need of prolonging the programme, especially as the Wagner overture was to follow with equally spectacular impression? The result was certain to be cloying.

That Mr. Sauer captured his audience by his show of a virtual mastery of all the difficulties of technic was plain enough, whatever comment each individual may wish to make on the fact. If technic were the highest quality to be sought in a master, his pre-eminence among living pianists could not possibly be admitted—although even that is not to be asserted positively. He is, at all events, a marvellous player and his personal characteristics and mannerisms, although appealing to the sense of the humorous at first, probably do something to heighten the effect of his brilliant and wonderful work at the keyboard.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 15.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 15, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sauer Makes an Instantaneous Capture of the Audience.

The Pianist a Splendid Master of Technique—A Symphony by Mozart and the First Movement of Mr. Converse's Symphony in D Minor Are Given.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening presented this programme:

Symphony, "Parisian" ....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, F minor......Henselt
First movement from symphony, D minor..
F. S. Converse
First time.
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"....Wagner

Mr. Emil Sauer was the soloist.

The "Parisian" symphony is so called because it was written in Paris for the opening of the Concert Spirituel. It is numbered in the latest edition of Mozart's works as the 31st symphony, and in Koechel's catalogue as opus 297. The inference is that by the time the composer had reached the age of 22 he had produced 31 symphonies, which hardly seems probable. However, it is to be presumed that this numbering has been carefully studied, and is therefore reliable.

Whatever may be the facts in this regard, the work is delightful in its sustained sparkle, its simplicity, its exquisite workmanship and its gayety of spirit, and is always heard with pleasure, especially when it receives such a sympathetic and charming interpretation as was accorded it last evening.

Mr. Converse is a young American musician, who has evidently studied seriously and ardently, both at home and abroad, and only a few months ago graduated from the Hoch-Schule in Munich, where he had studied under Rheinberger.

The first movement of his symphony, in D minor, is creditable to him in every way. Its themes are strongly marked and well contrasted, and, though it is in the advanced modern school, it is never vague nor ugly. The orchestration is clear, solid and admirable in its variety of tone color; the music flows freely, and the whole movement is notable for the vigor with which its animation is sustained.

There is in it, perhaps, overmuch of repetitions of which the purpose is not quite plain on a first hearing, and the composer does not as yet seem to stand firmly on his own feet in regard to individuality, and wanders from Mendelssohn to Schumann and thence to Brahms, while the shadow of Rheinberger is over it all; but it is unquestionable that his talent is of a high order, and, judging by the fine qualities that came constantly to the surface in his music, it is no less certain that he must make his mark in his art. In this allegro there is nothing of extravagance, nothing of posing for effect, nothing of the prevailing fanaticism of sacrificial offering to the idol of orchestration.

The work was splendidly played, and the stormy applause that followed was prolonged in the hope of bringing the composer forward, but it was not fulfilled.

A fiery and gorgeously colored performance of the Wagner overture brought the concert to a fitting close.

Mr. Sauer had been so industriously exploited by his manager, so many extraordinary stories had been circulated regarding him in order to stimulate public attention in his direction, that it is no wonder that interest to see and to hear him was at fever heat, and the result was an enormous audience.

When, however, there appeared a slightly-built, unobtrusive man, with nothing to distinguish him particularly from the usual run of men, except the length and volume of his hair, and its tendency to stand on end as if it were electrified, there was something of surprise. He took his place quietly at the piano, scarcely looking at the audience, and sat with his back to it through his entire performance of the concerto.

His choice of the Henselt work was not a happy one for a debut. It is simply a show piece, a species of sublimated salon music, and it has aged considerably and become somewhat dull and conventional since it first saw the light and was accorded a foremost place among the great concertos. Musically it is of slight interest and its difficulties, still great as they may be, have been surpassed by more modern efforts in kind.

There is a pretty slow movement, abundant in graceful embroidery and sugary sentiment, and a dashing finale that coys fluently with waltz-like themes that escape vulgarity by the skin of their teeth. It is hardly a work whose performance, no heed how admirable it may be, upon which to base a satisfying judgment of an artist's powers, especially when it is an artist pronounced among the greatest in his art, and who is heard for the first time.

Of Mr. Sauer's technique, too much cannot be said in the way of admiration. There is a glut of pianoforte technique, and the highest is now expected of pianists, and it no longer excites wonder. It is granted that Mr. Sauer need not fear comparison on this ground with the most brilliantly able of his predecessors here.

He has an exquisitely musical touch, and in the easy freedom, the cleverness, the precision, the smoothness and the elegance of his playing his superior has not been heard in Boston. His tone is a little hard and dry sometimes, but it is doubtful if that fault is wholly attributable to him. His runs are wonderful in their evenness, his control over pianoforte dynamics is perfect, and in all that he did there was a fairly fascinating refinement.

He does not overtax the instrument; his forte passages are not characterized by pounding and thumping; the movement of his hands is delightful to watch; his crescendos and diminuendos are beautiful, and his sentiment is free from sentimentalism. Through the whole work, polish, grace and delicacy were exemplified at their best.

[illegible] intellectuality, was wanting; but [illegible] did not admit of an illustration of these qualities. There was nothing for the artist to do but to play it in the salon style, and of this style he made it fully clear he is a master of the first order. A more favorable opportunity of learning his artistic worth in a larger and nobler field will be presented at his recital of this week. His effect on his audience was tremendous.

He was recalled with a delirious frenzy some seven or eight times, until at length he returned to the piano and played Tausig's transcription of Schubert's theme and variations, with a repetition of the incomparable elegance and perfection of finger mechanism that so delightfully distinguished his previous effort. No more instantaneous and overwhelming capture of a Symphony audience has ever been made.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; selection from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdaemmerung," Wagner; Symphony No. 3, Schumann. Mr. Evan Williams is to be the soloist and will sing two arias.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 15, 1899.

It may be easy enough to "know Hercules by his foot," but it is not always so simple a matter to declare the might of an artist from one single manifestation——especially if the claim be made for him that he is the greatest in the world. But it is safe and sure, after even only one hearing of only one concerto, to say that Mr. Emil Sauer, who made his Boston debut in the twelfth Symphony programme stands at least among the few very great living pianists. For our own part we should not like to declare for any man as the one greatest; because there is just enough differentiation among the front-rank men to make each superior in some one quality, characteristic or detail, while all are virtually peers in technique and virtuosity. Mr. Sauer played that immensely difficult and not often heard F-minor concerto of Henselt, opus 16. Not abstractly so much more difficult than many works of later composition; but difficult because it belongs to a manner which Henselt adapted to himself and developed for himself, and which therefore requires not only some unusual physical fitness, but great and arduous training along lines which nowadays are not followed so far or so vigorously. For beside a mastery of all the usual graces, powers and varieties of manner which marked the schools prior to Henselt or have come into being since his day, the player of his music must have a practically unlimited command of great octave sweeps and of the most massive harmonies distributed into arpeggios which must be rendered almost as if they were but immensely extended chords. This unusual command Mr. Sauer displayed unhesitatingly, and absolutely, until he swept the whole keyboard as the harp is swayed. All other gifts and achievements of pianism appeared to be his, and he evoked sonority without clangor and delicacy without affectation. Of the full range of his taste, sentiment and force it will not be possible to judge until he shall be heard in a various programme at his own initial concert next week, although it is certain that he has much more than virtuosity to give his listeners. One thing certainly may be said of him now: That few players upon any instrument can convey a stronger impression than he of the personal equation contributed to an artistic result, or make the hearer feel more sympathetically the enthusiasm, the glow, the earnestness, the purpose poured into the accomplished work. As Sauer ended each movement, one felt that he meant every note of it, and the many eager recalls came not from approval of the artist alone, but from a sense of unison with the young man himself.

The programme was otherwise fine and delightful, beginning with the exquisite animation and pure spirit of the youthful Mozart's short "Parisian" symphony, and ending with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, both wonderfully well read, the violins in the Mozart being brilliant [illegible] to a superlative degree. Mr. Gericke introduced a novelty in the first movement of a symphony by Mr. Frederick S. Converse, of Newton, who has not been at home long from study under Rheinberger, the whole work having been played with honor at the Hoch Schule in Munich, last summer. It is a well-thought, well-knit movement, developed firmly and understandingly from clearly stated themes, and it has vitality and energy throughout. Indeed, the question might be raised whether Mr. Converse, in spite of his master, has not inclined too far towards the burlier Wagnerian manner, in the constant strenuousness of his score, and his apparent desire to keep everything going pretty much all the time. But for some stretches when the brass is silent, the instrumentation is full to the brim and something independent is found for almost every voice to say. There is ability here no doubt—the ability to invent occupations and to avoid confusions; but we doubt whether so much excitement and complication pay, while we are sure that they diminish pleasure.

No concert this week, but a week later the orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, some Wagner episodes and Schumann's third symphony, and Mr. Evan Williams will sing twice.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C. FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, January 14, 1899.

BOSTON, MASS., Jan. 10, 1899.

For the eleventh symphony concert Mr. Gericke gave us the following programme: Overture to "Der Freischütz," Weber; concerto for violin, No. 5 in A minor, Vieuxtemps; Waltzes, op. 39, Brahms, and symphony No. 1 in D minor, Sinding. The Brahms waltzes were scored for orchestra by Mr. Gericke; the Sinding symphony was heard for the first time in Boston.

Miss Olive Mead was the soloist and gave a confident and vigorous presentation of Vieuxtemp's difficulties, with a frequent admixture of bad intonation, showing that she has gained somewhat in style and technical facility since she last played in these concerts, but failing to make evident the fact that there has been much if any æsthetic improvement.

The famous Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda) should have appeared, but in her failure to do so Miss Mead became the substitute.

The dreary waltzes of Brahms, written for the piano for four hands, and adroitly scored for small orchestra by Gericke, were played with the utmost regard for dynamic and rhythmic demands and with all the brilliancy possible.

The Sinding symphony abounds in the maximum of noise, fury and thematic iteration. Of melody, contrast and repose there is nothing whatever. Modern means are employed to be sure, but only to intensify the confusion and disappointment. What it is all about perhaps Mr. Sinding, of Norway, can explain. I'm sure I cannot. The orchestra did its part superbly. Near the end of the scherzo comes a "lunga pausa," which interval of orchestral silence was filled by the applause of the audience to the extent that Gericke turned about and bowed and let that finish it. This was awful funny, but the closing measures that were not played, like the people "on the list," were "not missed;" there was enough and to spare of the loud and monotonous stuff without them.

The old standby of Gericke's repertoire, "Der Freischütz" overture, was finely played.

Mr. Emil Sauer will be the soloist at the next concert, playing the Henselt concerto, a rather disappointing selection, but as he gives a recital on the following Friday afternoon a better opportunity for estimating his ability as an artist will be presented. At all events his advent is awaited with great interest.

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

First Appearance of Emil Sauer, the Famous Pianist—Movement From the Symphony of Mr. Converse, the American Composer.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, twelfth concert, Emil Sauer, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 31, in D major, Parisian ....Mozart
Concerto in F minor...................Henselt
Mr. Sauer.
First Movement of Symphony in D minor, Op. 7 ....F. S. Converse
(First Time.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"....Wagner

An immense audience, and one filled with eager anticipation, gathered to hear—and see—Emil Sauer, the pianist whose fame has been blared forth with such frenzied energy for these many months by the trumpet section of his manager's bureau. As a personality he was interesting at first sight. His figure is slender and his face is pale, intellectual and oddly moulded, surmounted by a mass of dark and fluffy hair. His bearing is modest and scholarly, and one wonders what must be his opinion of the puffery to which he has been subjected. Perhaps he does not read English. Altogether he impresses you as an artist of high rank.

And his playing bears out the impression. The Henselt concerto, which he chose for his debut, is not much more than a piece of elegant superficiality, but within its limits he was supreme. His touch is exquisitely light and beautiful, his tone pure and unforced, his arpeggios and trills as fascinating and as perfect as those of Paderewski. Of his absolute refinement and freedom from affectation there can be no doubt whatever. Of emotional strength and passionate bravura there is so little in the Henselt piece that it was entirely impossible to form any idea of his powers in that direction. His recital this week will reveal him fully, and I believe that he will not be found wanting in any particular. His playing aroused great enthusiasm, and at the evening concert the recalls were so insistent that he finally played the Schubert-Tausig theme and variations.

The single movement from the Symphony in D minor by Frederick S. Converse, the young composer of Newton, was sufficient to make me wish that the whole work had been given. It is solid, musicianly writing, not always sustained in interest, to be sure, but showing by its virility and sincerity that the young man has good stuff in him. Its chief faults lie in its monotony of thematic treatment and development, its somewhat square-cut formalism and its lack of any great inherent beauty. But withal it is sane, honest and hopeful work.

The gay and—for Mozart—rather shallow "Parisian" Symphony was played with the usual grace, and the "Dutchman" Overture with more than the usual splendor.

WILDER D. QUINT.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1899.

Emil Sauer as Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

The unusually large crowd which gathered in Music Hall showed that even the unpleasant weather conditions had no effect upon the music lovers of this section in such an event as that of Saturday evening. The crowds of patient waiters in the outside aisles were in themselves a tribute to Mr. Sauer's fame, for it was plain that the soloist was the chief attraction. Yet the other features of the programme were also well worthy of consideration.

The concert began with Mozart's dainty "Parisian symphony" in D major. Then came the first movement of a new symphony by a local composer. Then the brilliant Henselt concerto in F minor, with Emil Sauer at the keyboard, and the Wagner overture, "The Flying Dutchman," continued and ended the "fireworks." A Tausig arrangement of one of Schubert's themes was given by Mr. Sauer after frenzied recalls.

Of the Parisian symphony, it could hardly be said that it had the charm of novelty to Symphony audiences. It was given more than a decade ago, and again about five years later, and afterwards under Mr. Paur in 1895.

As was the case with the Flying Dutchman overture, there was an opportunity to compare the work of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's two successors—and predecessors—if anyone had been inclined to indulge in that delicate task. The kindly and amiable critic, however, without much pangs of conscience, may leave that task to the more sanguinary brothers of his profession with perfect safety to Mr. Gericke's fame.

The delicacy and quaint prettiness of the symphony, it may be remarked, were given with rare and admirable fidelity. The composition suited the people for whom it was written.

Wolfgang Mozart had a kindly feeling towards the Parisians, who had hailed him delightedly as an infant prodigy earlier in his meteoric career. So, when he scribbled off this symphony for a people who delighted in Watteau and Greuze, (and who had not developed their sterner demands for David and the realistic exhibition of death struggles at the place of the guillotine), he did exactly what he aimed to do—hit the popular taste. This daintiness, this artificial but delicate prettiness, were almost perfectly presented by the orchestra. The orchestration of the Wagner overture was also nearly faultless.

Of Mr. Converse's symphony, but the first movement was given. This is not too ambitious for a first public attempt in that direction. The orchestration had some decidedly attractive features. It impressed one generally as the work of a hard student, who had devoted so much time to a study of the best composers, that he had no distinctive style of his own. The symphony seemed to have been evolved from that study, but much taste and discrimination seemed apparent in the process of natural selection. Still, the fault is one from which even more ambitious or self-assertive American composers than Mr. Converse have not managed to escape.

The audience was evidently pleased, and there was some inclination apparent to call the composer to the front by persistent applause. Mr. Converse modestly and wisely declined to show himself, and Mr. Sauer, his forest of hair nodding graciously above him like an Oylmpian nimbus, came forward instead.

If Saturday night was to have been the only occasion for Mr. Sauer's appearance in this city, there would have been grounds for grievous complaint. A pianist of his European reputation could afford to be judged in something better than Henselt's concerto, although some pianists at Symphony concerts in this city have failed partly or wholly in that very test. Still, the Henselt concerto, while showing the intellectual side of a pianist and putting him through his technical paces to a wonderful degree, does not call for the deepest and most thoroughly artistic work of the true musician.

In technic Mr. Sauer is really wonderful; but so are certain other well known pianists. His finger-work is about as rapid as the changes of a kinetoscope picture, so that the twinkling rapidity of movement almost tires the eye.

One specially noteworthy feature of Mr. Sauer's playing is his arm-work, in contrast to the wrist or finger-work. While Henselt's concerto does not call for much sledge-hammer key-driving, there are certain accented notes that demand special force in fore-arm work; and the clearness and vigor of Mr. Sauer's playing in such passages certainly were of a kind superior to those of most of his predecessors in this city. If this were his only showing, however, there would not be much more to be said. He is a pianist of marvellous technic; but the world does not often feel the lack of such players. Each generation produces a number of such showy performers.

This is not Mr. Sauer's last word, however. He has another recital this week. Possibly on his second appearance he may display more power to appeal to something besides the intellect, the eye or the ear. The real, human pathos of genuine and showy emotion, as expressed by the soul of the artist, remain to be heard. Judgment may be suspended in the interval.

The unwritten rule of the Symphony was broken by the allowance of a concert number not on the programme. It displayed no new qualities of the pianist, and therefore was wholly unnecessary. If the "encore fiend" is to exercise a sway at the Symphony concerts as well as at his chosen field of comic opera, there will be reason to regret the innovation. Mr. Sauer showed his absolute physical command of the piano; but as he had already shown that in the efflorescent Henselt concerto, where was the need of prolonging the programme, especially as the Wagner overture was to follow with equally spectacular impression? The result was certain to be cloying.

That Mr. Sauer captured his audience by his show of a virtual mastery of all the difficulties of technic was plain enough, whatever comment each individual may wish to make on the fact. If technic were the highest quality to be sought in a master his pre-eminence among living pianists might possibly be admitted—although even that is not to be asserted positively. He is, at all events, a marvellous player and his personal characteristics and mannerisms, although appealing to the sense of the humorous at first, probably do something to heighten the effect of his brilliant and wonderful work at the keyboard.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 15.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 15, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sauer Makes an Instantaneous Capture of the Audience.

The Pianist a Splendid Master of Technique—A Symphony by Mozart and the First Movement of Mr. Converse's Symphony in D Minor Are Given.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening presented this programme:

Symphony, "Parisian"	Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, F minor	Henselt
First movement from symphony, D minor.. First time.	F. S. Converse
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner

Mr. Emil Sauer was the soloist.

The "Parisian" symphony is so called because it was written in Paris for the opening of the Concert Spirituel. It is numbered in the latest edition of Mozart's works as the 31st symphony, and in Koechel's catalogue as opus 297. The inference is that by the time the composer had reached the age of 22 he had produced 31 symphonies, which hardly seems probable. However, it is to be presumed that this numbering has been carefully studied, and is therefore reliable.

Whatever may be the facts in this regard, the work is delightful in its sustained sparkle, its simplicity, its exquisite workmanship and its gayety of spirit, and is always heard with pleasure, especially when it receives such a sympathetic and charming interpretation as was accorded it last evening.

Mr. Converse is a young American musician, who has evidently studied seriously and ardently, both at home and abroad, and only a few months ago graduated from the Hoch-Schule in Munich, where he had studied under Rheinberger.

The first movement of his symphony, in D minor, is creditable to him in every way. Its themes are strongly marked and well contrasted, and, though it is in the advanced modern school, it is never vague nor ugly. The orchestration is clear, solid and admirable in its variety of tone color; the music flows freely, and the whole movement is notable for the vigor with which its animation is sustained.

There is in it, perhaps, overmuch of repetitions of which the purpose is not quite plain on a first hearing, and the composer does not as yet seem to stand firmly on his own feet in regard to individuality, and wanders from Mendelssohn to Schumann and thence to Brahms, while the shadow of Rheinberger is over it all; but it is unquestionable that his talent is of a high order, and, judging by the fine qualities that came constantly to the surface in his music, it is no less certain that he must make his mark in his art. In this allegro there is nothing of extravagance, nothing of posing for effect, nothing of the prevailing fanaticism of sacrificial offering to the idol of orchestration.

The work was splendidly played, and the stormy applause that followed was prolonged in the hope of bringing the composer forward, but it was not fulfilled.

A fiery and gorgeously colored performance of the Wagner overture brought the concert to a fitting close.

Mr. Sauer had been so industriously exploited by his manager, so many extraordinary stories had been circulated regarding him in order to stimulate public attention in his direction, that it is no wonder that interest to see and to hear him was at fever heat, and the result was an enormous audience.

When, however, there appeared a slightly-built, unobtrusive man, with nothing to distinguish him particularly from the usual run of men, except the length and volume of his hair, and its tendency to stand on end as if it were electrified, there was something of surprise. He took his place quietly at the piano, scarcely looking at the audience, and sat with his back to it through his entire performance of the concerto.

His choice of the Henselt work was not a happy one for a debut. It is simply a show piece, a species of sublimated salon music, and it has aged considerably and become somewhat dull and conventional since it first saw the light and was accorded a foremost place among the great concertos. Musically it is of slight interest and its difficulties, still great as they may be, have been surpassed by more modern efforts in kind.

There is a pretty slow movement, abundant in graceful embroidery and sugary sentiment, and a dashing finale that coys fluently with waltz-like themes that escape vulgarity by the skin of their teeth. It is hardly a work whose performance, no heed how admirable it may be, upon which to base a satisfying judgment of an artist's powers, especially when it is an artist pronounced among the greatest in his art, and who is heard for the first time.

Of Mr. Sauer's technique, too much cannot be said in the way of admiration. There is a glut of pianoforte technique, and the highest is now expected of pianists, and it no longer excites wonder. It is granted that Mr. Sauer need not fear comparison on this ground with the most brilliantly able of his predecessors here.

He has an exquisitely musical touch, and in the easy freedom, the cleverness, the precision, the smoothness and the elegance of his playing his superior has not been heard in Boston. His tone is a little hard and dry sometimes, but it is doubtful if that fault is wholly attributable to him. His runs are wonderful in their evenness, his control over pianoforte dynamics is perfect, and in all that he did there was a fairly fascinating refinement.

He does not overtax the instrument; his forte passages are not characterized by pounding and thumping; the movement of his hands is delightful to watch; his crescendos and diminuendos are beautiful, and his sentiment is free from sentimentalism. Through the whole work, polish, grace and delicacy were exemplified at their best.

Something in the way of virility, or largeness of style, of intellectuality, was wanting; but the work did not admit of an illustration of these qualities. There was nothing for the artist to do but to play it in the salon style, and of this style he made it fully clear he is a master of the first order. A more favorable opportunity of learning his artistic worth in a larger and nobler field will be presented at his recital of this week. His effect on his audience was tremendous.

He was recalled with a delirious frenzy some seven or eight times, until at length he returned to the piano and played Tausig's transcription of Schubert's theme and variations, with a repetition of the incomparable elegance and perfection of finger mechanism that so delightfully distinguished his previous effort. No more instantaneous and overwhelming capture of a Symphony audience has ever been made.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; selection from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdaemmerung," Wagner; Symphony No. 3, Schumann. Mr. Evan Williams is to be the soloist and will sing two arias.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 15, 1899.

It may be easy enough to "know Hercules by his foot," but it is not always so simple a matter to declare the might of an artist from one single manifestation——especially if the claim be made for him that he is the greatest in the world. But it is safe and sure, after even only one hearing of only one concerto, to say that Mr. Emil Sauer, who made his Boston debut in the twelfth Symphony programme stands at least among the few very great living pianists. For our own part we should not like to declare for any man as the one greatest; because there is just enough differentiation among the front-rank men to make each superior in some one quality, characteristic or detail, while all are virtually peers in technique and virtuosity. Mr. Sauer played that immensely difficult and not often heard F-minor concerto of Henselt, opus 16. Not abstractly so much more difficult than many works of later composition; but difficult because it belongs to a manner which Henselt adapted to himself and developed for himself, and which therefore requires not only some unusual physical fitness, but great and arduous training along lines which nowadays are not followed so far or so vigorously. For beside a mastery of all the usual graces, powers and varieties of manner which marked the schools prior to Henselt or have come into being since his day, the player of his music must have a practically unlimited command of great octave sweeps and of the most massive harmonies distributed into arpeggios which must be rendered almost as if they were but immensely extended chords. This unusual command Mr. Sauer displayed unhesitatingly, and absolutely, until he swept the whole keyboard as the harp is swayed. All other gifts and achievements of pianism appeared to be his, and he evoked sonority without clangor and delicacy without affectation. Of the full range of his taste, sentiment and force it will not be possible to judge until he shall be heard in a various programme at his own initial concert next week; although it is certain that he has much more than virtuosity to give his listeners. One thing certainly may be said of him now: That few players upon any instrument can convey a stronger impression than he of the personal equation contributed to an artistic result, or make the hearer feel more sympathetically the enthusiasm, the glow, the earnestness, the purpose poured into the accomplished work. As Sauer ended each movement, one felt that he meant every note of it, and the many eager recalls sprang not from approval of the artist alone, but from a sense of unison with the young man himself.

The programme was otherwise fine and delightful, beginning with the exquisite animation and pure spirit of the youthful Mozart's short "Parisian" symphony, and ending with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, both wonderfully well read, the violins in the Mozart being brilliant and facile to a superlative degree. Mr. Gericke introduced a novelty in the first movement of a symphony by Mr. Frederick S Converse, of Newton, who has not been at home long from study under Rheinberger, the whole work having been played with honor at the Hoch Schule in Munich, last summer. It is a well-thought, well-knit movement, developed firmly and understandingly from clearly stated themes, and it has vitality and energy throughout Indeed, the question might be raised whether Mr. Converse, in spite of his master, has not inclined too far towards the burlier Wagnerian manner, in the constant strenuousness of his score, and his apparent desire to keep everything going pretty much all the time. But for some stretches when the brass is silent, the instrumentation is full to the brim and something independent is found for almost every voice to say. There is ability here no doubt—the ability to invent occupations and to avoid confusions; but we doubt whether so much excitement and complication pay, while we are sure that they diminish pleasure.

No concert this week, but a week later the orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, some Wagner episodes and Schumann's third symphony, and Mr. Evan Williams will sing twice.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, January 14, 1899.

BOSTON, MASS., Jan. 10, 1899.

For the eleventh symphony concert Mr. Gericke gave us the following programme: Overture to "Der Freischütz," Weber; concerto for violin, No. 5 in A minor, Vieuxtemps; Waltzes, op. 39, Brahms, and symphony No. 1 in D minor, Sinding. The Brahms waltzes were scored for orchestra by Mr. Gericke; the Sinding symphony was heard for the first time in Boston.

Miss Olive Mead was the soloist and gave a confident and vigorous presentation of Vieuxtemp's difficulties, with a frequent admixture of bad intonation, showing that she has gained somewhat in style and technical facility since she last played in these concerts, but failing to make evident the fact that there has been much if any æsthetic improvement.

The famous Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda) should have appeared, but in her failure to do so Miss Mead became the substitute.

The dreary waltzes of Brahms, written for the piano for four hands, and adroitly scored for small orchestra by Gericke, were played with the utmost regard for dynamic and rhythmic demands and with all the brilliancy possible.

The Sinding symphony abounds in the maximum of noise, fury and thematic iteration. Of melody, contrast and repose there is nothing whatever. Modern means are employed to be sure, but only to intensify the confusion and disappointment. What it is all about perhaps Mr. Sinding, of Norway, can explain. I'm sure I cannot. The orchestra did its part superbly. Near the end of the scherzo comes a "lunga pausa," which interval of orchestral silence was filled by the applause of the audience to the extent that Gericke turned about and bowed and let that finish it. This was awful funny, but the closing measures that were not played, like the people "on the list," were "not missed;" there was enough and to spare of the loud and monotonous stuff without them.

The old standby of Gericke's repertoire, "Der Freischütz" overture, was finely played.

Mr. Emil Sauer will be the soloist at the next concert, playing the Henselt concerto, a rather disappointing selection, but as he gives a recital on the following Friday afternoon a better opportunity for estimating his ability as an artist will be presented. At all events his advent is awaited with great interest.

The Boston Traveler.

THE SYMPHONY.

First Appearance of Emil Sauer, the Famous Pianist—Movement From the Symphony of Mr. Converse, the American Composer.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, twelfth concert, Emil Sauer, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 31, in D major, Parisian	Mozart
Concerto in F minor Mr. Sauer.	Henselt
First Movement of Symphony in D minor, Op. 7 (First Time.)	F. S. Converse
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner

An immense audience, and one filled with eager anticipation, gathered to hear—and see—Emil Sauer, the pianist whose fame has been blared forth with such frenzied energy for these many months by the trumpet section of his manager's bureau. As a personality he was interesting at first sight. His figure is slender and his face is pale, intellectual and oddly moulded, surmounted by a mass of dark and fluffy hair. His bearing is modest and scholarly, and one wonders what must be his opinion of the puffery to which he has been subjected. Perhaps he does not read English. Altogether he impresses you as an artist of high rank.

And his playing bears out the impression. The Henselt concerto, which he chose for his debut, is not much more than a piece of elegant superficiality, but within its limits he was supreme. His touch is exquisitely light and beautiful, his tone pure and unforced, his arpeggios and trills as fascinating and as perfect as those of Paderewski. Of his absolute refinement and freedom from affectation there can be no doubt whatever. Of emotional strength and passionate bravura there is so little in the Henselt piece that it was entirely impossible to form any idea of his powers in that direction. His recital this week will reveal him fully, and I believe that he will not be found wanting in any particular. His playing aroused great enthusiasm, and at the evening concert the recalls were so insistent that he finally played the Schubert-Tausig theme and variations.

The single movement from the Symphony in D minor by Frederick S. Converse, the young composer of Newton, was sufficient to make me wish that the whole work had been given. It is solid, musicianly writing, not always sustained in interest, to be sure, but showing by its virility and sincerity that the young man has good stuff in him. Its chief faults lie in its monotony of thematic treatment and development, its somewhat square-cut formalism and its lack of any great inherent beauty. But withal it is sane, honest and hopeful work.

The gay and—for Mozart—rather shallow "Parisian" Symphony was played with the usual grace, and the "Dutchman" Overture with more than the usual splendor.

WILDER D. QUINT.

[illegible], JANUARY 16, 1899.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony No. 31, in D [illegible], "Parisian."
Henselt: Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, opus 16.
Frederick S. Converse: First Movement from Symphony in D minor, opus 7.
Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."
Mr. Emil Sauer was the pianist.

Mozart's "Parisian" symphony may be called one of his lighter orchestral works, but is none the less charming. In writing it, the composer seems to have sized up his Paris audience with no little cleverness, and to have been bent, first and foremost, upon pleasing it. One can feel that he saw with the keen eyes of genius that the habitués of the Concert spirituel did not care for particularly solid dishes, but were nevertheless cultivated judges in matters of taste and style; that they were especially at home in the operatic vein. Accordingly we find that, in this symphony, if the inspiration flow from no very deep source, it is exceedingly distinguished in character; the style of the work is impeccably elegant. Then, few of Mozart's symphonies remind one so constantly of his operas; we hear Zerlina and Figaro frolicking through all three movements. In fine, it is a delightful piece of brightness and brilliance. It was admirably played; if not with quite the high polish that would have done it no harm, still with finish, dash and unfailing effectiveness.

Mr. Converse's movement has not merely the character of a work written for academic honors. That it has something of this character is undeniable, as, indeed, it would have been all but impossible for it not to have. Berlioz's blunder, the third time he competed for the prize at the Conservatoire, was a warning not to be despised by young aspirants. He had won the second prize the year before, and everyone assured him that he was sure of the Prix de Rome this time. So he reasoned thus: "As these gentlemen have made up their mind beforehand to give me the first prize, I don't see why I should bind myself down, as I did last year, to writing in their style and according to their ideas, instead of following my own feeling and the style which is natural to me. Let us be seriously an artist and write a distinguished cantata." The result of which was that he got no prize at all! When young would-be graduates are writing for academic judges, they must write academically. Mr. Converse probably knew this as well as another. The form of this first movement of his symphony, written for the "Haupt-Prüfung" in Munich last spring, is as academically regular as the veriest stickler could wish. And one cannot quite determine whether he fell into this regular form naturally or found it in any way an incumbrance. There is a certain individuality in his thematic material which is not to be gainsaid; an individuality which is not yet thoroughly crystallized out, so that it stands homogeneously before you, and in distinct outlines; it shows itself as yet as a rather composite individuality; not free from reminiscences of the influence of others, but as an individuality, for all that. You do not pick out separate passages, and say: "This is Schumann, that Brahms, and the other Rubinstein." You feel that there is some Schumann, Rubinstein and Brahms—to mention no others—unmistakably there; but all these outside influences are pretty cunningly blended, and Mr. Converse has stamped the whole with his own trademark. In fine, the work is decidedly more than respectable; there is achievement in it. Surely considerably more of promise than of achievement, but the young composer has really done something. It was, upon the whole, unfortunate that Mr. Sauer changed the order of the programme by not appearing at the announced time. The audience was left in the dark as to what had happened to him, and had to make the most of the announcement that "he would play the concerto after the Converse symphony." Mr. Converse's movement would have sounded fresher after the F minor concerto; Mozart had given the audience enough of the key of D for the nonce, and it was in no mood to go on with D minor just then.

But, if the change in the programme was to the disadvantage of Mr. Converse's movement, it was—it would have been—all to the advantage of Wagner's overture (also in D minor), had not other unpleasantnesses intervened. Of these later. Only, as a fact, one was not in the mood for the "Fliegende Holländer" when it came, nor for much of anything else! We could hardly make out whether the overture was effectively played or not; we listened earnestly, but unwillingly; it was out of its proper frame.

Mr. Sauer has come, played, and conquered! There can be not the slightest doubt of that. He has shaken off all the circus tinsel and pinchbeck spangles with which the most astonishing press agents known to history did their best to adorn him, and stands now as an unmistakable artist. Not yet as a wholly wise and tactful one; but that is another story! It was no bad notion of his to make his first appearance with the Henselt concerto. The work has no depth, its style is rather out of date nowadays, there is often an irksome clumsiness in the orchestration—indeed, it is the one concerto we know that sounds far better with a second pianoforte than it does with orchestra. But, with and in spite of all this, the concerto has much to recommend it. It is one of the most superb pieces of pianoforte writing in existence; and, more than this, the composer's treatment of the pianoforte is quite his own; call it Chopinesque, if you will, it is that with something added. Then, the composition shows a great deal of melodic invention; not of deep soulfulness, but genuine and infinitely distinguished; the whole thing is admirably written and holds together with perfect solidity. It has often reminded us of what Franz Kugler once said of Domenichino's "Communion of St. Jerome"—"the greatest picture ever painted without genius." For complete, finished, exquisite elegance of style it well-nigh seeks its [illegible] to be sure, he allowed himself certain liberties which seemed especially illegitimate for running counter to the composer's expressed direction. Henselt has stated plainly in his score that "the first movement of the concerto must be played without change of tempo, as far as possible, strictly in time, with the exception of the few places indicated"—and Mr. Sauer treated the tempo with ultra-Wagnerian "elasticity." We personally should have preferred to hear the thing go straight; but a pianist belongs to his own time, and might very well feel himself hampered in his expressiveness by adopting obsolete methods. In any case, Henselt was not the overpowering genius to specify the conditions under which a work of his should survive; he might esteem himself happy if it survived under any conditions. Still his direction for playing the first movement of this concerto was evidently something of a protest against a style of performance which had begun to be fashionable even in his day, and Mr. Sauer's playing was a characteristic example of this very style; in other words, Mr. Sauer did precisely what the composer had told him not to. But, with this single exception, his playing of the concerto was beyond praise. For once we have heard the peculiar old-time elegance of Henselt's style revived and made a thing of life. There was no scurrying in rapid passages, no unseemly exhibition of mere velocity. Every phrase was grace itself; and, not only grace, but the most distinguished, highly polished grace, the grace of high breeding. Then, Mr. Sauer's cantabile is as that of the old Italian bel canto; he juggles with his touch so that the half-voiceless pianoforte seems verily to sing. And, heaven be praised, he does not pound! How much more there may be in him than this concerto calls forth we cannot tell; but that he can exhaust all the highest possibilities of this composition may safely be recorded.

Why should he have spoiled so fair a record? After Mr. Gericke had taken the precaution of having the pianoforte closed and drawn back to its former position on the stage, so that there should be no possible breaking of wise and artistic rules, Mr. Sauer, amid the thundering applause of the audience, strides up to the instrument, opens it with his own hands, and proceeds to play a solo! And this was what spoiled the "Flying Dutchman" overture! Ah! what a mere shabby dive trick! at a symphony concert thus to subject a helpless audience to unmitigated pianoforte playing! Is Mr. Sauer such a baby in the hands of his press-agents that he must, at all hazards, have an encore go on record?

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Jan. 27, and Saturday evening, Jan. 28, there being no rehearsal nor concert this week—is: Tchaikovsky, overture to "Romeo and Juliet;" ———, aria; Wagner, selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung;" ———, aria; Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," opus 97. Mr. Evan Williams will be the singer.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, EDITOR.

☞ The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticize productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment, rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 21, 1899.

SINDING'S FIRST SYMPHONY.

This Symphony, No. 1, Op. 21, D minor, was performed at the 11th Boston Symphony Concert, under Gericke's direction. The "Gazette" says: The Sinding symphony is a good, lusty piece of work, strongly suggesting that Thor and Boreas are out for a holiday and have kept the chill out of their blood by a liberal use of raw spirits. Sometimes they are rarely jolly and their lusty bellowings can be heard for miles; then they become sentimental and hoarsely whisper sentiment through bassoons and horns, speedily returning, however to an emotional condition that can be expressed only by a full orchestra playing fortissimo. The ideas are clear enough to be easily followed, and they are not numerous, the orchestration is always interesting and sometimes piquant and there is rough vigor in every phrase. One hearing is not sufficient to detect all its merits, or all its faults, and yet even one hearing leaves a certain pleasurable sensation behind it and a certain respect for the howling north wind and the hammer-wielding Thor.

Some waltzes by Brahms, Op. 39, were played at the same concert. The same critic remarks: The Brahms waltzes are the playwork of a grave academician who fears to yield to gayety even in moments of relaxation. They are very charmingly orchestrated by Mr. Gericke, in the most brilliant and musicianly manner and in thorough sympathy with their spirit.

MUSICAL AMERICA

New York, January 21, 1899.

Emil Sauer was the attraction at the twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his fame bringing together an audience that occupied every sitting and standing position in the Music Hall auditorium.

Mr. Sauer chose Henselt's concerto for his Boston début, or rather it was his second choice, a quite recent performance of Beethoven's No. 5 in E flat preventing his playing the latter work as he most desired.

In an artistic sense the Henselt work was an unfortunate choice, for it is of cheap material and little less than salon music.

However, Sauer surmounted its difficulties with ease, and certainly gained an overwhelming success if the enthusiastic applause of the audience is to be taken as an indication.

In the matter of technical facility his performance was a marvel. Exquisite, delicate, delightfully contrasted in all the lights and shades of dynamic expression, acute and definite in rhythmic swing, steady and commanding in the broader elements of the interpretation, and in all a masterly grasp of the technical requirements necessary to mark the modern player of phenomenal powers.

The orchestral numbers on the programme were Mozart's "Parisian" Symphony in D major; first movement of a symphony in D minor, op. 7, by F. S. Converse, and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Converse is a young Bostonian who has studied both at home and abroad with the best teachers. His work, which shows little originality, is rather the presentation of what he has learned in school as regards the rules and laws of composition and orchestration. The field is still open for a cultivation of individuality upon his good fundamental training and for the exercise of invention in the detail of his art. The movement was played in an overloud manner, giving the ear of the listener little or no rest. If this was the fault of the reading or of the scoring I cannot say.

The playing of the Mozart symphony was devoid of refinement or grace. Has Gericke lost all the refinement and repose that formerly were so charmingly identified with his readings of the classics?

In reply to the courteous inquiry of Mr. Emilio Belari in the last MUSICAL AMERICA I would say that it is extremely difficult to satisfactorily answer upon paper the question regarding the position of the larynx during the vocal act.

My theory is that the larynx must voluntarily neither be elevated nor depressed, but must remain in its normal position during tone-production. It should never be held in a position, and should always be flexibly susceptible to the greater or lesser impulse of the column of air.

Now here is the difficulty in answering Mr. Balari's most pertinent question. What he may designate as a "low position" of the larynx, in contradistinction to that upheld position that prevails to such an extent in singers' efforts, may be the very point that I would indicate where it should remain.

If we could practically demonstrate our theories to each other we could then in a moment ascertain if we agreed or not; then the matter could be discussed upon its merits.

What I would warn the student against is the radical, voluntary depressions of the larynx, the direful results from which action I have observed in scores of cases. What stronger condemnation of such a fallacy can one ask?

As regards "who are the good, the correct singers," I would say that as soon as one appears I will hail the opportunity to make the process of tone-production presented as clear as possible in the columns of MUSICAL AMERICA.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 20, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Mr. Gericke chose for last night's Boston Symphony concert Brahms's Symphony No. 3, variations on an original theme by Dvorak, the overture to "Der Freischütz" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." These, together with M. Saléza's arias, one from "Sigurd" and one from "Joseph in Egypt," made a programme of agreeable quality and length.

No faults can be found with the orchestra's performance. The full tone and pure intonation of the strings and the sonority and precision of the brass and wood wind combined, under the correct direction of Mr. Gericke, brought the playing very near to the ideal in this branch of music.

The conductor's work was most pleasing in the symphony, though he caused each of the details of the intricately devised variations of Dvorak and the deftly woven "Meistersinger" prelude to be distinctly heard.

Mr. Gericke lacks that rare quality of personal magnetism: this is plainly evident in the apathetic attitude of the audience toward him. The applause which followed each number sounded extremely perfunctory.

M. Saléza was again the recipient of emphatic marks of appreciation on the part of his listeners. He sang as well as, if not better than, he did at the Wednesday concert, and that is saying a good deal.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
THE EVENING SUN, per month .... .30
THE EVENING SUN, per year $3.00

THURSDAY, JANUARY [illegible], 1899.

Pianist Emil Sauer, giving his first solo recital in Carnegie Hall last evening, had a fair chance to win serious consideration for his abilities as an interpreter and performer of music. It was chiefly as a performer that he succeeded. The hall was well filled, conspicuously so in its upper galleries, and the applause was both regular and emphatic. Schumann's toccata, op. 7, was the most enjoyable number in a varied programme. The fantastic piece was dashed off with the technical perfection which its difficulty demanded, and the pianist appeared for once to be playing for sheer love of the music. Schumann's romance, op. 28, No. 2, was also agreeably performed. In the Beethoven sonata appassionata, op. 57, which preceded these numbers, there was the same mastery of the instrument, but very little evidence of feeling. Sauer played the sonata with great ease and delicacy, bringing out here and there a critical note not always heard, and producing especially in the finale of "storm" a fine effect of clearness. Yet Beethoven in Sauer's performance proved less impressive than Schumann. Of the later selections, Chopin's Bolero, op. 19, the Mendelssohn-Liszt "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges," and Sauer's own "Serenade Française," were musical sketches picturesquely produced. The "Murmure du Vent," a rapid study by Sauer, exhibited that coldness which appears to be the temperamental defect of this pianist. Arbitrary variations of time in the familiar Berceuse of Chopin were hardly atoned for by the absolutely unerring flight of trained fingers through its hushed and hastened measures. Similar treatment of the Chopin Valse, op. 42, rather added to the fascination of that number; the waltz rhythm, however, was too greatly suppressed in favor of the even beat of the right hand melody. The Rigaudon of Raff was the one selection in which Herr Sauer overtaxed his instrument and used a loud pedal to the composer's confusion. In general the pianist was quiet, clear and earnest, in producing his tone effects, and often he seemed to forget business long enough to conjure up rarely beautiful and elusive sound pictures from his instrument. There is no praise, however, for the final number in the programme, the Wagner-Liszt "Tannhäuser" overture, which was a wretched piece of pounding that pianists in general, and Sauer in particular, might better leave to the orchestra, for which its noble noise was intended by the composer. Let it be said that last night's audience responded to the transcribed noise with howls of delight and refused to quit the hall until the Sauer mashed fingers had essayed the added difficulties of a brilliant waltz for encore.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave yesterday its third matinée at Carnegie Hall, will be heard to-night in its third evening concert with complete change of the instrumental programme. M. Saléza, tenor of the Grau company, is the soloist. The concerts will be reviewed in this column to-morrow.

The New York Times

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JAN. 19, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Third Matinee Given at Carnegie Hall Yesterday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinée at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon under difficulties. In the first place Mme. Milka Ternina, the famous Wagnerian soprano of the Ellis Opera Company, had been announced to sing, and continued illness compelled a change at the last moment. A satisfactory substitute was found in M. Saleza, the admirable tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House. The next trouble which confronted the orchestra was a wreck on the railway by which the organization came from Baltimore (where its last concert had been given) to New York. This wreck compelled a détour of something like 150 miles and a consequent late arrival at the hall. The instruments which were shipped did not arrive till 1:30 o'clock or after, and Mr. Gericke, the conductor, was unwilling to go on with the concert without a brief rehearsal. Hence the doors were kept closed till this rehearsal could be held, and some of the audience had to wait outside before being able to gain admission to the music room.

When the concert finally did get under way, it was as interesting and agreeable as the concerts of this organization usually are. The orchestral numbers were Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture, and Brahms's waltzes, Opus 30, arranged for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston band. The solo numbers, sung by M. Saleza, were an air from Reyer's "Sigurd," lately heard at a Sunday night concert, and "En vain, Pharaon," from Méhul's "Joseph." Mendelssohn's Italian symphony is very calm and unexciting music for a town throbbing with Nibelungs and gods of Norse mythology, but its suave and melodious measures, played with the perfection of polish yesterday, were very reposeful. The "Faust" overture was performed excellently and the waltzes proved to have been scored with great skill. M. Saleza was in fine voice and he sang both his numbers with most artistic skill and taste. He will repeat them at to-night's concert, but the orchestral numbers will all be different from those played yesterday.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 16, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony No. 31, in D major, "Parisian."
Henselt: Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor, opus 16.
Frederick S. Converse: First Movement from Symphony in D minor, opus 7.
Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."
Mr. Emil Sauer was the pianist.

Mozart's "Parisian" symphony may be called one of his lighter orchestral works, but is none the less charming. In writing it, the composer seems to have sized up his Paris audience with no little cleverness, and to have been bent, first and foremost, upon pleasing it. One can feel that he saw with the keen eyes of genius that the habitués of the Concert spirituel did not care for particularly solid dishes, but were nevertheless cultivated judges in matters of taste and style; that they were especially at home in the operatic vein. Accordingly we find that, in this symphony, if the inspiration flow from no very deep source, it is exceedingly distinguished in character; the style of the work is impeccably elegant. Then, few of Mozart's symphonies remind one so constantly of his operas; we hear Zerlina and Figaro frolicking through all three movements. In fine, it is a delightful piece of brightness and brilliance. It was admirably played; if not with quite the high polish that would have done it no harm, still with finish, dash and unfailing effectiveness.

Mr. Converse's movement has not merely the character of a work written for academic honors. That it has something of this character is undeniable, as, indeed, it would have been all but impossible for it not to have. Berlioz's blunder, the third time he competed for the prize at the Conservatoire, was a warning not to be despised by young aspirants. He had won the second prize the year before, and everyone assured him that he was sure of the Prix de Rome this time. So he reasoned thus: "As these gentlemen have made up their mind beforehand to give me the first prize, I don't see why I should bind myself down, as I did last year, to writing in their style and according to their ideas, instead of following my own feeling and the style which is natural to me. Let us be seriously an artist and write a distinguished cantata." The result of which was that he got no prize at all! When young would-be graduates are writing for academic judges, they must write academically. Mr. Converse probably knew this as well as another. The form of this first movement of his symphony, written for the "Haupt-Prüfung" in Munich last spring, is as academically regular as the veriest stickler could wish. And one cannot quite determine whether he fell into this regular form naturally or found it in any way an incumbrance. There is a certain individuality in his thematic material which is not to be gainsaid; an individuality which is not yet thoroughly crystallized out, so that it stands homogeneously before you, and in distinct outlines; it shows itself as yet as a rather composite individuality, not free from reminiscences of the influence of others, but as an individuality, for all that. You do not pick out separate passages, and say: "This is Schumann, that Brahms, and the other Rubinstein." You feel that there is some Schumann, Rubinstein and Brahms—to mention no others—unmistakably there; but all these outside influences are pretty cunningly blended, and Mr. Converse has stamped the whole with his own trademark. In fine, the work is decidedly more than respectable; there is achievement in it. Surely considerably more of promise than of achievement, but the young composer has really done something. It was, upon the whole, unfortunate that Mr. Sauer changed the order of the programme by not appearing at the announced time. The audience was left in the dark as to what had happened to him, and had to make the most of the announcement that "he would play the concerto after the Converse symphony." Mr. Converse's movement would have sounded fresher after the F minor concerto; Mozart had given the audience enough of the key of D for the nonce, and it was in no mood to go on with D minor just then.

But, if the change in the programme was to the disadvantage of Mr. Converse's movement, it was—or would have been—all to the advantage of Wagner's overture (also in D minor), had not other unpleasantnesses intervened. Of these later. Only, as a fact, one was not in the mood for the "Fliegende Holländer" when it came, nor for much of anything else! We could hardly make out whether the overture was effectively played or not; we listened earnestly, but unwillingly; it was out of its proper frame.

Mr. Sauer has come, played, and conquered! There can be not the slightest doubt of that. He has shaken off all the circus tinsel and pinchbeck spangles with which the most astonishing press agents known to history did their best to adorn him, and stands now as an unmistakable artist. Not yet as a wholly wise and tactful one; but that is another story! It was no bad notion of his to make his first appearance with the Henselt concerto. The work has no depth, its style is rather out of date nowadays, there is often an irksome clumsiness in the orchestration—indeed, it is the one concerto we know that sounds far better with a second pianoforte than it does with orchestra. But, with and in spite of all this, the concerto has much to recommend it. It is one of the most superb pieces of pianoforte writing in existence; and, more than this, the composer's treatment of the pianoforte is quite his own; call it Chopinesque, if you will, it is that with something added. Then, the composition shows a great deal of melodic invention; not of deep soulfulness, but genuine and infinitely distinguished; the whole thing is admirably written, and holds together with perfect solidity. It has often reminded us of what Franz Kugler once said of Domenichino's "Communion of St. Jerome"—"the greatest picture ever painted without genius!" For complete, finished, exquisite elegance of style it well-nigh seeks its fellow.

Mr. Sauer's playing of this composition was exhaustive. To be sure, he allowed himself certain liberties which seemed especially illegitimate for running counter to the composer's expressed direction. Henselt has stated plainly in his score that "the first movement of the concerto must be played without change of tempo, as far as possible, strictly in time, with the exception of the few places indicated"—and Mr. Sauer treated the tempo with ultra-Wagnerian "elasticity." We personally should have preferred to hear the thing go straight; but a pianist belongs to his own time, and might very well feel himself hampered in his expressiveness by adopting obsolete methods. In any case, Henselt was not the overpowering genius to specify the conditions under which a work of his should survive; he might esteem himself happy if it survived under any conditions. Still his direction for playing the first movement of this concerto was evidently something of a protest against a style of performance which had begun to be fashionable even in his day, and Mr. Sauer's playing was a characteristic example of this very style; in other words, Mr. Sauer did precisely what the composer had told him not to. But, with this single exception, his playing of the concerto was beyond praise. For once we have heard the peculiar old-time elegance of Henselt's style revived and made a thing of life. There was no scurrying in rapid passages, no unseemly exhibition of mere velocity. Every phrase was grace itself; and, not only grace, but the most distinguished, highly polished grace, the grace of high breeding. Then, Mr. Sauer's cantabile is as that of the old Italian bel canto; he juggles with his touch so that the half-voiceless pianoforte seems verily to sing. And, heaven be praised, he does not pound! How much more there may be in him than this concerto calls forth we cannot tell; but that he can exhaust all the highest possibilities of this composition may safely be recorded.

Why should he have spoiled so fair a record? After Mr. Gericke had taken the precaution of having the pianoforte closed and drawn back to its former position on the stage, so that there should be no possible breaking of wise and artistic rules, Mr. Sauer, amid the thundering applause of the audience, strides up to the instrument, opens it with his own hands, and proceeds to play a solo! And this was what spoiled the "Flying Dutchman" overture! Ah! what a mere shabby dive trick! at a symphony concert thus to subject a helpless audience to unmitigated pianoforte playing! Is Mr. Sauer such a baby in the hands of his press-agents that he must, at all hazards, have an encore go on record?

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Jan. 27, and Saturday evening, Jan. 28, there being no rehearsal nor concert this week—is: Tchaikovsky, overture to "Romeo and Juliet;" ———, aria; Wagner, selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung;" ———, aria; Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," opus 97. Mr. Evan Williams will be the singer.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, EDITOR.

☞ The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticize productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment, rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 21, 1899.

SINDING'S FIRST SYMPHONY.

This Symphony, No. 1, Op. 21, D minor, was performed at the 11th Boston Symphony Concert, under Gericke's direction. The "Gazette" says: The Sinding symphony is a good, lusty piece of work, strongly suggesting that Thor and Boreas are out for a holiday and have kept the chill out of their blood by a liberal use of raw spirits. Sometimes they are rarely jolly and their lusty bellowings can be heard for miles; then they become sentimental and hoarsely whisper sentiment through bassoons and horns, speedily returning, however to an emotional condition that can be expressed only by a full orchestra playing fortissimo. The ideas are clear enough to be easily followed, and they are not numerous, the orchestration is always interesting and sometimes piquant and there is rough vigor in every phrase. One hearing is not sufficient to detect all its merits, or all its faults, and yet even one hearing leaves a certain pleasurable sensation behind it and a certain respect for the howling north wind and the hammer-wielding Thor.

Some waltzes by Brahms, Op. 39, were played at the same concert. The same critic remarks: The Brahms waltzes are the playwork of a grave academician who fears to yield to gayety even in moments of relaxation. They are very charmingly orchestrated by Mr. Gericke, in the most brilliant and musicianly manner and in thorough sympathy with their spirit.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

New York, January 21, 1899.

Emil Sauer was the attraction at the twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his fame bringing together an audience that occupied every sitting and standing position in the Music Hall auditorium.

Mr. Sauer chose Henselt's concerto for his Boston début, or rather it was his second choice, a quite recent performance of Beethoven's No. 5 in E flat preventing his playing the latter work as he most desired.

In an artistic sense the Henselt work was an unfortunate choice, for it is of cheap material and little less than salon music.

However, Sauer surmounted its difficulties with ease, and certainly gained an overwhelming success if the enthusiastic applause of the audience is to be taken as an indication.

In the matter of technical facility his performance was a marvel. Exquisite, delicate, delightfully contrasted in all the lights and shades of dynamic expression, acute and definite in rhythmic swing, steady and commanding in the broader elements of the interpretation, and in all a masterly grasp of the technical requirements necessary to mark the modern player of phenomenal powers.

The orchestral numbers on the programme were Mozart's "Parisian" Symphony in D major; first movement of a symphony in D minor, op. 7, by F. S. Converse, and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Converse is a young Bostonian who has studied both at home and abroad with the best teachers. His work, which shows little originality, is rather the presentation of what he has learned in school as regards the rules and laws of composition and orchestration. The field is still open for a cultivation of individuality upon his good fundamental training and for the exercise of invention in the detail of his art. The movement was played in an overloud manner, giving the ear of the listener little or no rest. If this was the fault of the reading or of the scoring I cannot say.

The playing of the Mozart symphony was devoid of refinement or grace. Has Gericke lost all the refinement and repose that formerly were so charmingly identified with his readings of the classics?

In reply to the courteous inquiry of Mr. Emilio Belari in the last MUSICAL AMERICA I would say that it is extremely difficult to satisfactorily answer upon paper the question regarding the position of the larynx during the vocal act.

My theory is that the larynx must voluntarily neither be elevated nor depressed, but must remain in its normal position during tone-production. It should never be held in a position, and should always be flexibly susceptible to the greater or lesser impulse of the column of air.

Now here is the difficulty in answering Mr. Balari's most pertinent question. What he may designate as a "low position" of the larynx, in contradistinction to that upheld position that prevails to such an extent in singers' efforts, may be the very point that I would indicate where it should remain.

If we could practically demonstrate our theories to each other we could then in a moment ascertain if we agreed or not; then the matter could be discussed upon its merits.

What I would warn the student against is the radical, voluntary depressions of the larynx, the direful results from which action I have observed in scores of cases. What stronger condemnation of such a fallacy can one ask?

As regards "who are the good, the correct singers," I would say that as soon as one appears I will hail the opportunity to make the process of tone production presented as clear as possible in the columns of MUSICAL AMERICA.

WARREN DAVENPORT

The Sun.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 20, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Mr. Gericke chose for last night's Boston Symphony concert Brahms's Symphony No. 3, variations on an original theme by Dvorak, the overture to "Der Freischütz" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." These, together with M. Saléza's arias, one from "Sigurd" and one from "Joseph in Egypt," made a programme of agreeable quality and length.

No faults can be found with the orchestra's performance. The full tone and pure intonation of the strings and the sonority and precision of the brass and wood wind combined, under the correct direction of Mr. Gericke, brought the playing very near to the ideal in this branch of music.

The conductor's work was most pleasing in the symphony, though he caused each of the details of the intricately devised variations of Dvorak and the deftly woven "Meistersinger" prelude to be distinctly heard.

Mr. Gericke lacks that rare quality of personal magnetism; this is plainly evident in the apathetic attitude of the audience toward him. The applause which followed each number sounded extremely perfunctory.

M. Saléza was again the recipient of emphatic marks of appreciation on the part of his listeners. He sang as well as, if not better than, he did at the Wednesday concert, and that is saying a good deal.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
THE EVENING SUN, per month .... .20
THE EVENING SUN, per year $2.00

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1899.

Pianist Emil Sauer, giving his first solo recital in Carnegie Hall last evening, had a fair chance to win serious consideration for his abilities as an interpreter and performer of music. It was chiefly as a performer that he succeeded. The hall was well filled, conspicuously so in its upper galleries, and the applause was both regular and emphatic. Schumann's toccata, op. 7, was the most enjoyable number in a varied programme. The fantastic piece was dashed off with the technical perfection which its difficulty demanded, and the pianist appeared for once to be playing for sheer love of the music. Schumann's romance, op. 28, No. 2, was also agreeably performed. In the Beethoven sonata appassionata, op. 57, which preceded these numbers, there was the same mastery of the instrument, but very little evidence of feeling. Sauer played the sonata with great ease and delicacy, bringing out here and there a critical note not always heard, and producing especially in the finale of "storm" a fine effect of clearness. Yet Beethoven in Sauer's performance proved less impressive than Schumann. Of the later selections, Chopin's Bolero, op. 19, the Mendelssohn-Liszt "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges," and Sauer's own "Serenade Française" were musical sketches picturesquely reproduced. The "Murmure du Vent," a rapid study by Sauer, exhibited that coldness which appears to be the temperamental defect of this pianist. Arbitrary variations of time in the familiar Berceuse of Chopin were hardly atoned for by the absolutely unerring flight of trained fingers through its hushed and hastened measures. Similar treatment of the Chopin Valse, op. 42, rather added to the fascination of that number; the waltz rhythm, however, was too greatly suppressed in favor of the even beat of the right hand melody. The Rigaudon of Raff was the one selection in which Herr Sauer overtaxed his instrument and used a loud pedal to the composer's confusion. In general the pianist was quiet, clear and earnest, in producing his tone effects, and often he seemed to forget business long enough to conjure up rarely beautiful and elusive sound pictures from his instrument. There is no praise, however, for the final number in the programme, the Wagner-Liszt "Tannhäuser" overture, which was a wretched piece of pounding that pianists in general, and Sauer in particular, might better leave to the orchestra, for which its noble noise was intended by the composer. Let it be said that last night's audience responded to the transcribed noise with howls of delight and refused to quit the hall until the Sauer mashed fingers had essayed the added difficulties of a brilliant waltz for encore.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave yesterday its third matinée at Carnegie Hall, will be heard to-night in its third evening concert with complete change of the instrumental programme. M. Saléza, tenor of the Grau company, is the soloist. The concerts will be reviewed in this column to-morrow.

The New York Times

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JAN. 19, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Third Matinee Given at Carnegie Hall Yesterday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinée at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon under difficulties. In the first place Mme. Milka Ternina, the famous Wagnerian soprano of the Ellis Opera Company, had been announced to sing, and continued illness compelled a change at the last moment. A satisfactory substitute was found in M. Saleza, the admirable tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House. The next trouble which confronted the orchestra was a wreck on the railway by which the organization came from Baltimore (where its last concert had been given) to New York. This wreck compelled a détour of something like 150 miles and a consequent late arrival at the hall. The instruments which were shipped did not arrive till 1:30 o'clock or after, and Mr. Gericke, the conductor, was unwilling to go on with the concert without a brief rehearsal. Hence the doors were kept closed till this rehearsal could be held, and some of the audience had to wait outside before being able to gain admission to the music room.

When the concert finally did get under way, it was as interesting and agreeable as the concerts of this organization usually are. The orchestral numbers were Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture, and Brahms's waltzes, Opus 30, arranged for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston band. The solo numbers, sung by M. Saleza, were an air from Reyer's "Sigurd," lately heard at a Sunday night concert, and "En vain, Pharaon," from Méhul's "Joseph." Mendelssohn's Italian symphony is very calm and unexciting music for a town throbbing with Nibelungs and gods of Norse mythology, but its suave and melodious measures, played with the perfection of polish yesterday, were very reposeful. The "Faust" overture was performed excellently and the waltzes proved to have been scored with great skill. M. Saleza was in fine voice and he sang both his numbers with most artistic skill and taste. He will repeat them at to-night's concert, but the orchestral numbers will all be different from those played yesterday.

Th[illegible] Times

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 17, 1899.

DAMROSCH ATTACKED BY ANTICIPATION

A Letter Discrediting His Ability as a Symphony Conductor.

To the Editor of THE TIMES:

Vigorous efforts are being made by a number of persons to establish a permanent orchestra in Philadelphia. The plan proposed, however, seems ill considered and for every reason fatal to the best musical interests of this city.

The plan calls for the raising of an endowment fund of one hundred thousand dollars, or possibly more, wherewith to establish permanently in this city, in a body, the New York Symphony Orchestra, now playing here acceptably in grand opera.

Will you allow us to call attention in your columns to the chief points involved and to some of the dangers of the proposed scheme?

First. A great city of the size and importance of Philadelphia should be content with nothing short of an orchestra of the first class, one that would in reasonable time rank with the greatest of the world. This is the end desired by all.

Second. But the very fact that the orchestra proposed to be brought here has been trained for years under one conductor, and yet achieved no great results as a symphony orchestra, is one of the strongest arguments against its permanent establishment in Philadelphia as an orchestra of the first class.

Third, It is evident that it would cost more to import a colony of players who have no other means of support than their orchestra salaries than to employ equally good men at home who have good local avenues of teaching or of other playing. The only result would be, without affording superior orchestral material, to interfere, by a foreign glamour and by a false prestige, with legitimate business of our own musicians.

Fourth. It is well known that Philadelphia possesses a large number of very excellent players, some with an international reputation. Most of these men cannot afford to play in our present organizations, finding better living through outside work. A careful review of the orchestral forces now in the city shows the possibility of obtaining at least forty men as a nucleus, who under a conductor of conspicuous ability, experience and the highest ideals, would soon rank with the best men of any orchestra. Merit, and merit alone, ought to be the basis of membership in the new orchestra; but let Philadelphia be first searched—after that, the rest of the world. Philadelphia musicians have no objection whatever to the arrival of superior musicians from abroad. This would be part of a reasonable plan for a genuine Philadelphia symphony orchestra. But citizenship combined with musicianship certainly deserves the first opportunity. Under the guise of a public benefit it would be a fatal blow to Philadelphia music to disregard whatever of high musicianship the city has already produced. It would be a blow from which the musicians of Philadelphia would probably never recover. The end in view is to develop music in Philadelphia, not to aid in the support of an organization from another city, where it has neither high standing nor sufficient employment.

Fifth. One alleged argument in favor of the proposed scheme is the advantage of starting with a trained orchestra as a nucleus. Now this is really a distinct disadvantage. The very function of a leader of the first ability is to take his men as units and by patient and skillful training and direction mould them into a united and original band.

Sixth. The leader must be of the highest ability, an interpreter of symphonies and of absolute music par excellence. There would seem to be no special recommendation for such a post in a man who has given nearly all his work and love to another branch of music. In opera Mr. Walter Damrosch and his men have earned the thanks of the city, and there is no reason or desire to encroach on his proper field. But in symphony conducting a special training is required. It is the invariable equipment of all the prominent leaders in Europe. It would be easy to choose a man from such a list as Richter, Weingaertner, Mottl, Paur, Franz Kneisel and others.

Seventh. It is clearly the duty of those who criticise one plan to suggest a better one. From the facts and figures before us, furnished us by the management of America's two greatest symphony orchestras, Boston and Chicago, we have gathered that the average annual deficit in both cases has been about thirty thousand dollars. The deficit has ranged from a few thousand to fifty thousand dollars, but the average over a number of years is as stated. This sum is really less than has often been subscribed to a season of opera in Philadelphia. In Boston one man bears the entire burden. In Chicago the expense is shared by many.

It is proposed, hereby, to rouse the sense of civic pride in our own artistic ability, which has been long dormant in Philadelphia, and to urge the subscription, by representative groups of public-spirited citizens, of a fund sufficient to meet the deficits incurred in the maintenance of a first-class Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra for a term of years. Respectfully,

Mrs. E. D. Gillespie, Celeste D. Heckscher, Mrs. Charles Davis Clark, Elizabeth C. Easby, Nina Lea, Clifford Lewis, Thilo Von Westernhagen, Philip H. Goepp, Joseph Spencer Brock.

Prominent women on the committee of the permanent orchestra scheme who were interviewed on the subject think that the foregoing complaints are not only premature, but unfounded, for the reason that no steps have as yet been taken by the committee to do aught else than raise what it considers a proper and sufficient guarantee for the promotion of a permanent orchestra. After that guarantee has been secured the committee will proceed to the best of its judgment in the completion of the project, which will include, first, the engagement of a conductor, and, second, the engagement of the men. As to the conductor, no matter what the public belief may be on the subject, no name has as yet come before the committee for discussion, and these ladies are emphatic in their statement that no organization, as such, will be engaged in a body. They say that the best musicians of the city will receive equal consideration with the best available players that offer, whether they come from Kalamazoo, Philadelphia, Berlin or Paris. They think that the attack made through the press, which seeks to discredit the project by misrepresentation, is at least ill-advised and premature, and might better have been withheld until the committee had given the public something definite. This, they state, will be after the next committee meeting, and in the very near future. It will then be seen that had this letter, now published, been withheld for a few days longer its publication would not have appeared necessary, even to the signers.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ternina Again Disappoints—Sauer's Triumph in Henselt Concerto.

As Gadski has for the past two weeks substituted for Ternina, who is still confined to her room through illness, without causing the public any disappointment, even so Emil Sauer, who at the last moment was secured as the soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music last night, not only allayed all disappointment which might have been entertained through the continued illness of the unfortunate prima donna, but he achieved nothing short of a triumph, and at the end of the concerto was recalled at least six times, amid the cheers of an audience whom he had won through his unequaled excellence as a pianist. He made his debut in New York last Tuesday. He had been heralded to that public and much had been expected from him. He conquered there, and here, where he comes as a surprise, being practically unknown to all save the well informed musician, his success was a virtual triumph. He is a master of phrase and rhythm, a poetical dreamer who produces his effects with an electrical power which alternates only with the tender caress of his touch in subdued passages. He has a pianissimo of unsurpassed delicacy and actual distinctness. Above all, he is an artist like Busoni, who, being superlatively great as a virtuoso, at the same time makes his instrument an integral and consistent part of the composition he essays. He played the Henselt concerto in F minor and its most difficult problem, whether in astounding arpeggio passage work, whether in octaves with the well-nigh superhuman arpeggi rising and falling in extension on the left hand or the delivery of the great melody in the second movement in double and treble octaves, were delivered by him with a repose and mastery that know no challenge among modern pianists. It was in the final movement that he succeeded in exciting an enthusiasm that could hardly await the conclusion of the number, where, after the free fantasia, the exaggerated octave and cord passages, played with a free arm and perfection of poise, established this new name as a meteor in the exclusive constellation of great piano stars.

Wilhelm Gericke resumed his position at the conductor's desk and showed no signs of his recent protracted illness. He conducted a programme consisting of Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F major, Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme, and the prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

The work of the orchestra was but a repetition of its well-established reputation for sufficiency in musical ethics, and the niceties of its conversational utterances were never more clearly marked. The intrinsic beauties of the Dvorak Symphonic poem were given a charm and grace that heretofore had remained undiscovered and the Meistersinger selection terminated one of the best concerts ever given here by the band with an incomparably balanced presentation of its beautifully interwoven themes.

Acting upon a proposition made last season, it has now been definitely determined by the management of this superb orchestra to give ten concerts next season. A concert on Friday evening will be added to the regular Monday concert. Each programme will be similar in character to those given this season, but made up of entirely different compositions.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The
Commercial Advertiser Association.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 19, 1899.

Red noses and blue lips were prevalent at the beginning of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The band had been delayed by a wreck and reached Carnegie Hall only a few minutes before the time set for the beginning of the concert. Saléza, who took the place of Ternina, still a victim of the grip, had to rehearse with the band, and a thousand or more women with a few men hung patiently outside around the closed doors waiting to get in. It was unavoidable, perhaps, but it was unfortunate.

The concert, once begun, was very pleasing, without being particularly heavy. Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony is melodious and charming, and to listen to it does not tax the strength of an audience. It seemed yesterday as if the orchestra played it only in a spirit of toleration, after the fashion in which Mendelssohn is regarded nowadays. It was played with great suavity and polish, but it seemed to lack spontaneity. Wagner's Faust overture, on the contrary, rose to emotional heights such as one is unaccustomed to look for from Mr. Gericke. In this all the superb tonal beauty of the band was made evident, and some of the effects gained were ravishing in their charm.

The final number on the programme was Mr. Gericke's transcription of Brahms's four-hand pianoforte waltzes. The transcription is a clever, legitimate piece of work, so made as to show the great virtuosity of the band and yet preserve the spirit and delicacy of the original. The waltzes, as played, were altogether charming, and the arrangement will be a valuable addition to orchestral literature.

Mr. Saléza was a most acceptable substitute of Fraulein Ternina. He sang the familiar aria from Reyer's Sigurd and one from Mehul's Joseph in Egypt. He was in good voice, and won unstinted applause for his work.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

THURSDAY EVENING, JAN. 19, 1899.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reappeared here yesterday afternoon, for the first time since his recent illness and, with his fine body of musicians, received a cordial welcome from a good audience at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke has lost none of his energy and his control of the orchestra remains easy and complete.

The concert yesterday brought forward as its final number an interesting addition to the local repertory in a set of Brahms waltzes originally written under the title of "XVI. waltzes for the Pianoforte for four hands," opus 39, but now presented in an orchestral garb written by Mr. Gericke in the course of his first term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from 1884 to 1889. Of the sixteen waltzes, Mr. Gericke scored fourteen, omitting Nos. 7 and 16, the orchestration being gauged to the size of a room in a private house, for a performance in which the arrangement was originally made. Later, Mr. Gericke added parts enough to make the series available for large halls.

It is proverbial that the orchestration of a conductor, as contrasted with that of a composer, who has little experience in leading bands, is apt to be the more daring, or at least the more legitimately difficult and often more effective. Weingartner's scores are a case in point, though his results, as in the Weber "Invitation to the Dance," are not always happy. But to those who knew Mr. Gericke's temperament it was no surprise to find in Mr. Gericke's orchestration, instead of merely startling effects, numerous delightful touches, such as the piquant assumption of the air by the harp in one of the early waltzes of the group. Singularly well has Mr. Gericke preserved the spirit of these charming waltzes of Brahms. One is loath to think how blatant and uninspired some of them would sound with an orchestral setting less discreet and less in accord with the sober yet delicate beauty of the Viennese master's style. The continence and dignity and the unfailing appropriateness of Mr. Gericke's setting are a lesson to smaller men. The Boston orchestra played the waltzes with the swing and movement exactly necessary to their best expression.

The soloist at yesterday's concert was to have been Miss Ternina, the fine young dramatic soprano of the Ellis Opera Company, who was heard here with Walter Damrosch's troupe nearly three years ago. Miss Ternina has been ill for a number of weeks, and in fact has been unable to take part in the Philadelphia season. Two days ago it was announced that M. Albert Saleza, the tenor of the Maurice Grau Opera Company, would replace her. M. Saleza sang an aria from Ernest Reyer's opera "Sigurd" and a more familiar one from Mehul's "Joseph in Egypt." M. Saleza's voice was in good condition and he put to his credit two good pieces of work. His careful phrasing and his sureness as to pitch, together with the lovely quality of his voice, won him applause that was deserved.

The more weighty numbers on the programme were the "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn, in which Mr. Gericke's feeling for classification stood him in good stead; and "A Faust Overture" of Wagner, in which the noble strings of the Boston Orchestra made themselves felt in no halfhearted way.

At to-night's Boston Symphony concert, the orchestral programme will be different, but the solo numbers the same.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted music lovers in large numbers to Carnegie Hall yesterday.

M. Albert Salèza was the soloist in place of Fräulein Ternina, who is ill. His singing of arias from Reyer's "Sigurd" and Mehul's "Joseph in Egypt" elicited the only enthusiastic applause of the afternoon, and it was well deserved, for he sang with admirable breadth of tone and freedom from restraint, exhibiting his fresh and charming voice to great advantage. His enunciation is commendable for its distinctness.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture," and some Brahms waltzes scored by Mr. Gericke were the orchestral numbers. The snap and unanimity with which this organization usually plays were not as apparent in yesterday's work as they usually are, but the orchestra produces enjoyable effects even when the men are not in the best trim.

They gave the symphony well, the brass being especially good in the third movement. The overture was rather tamely rendered; it lacked some of the warmth which the music requires. The Brahms waltzes, heard here for the first time in their present form, make a pleasing number; the orchestration is effective, the harp being well used.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - - - - - JANUARY 17, 1899

SAUER, THE PIANIST

His First Appearance Last Night With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

We have no hesitation in pronouncing Emil Sauer a great pianist. He came here much heralded, and so far as the brief experience of last night can determine, justified what was said of him. Manifestly, however, it is impossible to give his full measure as an artist without a more extended acquaintance. It would be a poor artist who could not make a good impression, backed by Mr. Gericke's orchestra, but it would be unfair to give environment the credit for last night's piano work. The number selected was Henselt's concerto in F minor, opus 13, a beautiful composition, sufficiently varied to bring out both the virtuosity of Mr. Sauer as well as his temperamental moods. He is a vigorous player, with a nervous, almost electrical manner of using his arms and head, which adds to his individuality. In appearance he has the long, crinkly hair of Paderewski, but his face resembles the composers of the early part of the century. In forte passages he has a peculiar dynamic method which accentuates each note but does not produce too great volume. His technique is faultless, and his temperament is pleasing. His feathery octaves remind one partly of Joseffy and somewhat of Paderewski, though he does not produce the singing, harp-like quality of tone so characterisitc of the latter artist.

General Arnold arrived at Havana yesterday to take command of the second division of the Seventh Army Corps.

The audience rose to him, and he is likely to prove as deservedly popular as some of the great artists who have preceded him. He played the concerto beautifully throughout, preserving the identity of the piano in every passage.

As has just been said he is a great pianist, and we believe a great artist. This single appearance gives evidence of a wide range of power, and when he comes in recital we shall be ready to be convinced that he is all that has been claimed for him. He was certainly delightful last night.

The orchestral numbers were Brahm's Symphony, No. 3; Dvorak's Symphonic Variations, opus 78, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." These are all modern compositions, and as varied as is possible. The symphony is a masterpiece of composition, but not particularly delectable music. Dvorak's variations are less carefully composed, but particularly delightful, covering as they do, so wide a range of sentiment. The prelude is one of Wagner's most beautiful productions. Mr. Gericke was warmly greeted; his orchestra played faultlessly, and the evening was one of especial delight.

As the seats for the season were sold out before the first concert, Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee said last night that the orchestra next year would give ten concerts instead of five, the additional five being on Friday nights. The concerts will be on the same high plane, but the programs will be different. This is done in response to the liberal patronage here, and the success of similar arrangements this season in Boston, Brooklyn and New York.

New-York Daily Tribune.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Gericke and his admirable men from Boston labored under disadvantages when they gave their concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. They came from Baltimore, where they played on Tuesday evening and expected to arrive in New-York at early breakfast time, as usual, but a railway accident interfered, and they reached the metropolis an hour before noon. Mme. Ternina, of Mr. Ellis's opera company, had been announced as the solo performer of the concert and that of this evening, but Mme. Ternina was ill, and M. Saléza, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was secured as a substitute. In that circumstance, as results demonstrated, there was no loss to the public in artistic enjoyment, but the need of a rehearsal occasioned by the change caused a wait of nearly half an hour, which the people who wanted to hear the concert endured in the corridors of the hall and on the sidewalk, while the tenor ran through his two solos with the orchestra. Then came a concert which was wholly gratifying. The orchestra played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust Ouvertüre" and a set of Brahms's waltzes superbly, and M. Saléza sang an air from Reyer's "Sigurd" and "Vainement Pharaon" from Méhul's "Joseph" in a manner that excited the greatest enthusiasm. The symphony sounded old-fashioned, of course, but there was an unexpected (and therefore the more delightful) muscularity in the overture, and with the waltzes, arranged by Mr. Gericke from the original setting for pianoforte four hands (op. 39), Mr. Gericke put to shame all those who would make us believe that Brahms is always austere.

The New York Times

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JAN. 20, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The orchestral numbers were Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," Brahms's third symphony, F major; Dvorak's "Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The soloist was M. Saleza, tenor of the opera, who sang the same numbers as he had sung the previous afternoon—an air from Reyer's "Sigurd," and another from Mehul's "Joseph." The best work of the orchestra was done in the Brahms symphony, which was played superbly. In the "Meistersinger" prelude Mr. Gericke's conducting was somewhat too rigid. M. Saleza was in fine voice and sang admirably.

The Philadelphia Press

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme Rendered with Sauer as the Soloist.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last evening, saw Mr. Gericke restored to health and at his post as conductor, while poor Ternina was still unable to appear, and in her place Sauer, the much lauded Hamburg pianist, made his first bow—and thére was a good deal of it what with his hair and his arms—to a Philadelphia audience. Save for the symphonic variations of Dvorak, which grow a little wearisome in spite of the genius of the composer and the exploitation of the orchestra, the programme was a scholarly and thoughtful selection, Brahms' very melodious third symphony in F major leading the list. This was read by Mr. Gericke in a very contemplative manner with somewhat of classical reserve. The simple andante was suavely interpreted and the contrasts of color and figuration in the very dramatic final movement splendidly brought out.

The concluding number of the orchestra was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was interpreted in the concert room style, a greater balance and evenness of tone being observable as compared with the more insistent effects on the bass, with which we are familiar in the opera orchestra. It was given with fine swing, and the conclusion well worked up. The soloist chose for his selection Henselt's concerto in F minor, which hardly gave him the opportunity to run the full gamut of virtuosity or to do many of the remarkable things with the piano or his audience which are laid at his door. He may out-Paderewski Paderewski, but hardly in the Henselt concerto. Though he has an aureole of brown hair and a smooth face his mannerisms are not offensive and in spite of all the pother over him it is clear Sauer is a pianist of high rank; an artist whose technical work is perfect, and who has much sentiment and real feeling. He has a very striking manner of concluding his final phrases with a certain dash that is most effective, but for the most part he delights with the grace and elegance of his digital diction and charms by his tonal contrast and his clean and sure methods. He seemed to like the Henselt concerto and made the most out of the second movement, which allowed the player to show his feeling as well as his power, though nowhere was there any chance at sheer virtuosity. The regulation enthusiasm of the typical Boston Symphony concert audience delighted as well as embarrassed the German, but he stuck to his recalls bravely and shook his mane in fine style, but very sensibly gave no encore.

The great turnout in spite of the rain last night called attention to the fact that all records have been broken this year by the orchestra, for whose five concerts every seat in the Academy of Music was sold for the season a month before the first concert. Because of this remarkable state of affairs, and in deference to hundreds of patrons unable to secure seats, Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee, in an interview yesterday, made the interesting announcement of the intention of the orchestra, to give next season, two series of five concerts each at the Academy of Music, the first on Monday evenings as usual, and the second on Friday evenings of the same week. Each concert will be exactly the same in character as the concerts given this year, but with two distinctly different programmes. The same scale of prices as heretofore will prevail, and, as has resulted in Boston, New York and Brooklyn, where double series have been given, many patrons will undoubtedly attend both.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, January 17, 1899.

Boston Symphony—Academy of Music.

Wilhelm Gericke resumed his baton as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert given last evening at the Academy of Music, and the soloist of the occasion was Emil Sauer, a pianist new to Philadelphia audiences, but who comes to us with laurels gained in other places. Mr. Sauer's presence last evening was due to the illness of Fraulein Milka Ternina, who was billed originally to sing. It is hard to criticise Mr. Sauer's playing, merely because of its excellence. He is a master of technique, and has soul as well, so that his performance took his hearers by storm. The selection chosen by him was Adolph Henselt's Concerto in F minor, a work which enabled him to display every phase of his mastery over his instrument. Particularly noticeable were Mr. Sauer's piano passages, in which the shading was something really marvelous. The concert opened with Brahms' Symphony No. 3, in F major, and included also symphonic variations on an original theme by Dvorak and the prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

All records having been broken this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for whose five concerts every seat in the Academy of Music was sold for the season a month before the first concert, Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee announces that next season two series of five concerts each will be given at the Academy, the first on Monday evenings, as usual, and the second on Friday evenings of the same week. Each concert will be exactly the same in character as the concents given this year, but with two distinctly different programmes.

Telegram.

HIGH WATER MARK
Circulation . . 320,000

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1899.

The third matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was scheduled to take place at two o'clock, at Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon, and shortly before that hour lovers of the music made by that splendid organization flocked to the concert hall. To their astonishment they were not permitted to pass the golden gates—brass chain. The guardians of the gates stood there; courteously but firmly forbidding anyone passing beyond the foyer. An occasional faint echo of music from within floated through the crevices and was heard by the waiting crowd. People asked themselves and each other what the meaning of the new order of things could be. Had all the clocks in New York deceived them? Could it be they were late, and, in accordance with some new rule of which they were ignorant, the public was to be excluded until the close of the number in progress?

Mr. Corni, the genial assistant manager of the orchestra, appeared on the scene and explained the difficulty while apologizing for the delay in permitting the public to enter. "There had been a wreck on the road," he said, "which had delayed their arrival in New York until but a short while ago. They were rehearsing with the soloist," he continued, "and would finish in a very few minutes. Would they kindly excuse the unavoidable delay?" At twenty minutes past two the barring chains were removed and the doors thrown open. The audience, a large one, was quickly seated and the concert began.

Mr. Gericke made his first reappearance since his recent illness, and was given a hearty welcome. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, "Italian," which was given a superb rendition. The men may have been tired after their tedious trip from Baltimore, where they were heard Tuesday night, but they did not play as if they were. The beautiful ensemble playing of the orchestra was never more perfect. The work of this organization is not of kind but of degree, and it was superlatively good in the Allegro and the beautiful plaintive Andante of the symphony. Mr. Gericke is at his best in works of this kind. The orchestra also played Eine Faust Overture by Richard Wagner, and the Brahms waltzes, op. 39, most interestingly scored for orchestra by Mr. Gericke. Frl. Ternina, who was originally advertised to sing, did not appear. Ever since Frl. Ternina's arrival in this country, about four weeks ago, she has been suffering from a cold and has not yet been able to sing.

Her place on the programme was most ably filled by M. Saleza, of the Maurice Grau Opera Company. He was heard in an arie from the opera "Sigurd," by Reyer, and one from "Joseph in Egypt," by Mehul, and completely captivated the audience with his pure, vibrant tenor voice and fine dramatic singing.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 20, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York at its present visit took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. There was an audience present that proved that the opera, even when the Nibelung music-dramas are in course of production, unabridged, does not monopolize all the musical culture of the town, for it seemed scarcely less numerous than it has been on the previous visits of the orchestra this season. It was rewarded by a concert of altogether uncommon interest. Brahms's vigorous and overflowingly melodious third symphony was the number of chief importance, and it received an interpretation that stood at the summit of the Boston Orchestra's achievements in euphony, and in the loving elaboration of all the details of its structure and its rhythmic characteristics. Mr. Gericke conducted not only this, but particularly the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger," with unwonted fire and energy. The latter was a splendidly muscular reading, and suffered only from the somewhat unyielding character of his tempo, which gave less of dramatic modification than we are accustomed to. Dvorak's set of Symphonic Variations was played in not quite its original length, seven of the variations—according to the annotator of the programme—being omitted. These variations are a remarkable product of the composer's fertility of fancy and ingenuity in treating the orchestra in such a way as to engross the attention in the outcomings of a theme that is not only not beautiful in itself, but rather almost positively ugly. Of course, it was brilliantly played, with the fullest realization of all the orchestral effects contemplated by the composer.

M. Saléza was again the solo singer, in place of Fräulein Ternina, and sang the same pieces as on Wednesday afternoon—arias from Reyer's "Sigurd" and Méhul's "Joseph in Egypt"—with the same plenitude of vocal power and fine musical feeling that won an enthusiastic tribute of applause from the audience, especially the Sigurd aria, after which he was recalled again and again.

PUBLIC LEDGER AND DAILY TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Jan. 17, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Emil Sauer Makes His Philadelphia Debut.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra we have frequently though none too often with us. But Emil Sauer does not favor us with like regularity, and so it happened that at last night's concert the German pianist was the lion of the evening. Herr Sauer made his first appearance in this country last Tuesday, in New York, and played, amongst other numbers, Beethoven's concerto in E flat. Why he should not have done likewise here, instead of giving us Adolph Henselt's archaic concerto in F minor, is best known to himself.

As an illustration of peculiar effects in widespread chords, and as affording an opportunity for the display of technical ability, it has its value, but there are so many infinitely more interesting works that the choice was hardly a happy one. It was apparent, however, even with the first few notes, that a master was at the piano. The instrument was his to do with as he would. Tone, touch, feeling, expression; all were there in their highest and most poetic development, and with them a masterly surety of power.

Herr Sauer commanded attention from the first moment. He plays with a great deal of dash, and always in perfect accord with the orchestra. He is equally brilliant in the clarity and softness, the deft daintiness of his pianissimo effects in scales, as he is with the thundrous melody of his bass. Sauer is a great artist, one of the world's greatest, and we hope soon to have the pleasure of listening to him again, with a better opportunity of judging of his powers.

Herr Sauer is a little inconsiderate, perhaps, in the matter of encores, and though far from wishing to aid or abet the encore nuisance, it seems to us that it would have been a graceful recognition of the enthusiastic applause with which he was received last night had he sat down and played a Chopin nocturne, a Schubert impromptu, a Mendelssohn lieder, a rhapsodie of Liszt's, anything—something just to give an indication of his own powers and his own sentiment without an orchestral accompaniment.

The programme for the orchestra included Brahm's Symphony in F major (No. 3) Dvorak's Symphonic variations on an original theme (op. 78) and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." The latter was a perfect illustration of how Wagner's beautiful overture should be played.

More Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Assistant Manager Fred. R. Comee stated yesterday that it was the intention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor, to give next season two series of five concerts each at the Academy of Music, the first on Monday evenings as usual, and the second on Friday evenings of the same week. Each concert will be exactly the same in character as the concerts given this year, but with two distinctly different programmes.

The Evening Post.

New York, Thursday, January 19, 1899.

Three musical entertainments were given yesterday, each one of which was of considerable interest, but none of which presented any important feature that calls for extended comment. About ten minutes past two Carnegie Hall presented a strange aspect. The steps and the sidewalk in front of the hall were crowded with music-lovers who tried in vain to get in, though the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert was announced to begin at two o'clock precisely. Was anybody ill? had the orchestra struck for higher terms?—these and other questions were asked. As a matter of fact the orchestra was within rehearsing with the soloist, M. Saléza. This important function was to have taken place earlier in the day, but an accident to a train delayed the orchestra on its way from Baltimore. The soloist originally engaged for this concert and to-night's was M. Alvarez, but as he was unable to be present Frl. Ternina was secured. At the last moment she became indisposed, so that M. Saléza was engaged. He sang with great energy and vocal excellence airs by Reyer and Méhul, adding to the laurels he has won at the opera. M. Gericke and his men gave a placid performance of Mendelssohn's Italian symphony and a set of uninspired Brahms waltzes—interminable and monotonous. Wagner's "Faust" overture had a clear and logical interpretation. At this evening's concert Brahms's third symphony will be the longest number, and M. Saléza again the soloist.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE.

M. Saleza was the soloist at the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday. He sang with excellent expression an aria from Reyer's "Sigurd" and an aria from Mehul's "Joseph in Egypt."

The orchestra, under Wilhelm Gericke's direction, played with its customary finish Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and Brahms' "Liebeslieder" waltzes scored for orchestra by Mr. Gericke.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 22, 1899.

His Work for the Symphony Concerts.

As the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Col. Higginson's name is known all over the continent as the author of an enterprise which has made the name of this city synonymous with music, and justified its pround title to the name of "Athens of America." The scheme for giving the city a distinctive musical life of its own was evolved by him, and the execution of it carried out from year to year by him with characteristic persistence and energy. With a system of changing from time to time the conductors of the concerts, but leaving to each one during his administration the almost entire management of the details of the enterprise, Col. Higginson succeeded in wedding to the cause of the Symphony Concerts the interests of fashionable Boston, and making a permanent institution that which others had failed to make enduring.

The pasage of the Rapid Transit bill by the Legislature in 1893 threatened the Symphony Concerts with interruption, if not making them altogether a thing of the past. It seemed altogether likely at that time that the city would take the Music Hall for this scheme. Col. Higginson had a conference with Mayor Matthews and immediately was convinced of the necessity of speedy action if he was to be sure of carrying on the concerts of the orchestra. A number of public-spirited men who realized the abject poverty to which musical Boston would be reduced should these sweet sounds be hushed, banded themselves together to provide a hall suited to succeed Music Hall as a temple of music. An option was taken on the vacant land at the corner of West Chester Park (now Massachusetts Avenue) and Huntington Avenue, adjoining the Children's Hospital grounds, and a call was issued for subscriptions amounting to $400,000 to insure the immediate building of a new Music Hall upon this site. In accordance with a vote passed at a stockholders' meeting the ensuing January, the Directors of the new Boston Music Hall, of whom Col. Higginson was the leading one, bought and paid for the lot of land by the Children's Hospital and submitted later for consideration a model prepared by McKim, Mead & White. But although the Directors during the year following gave much time and attention to various matters connected with the new hall, they were unwilling, for business reasons, to advise the stockholders to adopt a plan and begin the building.

When it had seemed probable that the city would take Music Hall for the rapid transit scheme, the generous and prompt subscription of $400,000 for a new hall guaranteed the Symphony concerts a permanent home, and precipitancy was not desirable. When a few months later the rapid transit scheme failed, and the lot on Huntington Avenue was purchased, it became well-known that the old Music Hall was for sale, as Col. Higginson and the other owners of its stock were not willing to maintain it much longer as a public hall. During the year 1894 the owners of the old hall gave an option on the property for conversion into an arcade of shops. But existing business conditions were unfavorable to the scheme, and this option was allowed to expire.

As diligent calculation did not make it appear that the income of the old Music Hall as a public auditorium would ever be sufficient to pay its current expenses, for taxes and administration, the Directors were unwilling to advise to build until the fate of the old hall was settled. Last March the question was settled by the sale of Music Hall to the Boston Real Estate Trust for the sum of $450,000.

One of the stipulations of the sale of this venerable building was that for the space of two years the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have the use of the auditorium for their regular concerts. The necessity for expediting progress upon the new Music Hall was therefore done away with. Thus was the terror of homelessness once more averted by the foresight of Col. Higginson.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Boston Symphony's Concert This Evening.

Throughout all of yesterday there was a steady stream of persons passing in and out of the amusement ticket office, No. 13 North Charles Street, purchasing seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestral Concert, at Music Hall tonight. Ticket Agent Albaugh reports the sale as unusually large, and the house is expected to be among the most brilliant of the season. The noteworthy program, arranged by Conductor Wilhelm Gericke, who has recovered from his illness and resumed his place at the desk, offered at this concert, including such masterpieces as Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," will be enhanced by the performance of Henselt's piano forte concerto, in F. minor, by Mr. Emil Sauer, the distinguished European pianist.

As has been stated in The American, this will be the second appearance of Sauer in America, and is looked forward to with many pleasing anticipations by the lovers of piano-playing in Baltimore. The Beethoven symphony will be given in its entirety, with the full strength of the orchestra, and also a series of Brahm's waltzes, which have been especially scored for the Boston musicians by Mr. Gericke.

THE QUESTION OF SOLOISTS

Director Randolph, Of The Peabody Conservatory, Gives His Views On The Subject.

Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, writes to THE SUN as follows:

"It is impossible for a genuine lover of music to pass over the letter in THE SUN of Thursday concerning the soloists at the Boston Symphony concerts without entering a protest. Even from the purely business standpoint, the writer is wrong. Can it be considered good business policy to invest a thousand dollars or so in some great star, such as Melba, Nordica or Lehmann, when experience proves that, in Baltimore at least, only about five or six hundred dollars increase in the usual receipts may be looked for? Is it to be supposed that the vast audience assembled at Music Hall at the last concert came for the pleasure to be derived from listening to a great artist? It is safe to say that ninety-nine out of every hundred of those who are not regular attendants of these concerts came out of curiosity to see a man who had been advertised as has no other public performer since the days of Barnum. It happens that Sauer is a great artist, but let us see when he comes for his recital in March whether, having once satisfied its curiosity, the public will flock in such numbers.

"I would also like to ask who are some of the 'nonentities' who are spoken of as having figured as soloists at these concerts? I cannot recall one—unless the fact that he or she were unknown to the average citizen who makes no pretense of keeping up with the musical world, be taken as proof of incompetence.

"Then as to the members of the orchestra appearing as soloists. Does it work the other way in this instance, and the mere fact of their being familiar to the audience incapacitate them? One might search America and Europe over without finding a better violinist than Franz Kneisel or a better 'cellist than Alvin Schroeder. Timothee Adamowski, too, is considered good enough in London and Paris to serve as solo attraction at the very best concerts to be heard there, orchestral and otherwise. These three are the only ones so far to whom we have had the pleasure of listening.

"Last, but by no means least, is a great orchestra to be looked upon merely as a background for the soloist? the surrounding darkness which shall make the star shine the more brightly? In Europe the few orchestras that can claim equality with the Boston orchestra—for it has no superior—very frequently give concerts without any soloist whatever. It is even conceivable that when we are better educated in such matters we will come to look upon the exploitation of a solo player as an impertinence in a symphony concert, as the thrusting of a trivial personality between us and true art."

IN ANOTHER LIGHT

"The Moral Of Sauer" As Viewed By "Another Lover Of Music."

"Another Lover of Music" writes as follows:

"The striking illustration of the importance of having a high-class soloist at symphony concerts like those of the Boston organization to produce successful financial results makes me look upon musical matters in Baltimore in a different light from the 'Music Lover' who writes to THE SUN. The question, What does it mean? seems pertinent enough and easily answered. The Boston Orchestra, as it now stands, with Gericke as its leader, is unsurpassed either in this country or in Europe; in fact, there are few European cities who can boast of organizations of equal merit.

"With unlimited capital at his command, Mr. Higginton, the promoter of the orchestra, has been able to secure for it the best talent of both this country and Europe. Mr. Gericke, the leader, is a man of international reputation. Now, does it speak well for the musical taste of Baltimore that it takes an artist like Sauer to fill Music Hall at one of the symphony concerts? Among a population of half a million there certainly ought to be enough true lovers of music to constitute a large audience without the aid of such a celebrity.

"We all love to hear the best the musical world has to offer, but the question which was foremost in my mind when I was working my way through the crowd on Tuesday night was: Why is an orchestra like the Boston Symphony compelled to depend for its financial success in Baltimore solely upon the excellence of its soloists? The answer—or, rather, the inference to be drawn—is that Baltimore is not the equal in musical culture of such cities as Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and the large Western cities, where this orchestra has always played to crowded houses, no matter who the soloists were."

News

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Franz Kneisel Will Conduct It During December.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has been ill in Boston for some time with the grippe. He is now recovering, but will not be sufficiently strong to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its December tour. His place will be taken by Mr. Franz Kneisel, whose abilities are well known.

Mr. Willy Burmester, the violinist, will appear with the orchestra at the concert at Music Hall on Tuesday evening, December 13. The programme will be as follows:

Schubert—Symphony No. 9, in C major.
  I. Andante—Allegro, ma non troppo.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.—Trio.
  IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for Violin.
MacDowell—Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," Op. 25.
Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

[illegible] MORAL OF SAUER

Striking Illustration Of The Importance Of Having A High-Class Soloist At Symphony Concerts.

"Music Lover" writes to THE SUN as follows:

"The splendid audience that was present at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening should cause the management of that organization to reflect upon what the concert-goers of this city desire. I have been told today on the very best authority that the receipts at this concert were larger than at any previous appearance of the Symphony Orchestra. The question, What does it mean? seems pertinent.

"The orchestral programme offered nothing exceptional, but there was announced an artist as soloist who is already a celebrity—a man of international reputation and a pianist whose performance during the few days since his arrival in this country shows that he is able to sustain this reputation. It was the soloist, therefore, who brought the people and it was undoubtedly he who gave the most pleasure.

"This in no way is meant as disparagement of the playing of the band, which is always of the highest class, but as has been pointed out from time to time in your paper, there is too great an air of complacency about the orchestra. To the average subscriber to these concerts an entire evening of orchestral music is an imposition unless it is varied by a soloist who has something that is really interesting to present. The nonentities who have figured all too frequently on the programmes do not fulfill the demands and as a result the concerts have been neglected in a manner that has quite chagrined the Bostonians. It can be fully explained by the neglect of the management to offer soloists who really stand for something in the musical world.

"The case of Sauer points the moral most aptly and the eloquent figures represented by the unparalleled receipts must show the folly of pursuing a policy which is fatal to the influence of the orchestra in this community, when it is easy and immeasurably more profitable to give the public what it has a right to demand from a great orchestra, namely, soloists of the best type.

"Exception was taken last year in very forcible language in the columns of your paper to the appearance of members of the orchestra as soloists, and the justice of the criticism stands undenied. If great artists like Nordica, Melba, Plancon, Ysaye, Ternina and Sauer were brought here regularly, there would no longer be a doubt about the financial success of the series.

"It is, of course, well understood that the orchestra wishes to be recognized as the principal feature of the entertainment and it is somewhat galling to have to confess that it is the soloist who attracts the large audiences, but this should be regarded in a sensible light and the management should be willing to make this concession to popular demands, especially as it in no way interferes with the educational value of the performances nor lessens the appreciation of the good work of the audience by those best able to judge and whose opinion is most valuable.

"As soon as the justice of this demand is recognized by the management of the orchestra, and as soon as it consents to give us artists of the rank of Sauer, the doubt in regard to the appreciation of the Boston Orchestra in Baltimore will disappear."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Franz Kneisel Was The Conductor, In The Absence Of Director Gericke—Burmester's Pleasing Performance.

Franz Kneisel, the much-liked concert master and second in command of the forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, occupied the conductor's rostrum last night at the second concert of the series. Director Gericke has been ill and was unable to undertake the hardships of the monthly tournee of the orchestra.

Schubert's Symphony in C Major, MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," and the overture to Tannhauser constituted the orchestral part of the concert which Mr. Kneisel was called upon to interpret. His sincerity and his appreciative readings of the several numbers showed that his substitution must be regarded in no sense as a makeshift.

He had his men always well in hand, and the evidence of his ability as a conductor was a concert of unusual suggestiveness and beauty.

The Schubert Symphony had been heard before this season, well performed by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, but the repetition brought out beauties which are always worth the seeking in this symphony. The playing of the solo instruments in the wood wind choir, especially in the second movement of the symphony, was one of the events of the evening. The 'cellos, headed by the versatile Alwin Schroeder, showed exquisite unanimity of tone in many places.

Burmester was the soloist—a young man unheralded, but already enjoying a unique reputation in Europe. About three years ago he suddenly flashed into prominence in the Berlin concert field, and the astonishment at his remarkable performance called forth such enthusiastic comments as Paganini Redivivus.

Last night he played the well-known Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E Minor. The impression produced was favorable in the extreme. His methods are very unusual in the matter of many of the technical details of violin playing, but the results more than justify the procedure. His tone, while not extraordinary in volume, has the rarest carrying power, and is almost perfect in its purity. The immense amount of reserve force, always evident, makes the seemingly unsurmountable technical details the merest child's play for him. The soloist, as well as the conductor, were both enthusiastically recalled.

The American representative on the programme, Edward A. MacDowell, has gone to school so persistently to Germany as to lose not only his nationality, but also, in the excerpt last night, his originality. It was "Tristan and Isolde," with an admixture of other "Wagnerisms."

The audience was a large one, although somewhat reduced late in the evening by the adjournment of many of the fashionables to the Tuesday german.

Sun

A TRIUMPH FOR SAUER

Splendid Performance Of The German Pianist With The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The following programme was offered last night at the third concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 4.
Henselt—Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, Op. 16.
Brahms—Waltzes (Scored for Orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke).
Liszt—Les Preludes.

The interest in the concert centred chiefly in the performance of Emil Sauer, the distinguished German pianist, who appeared for the first time in this city.

The soloist chose as his introductory effort the almost forgotten Henselt concerto—a composition by a pianist and for a pianist. It revels in the most bewildering difficulties and, as is remarked by the sage Mr. Apthorp, the compiler of the Boston Symphony programmes, was for many years regarded as the most difficult piano composition in existence. It is not stated what piece has the honor at present of bearing this title.

Divested of the halo that had been arranged for Sauer by his eloquent press agent, he remains an artist of transcendent ability. The danger, in describing his performance, is to become rhapsodical, but viewed in the most severe light, he shows all the elements that go to make up a musician of high degree.

His touch is as varied as the demands of the composition require, but it is at no time unbeautiful. There is abundant reserve force, although severe demands were made upon his power of forcible playing and in the most sonorous passages there is not a tone that is strident nor is there a time when the piano is required to do more than ought to be expected of it. Sauer is especially noted as a pianissimo player and in such phrases it is possible that he is at his best, although there is great difficulty in picking out the prominent excellencies in the performance of such a well-rounded and complete artist.

The enthusiasm that followed the conclusion of each movement was extraordinary for a Baltimore audience, and the event of his first appearance in this city must be regarded as a notable one in local musical history.

The soloist's hands are marvels of strength, although they are not peculiarly the hands of a pianist, the fingers being short and rather thick. The most remarkable part of their anatomy lies in their great breadth and the ability they possess of being stretched. This latter quality was taxed to its utmost limit in the Henselt concerto by the excessive use of arpeggios.

Sauer's manner in playing betrays the deep absorption that he feels for the work in hand. There are now and then mannerisms, but it is safe to say that they are the result of the player's enthusiasm rather than any conscious effort to pose. A very peculiar bow was frequently called into requisition by the applause of the audience. The soloist grasps the piano with one hand, the chair with the other and bends almost down to the ground, causing his errant locks to rise and fall with the movement of the body.

Entirely regardless of the playing of Sauer, the concert was of singular interest. The symphony, the Fourth of Beethoven, has been rarely heard, so that its presentation was doubly interesting. While it has not the absorbing power and charm of its immediate predecessor and successor, it is in the master's most exalted manner and suffers only in consequence of its position in the sequence of his productions. The orchestra failed to get thoroughly awakened to the work until the last movement, which was wonderfully rendered. The first three movements were satisfactory, as the playing of the men from Boston is sure to be, but it was quite evident that the director and his men were very much disturbed and embarrassed by the extraordinary number of late comers, who disregarded the unwritten law that during the performance no one is expected to take his seat.

Director Gericke evidently had a most sympathetic task, but for this reason he was unable to give the full benefit of his thought and study. The Brahms waltzes orchestrated by the director were played with all the care and intelligence that characterizes the orchestra's work.

Liszt's "Les Preludes" concluded the most enjoyable concert of the present season, while the audience was probably larger than has attended a concert of the Boston Orchestra since the opening of Music Hall.

FINDS AMERICA IMPRESSIVE

Sauer, The Pianist, Says This Country Has Been A Revelation To Him.

While in Baltimore Emil Sauer, the distinguished German pianist, is the guest of Mr. Ernest J. Knabe, Jr., at his home, 839 Park avenue, and after the concert at Music Hall last night he met there a number of Baltimore musicians.

In conversation he makes the impression of an artist with the profoundest reverence for his art. There is no trace of affectation nor of self-glorification. Physically the very embodiment of the thinker and the worker, he shows the effects of his active and successful life. He has the face of an ascetic, with eloquent eyes and a very sensitive mouth. The artist's suit of neglected hair seems in no sense an affectation, but the natural accompaniment of a man who is more concerned with things intellectual than with externalities. A very spare figure about the middle height, on which the clothes seem to hang, surmounted by a head whose profile is singularly expressive, complete the picture of a man who is likely to win as many friends through his personality as through his playing.

"I find America," he said, "wonderfully impressive. It was a revelation to me. I was prepared for magnificence and for enterprise, but the reality has far exceeded my expectations. There is even something quite inspiring in an artistic sense about the intense practical nature of conditions in this country. Art must always have at the bottom an element of the practical in it and in the stupendous efforts of American ingenuity and intelligence there is something immensely suggestive to an artist.

"I have been very kindly and hospitably received and I feel that I shall be able to please. An American tour brings with it a tremendous amount of work, but I am in good condition and I expect to be able to stand the strain. The long distances in traveling cause a great deal of fatigue, but with the splendid arrangements for transportation and with my experience of eighteen years of uninterrupted touring behind me, I shall hope to be able to accomplish my purpose."

"Do you notice any great changes in piano playing from the time of Liszt?" Mr. Sauer was asked.

"I should say the younger generation of pianists are in many instances far in advance technically of Liszt and Rubinstein. Pianos have been wonderfully improved in the past 25 years, and pianists are willing to labor more than at that time, but this by no means signifies that we now have artists of the power of Liszt and Rubinstein. Technique does not make the great pianist; it is something far more elusive and rare. It is the power to express the feelings and emotions of a strong personality that constitutes the really great artist, and unless the player has something to say that is really interesting, the large body of hearers will not listen to him.

"The great thing to be striven for in playing the piano is color. By variations in touch and, therefore, in tone, effects can be obtained similar to those gained by the painter. Some of the best painters have been mediocre draughtsmen, but they are able to cause emotions that the mere technician is entirely incapable of. The same applies to the musician. It is notorious that Rubinstein was frequently inaccurate in his playing, but with all his wrong notes he is unapproached by any of the young men who are his superiors as mere virtuosos. This is not an apology for careless playing, but is meant to show that there are higher spheres which must be touched to be able to move an audience.

"I practice always a great deal, although I rely principally upon my vacation to do my hard work. Last summer I was in Blankenbergh, the famous little watering place near Ostend, and there I got into condition for the winter's work. I think too much practice is useless and sometimes dangerous. It is necessary to use the mind as much, in rehearsing, as the fingers and the student who does this will find that he can save his hands at the expense of his head. I never play a composition twice in the same way. Consciously or unconsciously one is influenced by his surroundings and is governed by his feelings."

American

MUSIC HALL— MT. ROYAL AVENUE.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SAUER
MR. WILHELM GERICKE........Conductor.
THIRD CONCERT,
TUESDAY, JANUARY 17TH, 1899,
AT 8:15 PRECISELY.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven..............................Symphony No. 4
Henselt..Concerto for Piano-forte in F Minor, Op. 16
Brahms..Waltzes
(Scored for Orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Liszt......................................Les Preludes
SOLOIST, MR. EMIL SAUER.
Seats now on sale at 13 North Charles street.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

First Appearance of Emil Sauer.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the distinguished director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose serious illness last month enforced a temporary retirement from the desk, has been fully restored to health, and will conduct the third concert of the series at Music Hall next Tuesday evening. This concert will probably prove to be the most notable one of the winter, due to the fact that not only is the program an unusually fine one, but opportunity will be afforded the many lovers of the piano forte in Baltimore to hear Mr. Emil Sauer, the eminent European artist, who has just arrived in this country.

Sauer made his first appearance in America last Tuesday evening in New York city, and was accorded an ovation. The press speak of his playing as they did of Paderewski's, and many of the critics said it recalled the days of Rubinstein and Liszt. Sauer, who is only thirty-six years old, has, during the past two years, been accorded a recognition in England and on the Continent of Europe as the foremost pianist now before the public. He made his debut in North Germany and the Rhineland in 1877, and in 1883 made a concert tour of Spain and Italy. He first appeared in Berlin in 1885, and since then in every country in Europe. The concert halls of Germany, Austria, Russia and England have in late years echoed and re-echoed with the enthusiastic applause of delighted audiences. At St. Petersburg, the fastidious home of Rubinstein, he was accorded an oveation and declared to be an incomparable master of his art.

Herr Sauer, whose appearance in Baltimore is the second one he will have made in this country, will play Adolf Henselt's concerto for piano forte in F minor. The concerto had for a long time the reputation of being the most difficult piano forte piece in existence. The style is based on Weber and on Chopin, but is fuller than was habitual with either of those composers. It was played in Boston as long ago as 1866, but has never been heard in this city. Those who have heard Sauer play it speak in terms of warm praise of its many beauties.

The symphony for this concert will be Beethoven's fourth in B flat major, the composition which drew forth so much criticism when first performed in 1807, but which has since been accorded high rank among the composer's writings. The remaining numbers on the program are Brahm's waltzes, scored for the orchestra by Director Gericke, and "The Prelude," Lizst's great symphonic poem.

Sun

Sauer, The Pianist.

Emil Sauer, the distinguished European pianist, who is to play tonight at Music Hall, upon the occasion of the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will reach the city from New York about noon and occupy a suite of rooms at the Hotel Stafford. It is expected that many of the leading musicians of Baltimore will seek an introduction to Herr Sauer, and if his stay in the city permits he will be the object of some social attention. The advance sale of seats has been large.

Herald

SAUER'S TRIUMPH.

Brilliant Performance Given in the Music Hall Last Night by the Famous Pianist.

No longer can the memorable "Melba" night be referred to as the banner event in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. The concert given in the Music Hall last evening equalled it in every particular, and perhaps excelled it. There will also, in the future, be regarded a "Sauer" night.

Neither can it longer be said that the people of Baltimore do not appreciate a stellar musical attraction. The great throng that crowded into the large auditorium was proof positive to the contrary, and by the time Director Gericke took up his position before the orchestra the hall was filled to overflowing with the wealth and culture of the city.

And well worthy of such a splendid attendance was the treat given those who attended. The orchestra, with its regular director at the head, was in splendid form, but the magnet of the occasion was the advent of Emil Sauer, whose fame as a prince of the piano had preceded him here. The impression left by Paderewski, though many days have elapsed since that artist gave a performance in Baltimore, were still fresh in the minds of many of the local enthusiasts who attended the concert last night, and the fact that Sauer was held up as the equal of the Pole in many respects, aroused the people to the very edge of expectancy.

When the pianist came upon the platform he was given a warm reception. He has hair constructed in a manner that helped make Paderewski famous, but instead of the pallid complexion and bored manner so characteristic of the Pole, Sauer's face glows with the ruddy hue of health, and his most conspicuous mannerisms are the absence of any attempt at affectation and the conscientious vigor with which he goes about his work.

From the very moment his hands touched the keyboard the artist had his audience won, and from that time until the people had applauded themselves into weariness, after he concluded, his performance was one continuance of triumphs and ovations. The very selection showed the man's confidence in his ability to conquer monumental difficulties. He played the Hensel concerto in F minor, for a long time considered to be one of the most difficult piano compositions in existence. Later-day critics rather deny the work this distinction, but of all the big piano solos of the period there are few so difficult, because of the intelligence and finesse with which the wealth of melodious themes must be handled. Contrapuntal heroics and pyrotechnics in scale passages can occasionaly be mastered by performers of mediocre ability, but it is only the true artist that can blend technique and soul so gloriously as does Sauer.

The artist displays the sentiment expressed in the concerto as part of himself. His shading, even in the rapid octave work, nears perfection, and the tones, each distinctive in themselves, ripple from beneath his fingers as soft as silk and as soulful as a cluster of chimes. In forte as well as pianissimo he observes the expressive necessities to the letter, and his work in scale passage and arpeggi is a revelation. The orchestration is more in duo form rather than accompaniment. The various motifs teem with harmonic beauty, and the soloist is en rapport with this characteristic throughout. Especially interesting was the counter melody in obligato with the 'cello in the second movement.

Sauer was recalled again and again when he concluded, and graciously pointed to Mr. Gericke and the orchestra as deserving of a share of recognition.

The orchestral numbers were equally as well received. The opening number, Beethoven's No. 4 Symphony in B flat, was given a splendid reading by Mr. Gericke, who infused by his interpretation new interest in what is looked upon as one of the few unpopular Beethoven compositions. The Brahms waltzes, scored for orchestra by Mr. Gericke, were given a pleasing presentation, and a most successful concert was concluded with "The Preludes," by Liszt.

[91]

American

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Emil Sauer, the German Pianist, Was the Principal Attraction.

The special attraction at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Music Hall was Mr. Emil Sauer, the German pianist, who has been well advertised for several weeks. This is Mr. Sauer's first visit to the States. He has won much praise in Europe. The audience was very large—probably the largest so far this season at the concerts. When Mr. Sauer made his appearance he was very cordially received. His appearance excited interest. The pianist is very tall and spare, his head is large, his features prominent, and his luxuriant growth of hair, thrown about in a manner peculiar to some pianists, added to the striking effect he produced. When he bowed there was a suggestion of topheaviness. He is not markedly graceful in his movements. But once at the piano and at work, the listener became too much interested in his playing to think much about his appearance. Mr. Sauer was thoroughly absorbed in his work. He played with great earnestness and spirit. Mr. Sauer is free from objectionable mannerisms. His habit of throwing up the hands occasionally is evidently natural. It is not affected. It is about the only thing that seems like a mannerism while he is playing.

He played Henselt's concerto in F minor. Henselt was a pianist, and the concerto seems to have been written to test a player's power to master technical difficulties. It does not abound in ideas, but it affords fine scope for a pianist to produce brilliant effects in fingering, octave playing, runs, trills, &c., with great rapidity and volume. Mr. Sauer's technical skill is of a very high order. His execution was powerfully impressive in the strongly accented passages, and his strength of wrist and arm is prodigious. In working up to the climax in the larghetto movement and in the final allegro, he played with such dash and power that he keyed the audience up to a high pitch. When he had finished the applause was tremendous. It amounted to an ovation, and certainly he deserved it, for he played the concerto as probably but very few pianists could give it.

He was recalled again and again. He bowed his thanks to the audience in the regulation style, shook Conductor Gericke by the hand, and did not forget to pay his respects to the splendid orchestra, who had contributed considerably to his success. No encore was given. An estimate of Mr. Sauer's ability as a pianist cannot be given based on last night's performance. The concerto was brilliantly and powerfully played, but it is not music of the kind to show what one who has made the piano a life study can do. Before passing judgment, most people would prefer to hear Mr. Sauer play music by Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin and other masters written specially for the piano. There was little or no opportunity last night to discover whether he has the poetic quality. Technically, and it may be said dynamically, he is a wonderful performer.

The symphony was Beethoven's fourth, not the greatest of the nine, but very enjoyable, performed as it was last night. A novelty was a group of waltzes by Brahms, scored for the orchestra by Mr. Gericke. They were delightfully played. The concert closed with Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes." It was played in a broad, musicianly manner. The rich coloring of Liszt was brought out with great beauty and effectiveness.

Mr. Gericke, who has entirely recovered from his illness, was very warmly applauded by the audience.

Burmester a Disappointment.

People who attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Tuesday night are of the general opinion that Willy Burmester was a disappointment. So much had been sent from over the water in praise of the violinist's abilities that the musical enthusiasts of this city surely expected something far above the ordinary.

Burmester, however, failed to come up to all the good things that have been said of his playing. His very entrance was depressing. He is awkward and seemed to be ill at ease all the while he was giving his solo.

It must be conceded that Burmester is a thorough master of the instrument, as far as technique is concerned, but his style is effeminate, and in slow movements he ignores shading altogether. His tone is pure and his fingering agile and correct, but it is only when he plays unaccompanied that he can be heard to advantage. The Mendelssohn concerto, especially in the second movement, gives ample play for soulful work, but Burmester failed to take advantage of the opportunity, seeming to lack the necessary spirit and enthusiasm. There are several in the violin section of the orchestra who are easily superior to Burmester as soloists.

As director of this splendid organization, Franz Kneisel added another to his string of laurels. He led with vigor and good judgment, and it was only the fact, perhaps, that he was filling another's place that prevented him from infusing a little more of his personality in the reading of the orchestral numbers given.

Herald
2/18

News

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Sauer Will Appear and Mr. Gericke Will Conduct.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall on Tuesday evening next, and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will conduct. The soloist will be Mr. Emil Sauer. The following will be the programme:

Ludwig van Beethoven..................
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60.
I. Adagio (B-flat major)..............4-4
Allegro vivace (B-flat major)....2-2
II. Adagio (E-flat major)..............3-4
III. Allegro vivace (B-flat major)....3-4
Trio: Un poco meno Allegro (B-flat major)........................3-4
IV. Allegro ma non troppo (B-flat major)........ 2-4
Adolph Henselt................................Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor, Op. 16.
Allegro patetico.
Larghetto.
Allegro agitato.
Johannes Brahms...........Waltzes, Op. 39.
(Scored for Orchestra by WILHELM GERICKE.)
Franz Liszt................................Symphonic Poem No. 3, "The Preludes."

This concert will introduce Mr. Sauer to the public of Baltimore. His concert in New York last week was in the nature of an ovation, and he fully duplicated his European triumphs.

Herald

Coming of Emil Sauer.

Unusual interest attaches to the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall next Tuesday evening, since it marks the first appearance here of Emil Sauer, the distinguished young pianist. His arrival in New York a week ago was made the occasion of lengthy notices of him and his work in all the papers of the metropolis, and when he gave his first performance in New York, on last Tuesday evening, the critics vied with each other in sounding his praises. Some of them speak of him as the equal of Paderewski.

Baltimore will be the second city in America to hear Sauer, and that within 10 days of his arrival in this country. His coming is awaited with eager anticipation by music lovers, who confidently expect a great treat, as his popularity on the continent and in London during the past two seasons has been remarkable.

Born in 1862, he received his early training in piano-playing from his mother. In 1876 Rubenstein heard him play, and, being much impressed by his talent, warmly recommended him to his brother. Sauer thereupon became a stipendiary of Nikolaus Rubenstein. In 1884 Sauer received his artistic consecration in Weimar, from the great composer Liszt, who thoroughly recognized the extraordinary endowment of the young pianist. He made his Berlin debut in 1885, and from that moment dates the world-wide reputation he now enjoys. During 1895 and 1896 he was accorded triumphs in London and throughout England such as had not been known there since the days of Rubenstein and Liszt.

Herr Sauer will play at the Baltimore concert Adolf Henselt's concerto for piano-forte in F minor. The first performance of this composition was given in Boston on December 7, 1866, by Mr. Carlyle Petersilea, on the occasion of his debut in that city. It is a great favorite of Sauer's, and those who have heard him play it say that notwithstanding the great difficulties of its performance his rendition of the work is perfect.

The orchestra numbers on the programme of this concert are Beethoven's fourth symphony in B-flat major; Brahm's waltzes, scored for the orchestra by Director Wilhelm Gericke, and Liszt's great symphonic poem No. 3, entitled "The Preludes."

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony was written in 1806, and first performed at a concert for his benefit in March, 1807. This is the symphony which Carl Maria Von Weber criticised so severely, but which in after years more intelligent discernment raised to the highest rank as an unsurpassed example of melodic inspiration and perfection of musical form. The whole of the four movements will be performed on this occasion.

It is very gratifying to be able to announce that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the orchestra's popular director, has entirely recovered from the malady with which he was attacked in the early part of last month, and is again wielding the baton. His return to the desk will no doubt be the occasion of a most generous welcome on Tuesday evening.

News

SAUER WILL RETURN

THEN HE WILL RESPOND TO EVERY ENCORE.

Boston Symphony Rule Prevented His Doing So Last Night—Entertained After the Recital—His Remarkable Experiences in Europe Told in Quaintly Written Letters. A Countess Who Bought Out the Whole House—A Woman Who Screamed for a Kiss.

Emil Sauer, the pianist, left Baltimore this morning for New York, where he will give a recital tonight. Before going he expressed regret that he was not able to split himself up in several parts so he could give recitals in many cities at the same time. He was entertained during his stay in Baltimore at the home of Mr. Ernest J. Knabe, 829 Park avenue, and was the guest of honor at a supper given last night by his host after the Boston Symphony concert. Among those present at the supper were Mrs. Dorsey Coale, Miss Howison, Miss Alice Fitzgerald, Mrs. Fitzgerald Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. Belding, Mrs. Isabel Dobbin, Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder of the Kneisel Quartette, Dr. Hemmeter, Colonel Young, Mr. William Knabe and Mr. Thomas S. Baker.

Another Recital in March.

Sauer will return in recital at Music Hall March 7. Before leaving Baltimore this morning he said he would play all night for the crowd if they demand it upon that occasion. He will respond to all the recalls made. He desired it explained that he did respond to an encore in Boston with the Symphony, but that Colonel Higginson, the proprietor of the Symphony, raised a greater storm about it than the audience had done, because it broke a rule of the organization never to respond to encores. Sauer and Gerricke were given explicit instructions not to break this rule on the present tour and that is why they did not break it last night.

Quaint and Interesting Letters.

Sauer's use of the English language is not yet up to the standard of the Johns Hopkins University and some of his utterances concerning himself are exceedingly quaint. In a letter written to a Baltimorean before coming to this city he gave some of his experiences as follows:

An Hungarian Countess follows me since eight years from town to town. A few years ago I arrived in Vienna a few hours before my concert, and I was mostly astonished to find at the Hotel Bristol hundred of letters, not only from musicians and the press, but also from wealty people, asking tickets for my concert. The key to that riddal was quickly found out. The rather excentric Countess (one of the greatest professional beautys) had bought up the whole concert, and when I appeared on the stage I found her sitting alone in a big armchair alone in the immense hall. Never mind, I played better, perhaps, that evening than a few days later when I had to repeat the programme before a crowded audience.

Screamed for a Kiss.

Another case was that a lady belonging to the highest aristocratic was forgetting herself so far as to fall down on the platform on her knees and to scream out for a kiss. I have taken this attack easier than another one in Moscow, where the delirious public has torn me out by force of the artist-room and I found myself suddenly pressed in such a crowd that I was nearly suffocating. Then a couple of wild enthusiasts took me on their shoulders and a regular lawn tennis began. The feeling when I found myself 10 feet high in the air was most uncomfortable.

On my way from Constantinople to the Kaukasus our steamer was taken by an immense storm, so that we were in delay of 36 hours. The captain told me that we never would reach Batum in time early enough for my concert in Tiflis. Retained by the wish of the Sultan in Constantinople and already twice postponed, it was hardly impossible to disappoint the public a third time. I went on land and explained my case to the general agent of the steamship company, and now happened the most extraordinary case. To hear my name was enough to give an immediate order to pass all the other ports and to bring me first to Batum. I call this fact the greatest success of my life.

Remembered in a Will.

One day an old gentleman of 90 who came from the South of Hungaria, 14 hours by rail to Budapest, to hear me play, called in my hotel, nearly crying not be be able to get a ticket for my concert. Meanwhile, I made the gentleman comfortable in my room with a good cigar. I went myself to procure him a seat, but every corner of the place was sold. Nevertheless, I gave him a chance in repeating the whole programme the next morning especially for him. Just a week later I was asked in Vienna to one of the well-known lawyers who communicated to me that the old gentleman died, leaving me a considerable sum.

Besides the great many worships from women there is one especially touching. Since nearly five years I receive from London continually most precious presents, and all my efforts to find out the giver were in vain, all parcels being given to the post in all different parts of London. I call this way of giving a most unselfish one.

How He Won a Bet.

In '85, when I stopped with Liszt in Weimar, an extravagant English millionaire was betting with me that it was impossible to learn a pianoforte concerto within 48 hours, naturally by heart. I entered the bet for £100. He gave me the Sgambati concerto, then entirely unknown by me. I began to study it on a Monday at 4 P. M., and played it on Wednesday afternoon.

A friend of mine, Marchesa della Valle, is in possession of an exact copy of Chopin's hand. He was pretending that my hand was exactly the same. So he engaged me to have my hand in gypsum, putting Chopin's left and my right hand together. They were completely alike to each other. Even every little vein was marked in the same place; quite impossible to find the slightest difference between them.

Naturally a great many of royal honors had been conferred upon me; not only that I have played before all monarchs of Europe. I have known a couple of them intimately, especially the Empress Frederic of Germany, the Queens of Italy and Spain, and last, not least, the Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, who takes every opportunity to give me proof of his admiration. When I was last in Sofia on my way to Constantinople, the Orient express train had to stop by his order three-quarters of an hour over the time and to wait for my arrival, as he kept me on my farewell visit over my departure time. When I entered the waggon the passengers were staring on me, believing me to be at least a relation of the Prince.

My mother living in Hamburg gave me the first instruction from my 6th till the 16th year.

Why He Came Here.

Concerning his purpose in coming to America, he says:

Though I have never been in America, I am quite informed about the enormous progress musical art has made in the United States; that only very first-rate art, something extraordinary in its style, is cultivated and admired there, and to conquer and take the American public by storm—that is to say, to gain a real and not a made-up success—that means to be the greatest proof and distinction for an artist. From this point of view I consider the matter. It is not American money what attracts me (as concerts in the principal towns of Europe have been for me as lucrative as possible); it is more than that—a matter of honor to join to my European triumphs American ones, and to proof that I can fulfill the wonders wich are expected from me.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Music Hall. The soloist was Mr. Emil Sauer. Mr. Sauer has been known as a pianist of great repute in Europe for some years, and his fame had been heralded throughout this country long before he himself came over. But it was evident from his performance of last night that his reputation as a pianist had not only not been exaggerated, but that not half enough had been said about him. As an artist he stands upon the top round of the ladder, and as a pianist he is second to none. He is pre-eminently a musician. His playing exhibits colossal technique, interpretation and warmth of expression—a rare combination in pianists of the present day. One of the greatest charms of his playing is the extreme delicacy of his piano and pianissimo, as contrasted with his forte and fortissimo effects. His octave passages were simply marvelous. That is, however, due to the fact that he played the Henselt concerto in F minor, which consists largely of octave passages. Had he decided to play any other concerto, exhibiting any other form of technique, judging from the comparative ease with which he accomplished his task, it is safe to say that his playing would have been equally faultless.

It seems a pity that he should have chosen the Henselt concerto as a medium of introduction to the Baltimore public. It is a work of enormous difficulty, but as a composition it is not very interesting. Liszt described it as an "etude" in three movements. However that may be, the artist brought out of it all that was in it, and at the close was obliged to acknowledge the plaudits of the large audience, several times.

Beethoven's fourth symphony was the opening number on the programme. This delightful work was splendidly rendered by the orchestra, under the able baton of Mr. Gericke, who is to be congratulated upon his recovery from his recent illness. The next number was a series of waltzes by Brahms. These were originally written for piano, but have been orchestrated by Mr. Gericke; and it was in this form that they were presented last night. Mr. Gericke's reputation as a conductor has long been well established, and now as arranger for orchestra he shows himself a thorough master of orchestral effects. His instrumentation exhibits a freshness and variety that is perfectly charming. Liszt's "Symphonic Poem" No. 3, "The Preludes," brought the concert to a conclusion. The work was rendered in a masterly manner. It might be interesting to note that, in the conception of his symphonic poems, Liszt was guided by the conviction that the symphony, as developed by Mozart and Beethoven, had reached the highest degree of perfection, and that if anything worthy the name of symphony was still to be produced, some new form must be found, otherwise music would move round in a circle and no progress be made; and so he invented what he called the "Symphonic Poem," which is a musical interpretation of some poetic idea that has most generally been expressed in words. In this instance the words are taken from the French poet Lamartine.

THE MORAL OF SAUER

Striking Illustration Of The Importance Of Having A High-Class Soloist At Symphony Concerts.

"Music Lover" writes to THE SUN as follows:

"The splendid audience that was present at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening should cause the management of that organization to reflect upon what the concert-goers of this city desire. I have been told today on the very best authority that the receipts at this concert were larger than at any previous appearance of the Symphony Orchestra. The question, What does it mean? seems pertinent.

"The orchestral programme offered nothing exceptional, but there was announced an artist as soloist who is already a celebrity—a man of international reputation and a pianist whose performance during the few days since his arrival in this country shows that he is able to sustain this reputation. It was the soloist, therefore, who brought the people and it was undoubtedly he who gave the most pleasure.

"This in no way is meant as disparagement of the playing of the band, which is always of the highest class, but as has been pointed out from time to time in your paper, there is too great an air of complacency about the orchestra. To the average subscriber to these concerts an entire evening of orchestral music is an imposition unless it is varied by a soloist who has something that is really interesting to present. The nonentities who have figured all too frequently on the programmes do not fulfill the demands and as a result the concerts have been neglected in a manner that has quite chagrined the Bostonians. It can be fully explained by the neglect of the management to offer soloists who really stand for something in the musical world.

"The case of Sauer points the moral most aptly and the eloquent figures represented by the unparalleled receipts must show the folly of pursuing a policy which is fatal to the influence of the orchestra in this community, when it is easy and immeasurably more profitable to give the public what it has a right to demand from a great orchestra, namely, soloists of the best type.

"Exception was taken last year in very forcible language in the columns of your paper to the appearance of members of the orchestra as soloists, and the justice of the criticism stands undenied. If great artists like Nordica, Melba, Plancon, Ysaye, Ternina and Sauer were brought here regularly, there would no longer be a doubt about the financial success of the series.

"It is, of course, well understood that the orchestra wishes to be recognized as the principal feature of the entertainment and it is somewhat galling to have to confess that it is the soloist who attracts the large audiences, but this should be regarded in a sensible light and the management should be willing to make this concession to popular demands, especially as it in no way interferes with the educational value of the performances nor lessens the appreciation of the good work of the audience by those best able to judge and whose opinion is most valuable.

"As soon as the justice of this demand is recognized by the management of the orchestra, and as soon as it consents to give us artists of the rank of Sauer, the doubt in regard to the appreciation of the Boston Orchestra in Baltimore will disappear."

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 29, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The thirteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. Evan Williams was the soloist. The programme was: Overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and air, "Waft Her Angels," from Handel's oratorio, "Jephthah"; selections from Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Twilight of the Gods" (arranged by Hans Richter); air, "Lend Me Your Aid," from Gounod's opera, "Irene," and Schumann's symphony No. 3 in E flat ("Rhenish").

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, which he calls a "fantasy," probably to show his desire to be free from arbitrary and restricted form, has been several times performed at these concerts. The work grows with repeated performances. It was very finely given by the orchestra.

The various concert selections from Wagner's "Music Dramas" are always given at these concerts in an ideal manner, and the two given last evening were highly enjoyable from every standpoint. The Schumann symphony—called the "Rhenish," from the visit of the composer to Cologne in 1850—is much less interesting than those in B flat and D minor. The scherzo and finale always seem the bright spots of the work, the first movement being noisy, and the slow movement dull and uninspired. The performance was excellent.

Mr. Evan Williams is a singer one always enjoys hearing, either in oratorio or concert. Both his selections, especially the aria, "Lend Me Your Aid," were sung with exquisite expression and excellent quality of tone throughout. Recalls were numerous at the close of his second number.

At the next rehearsal and concert, Mr. T. Adamowski is announced as the soloist. The selections include the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz; Carnival overture, Dvorak; Scotch fantasy for violin, Bruch; symphonic poem, "Phaeton," Saint-Saens.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE third matinee and evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday and Thursday respectively. Wednesday afternoon the program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in A major, Italian, op. 90	Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Aria from Sigurd	Reyer
A Faust Overture	Wagner
Aria from Joseph in Egypt	Mehul
Waltzes, op. 39	Brahms

(Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Soloist, M. Saleza.

Owing to the illness of Milka Ternina, Albert Saleza, of the Metropolitan Opera House, appeared and made a most favorable impression with his strong, vibrant tenor and marked musical temperament. The Reyer number is not very interesting, full as it is of a reckless use of Wagner effects, but it demonstrated the tenor's dramatic ability. A tendency to force his upper tones produces an occasional deviation from the pitch. This was more noticeable in the Mehul air, which was sung with smoothness and reticence of style. Saleza showed the fatigue of having sung for the first time "Aïda" on the Monday previous to this matinee. However, he was more than a welcome substitute for Ternina.

The orchestra having been delayed en route from Baltimore, it was late before the concert began. Mr. Gericke, like the stern disciplinarian he is, insisted on a short rehearsal with the singer, yet in the placid, ductile performance of Mendelssohn's symphony there was not a flaw to indicate that the men had been unduly hurried. It was the perfection in finish and exactly suited to the graceful and symmetrical utterances of melodious Felix. Especially enchanting was the saltarello. The "Faust" overture was surprisingly well played. We say this because Gericke has not been deemed in sympathy with Wagner. The structural beauties of the work were brought out, nor was it deficient in sensuous color and passion. Moderation there was, but there was no suggestion of coldness or lack of imaginative breadth.

The Brahms waltzes proved to be a delightful surprise. Written for the piano, Mr. Gericke has scored them discreetly and with a taste that Brahms could not cavil at. Indeed we doubt if Brahms would have been so generous to his orchestra. No. 6, in C sharp major, was a bright bit of color, with a harp employed ever so deftly. Calling for special admiration were the sturdy one in B, the melancholy one in G sharp minor, the grave, gray valse in E and the lovely, exuberant one in B flat. Part of this latter Mr. Gericke uses in his well constructed coda. The entire sixteen are so well instrumented that they will take place in the repertory of every orchestra.

At the Thurday evening concert this program was put forth:

Overture to Der Freischütz	Von Weber
Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90	Brahms
Aria from Sigurd	Reyer
Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, op. 78	Dvorak
Aria from Joseph in Egypt	Mehul
Prelude to The Master Singers of Nuremberg	Wagner

M. Saleza repeated his success of the afternoon previous, although he was not in the same voice. The orchestra evidently had been refreshed by its rest and played with vim and the finish for which it is celebrated. The symphony was read with loving care and with all its contours clearly outlined. In the variations Mr. Gericke got a great variety of color and dynamic contrast, while in the prelude his band played with a surprising tonal splendor, even if there was a certain restraint in the conception. But with Brahms this conductor is in sympathy and the sunshine and shadow of the great work were admirably pictured. There was a large attendance at both concerts.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

New York. January 28, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The third afternoon and evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Wednesday and Thursday, at Carnegie Hall.

Fraulein Milka Ternina, who had been advertised as the soloist, was too ill to appear, so M. Albert Saléza, from the Metropolitan Opera House, took her place, and at both concerts sang admirably, arias from Reyer's "Sigurd" and Méhul's "Joseph in Egypt."

M. Saléza was received with exceptional enthusiasm; well deserved, for in quality of voice, enunciation and exquisite taste, he has no superior among the tenors now in New York.

At the afternoon concert the orchestra played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture," and some Brahms waltzes arranged for orchestra by Mr. Gericke.

The evening concert brought Brahm's third symphony, variations on an original theme by Dvorak, the overture to "Der Freischutz," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

At both performances the playing of the orchestra left much to be desired. It looks as though success, long and continued, is having its customary effect. The gentlemen from Boston are no longer afraid of their public.

The Philharmonic Society of New York, even in its most degenerate days, has never played so perfunctorily as did the out-of-town organization last week.

A perfect instrument? Yes, and one moved by a crank—Gericke.

The audiences were eloquently reserved in their applause.

M.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1899.

The Symphony Concert—"Barber of Seville" at Boston Theatre.

After dining out for a week, it was a pleasure to sit down again at the home table and the highly spiced courses of opera which have been set before us only served to make the classical fare of our Symphony Orchestra the more attractive. But the symphonic banquet also began with a strongly seasoned dish; Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture dwells far more upon the strife of the Montagues and Capulets than upon the affairs of the two lovers.

It is astonishing from how many points of view this tragedy can be approached by the composer! Just as Heine's "Du bist wie eine Blume" leads all other poems in the number of its musical settings, (there are probably over 200 settings of this short poem), so this Shakespearian topic leads all others in its manifold musical treatments.

From Gounod and Bellini at the head of the list, we have a roll of nearly a score of composers who have made an opera out of the subject, Dejazet bringing up the rear with a parody called "Rhum et Eau en Juillet." We have Romeo turned into a violoncello, and Juliet into a violin, in a wonderful balcony scene by Berlioz, and an entire symphony with choruses of the fighting factions, and other outgrowths of the play might be cited. It is evident, therefore, that the composer joins with all the world in loving a lover.

The Tschaikowsky overture cannot escape some traits of nationality; the Russians claim that this composer is too cosmopolitan to represent their country; but to the outsider, Tschaikowsky cannot altogether purge himself of the caviar flavor. Mark Twain has told a charming tale of the German painter who sketched "The Surrender at Yorktown," with the result that Washington and Cornwallis became Germans, and both armies had Teutonic attributes; in about the same manner, we cannot help suspecting that this Romeo and Juliet dwelt in Moscow rather than in Verona, and that the crowd which brought forth the "alarums and excursions," were moujiks.

The great Hanslick once said of this overture,—"Thus Destiny knocks at—the bass-drum!" The remark is apt, for there is plenty of tumult in the work, and Mr. Gericke read this with his latterday emphasis. But the dreamy melancholy of the English horn and a final suggestion of the apotheosis of the lovers was not lacking and the tender subordinate theme was given with much beauty. The kettledrummer allowed himself more force in this work than he has hitherto exhibited, but this was in accordance with the composer's evident intention.

Mr. Evan Williams sang with commendable surety and expression Handel's "Waft her angels" with its preceding recitative, and later on the less worthy "Lend me your aid," from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." The phrasing and expression in both of these was a model and we wish that our American tenors might try to imitate Mr. Williams's clear enunciation. The audience became enthusiastic over his work and recalled him many times.

Then came a dash of Wagner, just to show the visiting Wagnerians of the opera company a good example. Richter's arrangement of portions of "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung" is done with a reverent hand and forms a very satisfactory concert number. Every leit-motif stood forth with clearness and beauty and the romantic touches of the Rhine-journey (the book called it "Siegfried's Trip up the Rhine," which suggests "Cookies," reduced fares and excursion steamers) were gloriously interpreted. The horns deserve especial praise for their work in this.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony formed a dignified end to the concert. It is not a work which may take rank with the composer's B flat symphony, but it is beautiful music nevertheless, and like much of Schumann's work it is autobiographic in some degree; it tells plainly how the Rhine life affected the serious musician, it speaks of the happy beginning of the life at Dusseldorf which was to end so disastrously, it is the last gleam of sunshine from a mind over which the clouds were soon to gather.

Mr. Gericke brought out the mighty syncopations of the first movement with abundant vigor; it is possible that Schumann, the great master of syncopation, here pushed his enjoyment of this effect a trifle too far, but the loftiness of subsequent passages redeems this fault. With Schumann even enjoyment was serious, and the Scherzo is certainly not playful. Perhaps this is a national trait and part of the same tendency which causes the German on occasions of great festivity to sing

> "Ich weiss nicht was soll es bedeuten
> Dass ich so traurig bin."
>
> "I know not what spell is upon me
> That I am so sad at heart."

To the present writer the chief charm of this five-movement symphony lies in the two last movements. The fourth movement was inspired by the inauguration of Archbishop von Geissel in Cologne Cathedral, at which Schumann was present.

The orchestra, thanks chiefly to the trombones, here imitates the effect of a mighty organ, and the greatest dignity and solemnity is attained. This makes an admirable foil to the last movement, in which one can almost see the chattering multitude swarming out of the church into the wide Dom-platz on a bright Sunday morning. Here, for once, Schumann rejoices, and we must rejoice with him.

Such music effectively rinsed the consecutive fifths of Puccini, and the hysterical noises of Mascagni out of our ears.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON JOURNAL.
MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1899.

Evan Williams, the Soloist at the 13th Symphony Concert—"The Barber of Seville" Given by the Ellis Grand Opera Company.

The program of the 13th Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet,"	Tschaikowsky
Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and Air, "Waft Her, Angels," from Jephthah	Handel
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Twilight of the Gods" (arranged by Hans Richter)	Wagner
Air, "Lend Me Your Aid," from "Irene,"	Gounod
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major	Schumann

After the opera music of the week a symphony program with a little green in it—something cooling—would have been a relief. Although I have heard more stirring performances of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," there was still the sound of clashing rapiers, there was the music of the church and the thought of funeral hymn, there was the great melody of "love that mocks time and space," the melody of eternal passion, eternal pain. There was again the smell of the theatre, the sight of the footlights. The selections from "The Ring" were surely not green or cooling, and we were thus reminded that "Die Walkürie," Sigfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung" are coming. As for Schumann's Rhenish symphony, it is for the most part one of the most irritatingly boresome things in all music. Take out the "Cathedral music," and there is little of any interest to anyone save the earnest student of syncopation.

Mr. Evan Williams supplied a touch of green by singing the recitative and aria from "Jephthah" and then he, too, went into the theatre with his aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." Handel's recitative always appealed to me on account of the line "Great Chemosh, and such fabled deities." And in the Gounod recitative it takes a tenor of authority to face an audience with

> "How frail and weak a thing is man!"

I have written about Mr. Williams many times in the Journal, and it is not necessary now to draw a pen picture of him after the manner of Clarendon. Certain tones were veiled last night, and at times there was a suspicion of throatiness, but the natural beauty of his voice, the intelligence shown in phrasing, and the ease and simplicity with which he sang made their way straight to the hearers, who were loud in applause, especially after the aria from Gounod, which—let me whisper in your ear, Mr. Williams—is pretty poor stuff.

Philip Hale.

Eagle
Jan 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third of the season's evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not quite fill the Academy of Music, but the audiences at these performances are no longer meager or injurious to the reputation of Brooklyn. Possibly this is due to the patronage of the Brooklyn Institute and possibly to the increasing fondness for good music, but the fact is one to give satisfaction to all concerned. Mr. Gericke played last night the Brahms Academic Festival overture by which the composer got his degree. It has been given here on several occasions, and is an always welcome number. Brahms took for his themes the college songs that are more or less familiar in our own universities and has woven them into a beautiful and sometimes stately fabric. German folk songs are apt to be better than ours, yet when the right man comes to us he will erect "Johnny Get Your Gun" and "There'll be a Hot Time in the Old Town To-Night" into a musical structure of appealing beauty, if not of grandeur. In all the arts it is not the subject that counts for as much as the way the subject is treated. A second number was Antonin Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme. There are twenty-seven of these variations, of which seven were omitted from this concert. Had the composer adhered to the old idea of a variation, a suite of this length would have been well night unbearable, for who could endure to hear a man tell the same fact in twenty-seven forms of words? but he has used so great a liberty in the treatment that the divisions bear little relation to each other, differing in rhythm, tune, time and orchestration, and while some are heavy and forced, most of them are pleasing and have a rough beauty that is typical of Hungarian music. The close suggestion of the prayer in Verdi's "Othello" in one of these variants is notable. The symphony was Volkmann's first in D minor, not a great work, to be sure, but a truth does not always require to be spoken loud. It has some drowsy moments—this symphony—and would prosper in condensation, especially in the opening number, where the composer seems to acknowledge most frankly his debt to Beethoven for form, and occasionally for instrumentation. There are, however, some beautiful episodes in the work, and that it appeals more to the meditative mood than to the merry is nothing against it. It hardly requires to be said that it was placidly and delightfully played by Mr. Gericke's band. Frau Schumann-Heink, who substituted the air from Mozart's "Titus" and a recitative and air from Bruch's "Odysseus" for the numbers on the programme that were to have been sung by Fraulein Ternina, was in better voice, more spirited and more sure in her singing than when she gave these same selections on the afternoon before. There were still evidences of caution in her treatment of the Mozart number, which is not so well in her range as the Bruch air. Large voices and dramatic voices appear to best advantage in music that has a corresponding breadth and flow and expression, rather than in music that is brilliant or merely rapid. It is blasphemy to say it, because Mozart is an old master, and everything that an old master does is perfect; but the Bruch air was much better than the Mozart selection, both as fitting the singer's voice and because of its intrinsic charm. It was modern; it contained no jigs; it had smoothness, repose, sentiment, dignity and beauty. Frau Heink gave this number with more decision, more dramatic force and more pleasing tone than at the matinee, and the enraptured ones recalled her [illegible] or five times, as if she had been [illegible] who had just played some of the finest [illegible] written. The next appearance of the orchestra in Brooklyn will be on the [illegible] of February.

[93]

THE MORAL OF SAUER

Striking Illustration Of The Importance Of Having A High-Class Soloist At Symphony Concerts.

"Music Lover" writes to THE SUN as follows:

"The splendid audience that was present at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening should cause the management of that organization to reflect upon what the concert-goers of this city desire. I have been told today on the very best authority that the receipts at this concert were larger than at any previous appearance of the Symphony Orchestra. The question, What does it mean? seems pertinent.

"The orchestral programme offered nothing exceptional, but there was announced an artist as soloist who is already a celebrity—a man of international reputation and a pianist whose performance during the few days since his arrival in this country shows that he is able to sustain this reputation. It was the soloist, therefore, who brought the people and it was undoubtedly he who gave the most pleasure.

"This in no way is meant as disparagement of the playing of the band, which is always of the highest class, but as has been pointed out from time to time in your paper, there is too great an air of complacency about the orchestra. To the average subscriber to these concerts an entire evening of orchestral music is an imposition unless it is varied by a soloist who has something that is really interesting to present. The nonentities who have figured all too frequently on the programmes do not fulfill the demands and as a result the concerts have been neglected in a manner that has quite chagrined the Bostonians. It can be fully explained by the neglect of the management to offer soloists who really stand for something in the musical world.

"The case of Sauer points the moral most aptly and the eloquent figures represented by the unparalleled receipts must show the folly of pursuing a policy which is fatal to the influence of the orchestra in this community, when it is easy and immeasurably more profitable to give the public what it has a right to demand from a great orchestra, namely, soloists of the best type.

"Exception was taken last year in very forcible language in the columns of your paper to the appearance of members of the orchestra as soloists, and the justice of the criticism stands undenied. If great artists like Nordica, Melba, Plancon, Ysaye, Ternina and Sauer were brought here regularly, there would no longer be a doubt about the financial success of the series.

"It is, of course, well understood that the orchestra wishes to be recognized as the principal feature of the entertainment and it is somewhat galling to have to confess that it is the soloist who attracts the large audiences, but this should be regarded in a sensible light and the management should be willing to make this concession to popular demands, especially as it in no way interferes with the educational value of the performances nor lessens the appreciation of the good work of the audience by those best able to judge and whose opinion is most valuable.

"As soon as the justice of this demand is recognized by the management of the orchestra, and as soon as it consents to give us artists of the rank of Sauer, the doubt in regard to the appreciation of the Boston Orchestra in Baltimore will disappear."

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 29, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The thirteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. Evan Williams was the soloist. The programme was: Overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and air, "Waft Her, Angels," from Handel's oratorio, "Jephthah"; selections from Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Twilight of the Gods" (arranged by Hans Richter); air, "Lend Me Your Aid," from Gounod's opera, "Irene," and Schumann's symphony No. 3 in E flat ("Rhenish").

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, which he calls a "fantasy," probably to show his desire to be free from arbitrary and restricted form, has been several times performed at these concerts. The work grows with repeated performances. It was very finely given by the orchestra.

The various concert selections from Wagner's "Music Dramas" are always given at these concerts in an ideal manner, and the two given last evening were highly enjoyable from every standpoint. The Schumann symphony—called the "Rhenish," from the visit of the composer to Cologne in 1850—is much less interesting than those in B flat and D minor. The scherzo and finale always seem the bright spots of the work, the first movement being noisy, and the slow movement dull and uninspired. The performance was excellent.

Mr. Evan Williams is a singer one always enjoys hearing, either in oratorio or concert. Both his selections, especially the aria, "Lend Me Your Aid," were sung with exquisite expression and excellent quality of tone throughout. Recalls were numerous at the close of his second number.

At the next rehearsal and concert, Mr. T. Adamowski is announced as the soloist. The selections include the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz; Carnival overture, Dvorak; Scotch fantasy for violin, Bruch; symphonic poem, "Phaeton," Saint-Saens.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE third matinee and evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday and Thursday respectively. Wednesday afternoon the program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in A major, Italian, op. 90..Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Aria from Sigurd..........Reyer
A Faust Overture..........Wagner
Aria from Joseph in Egypt..........Mehul
Waltzes, op. 39..........Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Soloist, M. Saleza.

Owing to the illness of Milka Ternina, Albert Saleza, of the Metropolitan Opera House, appeared and made a most favorable impression with his strong, vibrant tenor and marked musical temperament. The Reyer number is not very interesting, full as it is of a reckless use of Wagner effects, but it demonstrated the tenor's dramatic ability. A tendency to force his upper tones produces an occasional deviation from the pitch. This was more noticeable in the Mehul air, which was sung with smoothness and reticence of style. Saleza showed the fatigue of having sung for the first time "Aïda" on the Monday previous to this matinee. However, he was more than a welcome substitute for Ternina.

The orchestra having been delayed en route from Baltimore, it was late before the concert began. Mr. Gericke, like the stern disciplinarian he is, insisted on a short rehearsal with the singer, yet in the placid, ductile performance of Mendelssohn's symphony there was not a flaw to indicate that the men had been unduly hurried. It was the perfection in finish and exactly suited to the graceful and symmetrical utterances of melodious Felix. Especially enchanting was the saltarello. The "Faust" overture was surprisingly well played. We say this because Gericke has not been deemed in sympathy with Wagner. The structural beauties of the work were brought out, nor was it deficient in sensuous color and passion. Moderation there was, but there was no suggestion of coldness or lack of imaginative breadth.

The Brahms waltzes proved to be a delightful surprise. Written for the piano, Mr. Gericke has scored them discreetly and with a taste that Brahms could not cavil at. Indeed we doubt if Brahms would have been so generous to his orchestra. No. 6, in C sharp major, was a bright bit of color, with a harp employed ever so deftly. Calling for special admiration were the sturdy one in B, the melancholy one in G sharp minor, the grave, gray valse in E and the lovely, exuberant one in B flat. Part of this latter Mr. Gericke uses in his well constructed coda. The entire sixteen are so well instrumented that they will take place in the repertory of every orchestra.

At the Thurday evening concert this program was put forth:

Overture to Der Freischütz..........Von Weber
Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90..........Brahms
Aria from Sigurd..........Reyer
Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, op. 78..........Dvorak
Aria from Joseph in Egypt..........Mehul
Prelude to The Master Singers of Nuremberg..........Wagner

M. Saleza repeated his success of the afternoon previous, although he was not in the same voice. The orchestra evidently had been refreshed by its rest and played with vim and the finish for which it is celebrated. The symphony was read with loving care and with all its contours clearly outlined. In the variations Mr. Gericke got a great variety of color and dynamic contrast, while in the prelude his band played with a surprising tonal splendor, even if there was a certain restraint in the conception. But with Brahms this conductor is in sympathy and the sunshine and shadow of the great work were admirably pictured. There was a large attendance at both concerts.

MUSICAL AMERICA
JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

New York, January 28, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The third afternoon and evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Wednesday and Thursday, at Carnegie Hall.

Fraulein Milka Ternina, who had been advertised as the soloist, was too ill to appear, so M. Albert Saleza, from the Metropolitan Opera House, took her place, and at both concerts sang admirably, arias from Reyer's "Sigurd" and Méhul's "Joseph in Egypt."

M. Saléza was received with exceptional enthusiasm; well deserved, for in quality of voice, enunciation and exquisite taste, he has no superior among the tenors now in New York.

At the afternoon concert the orchestra played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture," and some Brahms waltzes arranged for orchestra by Mr. Gericke.

The evening concert brought Brahm's third symphony, variations on an original theme by Dvorak, the overture to "Der Freischutz," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

At both performances the playing of the orchestra left much to be desired. It looks as though success, long and continued, is having its customary effect. The gentlemen from Boston are no longer afraid of their public.

The Philharmonic Society of New York, even in its most degenerate days, has never played so perfunctorily as did the out-of-town organization last week.

A perfect instrument? Yes, and one moved by a crank—Gericke.

The audiences were eloquently reserved in their applause.

M.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1899.

The Symphony Concert—"Barber of Seville" at Boston Theatre.

After dining out for a week, it was a pleasure to sit down again at the home table and the highly spiced courses of opera which have been set before us only served to make the classical fare of our Symphony Orchestra the more attractive. But the symphonic banquet also began with a strongly seasoned dish; Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture dwells far more upon the strife of the Montagues and Capulets than upon the affairs of the two lovers.

It is astonishing from how many points of view this tragedy can be approached by the composer! Just as Heine's "Du bist wie eine Blume" leads all other poems in the number of its musical settings, (there are probably over 200 settings of this short poem), so this Shakespearian topic leads all others in its manifold musical treatments.

From Gounod and Bellini at the head of the list, we have a roll of nearly a score of composers who have made an opera out of the subject, Dejazet bringing up the rear with a parody called "Rhum et Eau en Juillet." We have Romeo turned into a violoncello, and Juliet into a violin, in a wonderful balcony scene by Berlioz, and an entire symphony with choruses of the fighting factions, and other outgrowths of the play might be cited. It is evident, therefore, that the composer joins with all the world in loving a lover.

The Tschaikowsky overture cannot escape some traits of nationality; the Russians claim that this composer is too cosmopolitan to represent their country; but to the outsider, Tschaikowsky cannot altogether purge himself of the caviar flavor. Mark Twain has told a charming tale of the German painter who sketched "The Surrender at Yorktown," with the result that Washington and Cornwallis became Germans, and both armies had Teutonic attributes; in about the same manner, we cannot help suspecting that this Romeo and Juliet dwelt in Moscow rather than in Verona, and that the crowd which brought forth the "alarums and excursions," were moujiks.

The great Hanslick once said of this overture,—"Thus Destiny knocks at—the bass-drum!" The remark is apt, for there is plenty of tumult in the work, and Mr. Gericke read this with his latterday emphasis. But the dreamy melancholy of the English horn and a final suggestion of the apotheosis of the lovers was not lacking and the tender subordinate theme was given with much beauty. The kettledrummer allowed himself more force in this work than he has hitherto exhibited, but this was in accordance with the composer's evident intention.

Mr. Evan Williams sang with commendable surety and expression Handel's "Waft her angels" with its preceding recitative, and later on the less worthy "Lend me your aid," from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." The phrasing and expression in both of these was a model and we wish that our American tenors might try to imitate Mr. Williams's clear enunciation. The audience became enthusiastic over his work and recalled him many times.

Then came a dash of Wagner, just to show the visiting Wagnerians of the opera company a good example. Richter's arrangement of portions of "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung" is done with a reverent hand and forms a very satisfactory concert number. Every leit-motif stood forth with clearness and beauty and the romantic touches of the Rhine-journey (the book called it "Siegfried's Trip up the Rhine," which suggests "Cookies," reduced fares and excursion steamers) were gloriously interpreted. The horns deserve especial praise for their work in this.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony formed a dignified end to the concert. It is not a work which may take rank with the composer's B flat symphony, but it is beautiful music nevertheless, and like much of Schumann's work it is autobiographic in some degree; it tells plainly how the Rhine life affected the serious musician, it speaks of the happy beginning of the life at Dusseldorf which was to end so disastrously, it is the last gleam of sunshine from a mind over which the clouds were soon to gather.

Mr. Gericke brought out the mighty syncopations of the first movement with abundant vigor; it is possible that Schumann, the great master of syncopation, here pushed his enjoyment of this effect a trifle too far, but the loftiness of subsequent passages redeems this fault. With Schumann even enjoyment was serious, and the Scherzo is certainly not playful. Perhaps this is a national trait and part of the same tendency which causes the German on occasions of great festivity to sing

> "Ich weiss nicht was soll es bedeuten
> Dass ich so traurig bin."
>
> "I know not what spell is upon me
> That I am so sad at heart."

To the present writer the chief charm of this five-movement symphony lies in the two last movements. The fourth movement was inspired by the inauguration of Archbishop von Geissel in Cologne Cathedral, at which Schumann was present.

The orchestra, thanks chiefly to the trombones, here imitates the effect of a mighty organ, and the greatest dignity and solemnity is attained. This makes an admirable foil to the last movement, in which one can almost see the chattering multitude swarming out of the church into the wide Dom-platz on a bright Sunday morning. Here, for once, Schumann rejoices, and we must rejoice with him.

Such music effectively rinsed the consecutive fifths of Puccini, and the hysterical noises of Mascagni out of our ears.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 29, 1899.

Evan Williams, the Soloist at the 13th Symphony Concert—"The Barber of Seville" Given by the Ellis Grand Opera Company.

The program of the 13th Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky
Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and Air, "Waft Her, Angels," from Jephthah ....Handel
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Twilight of the Gods" (arranged by Hans Richter) ....Wagner
Air, "Lend Me Your Aid," from "Irene," Gounod
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major...Schumann

After the opera music of the week a symphony program with a little green in it—something cooling—would have been a relief. Although I have heard more stirring performances of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," there was still the sound of clashing rapiers, there was the music of the church and the thought of funeral hymn, there was the great melody of "love that mocks time and space," the melody of eternal passion, eternal pain. There was again the smell of the theatre, the sight of the footlights. The selections from "The Ring" were surely not green or cooling, and we were thus reminded that "Die Walkürie," Sigfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung" are coming. As for Schumann's Rhenish symphony, it is for the most part one of the most irritatingly boresome things in all music. Take out the "Cathedral music," and there is little of any interest to anyone save the earnest student of syncopation.

Mr. Evan Williams supplied a touch of green by singing the recitative and aria from "Jephthah" and then he, too, went into the theatre with his aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." Handel's recitative always appealed to me on account of the line "Great Chemosh, and such fabled deities." And in the Gounod recitative it takes a tenor of authority to face an audience with

> "How frail and weak a thing is man!"

I have written about Mr. Williams many times in the Journal, and it is not necessary now to draw a pen picture of him after the manner of Clarendon. Certain tones were veiled last night, and at times there was a suspicion of throatiness, but the natural beauty of his voice, the intelligence shown in phrasing, and the ease and simplicity with which he sang made their way straight to the hearers, who were loud in applause, especially after the aria from Gounod, which—let me whisper in your ear, Mr. Williams—is pretty poor stuff.

Philip Hale.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third of the season's evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not quite fill the Academy of Music, but the audiences at these performances are no longer meager or injurious to the reputation of Brooklyn. Possibly this is due to the patronage of the Brooklyn Institute and possibly to the increasing fondness for good music, but the fact is one to give satisfaction to all concerned. Mr. Gericke played last night the Brahms Academic Festival overture by which the composer got his degree. It has been given here on several occasions, and is an always welcome number. Brahms took for his themes the college songs that are more or less familiar in our own universities and has woven them into a beautiful and sometimes stately fabric. German folk songs are apt to be better than ours, yet when the right man comes to us he will erect "Johnny Get Your Gun" and "There'll be a Hot Time in the Old Town To-Night" into a musical structure of appealing beauty, if not of grandeur. In all the arts it is not the subject that counts for as much as the way the subject is treated. A second number was Antonin Dvorak's symphonic variations on an original theme. There are twenty-seven of these variations, of which seven were omitted from this concert. Had the composer adhered to the old idea of a variation, a suite of this length would have been well night unbearable, for who could endure to hear a man tell the same fact in twenty-seven forms of words? but he has used so great a liberty in the treatment that the divisions bear little relation to each other, differing in rhythm, tune, time and orchestration, and while some are heavy and forced, most of them are pleasing and have a rough beauty that is typical of Hungarian music.
The close suggestion of the prayer in Verdi's
"Othello" in one of these variants is notable.
The symphony was Volkmann's first in D minor, not a great work, to be sure, but a truth does not always require to be spoken loud. It has some drowsy moments—this symphony—and would prosper in condensation, especially in the opening number, where the composer seems to acknowledge most frankly his debt to Beethoven for form, and occasionally for instrumentation. There are, however, some beautiful episodes in the work, and that it appeals more to the meditative mood than to the merry is nothing against it. It hardly requires to be said that it was placidly and delightfully played by Mr. Gericke's band. Frau Schumann-Heink, who substituted the air from Mozart's "Titus" and a recitative and air from Bruch's "Odysseus" for the numbers on the programme that were to have been sung by Fraulein Ternina, was in better voice, more spirited and more sure in her singing than when she gave these same selections on the afternoon before. There were still evidences of caution in her treatment of the Mozart number, which is not so well in her range as the Bruch air. Large voices and dramatic voices appear to best advantage in music that has a corresponding breadth and flow and expression, rather than in music that is brilliant or merely rapid. It is blasphemy to say it, because Mozart is an old master, and everything that an old master does is perfect; but the Bruch air was much better than the Mozart selection, both as fitting the singer's voice and because of its intrinsic charm. It was modern; it contained no jigs; it had smoothness, repose, sentiment, dignity and beauty. Frau Heink gave this number with more decision, more dramatic force and more pleasing tone than at the matinee, and the enraptured ones recalled her four or five times, as if she had been eighty men who had just played some of the finest music ever written. The next appearances of the orchestra in Brooklyn will be on the 24th and 25th of February.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 29.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 29, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Williams, the Soloist, Wins New Laurels.

His Singing Rewarded with Applause and Recalls—Other Numbers on the Programme Include a Spirited Overture—A Week of Musical Feasts Concluded.

The programme for the 13th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Overture—Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"..Tschaikowsky
"Waft Her Angels," from "Jephtha"..Handel
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung"..........................Wagner
Air, "Lend Me Your Aid," from "Irene". Gounod
Symphony No. 3, E-flat, "Rhenish"..Schumann

Mr. Evan Williams was the soloist.

The concert seemed to be a trifle provocative of somnolency, or, perhaps, at the close of a week that has been so prolific in music, the ear had become jaded with excessive concourse of sweet sounds, and of sounds that were not so sweet, and found it difficult to appreciate the programme in the proper spirit and at its true worth. Then, too, the Tschaikowsky overture was music that set a pace which was not sustained by the other numbers. Even the Richter arrangement of the Wagner selections seemed dull.

After listening to seven operas in one week, and going from the last of them in the afternoon to a solid concert in the evening, it is not wholly impossible that one may have feasted to satiety before reaching the last named event, and without the palate in exactly the condition to relish so rich a pousse cafe. Therefore is it that if the programme took on an aspect of heaviness, and its interpretation appeared to be not as interesting as is the rule with the conductor and his splendid orchestra, it is possibly attributable to musical gormandizing and its resulting dyspeptic sluggishness on the part of the over-fed hearer, rather than to the selections and their performance.

Mr. Williams, who was cordially welcomed, sang the Handel aria in that broad legato manner and with that beauty of voice that always causes listening to him to prove a pleasure of a high order. The recitative seemed to drag, owing to the unnecessarily dragging pace at which it was taken, but the aria was read with dignity of sentiment and loftiness of style. The Gounod air hovers perilously on the verge of commonplace, but it is vigorously dramatic, and its climaxes are very effective. Mr. Williams sang this with great impressiveness and with a sostenuto that may be fairly pronounced noble. He was tremendously applauded and recalled after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Carneval," Dvorak; Scotch fantasy for violin, Bruch; symphonic poem, "Phaeton," Saint-Saens; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. Mr. T. Adamowski is to be the soloist.

At the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon were, among many others, Mrs. J. Deforest Danielson, Mr. George W. Proctor, Mme. Melba, Mr. Walter Damrosch, Mr. Henry W. Daniell, Mrs. Boylston Beal, Miss Elizabeth King, the Rev. G. D. Latimer, Mrs. R. M. Field, Mrs. A. H. Hersey, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mr. W. A. Hovey, Mr. Ernest Perabo, Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Baker, Mr. C. P. Curtis, Dr. and Mrs. Hall Curtis, and many more. Mr. Evan Williams had a great reception.

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

Union — Jan. 17

THE CONTRALTO TO SING WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Milka Ternina, who was announced as the soloist of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been compelled on account of illness, to cancel her engagements in Manhattan and Brooklyn this week. Yesterday arrangements were completed between Mr. Grau, manager of the opera company at the Metropolitan Opera House, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the appearance of Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, the great German contralto of the Grau company, at the Brooklyn concerts, to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

SCHUMANN-HEINK TO SING.

Change in Soloist for the Boston Symphony Concert.

Eagle Jan. 17

Mme. Ternina, the soloist engaged for the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn and for those in Manhattan this week is ill and has canceled all her engagements for the present. In her place Mr. Comee has engaged for the Brooklyn concerts Mme. Schumann-Heink, the great contralto of the opera house. She sang Ortrud here last week and every one who heard her then will welcome the chance to hear her in concert and in music which gives more opportunity for the beauty of her noble voice than does the trying role of Ortrud. Her lower tones are very broad and rich and she is a dramatic singer with a great command of tone color and with intense feeling. Her selections are not yet announced, but she will no doubt sing music suitable for a symphony programme and her presence will add much to the interest of the concerts.

MUSIC OF ANOTHER WEEK.

Citizen — Dec. 11

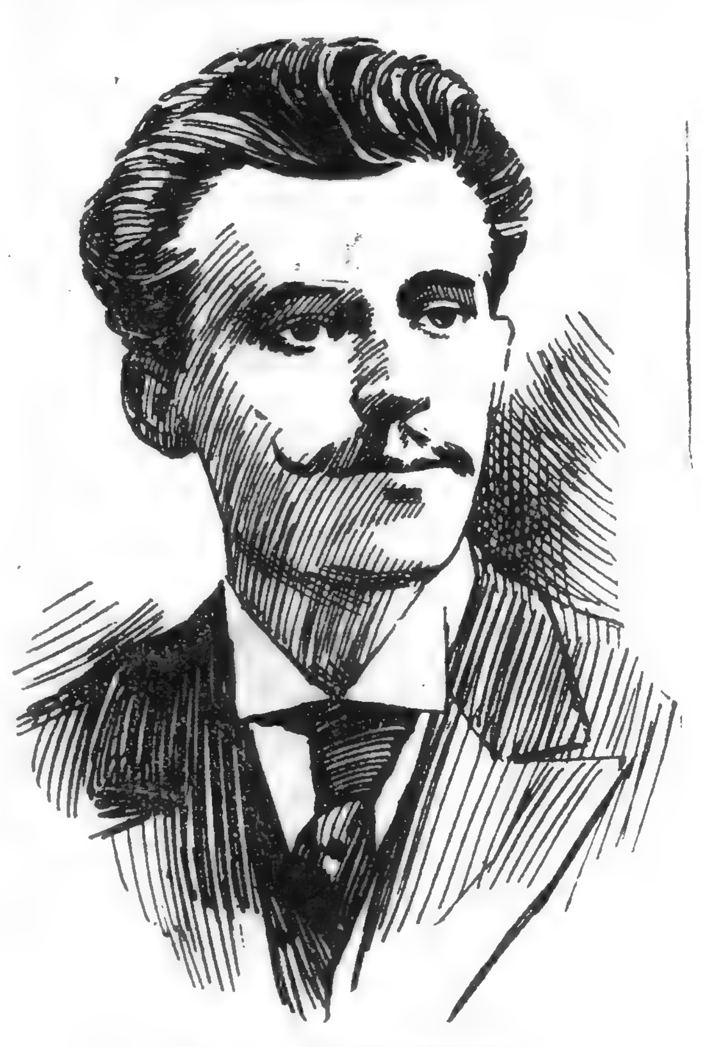
The Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Here the Second Time This Year.

FRANZ KNEISEL TO LEAD

Because of the Illness of Mr. Gericke—The First Apollo Concert of the Winter—Other Programmes.

Cut of BURMEISTER to go with this

Owing to the recent illness of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the two performances this week in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given under the direction of Mr. Franz Kneisel, the well-known violinist. At both matinee and evening concerts Willy Burmester will be the soloist. He is a violinist whose native land is Germany, and whose popularity is great just now in London. When but a boy he spent much time playing on his instrument with the great Hans Von Bulow, who was the one to discover his genius. He has a sister, Johanna, a pianist, and with her he first appeared before the Berlin public in 1891. His selection on Friday afternoon will be the Beethoven Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61, and on Saturday night a Paganini Concerto in D major, an extremely difficult composition for the violin. The orchestral numbers for the two dates are these: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64, Tscharkowsky; Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Op. 31. Saint Saens; and overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, by Hector Berlioz. Saturday—Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61; overture, "Fingal's Case," Mendelssohn, and "Les Preludes," by Liszt.



WILLY BURMESTER.
Violinist.

At the grand concert to-morrow night of the Brooklyn Saengerbund, in the Academy of Music, the following programme will be rendered, with the assistance of Mrs. Josephine S. Jacoby, alto; and August Spanuth at the piano.

Overture, Tannhauser, Wagner, orchestra, Recognition of Land, male chorus and orchestra. Baritone solo, Mr. Henry Bartels; Aria from Orpheus, Gluck, Mrs. Josephine S. Jacoby and orchestra; The Emigrants (new), Gevaert, ballad for male chorus a capella; May Song (new), Krug; Phyllis and the Shepherd (new), von Othegraven, ladies' chorus and orchestra; overture, Melpomene, Chadwick, orchestra; The Fire Rider (new), Hugo Wolf, mixed chorus and orchestra; Piano Concerto in E flat major, Liszt, August Spanuth and orchestra; Jessie, Scotch folk song (new), von Othegraven; "I Love But What Neat Is" (new), Renger, male chorus a capella; songs with orchestra (a) Urlicht, IV Movement from the II. Symphony (new), Mahler; (b) Bliss, van der Stucken, Mrs. Josephine S. Jacoby; Young Siegfried, Zoellner, male chorus and orchestra.

A large audience was present at both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening readings by Miss Mary French Fuld, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. On both occasions Miss Fuld was assisted by Mr. Charles Stuart Phillips, tenor of Holy Trinity choir, and Mr. H. E. H. Benedict at the piano. The music proved a most delightful adjunct, the vocalist receiving quite as much applause as the reader. Three groups of songs, many of them quite familiar, programme selected, were rendered on Friday afternoon, and in them Mr. Phillips displayed both the power and the rich mellow quality of his voice. John Hyatt Brewer's "The Rockaby Lady" was highly appreciated, and after singing "The Songs of Araby" and Victor Harris' Madrigal, Mr. Phillips was encored three times, to the last of which he responded, repeating the last-named composition.

ORCHESTRA AND OPERA.

BRILLIANT MUSICAL PROGRAMME FOR THIS WEEK.

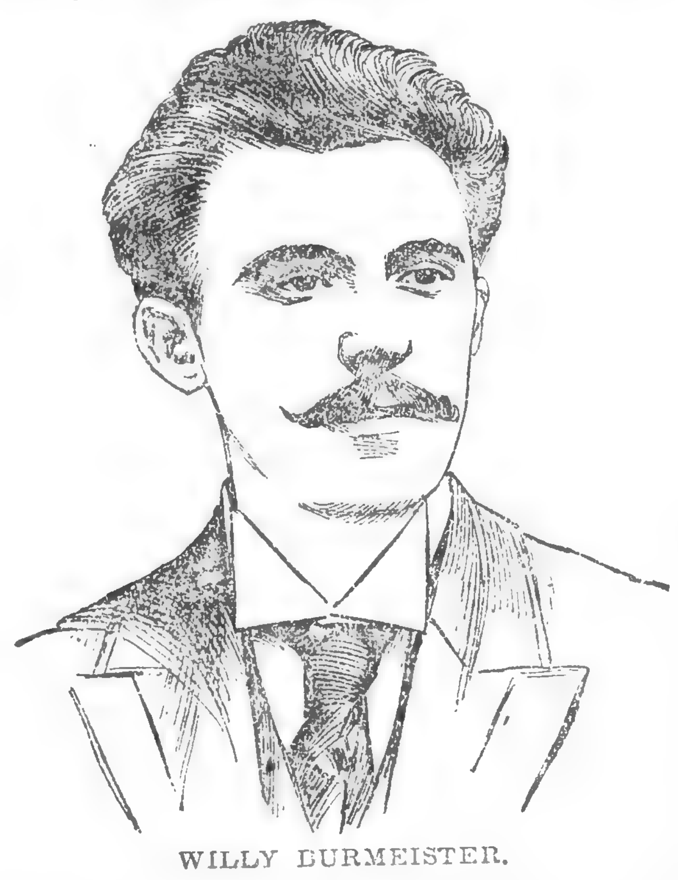
Eagle — Dec. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Apollo Club and the Saengerbund. The New Conductor and Two Wagner Operas at the Metropolitan.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY—Popular concert with Gadski, Martelli, Bispham and Plancon, Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M.
Paur popular concert, with soloists, Carnegie Hall, 8 P. M.
MONDAY—Sangerbund annual concert, Leo Schulz and Mrs. Jacoby, soloists, Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
"Romeo et Juliette," Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M.
TUESDAY—Apollo Club concert, Academy of Music, 8:15.
Women's String Orchestra of New York, Ovide Musin, soloist, Mendelssohn Hall, Manhattan, 8:30 P. M.
WEDNESDAY—"Die Walkure," Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M.
FRIDAY—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 3:30 P. M.
"Siegfried," Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M.
SATURDAY—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn Academy, 8 P. M.
"Marriage of Figaro," Metropolitan Opera House, 2 P. M.
Popular price opera, work yet to be selected, Metropolitan, 8 P. M.

The great musical event on this side of the river is the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its December concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.



WILLY BURMEISTER.

There are several interesting features about this week's concerts which distinguish them from others by the same great orchestra. First we shall have a chance to test the powers of Mr. Kneisel as a conductor, for he is leading all the orchestra's December concerts owing to the illness of Mr. Gericke. Mr. Kneisel has often proved himself a fine musician and a brilliant violinist and he will no doubt add to his laurels as a conductor. The soloist of both concerts is to be Willy Burmester, a young violinist, who made a great reputation two or three years ago in Berlin, where the long residence of the great Joachim has made them critical of violinists. Since then Mr. Burmester has won the admiration of London and many continental cities by his brilliant virtuosity. He has been called the modern Paganini so much that the phrase must be very tiresome to him, but he is something more than a virtuoso or he would hardly undertake the Beethoven concerto, which he is to play in the afternoon. The programmes are up to the best standard of this noble orchestra, the symphonies being Tschaikowsky's Fifth, which has been little heard here, and Schumann's Second, which would bear repeating every winter. The public all through this country is now crying for Tschaikowsky on its programmes as twenty years ago it was crying for Wagner and the orchestra is meeting the demand. The symphony will be played in the afternoon because last month Tschaowsky's Sixth was played in the evening, and the audiences are to a considerable extent separate. The full programmes are:

FRIDAY AFTERNOON AT 3:30.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64.............. Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, Op. 61............ Ludwig von Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Op. 31...............Camille Saint-Saens
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23.......... Hector Berlioz

Soloist, Mr. Willy Burmester.

SATURDAY EVENING AT 8:15.

Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61................ Robert Schumann
Concerto (in one movement) for violin, D major, Paganini
Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Op. 26................. Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"......... Franz Liszt

Soloist, Mr. Willy Burmester.

The Apollo Club, Brooklyn's most notable male chorus, will give its opening concert on Tuesday night, at the Academy. Dudley Buck will conduct, as he has long done with distinction, and there will be assisting artists.

The Women's String Orchestra of New York, a body of much social and musical distinction in Manhattan, will give the first concert of its third season on Tuesday night, at Mendelssohn Hall. Carl V. Lachmund will conduct. Ovide Musin will play violin solos, and the programme ranges from Haydn to Wagner.

David Bispham has recovered his voice and returned to the casts at the opera. He will have but two song recitals outside his operatic work, one in Manhattan and one here next week, with Bertha Bucklin.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Eagle Jan 21

Mr. Gericke has recovered from his illness and led the splendid band from Boston at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. He had only one new number to offer, but that was worth hearing and under his lead the orchestra acquitted itself in its always admirable manner. This new offering was a set of Brahms waltzes, scored by Mr. Gericke himself, and it was so different from what Brahms usually is that most of the audience forgave him and some doubtless became Brahmins on the instant. Brahms is commonly indecisive. In these dances he has a purpose and follows it. Commonly he wanders from his subject, and the farther he can get from it, and the longer he stays away, the better he seems to like it and the less his audience does. Commonly he uses the utmost economy of melody and if it were not for the contrary assurance of his admirers one might also say that he is stingy of beauty. But in these little pieces, which make a really charming suite, he is clear, writes to the point, stops when he is through, and his rhythms and nuances have a gentle and caressing swing absolutely different from the burly and formless music of his symphonies. They have a Hungarian dash and force and now and again they are absolutely sweet. Some of their virtues belong to Mr. Gericke, who has so well succeeded in the orchestration that one can but think that, if he had confided the scoring of all his work to this leader, Brahms would have done better than to insist on it himself. The adapter's long experience as a conductor has given to him familiarity with every voice in the orchestra, and he uses exactly the tone color required of every passage, often exhibiting a striking originality and always a refinement of taste. As it now stands, this suite should be in demand on our concert programmes for years to come.

The only other instrumental numbers in a short programme—a wee bit too short—were the "Freischuetz" overture, which was played smoothly, properly, with a fair but not stirring spirit and without emphasis on the spooky episodes, and the Beethoven Fourth Symphony. This latter work, in spite of some moments of thinness and bareness and a lack of the decision and dramatic quality that are found in the Fifth, Seventh and the "Eroica," has much that is delightful, and its spirit is suave and idyllic. In its interpretation the band was at its best and the string playing would have been marvelous had we not become used to marvels.

The illness of Fraulein Ternina, who had been announced as soloist, necessitated a change in the relatively unimportant part of the programme, and she was replaced by Frau Schumann-Heink, who sang an air from Mozart's "Titus" and one from Bruch's "Odysseus." It is understood that she had to prepare herself in haste, and to that fact may be ascribed a rather obvious care in her singing and an occasional false intonation. The gay little turns and runs with which Mozart ornamented everything, whether it were a ballad or a dirge, and which make all his music juvenile and cheery, were given with effort and often made the voice as well as the manner seem dry and lacking in melodious quality; but the Bruch air was better. It had repose and strength; it was broad and dramatic, and it subordinated mere technic to theme and meaning. In this the singer, although not wholly confident, exhibited more freedom and her voice gained in volume and correctness of delivery. As usual with solos these drew more exhibitions of rapture than the finer music. This evening the same songs will be sung and will doubtless be improved upon, while the orchestral numbers will comprise the "Academic" overture of Brahms, Dvorak's variations on an original theme and Volkmann's First Symphony.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Union — Dec 10

Next week Brooklyn and Manhattan will each have two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke's place as conductor will be taken by Franz Kneisel, the concert meister of the orchestra. Reports from Boston announced slight improvement in Mr. Gericke's condition. His illness, this early in the season, is deplored by musicians everywhere and that great public which looks forward to the monthly visits of the men from Boston with keenest anticipation. From Mr. Kneisel's perfect art and soulful performances as a violinist, his admirers are not likely to be disappointed when he appears before them in the role of conductor The Brooklyn concerts will be given at the Academy of Music, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 16 and 17. William Burmeister, the violinist, will be the soloist at both concerts.. The programmes follow—Friday afternoon:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64 Tschaikowsky
I. Andante, (E minor), Allegro con anima (E minor).
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuma licenza (D major).
III. Valse: Allegro moderato (A major).
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso (E major), Allegro vivace (E minor).
Concerto for violin in D major, Op. 61, Beethoven
I. Allegro, ma non troppo (D major).
II. Larghetto (G major).
III. Rondo (D major).
Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Op. 31....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 22 Berlioz

Saturday evening:

Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61, Schumann
I. Sostenuto assai (C major).
Allegro ma non troppo (C major).
II. Sherzo: Allegro vivace (C major),
Trio I. (C major).
Trio II. (C major).
III. Adagio espressivo (C minor).
IV. Allegro moto vivace (C major).
Concerto for violin in D major (in one movement)......... ....Paganini
Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Op. 26, Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes," Liszt

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Tribune Dec. 11

THE WEEKLY CALENDAR—MR. KNEISEL AND THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—PROGRAMMES OF A BUSY WEEK—NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Following is the local musical calendar for the current week:

Sunday—Metropolitan Opera House, 8:15 p. m., popular concert; Carnegie Hall, 8:15 p. m., popular concert of the Paur Symphony Orchestra.

Monday—Metropolitan Opera House, 8 p. m., "Roméo et Juliette"; American Theatre, 8:15 p. m., "Faust" in English (all week); Broadway Theatre, "The Highwayman" (all week); Chickering Hall, 11 a. m., analytical pianoforte recital by Dr. Hanchett; 2:30 p. m., song and 'cello recital by Mme. Wiskow and Mr. Grienauer; Academy of Music, Brooklyn, concert of the Sängerbund; Waldorf-Astoria, 11:15 a. m., Mr. Bagby's musical morning; Old South Church, 8 p. m., free organ recital by Gerrit Smith.

Tuesday—Mendelssohn Hall, 8:15 p. m., concert of the Women's String Orchestra; Brooklyn Institute, 2 p. m., analytical pianoforte recital by Dr. Hanchett.

Wednesday—Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m., concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Metropolitan Opera House, 8 p. m., German opera, "Die Walküre"; No. 19 East Sixty-second-st., 11 a. m., lecture by Miss Hannah Smith on "The Orchestra"; Wissner Hall, Brooklyn, 4 p. m., public lesson in musical form by Carl Fiqué; Hardman Hall, 8:15 p. m., recital by Jules Braham, basso; Cooper Union, 8 p. m., lecture by Mr. Surrette on Beethoven.

Thursday—Carnegie Hall, 8:15 p. m., concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mendelssohn Hall, 3 p. m., song recital by David Bispham; Chickering Hall, 8:15 p. m., concert of chamber music; First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, 8 p. m., service of the American Guild of Organists; Church of the Intercession, 8 p. m., free organ recital by Samuel A. Baldwin.

Friday—Carnegie Hall, 2 p. m., public rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society; Metropolitan Opera House, 8 p. m., German opera, "Siegfried"; Academy of Music, Brooklyn, 8:30 p. m., concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; No. 451 West End-ave., 4 p. m., recital by Miss Bisbee and Mrs. Bussing.

Saturday—Metropolitan Opera House, 2 p. m., "Le Nozze di Figaro"; 8 p. m., Italian opera at popular prices; Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m., symphony concert for young people; 8:15 p. m., concert of the Philharmonic Society; No. 126 West Sixty-sixth-st., lecture by Miss Hannah Smith on "The Opera"; Academy of Music, Brooklyn, 8:15 p. m., concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The week thus offers the people of New-York City six orchestral concerts of the highest class, and six orchestral concerts of less importance, eleven performances of what is popularly spoken of as grand opera, fourteen performances of comic operetta in English, not to mention the miscellaneous affairs. It is to be hoped that no music lover will go hungry. The offerings, it will be observed from the intelligence conveyed by this column, are all of a high order. At the opera there are the first of Wagner's Nibelungen dramas to look forward to, and the production of Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," which had to be postponed last Wednesday because of the illness of Mme. Eames. In the orchestral department local patriotic interest centres in the third public rehearsal and concert of the Philharmonic Society. For these the original plans contemplated the co-operation of Mme. Schumann-Heink with the society, but circumstances have compelled the substitution of another singer, and Mme. Josephine S. Jacoby has been chosen. She will sing airs by Gluck and Saint-Saëns. Following is the programme:

Overture, "Genovera"	Schumann
Aria, "Oh, del mio dolce ardor"	Gluck
Suite for orchestra, "Impressions d'Italie"	G. Charpentier
Aria, "Amour! viens aider ma faiblesse"	Saint-Saëns
Symphony, C minor	Beethoven

At the opera "Romeo et Juliette" will be given on Monday evening with Mme. Melba and those who were associated with her in the first performance of the opera this season; on Wednesday the scene will shift to the mythical Northland, and "Die Walküre" will be given, with the principal parts in the hands of Mmes. Eames, Nordica and Meisslinger and MM. Van Dyck, Pringle and Van Rooy; on Friday Mmes. Nordica, Engle and Meisslinger and MM. Dippel, Bispham and Van Rooy may be heard in "Siegfried." Saturday afternoon is expected to bring us "Le Nozze di Figaro," with the cast as printed in last Sunday's Tribune. For the Saturday evening performance at popular prices the opera had not been chosen yesterday.

After conducting the fifth public rehearsal in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, November 18, Mr. Gericke had a sudden and severe attack of the grip, which has confined him to his house ever since. A high temperature for several days made his physicians fear an attack of typhoid fever, but this fear has been averted, and he is now on the road to rapid and complete recovery. Ever since the date given Franz Kneisel has very creditably filled Mr. Gericke's place, and will continue in the position of conductor until Mr. Gericke has fully recovered. As all the performances of the orchestra on its December trip this week will be under the direction of Mr. Kneisel, the following sketch of his career may prove interesting: Franz Kneisel, a Rumanian by birth but of German parentage, studied the violin in Vienna with Gruen and Hellmesberger. He studied not only the violin, but music; and he studied music by most intelligent hearing and observation, as well as by the performance of routine task. Graduating at the Vienna Conservatory, he made his first appearance with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on December 21, 1882, and was soon afterward offered the position of solo violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Court Theatre. Afterward he was associated with the Bilse Orchestra at Berlin, as concert-meister, a position of the highest honor, which had been held before him by such eminent artists as Ysaye, Halir and Thomson. Americans are indebted to Wilhelm Gericke for his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for it was he who engaged him as principal of that organization. This was in the second year of Mr. Gericke's administration, and at the third concert, October 31, 1885, Mr. Kneisel, then twenty years old, made his first appearance at these concerts as a soloist. He played the concerto by Beethoven. On October 22, 1898, and again under the direction of Mr. Gericke, he played the concerto by Goldmark, and this was his eighteenth appearance at these concerts as a soloist, although many have been his incidental solo passages. It would be interesting to go through in detail the indefatigable and illustrious career of Mr. Kneisel in Boston alone. As solo violinist, he introduced at the Symphony concerts concertos by Brahms, Goldmark and Strube. He has played, in addition to the concertos already [illegible] Joachim's Hungarian (first movement), Spohr's Ninth, Paganini's in D, arranged by Wilhelmj; Mendelssohn's; Viotti's in A minor, No. 22. With Mr. Loeffler, he has played Bach's double concerto and the viole d'amour in Loeffler's "Mort de Tintagiles," and, with Mr. Schroeder, Brahms's concerto for violin and 'cello. And this list, no doubt, is incomplete. He had the honor of conducting this orchestra, after Mr. Nikisch's departure, on its Western trip, and at three concerts at the World's Fair. Mr. Kneisel is a member of the Harvard Musical Association, the St. Botolph Club, of Boston, and many famous foreign musical organizations.

The programmes at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York and Brooklyn this week will be as follows:

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY MATINEE.

Symphony No. 9, in C major	Schubert
Concerto for violin	Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," op. 25	MacDowell
Overture to "Tannhäuser"	Wagner

Solo player, Willy Burmester.

NEW-YORK, THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 65	Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61	Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31	Saint-Säens
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"	Liszt

Solo player, Willy Burmester.

BROOKLYN, FRIDAY MATINEE.

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64	Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61	Beethoven
Symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31	Saint-Säens
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23	Berlioz

Solo player, Willy Burmester.

BROOKLYN, SATURDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61	Schumann
Concerto for violin, in D major (in one movement)	Paganini
Overture, "Fingal's Cave," op. 26	Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes"	Liszt

Solo player, Willy Burmester.

Willy Burmester, the violinist, who will play solos at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York and Brooklyn this week, has won a fine reputation, chiefly for his technical skill, throughout Europe. He is a native of Hamburg, was born in 1869 and studied first with his father, and afterward with Joachim for three years in Helsingfors, Finland, before beginning his career as a virtuoso.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE.

Union Jan. 21

A beautiful day, a programme of suitable length, and the reappearance, after his illness, of Mr. Gericke, contributed to the enjoyment of the third Brooklyn matinee of the Boston Orchestra, which confined its ministrations to three numbers only—a Beethoven symphony, the Overture to "Der Freischutz" and some waltzes by Brahms, scored for the orchestra by the conductor. The fourth Beethoven symphony, coming immediately after the "Eroica" and just before the C minor, always seems, perhaps because of its position, somewhat ineffective and uninteresting. All that there is of thematic variety and melodic charm Mr. Gericke and his orchestra bring out to the full, since it is in compositions of the ultra classical order that this maestro feels most thoroughly at home, and in which he obtains the most perfect response from his men. But it must be confessed that the layman values Opus 60 for the technical opportunity it gives the instruments rather than for any marked inspiration in its character and material. Mr. Apthorp has an interesting note to the effect that on its first presentation, at a concert in Vienna, this symphony was preceded on the programme by Beethoven first, second and third! Truly the audiences of those days must have been made of sterner stuff than those in the year of grace 1899.

The "Freischutz" overture was played delightfully, from the lovely Adagio near the beginning to the grand close in full fortissimo, with every dramatic incident receiving due attention throughout. About the Brahms waltzes there was nothing remarkable, though they bore witness to Mr. Gericke's knowledge and care, and at the same time served as a pleasant sauce to the more solid matter. Two or three of them were very pretty, but as a whole they were more or less out of place on a symphony programme, even though from the hand of so serious a musician as Brahms.

Mme. Schumann-Heink and opera ought to be separated. The descent from the costume of an Ortrud or a Fricka to the conventional attire of the day, with a hat to match, is in itself a shock, since all the majesty of mien evaporates in a trice. Then the voice, with its noble tones, so effective in music drama, amidst the colder atmosphere of the concert hall, particularly in such arias as that from Mozart's "Titus," seems deficient in suavity and tenderness. In the deeper music of Bruch's "Odyesius" there was a chance for the tragic note which contains for this singer her greatest opportunity, but the larger sweep of the operatic stage was keenly missed. Possibly in such circumstances the voice stands more solidly on its merits, and in Mme. Schumann-Heink's case proves that, while big and glorious, it is lacking in that luscious sweetness which is usually the contralto's birthright. But that is something we do not care to know, and do not know, when under the spell of Ortrud's splendid cunning or Fricka's wounded sensibility, Mme. Schumann-Heink, as everybody must understand by this time, was a substitute for Milka Ternina, who came over to sing Wagner solos with the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, but whose continued illness prevented a single appearance.

This evening the orchestra appears at the Academy again, in a different programme, except for the selection of the soloist. The next matinee and concert are set down for Jan. 24 and 25. A large attendance seems to be the rule on all these occasions.

MUSIC FOR THE WEEK

Eagle Jan 15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND MILKA TERNINA.

Concerts on Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening in Brooklyn—Great Week at the Metropolitan—Wagner Cycle and Other Brilliant Operas.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY—Popular concert with Sembrich, Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M.

MONDAY—"Aida," with Nordica, Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M. Concert by Alma Webster Powell, Chickering Hall, Manhattan, 8:15.

TUESDAY—"Die Walkure," Metropolitan Opera House, 7 P. M.

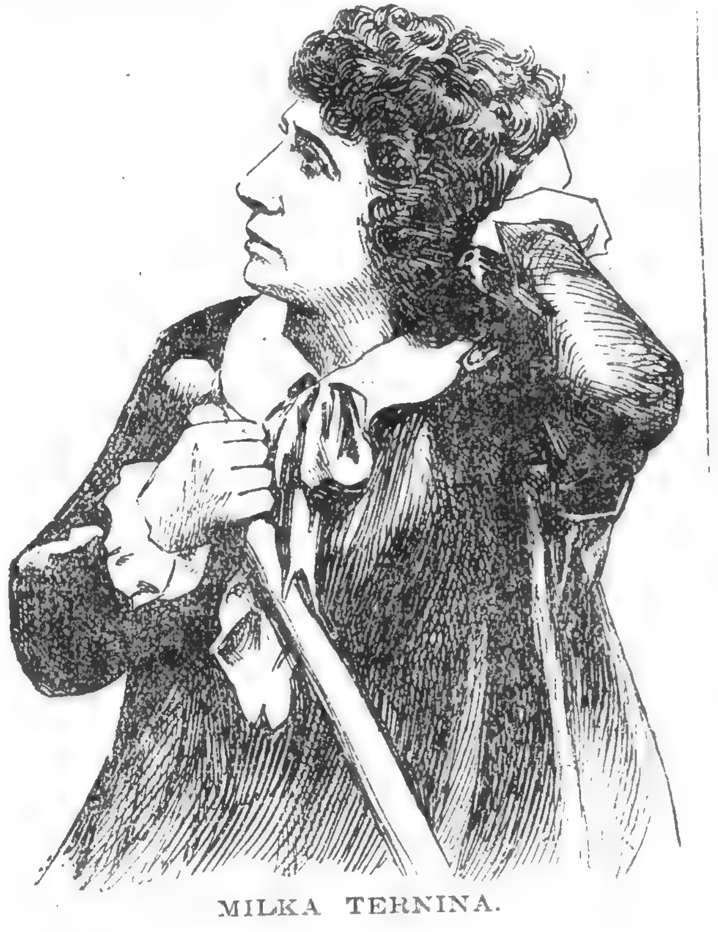
WEDNESDAY—"The Huguenots," with star cast, Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M. Concert, Arthur Claassen pupils, Wissner Hall, 8:15.

THURSDAY—"Siegfried," Metropolitan Opera House, 7 P. M.

FRIDAY—Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ternina, Academy of Music, 3:30 P. M. "Faust," Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M.

SATURDAY—Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ternina, Academy of Music, 8:15; "Don Giovanni," 2 P. M. "Manon," Metropolitan Opera House, 8 P. M.

This week brings the always welcome return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its Brooklyn concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The orchestra will be welcomed this week not only for its two excellent programmes and because Mr. Gerike comes in restored helth to lead his great band, but because it brings as soloist Milka Ternina, one of the rare opera singers whose style is so noble that she is a fitting associate of such an orchestra. Mme. Ternina has made her greatest fame in Germany and London, but she has been in this country, so that we know that her foreign reputation will be sustained by the appreciation of American audiences. She was here with the Damrosch company in 1895-96, and divided parts and honors with the great Klafsky at that time, singing Isolde, Brunnhilde and Fidelio in alternation with that artist. In Boston Ternina made a specially strong impression by the beauty of her singing, which was regarded as more than an equivalent for Klafsky's whirlwind of dramatic power. Last summer she made the same stir in London that she had done in Boston two years earlier, and the indications are that the court opera at Munich won't be able to retain its star much longer. This year she is the reliance of the German end of the Melba-Ellis opera company. The symphony in the afternoon will be Beethoven's Fourth. The evening will have two unusual numbers, the "Academic" overture, by Brahms, and the First Symphony of Robert Volkmann, a composer of this century whose music is liked in Germany, but little known here. Mme. Ternina's selections will show her both as a mistress of the bel canto and as a dramatic singer. The full programmes are:



MILKA TERNINA.

FRIDAY MATINEE.

Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Aria, "Cosi fan tutte"	Mozart
Frl. Milka Ternina.
Waltzes, Op. 39	Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Aria from "Fidelio"	Beethoven
Frl. Milka Ternina.
Symphony No. 4, in B flat major, Op. 60	Beethoven

SATURDAY EVENING.

"Academic" overture	Brahms
Aria	Brahms
Frl. Milka Ternina.
Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 78	Dvorak
Elizabeth's aria from "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Frl. Milka Ternina.
Symphony No. 1, in D minor, Op. 41	Robert Volkmann

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Standard January

At the concert Saturday evening which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the Academy of Music, Mme. Schumann-Heink repeated the arias which she sang at the Friday matinee. The great contralto was in much better voice. In the recitative and aria from Max Bruch's "Odysseus" she sang with richness of tone and dramatic power. A month or six weeks hence, when certain temporary causes are removed, this marvelous artist will be able to show New Yorkers the full range and beauty of a rare contralto voice. It should be stated that the arias which Mme. Schumann-Heink sang in Brooklyn were prepared in haste, and so one could hardly expect her to appear to the best advantage. The orchestral numbers at the concert Saturday evening were the Brahms Academic Festival Overture, variations on an original theme, by Dvorak, and the Volkmann Symphony No. 1. Only the musical pedagogue found something to admire in these compositions. For the mere music lover they contained very little that was interesting, although the fine playing of the orchestra, under Herr Gericke, held the audience under the usual spell.

MUSICAL.

Times Jan. 23

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday night brought out a good attendance and it is quite safe to say that the majority of the audience found their chief pleasure in the singing of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who repeated the Mozart and Bruch arias given on Friday afternoon and sang them with the animation and fervor of expression that won for her frequent recalls, as at the afternoon concert. No encore was given, however.

Vocal selections, as a rule, give more general satisfaction than the instrumental numbers at these concerts, a proof of the accepted fact that vocal music is still more popular than orchestral music, the personality of the singer having something to do with this. But the character of the orchestral selections on Saturday night suggested a special reason why the audience should find the vocal numbers the most interesting—using this word in the sense that the average listener would be likely to apply it. The programme indicated that Mr. Gericke is not inclined to make any concessions to popular taste and that he holds to a severe standard of classical excellence. After the concert there were remarks to the effect that the programme was the dullest heard in some time.

This was a trifle severe but it gave evidence of a more or less prevalent feeling. There certainly was little or nothing of that musical joyousness which the public finds delight in and which does not necessarily imply a lack of appreciation of what is good and wholesome. No conductor can afford to ignore this sentiment.

The orchestral part of Saturday night's programme was more serviceable for the purposes of musical study than for ordinary enjoyment, but the majority of the public does not go to study. Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, like his series of waltzes played on Friday afternoon, was quite different from what we have usually had from this composer and clearly showed that Brahms could write in an intelligent vein before he surrendered himself wholly to the vagaries of musical sophistry. The symphonic variations on an original theme by Dvorak were interesting as showing that this great composer was a master of technical ingenuity and orchestral device twenty years ago, when this work was written. The theme is quite ordinary and the principal interest centres in the skill and originality displayed in the working out of the variations of which there are twenty-seven although only twenty were given at this concert. The Volkmann Symphony No. 1, in D minor, is one of those works which justify admiration for the care and knowledge evident in its construction, but which lacks those qualities of spontaneous beauty of thematic material and richness in scoring that lift a work above a mere consideration of its academic accuracy.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Standard Union. Jan. 14

With Herr Gericke restored to health, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to this city next week to give four concerts, two at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, and two at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Milka Ternina, the prima donna from the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, will be the soloist at the four concerts. The programmes for Brooklyn are as follows:

Friday afternoon, Jan. 20:

Overture to "Dei Freischuetz"	Weber
Aria from Cosi fan Tutte	Mozart
Waltzes	Brahms
Scored for the orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.
Aria from "Fidelio"	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4	Beethoven

Saturday evening, Jan. 21:

Academic Overture	Brahms
Aria (to be selected).
Symphonic Variations	Dvorak
Prayer from "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Symphony No. 1	Robert Volkmann

Milka Ternina, one of the greatest Wagnerian singers in the world, was born in 1863, at Vezisce, Croatia, and was educated at Agram and Vienna, making her first appearance at Leipsic, June, 1883, as Elizabeth in "Tannhauser." For the next seven years she sang in various German cities until engaged by the Court Theatre at Munich as star in the music-dramas of Wagner, as well as in the operas of Mozart, Weber, Verdi and others. She has sung in this country before under the Damrosch-Ellis management, as well as at Covent Garden, London, with signal success. Ternina's voice is a splendid and well-controlled instrument, admirably adapted to dramatic roles. She is a person of noble and commanding presence, fresh colored, dark haired, with a peculiar fascination in manner and a haunting voice in speech as well as in song. Never angular, never a prey to hysteria, never setting applause traps, free from all petty affectations and tricks not disdained by many opera singers of great repute, Milka Ternina is one of the most intelligent, thoroughly artistic, sympathetic sopranos now upon the stage.

[95]

…CHUMANN-HEINK WILL SING TWO ARIAS

Assistant Manager F. P. Commee, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, informed the management of the Brooklyn Institute this morning that Mme. Schumann-Heink had made her selections of arias for the concerts at the Academy of Music to-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening, in which she will appear as soloist in place of Fraulein Milka Ternina, who is ill. Mme. Schumann-Heink's numbers are as follows: Aria, "Titus," second, Mozart; recitative and aria from "Odysseus," Bruch. Owing to the fact that the famous contralto comes at such brief notice, the same selections will be sung at the matinee and evening concerts. The orchestral programmes are, however, entirely different. Schumann-Heink sang in Brooklyn a week ago Tuesday in "Lohengrin," and music lovers do not need to be reminded of the fact that she owns one of the finest contralto voices heard in this country in years. Her success in the part of Ortrud will be long remembered. Mme. Schumann-Heink appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city through permission of Maurice Grau, impressario at the Metropolitan Opera House.

…G GAZETTE, BOSTON, JA…

…N, JANUARY 28, 1899.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the thirteenth concert was:

Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky
Recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and Air, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephthah," ....Handel
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Twilight of the Gods" (arranged by Hans Richter)....Wagner
Air, "Lend me your aid," from "Irene" Gounod
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," Op. 97....Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Evan Williams.

There is little that calls for special note in this program. The orchestral portion was admirable throughout, the Tschaikovsky overture being interpreted with rare brilliancy and the larger selections with thrilling effect. These latter aroused the passing belief that they were more effective without than with the voices; at least they did not arouse in the hearer the pain of witnessing a single pair of human lungs struggling to sing against the whirlwind of an entire orchestra. The absence of vocalists brought another relief with it: there was no singing out of tune, and so one could rest in comparative ease to the music that is always more instrumental than singable. Mr. Evans was not at his best; his voice seemed tired, and there was a suggestion that he sang with effort. The Handel recitative, however, was given with simplicity and dignity, and the interpretation of the Gounod air appealed strongly to the enthusiasm of the audience.

The program for the next concert is: Overture, "Carnival," Dvorak; Scotch Fantasy for violin, Bruch; Symphonic poem, "Phaeton," Saint-Saens; Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. The soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1899.

SYMPYHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Slightly Increased Attendance.

The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening. An increase in the attendance was noted, the audience being larger than at any previous concert of the series. While the increase was not large, the presence of from one to two hundred extra auditors was encouraging as a possible symptom of reviving interest in these admirable and most enjoyable concerts. Those who were present heard one of the finest programmes of the season performed in a brilliant and flawless fashion. The assisting soloist was Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, the well-known pianist, and the programme numbers were as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischutz"....................Karl Maria von Weber
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23.....Peter Illyitch Tchaikovsky
I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso (B-flat minor)
Allegro con spirito (B-flat minor)
II. Andantino semplice (D-flat major)
Allegro vivace assai (D-minor)
III. Allegro con fuoco (B-flat minor)
Waltzes, Op. 39..............Johannes Brahms
(Scored for Orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
(First time in Providence.)
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat Major, Op. 60....................Ludwig van Beethoven
I. Adagio (B-flat major)
Allegro vivace (B-flat major)
II. Adagio (E-flat major)
III. Allegro vivace (B-flat major)
Trio: Un poco meno Allegro (B-flat major)
IV. Allegro ma non troppo (B-flat major)

The purely orchestral numbers were well contrasted and each of a thoroughly enjoyable character. Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture is always a welcome number upon a programme. It is brilliant, extremely melodious, and the instrumentation is characterized by the originality and variety for which Weber's writings are justly famous. The orchestra performed it in a superb way, with all possible attention to detail and great brilliancy of execution.

The novelty of the programme was the set of waltzes by Brahms, scored for orchestra by conductor Gericke. This work was written originally for the pianoforte for four hands and the set consisted of 16 numbers, of which Mr. Gericke has omitted two in his orchestral arrangement. In the programme notes Mr. Apthorp concisely describes them as essentially concert compositions, not intended for use in the ball-room. They have much the same character, for our day, as Mozart's and Beethoven's sets of little orchestral dance-pieces, and are, for the most part, short and pithy, written in no elaborate style. It may be further said that they are exceedingly melodious and that in writing them Brahms dropped for once his complexity and obscurity of rhythm, and wrought something melodious and characteristic of their genre. Mr. Gericke's scoring is done with a practiced hand, and the number was an eminently pleasing one.

Beethoven's symphony, No. 4, which was chosen for the closing number of the programme, while less familiar than some of its famous fellows, is—to quote Mr. Apthorp again—"an unsurpassed example of melodic inspiration and perfection of musical form." Certainly this language is none too strong, for the symphony is a most beautiful and interesting work. It was first played at a concert for Beethoven's benefit in Vienna in March, 1807, and was preceded on the programme by his first, second and third symphonies. What a treat that must have been for the Viennese first-nighters. The second movement of this symphony is not exceeded in sheer musical beauty by anything in the nine which the great composer left to the world. In this the orchestra, which played with remarkable spirit and precision throughout the evening, did some of its very finest work.

Miss Aus der Ohe chose for her number Tchaikovsky's great concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in B-flat minor. The story of the first production of this work in Boston 13 years ago has been previously told. In spite of the profound impression which it made at that time it does not seem to have attracted pianists until within the last few years. Like many another composer, Tchaikovsky has had to "wait until he was dead" for his full meed of recognition and appreciation. This concerto is a gigantic work, calling for the greatest of virtuosity, strength and endurance on the part of the player, and, indeed, hardly less so on the part of the orchestra. That Miss Aus der Ohe is fully equipped to grapple with its difficulties goes without saying. Her playing is distinguished for virility and force, although she never pounds the tone out of the piano, as do some who have great reputations. She has grown greatly, too, of late years, upon the artistic side, and is to-day one of the very first of living players. Of her performance last night nothing but warmest praise can be said. It was masterly, superb, overwhelming. A half-dozen energetic and thoroughly sincere recalls complimented her remarkable playing, and they were fully deserved. The concert, as a whole, was one of the most satisfactory of the present season. The sixth concert by the orchestra will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 8.

…JOURNAL, JANUARY 29…

Unreasonableness of "Artists."

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

Your music man makes me sick. What is the matter with him, anyway? Why doesn't he stick to his business, and speak about music instead of audiences? He makes me tired! What is it to him whether people here like high-class music or not? What is high-class music anyway? Sousa's band is good enough, and for most they play I don't care—and I took lessons myself when I was a kid. Who cares for high-class music anyhow in Providence? Nobody but a few cranks, and a few "ideal" musicians, who have dyspeptic musical stomachs and must have everything served with a sauce piquante.

Plain old music is good enough for anybody, and I don't see why music that was good enough a hundred years ago, when there were no "professors," and symphony orchestras around here, should not be good enough to-day. Who cares for the Boston Symphonies here? Let them stay in Boston. In our town we have a band that rehearses every week, I tell you! They call themselves the Dewey Wind Pushers. You ought to hear them. The fellow that beats the drum is a corker! That's my music! People talk about arts, and their refining influence, and hang up a lot of pictures in their parlors that make you dizzy, and are painted in the impressionistic or plein-air style. I would not have them in my barn. Susie painted some daisies on a broken bootjack of mine and they are peaches; and when she sits down and hammers a "coon" song out of the old piano and I look at those daisies, I get all the art I need. She never changes the bars, and confuses you.

They say when a New York manager speaks of coming to Providence with a virtuoso, they arrest him for being insane. And that's right! We've got art enough in Providence. There is the Westminster Musee, with Tom Sharkey, the "biffer," the virtuoso in the "manly art." There are all the girls, that have more form on them than all the Venuses of Calypso, Milo or Cassanova together, and what they haven't the manager buys them. The people don't care for quality here—they want quantity. There is the Olympic, and two or three more temples of art. They are packed every night. Are we art lovers? I should smile!

What's the use of going to Infantry Hall and listening to the Symphony when the hurdy gurdy comes right under your window? In summer some of the rich swells pay them to come around during dinner hours. That's the stuff. Who cares to buy paintings of artists when you get chromos by the yard at 15 cents and all the soap "ads." to hang up? And what is to be done with the old mineral water bottles when you don't paint pansies on them any more?

High art is good enough for people that know a lot, but most of us don't. If the musicians can't make any money with music alone, let them learn something else besides; in Providence they will have plenty of time to do so. If the people had taste they would go to concerts, but they haven't; so what's the use of kicking. The majority don't care for them; so let the minority go hang themselves and keep quiet and listen to the angels' music. That is surely high enough. A man named Proctor tried to give a piano recital here. Who cares? They sold 12 tickets. On the evening of the concert he was sick. Who blames him? Everybody else would have been pleased. He was too sensitive. He sold 10 more tickets than anybody thought he would.

So just speak to your music man and stop his foolish talk. We are an artistic people; anybody looking at the new railroad station knows that as soon as he gets here. Our art is peculiar, but we can't help it with talking. Conditions that have arisen from the criminal neglect of egoistic people in responsible positions during previous years cannot be changed at once. Let everybody put the shoulder to the wheel and keep pushing. But who cares? That's all!

LOVER OF TRUE ART.

Providence, Jan. 26, 1899.

(This sounds so much like an honest expression of the opinions of the average Providence citizen that nothing but the knowledge of the identity of the author could possibly suggest that it may be "writ sarcastic."—Ed.)

Music in Providence.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I was much interested in the article in your paper a while ago entitled "Art in Providence," and signed "An Art Crank." While I join with the "Crank" in bewailing the meagre patronage given to concerts of a high order here, still I think that lack of appreciation is not always the reason for the slimly attended concerts. Your contributor stated that the Boston Symphony concerts are not as well patronized this year as in the past. I am inclined to think that the departure from the custom of giving a series of six concerts for $5 to the one of providing eight for $7 is one reason for the small audiences referred to. Many persons of moderate means, who would be willing to give the $5 for the course, would hesitate to spend the extra $2, as $7 is as much as many would care to afford for their entertainment in the music line all winter. The music-loving people of this city are by no means the ones most plentifully endowed with wealth.

If the price of the single concerts could be $1, it would also help fill up the empty benches. For 50 or 75 cents one may get a fairly good seat at the Opera House to see a charming play or a bright opera. Of course, it might be said with truth that a symphony concert and a modern opera could not well be compared in their relative educating influences, but anyone likes to be amused sometimes as well as educated.

Still, this does not excuse the citizens of Providence from allowing such talent as Rosenthal and Ysaye to play to such discouragingly small audiences. It is undeniably an "off" year for musical enterprises here, but let us hope that the Boston Orchestra will give us another chance next year with the old system of six concerts for $5.

I write this as the representative of a club of ladies interested in, and studying music. C.

Providence, Jan. 27, 1899.

TH… MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1899.

The program of last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was:

Overture, Fantaisie, Romeo and Juliet................Tschaikowsky
Waft Her Angels, from Jephtha..............................Händel
Selections from Siegfried and Götterdämmerung............Wagner
Air, Lend Me Your Aid..Gounod
Symphony No. 3, E flat, Rhenish..........................Schumann

Evan Williams was the soloist.

The program and the performances seemed dull to me. It is possible that my ears had become jaded with the week's excessive concourse of sweet sounds, and of sounds that were not so sweet; but in any case I did not enjoy the concert. The conducting of Mr. Gericke and the playing of the orchestra were doubtless fully up to their familiar high standard, but I was overfull of music and my palate was not exactly in the condition to relish so cloying a dessert as a solid concert within a brief three hours after having feasted to satiety in the afternoon on an opera. Seven operas in one week is musical gormandizing to which I am not yet hardened this season, and so my unappreciative view of the concert may be attributable to the dyspeptic sluggishness of a tone-stuffed listener. Mr. Williams sang his two arias in a noble, sostenuto style, and was tremendously applauded and recalled.

B. E. Woolf.

The new music hall is to be all done by April 1, 1900, only a little more than a year hence. The plan of having a theatre combined with the new music hall has been given up, as the directors think that it would be very expensive and the best purposes would not have been served.

Mollie G. Slattery, Boston; Olga Gretchen Ayer, Newton Highlands; Raymond Clayton Bass, Jamaica Plain; … Mildred Constable

BY MOZART AND BRUCH.

Union Jan. 19

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK WILL SING TWO ARIAS.

Assistant Manager F. P. Commee, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, informed the management of the Brooklyn Institute this morning that Mme. Schumann-Heink had made her selections of arias for the concerts at the Academy of Music to-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening, in which she will appear as soloist in place of Fraulein Milka Ternina, who is ill. Mme. Schumann-Heink's numbers are as follows: Aria, "Titus," second, Mozart; recitative and aria from "Odysseus," Bruch. Owing to the fact that the famous contralto comes at such brief notice, the same selections will be sung at the matinee and evening concerts. The orchestral programmes are, however, entirely different. Schumann-Heink sang in Brooklyn a week ago Tuesday in "Lohengrin," and music lovers do not need to be reminded of the fact that she owns one of the finest contralto voices heard in this country in years. Her success in the part of Ortrud will be long remembered. Mme. Schumann-Heink appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city through permission of Maurice Grau, impressario at the Metropolitan Opera House.

G GAZETTE, BOSTON, JA

N, JANUARY 28, 1899.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the thirteenth concert was:

Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky
Recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and Air, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephthah," ....Handel
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Twilight of the Gods" (arranged by Hans Richter)......................Wagner
Air, "Lend me your aid," from "Irene" Gounod
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," Op. 97...............Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Evan Williams.

There is little that calls for special note in this program. The orchestral portion was admirable throughout, the Tschaikovsky overture being interpreted with rare brilliancy and the larger selections with thrilling effect. These latter aroused the passing belief that they were more effective without than with the voices; at least they did not arouse in the hearer the pain of witnessing a single pair of human lungs struggling to sing against the whirlwind of an entire orchestra. The absence of vocalists brought another relief with it: there was no singing out of tune, and so one could rest in comparative ease to the music that is always more instrumental than singable. Mr. Evans was not at his best; his voice seemed tired, and there was a suggestion that he sang with effort. The Handel recitative, however, was given with simplicity and dignity, and the interpretation of the Gounod air appealed strongly to the enthusiasm of the audience.

The program for the next concert is: Overture, "Carnival," Dvorak; Scotch Fantasy for violin, Bruch; Symphonic poem, "Phaeton," Saint-Saens; Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. The soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1899.

SYMPYHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Slightly Increased Attendance.

The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening. An increase in the attendance was noted, the audience being larger than at any previous concert of the series. While the increase was not large, the presence of from one to two hundred extra auditors was encouraging as a possible symptom of reviving interest in these admirable and most enjoyable concerts. Those who were present heard one of the finest programmes of the season performed in a brilliant and flawless fashion. The assisting soloist was Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, the well-known pianist, and the programme numbers were as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischutz"..............................Karl Maria von Weber
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23.....Peter Illyitch Tchaikovsky
  I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso (B-flat minor)
    Allegro con spirito (B-flat minor)
  II. Andantino semplice (D-flat major)
    Allegro vivace assai (D-minor)
  III. Allegro con fuoco (B-flat minor)
Waltzes, Op. 39...............Johannes Brahms
(Scored for Orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
(First time in Providence.)
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat Major, Op. 60........................Ludwig van Beethoven
  I. Adagio (B-flat major)
    Allegro vivace (B-flat major)
  II. Adagio (E-flat major)
  III. Allegro vivace (B-flat major)
    Trio: Un poco meno Allegro (B-flat major)
  IV. Allegro ma non troppo (B-flat major)

The purely orchestral numbers were well contrasted and each of a thoroughly enjoyable character. Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture is always a welcome number upon a programme. It is brilliant, extremely melodious, and the instrumentation is characterized by the originality and variety for which Weber's writings are justly famous. The orchestra performed it in a superb way, with all possible attention to detail and great brilliancy of execution.

The novelty of the programme was the set of waltzes by Brahms, scored for orchestra by conductor Gericke. This work was written originally for the pianoforte for four hands and the set consisted of 16 numbers, of which Mr. Gericke has omitted two in his orchestral arrangement. In the programme notes Mr. Apthorp concisely describes them as essentially concert compositions, not intended for use in the ball-room. They have much the same character, for our day, as Mozart's and Beethoven's sets of little orchestral dance-pieces, and are, for the most part, short and pithy, written in no elaborate style. It may be further said that they are exceedingly melodious and that in writing them Brahms dropped for once his complexity and obscurity of rhythm, and wrought something melodious and characteristic of their genre. Mr. Gericke's scoring is done with a practiced hand, and the number was an eminently pleasing one.

Beethoven's symphony, No. 4, which was chosen for the closing number of the programme, while less familiar than some of its famous fellows, is—to quote Mr. Apthorp again—"an unsurpassed example of melodic inspiration and perfection of musical form." Certainly this language is none too strong, for the symphony is a most beautiful and interesting work. It was first played at a concert for Beethoven's benefit in Vienna in March, 1807, and was preceded on the programme by his first, second and third symphonies. What a treat that must have been for the Viennese first-nighters. The second movement of this symphony is not exceeded in sheer musical beauty by anything in the nine which the great composer left to the world. In this the orchestra, which played with remarkable spirit and precision throughout the evening, did some of its very finest work.

Miss Aus der Ohe chose for her number Tchaikovsky's great concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in B-flat minor. The story of the first production of this work in Boston 13 years ago has been previously told. In spite of the profound impression which it made at that time it does not seem to have attracted pianists until within the last few years. Like many another composcer, Tchaikovsky has had to "wait until he was dead" for his full meed of recognition and appreciation. This concerto is a gigantic work, calling for the greatest of virtuosity, strength and endurance on the part of the player, and, indeed, hardly less so on the part of the orchestra. That Miss Aus der Ohe is fully equipped to grapple with its difficulties goes without saying. Her playing is distinguished for virility and force, although she never pounds the tone out of the piano, as do some who have great reputations. She has grown greatly, too, of late years, upon the artistic side, and is to-day one of the very first of living players. Of her performance last night nothing but warmest praise can be said. It was masterly, superb, overwhelming. A half-dozen energetic and thoroughly sincere recalls complimented her remarkable playing, and they were fully deserved. The concert, as a whole, was one of the most satisfactory of the present season. The sixth concert by the orchestra will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 8.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, JANUARY 2

Unreasonableness of "Artists."

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

Your music man makes me sick. What is the matter with him, anyway? Why doesn't he stick to his business, and speak about music instead of audiences? He makes me tired! What is it to him whether people here like high-class music or not? What is high-class music anyway? Sousa's band is good enough, and for most they play I don't care—and I took lessons myself when I was a kid. Who cares for high-class music anyhow in Providence? Nobody but a few cranks, and a few "ideal" musicians, who have dyspeptic musical stomachs and must have everything served with a sauce piquante.

Plain old music is good enough for anybody, and I don't see why music that was good enough a hundred years ago, when there were no "professors," and symphony orchestras around here, should not be good enough to-day. Who cares for the Boston Symphonies here? Let them stay in Boston. In our town we have a band that rehearses every week, I tell you! They call themselves the Dewey Wind Pushers. You ought to hear them. The fellow that beats the drum is a corker! That's my music! People talk about arts, and their refining influence, and hang up a lot of pictures in their parlors that make you dizzy, and are painted in the impressionistic or plein-air style. I would not have them in my barn. Susie painted some daisies on a broken boot-jack of mine and they are peaches; and when she sits down and hammers a "coon" song out of the old piano and I look at those daisies, I get all the art I need. She never changes the bars, and confuses you.

They say when a New York manager speaks of coming to Providence with a virtuoso, they arrest him for being insane. And that's right! We've got art enough in Providence. There is the Westminster Musee, with Tom Sharkey, the "biffer," the virtuoso in the "manly art." There are all the girls, that have more form on them than all the Venuses of Calypso, Milo or Cassanova together, and what they haven't the manager buys them. The people don't care for quality here—they want quantity. There is the Olympic, and two or three more temples of art. They are packed every night. Are we art lovers? I should smile!

What's the use of going to Infantry Hall and listening to the Symphony when the hurdy gurdy comes right under your window? In summer some of the rich swells pay them to come around during dinner hours. That's the stuff. Who cares to buy paintings of artists when you get chromos by the yard at 15 cents and all the soap "ads." to hang up? And what is to be done with the old mineral water bottles when you don't paint pansies on them any more?

High art is good enough for people that know a lot, but most of us don't. If the musicians can't make any money with music alone, let them learn something else besides; in Providence they will have plenty of time to do so. If the people had taste they would go to concerts, but they haven't; so what's the use of kicking. The majority don't care for them; so let the minority go hang themselves and keep quiet and listen to the angels' music. That is surely high enough. A man named Proctor tried to give a piano recital here. Who cares? They sold 12 tickets. On the evening of the concert he was sick. Who blames him? Everybody else would have been pleased. He was too sensitive. He sold 10 more tickets than anybody thought he would.

So just speak to your music man and stop his foolish talk. We are an artistic people; anybody looking at the new railroad station knows that as soon as he gets here. Our art is peculiar, but we can't help it with talking. Conditions that have arisen from the criminal neglect of egoistic people in responsible positions during previous years cannot be changed at once. Let everybody put the shoulder to the wheel and keep pushing. But who cares? That's all!

LOVER OF TRUE ART.

Providence, Jan. 26, 1899.

(This sounds so much like an honest expression of the opinions of the average Providence citizen that nothing but the knowledge of the identity of the author could possibly suggest that it may be "writ sarcastic."—Ed.)

Music in Providence.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I was much interested in the article in your paper a while ago entitled "Art in Providence," and signed "An Art Crank." While I join with the "Crank" in bewailing the meagre patronage given to concerts of a high order here, still I think that lack of appreciation is not always the reason for the slimly attended concerts. Your contributor stated that the Boston Symphony concerts are not as well patronized this year as in the past. I am inclined to think that the departure from the custom of giving a series of six concerts for $5 to the one of providing eight for $7 is one reason for the small audiences referred to. Many persons of moderate means, who would be willing to give the $5 for the course, would hesitate to spend the extra $2, as $7 is as much as many would care to afford for their entertainment in the music line all winter. The music-loving people of this city are by no means the ones most plentifully endowed with wealth.

If the price of the single concerts could be $1, it would also help fill up the empty benches. For 50 or 75 cents one may get a fairly good seat at the Opera House to see a charming play or a bright opera. Of course, it might be said with truth that a symphony concert and a modern opera could not well be compared in their relative educating influences, but anyone likes to be amused sometimes as well as educated.

Still, this does not excuse the citizens of Providence from allowing such talent as Rosenthal and Ysaye to play to such discouragingly small audiences. It is undeniably an "off" year for musical enterprises here, but let us hope that the Boston Orchestra will give us another chance next year with the old system of six concerts for $5.

I write this as the representative of a club of ladies interested in, and studying music. C.

Providence, Jan. 27, 1899.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1899.

The program of last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was:

Overture, Fantaisie, Romeo and Juliet................	Tschaikowsky
Waft Her Angels, from Jephtha........................	Händel
Selections from Siegfried and Götterdämmerung............	Wagner
Air, Lend Me Your Aid........................	Gounod
Symphony No. 3, E flat, Rhenish........................	Schumann

Evan Williams was the soloist.

The program and the performances seemed dull to me. It is possible that my ears had become jaded with the week's excessive concourse of sweet sounds, and of sounds that were not so sweet; but in any case I did not enjoy the concert. The conducting of Mr. Gericke and the playing of the orchestra were doubtless fully up to their familiar high standard, but I was overfull of music and my palate was not exactly in the condition to relish so cloying a dessert as a solid concert within a brief three hours after having feasted to satiety in the afternoon on an opera. Seven operas in one week is musical gormandizing to which I am not yet hardened this season, and so my unappreciative view of the concert may be attributable to the dyspeptic sluggishness of a tone-stuffed listener. Mr. Williams sang his two arias in a noble, sostenuto style, and was tremendously applauded and recalled.

B. E. WOOLF.

The new music hall is to be all done by April 1, 1900, only a little more than a year hence. The plan of having a theatre combined with the new music hall has been given up, as the directors think that it would be very expensive and the best purposes would not have been served.

Mollie G. Slattery, Boston; Olga Gretchen Ayer, Newton Highlands; Raymond Clayton Bass, Jamaica Plain; Mildred Constable

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The thirteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being:

Tchaikovsky: Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."
Handel: Recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and Air, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephthah."
Wagner: Selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" (arranged by Hans Richter).
Gounod: Recitative, "How frail and weak a thing is man," and Air, "Lend me your aid," from "Irene."
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," opus 97.

Mr. Evan Williams was the singer.

If ever Tchaikovsky has made for beauty in his orchestral writing, it is surely in parts of his "Romeo and Juliet." Impressive—for force and poignancy of feeling—he surely is in many of his works; but here he lets pure musical beauty go hand in hand with impressiveness. Seldom has he reached such a height as in the introduction to this overture-fantasy, especially in those series of suspensions that seem caught, as it were, from Gluck's overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide." The much-admired second theme (love-motive) in the Allegro moves us less puissantly; we find beauty in it, and of poignancy enough and to spare; it is certainly a nobler inspiration than the second theme in the "Pathétique." But it somehow does not strike us as quite so wonderfu as it does many of the composer's sworn admirers. We are ready to acknowledge the brilliancy of the first theme of this Allegro (street-brawl motive) and the superb fire with which it is worked up; still we cannot entirely like it; the trail of Meyerbeer is over it, and that rhythm has been so trivialized by him that it is hard for anyone to wash the stain from it. But the firm strength with which the whole work is carried through cannot help compelling sincere admiration; the whole is very genuine and spontaneous, there is true genius in it. Of the performance, yes and no! It was well-nigh faultless technically; the introduction and all the more furious parts of the Allegro were wonderfully played. Only in the love-theme did we miss the true Tchaikovskian "disperazione," desperation—that is the word for it; it sounded a little tame and lyrical, it did not harrow you.

Richter's selections from the last two "Nibelungen" dramas were read and played to perfection in every respect; one could imagine nothing finer. The selections themselves are admirably chosen; Richter has truly made an "invisible seam" between the "Siegfried" and the "Götterdämmerung" parts. Only we do not like that tagging-on of the Valhalla-motive at the end; it does not seem to belong with the rest. We should have preferred to have "Siegfried's Rheinfahrt" go n unbroken, through all those mysterious, ill-boding harmonies which bring it to a close in Wagner's original score, the whole ending on the first B natural of the Gibichung-scene—it would be no sin for Mr. Gericke to write out the full chord of B-minor for brass instruments. This ending would, it seems to us, be more in keeping; as it is, the Valhalla-motive "makes irruption," as the French say; you do not get enough of it to make it worth while!

Schumann's third symphony had not been heard here since it was given by Mr. Nikisch in the season of 1892-93; Mr. Paur let it severely alone. It is, upon the whole, the least generally admired of Schumann's four symphonies, although there may be some persons who prefer it to the No. 2, in C major. It is certainly the most unequal of the four; if not unequal in absolute merit—for there is not a weak movement in it—at least singularly various in mood and style, lacking in that homogeneity that should mark a truly great symphony. The third movement, delightful as it is in itself, is too much in the vein of some of Schumann's smaller pianoforte pieces to seem quite in place in so extended a work; it takes you too far from the grand mood of the first and fourth movements. There is nothing symphonic in its character. The finale, too, although thematically related to the fourth movement, is quite unrelated in general mood to anything else in the work. Still, with all its shortcomings, the symphony contains some of Schumann's finest and most titanic inspirations. The syncopated theme of the first movement is a gem of the first water; and how gloriously, with what wealth of harmonic and contrapuntal resource, with what unflagging energy and fire, the movement is worked out! The second movement is unique in the history of symphonic writing; worth its weight in gold! And the fourth movement (cathedral-scene) would stand alone for grandeur and emotional depth among all Schumann's works, were it not for the introduction to the final chorus in his "Faust"—which Ambros called "the church-music of the future." The performance was exhaustive; it gave you the work, the whole work, and nothing but the work! It can rank with the recent performance of the C major symphony.

Mr. Williams's singing almost induced us to forgive him for his selections. When first we read the programme we thought of the advisability of some such advertisement in the newspapers as, "Wanted! a tenor who will not sing 'Waft Her, Angels,' nor 'Lend Me Your Aid!'" The Handel air is infinitely great music, if you will; but one has had so much opportunity for hearing it in its proper frame that it seemed superfluous to give it at a Symphony concert. Besides, one does not care to be reminded unnecessarily of oratorio. But Mr. Williams's singing of it was a revelation. Not that we liked him particularly in the recitative; his enunciation is beauty itself, and he is in no wise lacking in feeling and expressive force; but there was too much of the conventional oratio-singer's whine there, a good deal of it was sung too slow. When will singers remember that Handel was, first and foremost, a dramatic writer, a composer of operas? In the air, however, Mr. Williams was easily superb; his tempo, to begin with, was admirable as it was unusual; it made the air seem one ecstasy, not the lackadaisical mooning of a sorrow-stricken father over a politely filial daughter. Ah! it is great to hear Handel thus sung, at a tempo that allows the music to have some melodic hang-together, that puts shallow sentimentality out of doors! Would only that the accompaniment had been better played! Mr. Gericke followed the singer with all his usual skill, but the orchestra played the music like—well, just as they talk about Handel when they confide their professional grievances to you; and Handel is one of these grievances. No modern orchestral player likes playing Handel today; it is "too disgustingly easy" to be any fun. And it must be admitted that the men played the accompaniment to this air rather like sawing wood.

The "Irene" air is certainly not great music, being cheap and commonplace enough, in all conscience. Even the scoring is vulgar, albeit not unskilfully done. Gounod was foolish enough to forget the singular merit of his orchestration in "Faust," written for the Théatre Lyrique; in buckling on his armor for the Académie de Musique, he bade farewell to that masterly thrift in the use of instruments and began to lay on color as with a trowel, scoring like any competent craftsman, but no better. Mr. Williams sang the thing superbly, but could make it no better than it was. After all, this air marks an advance in the tenor repertory; it is one of those things that tenors sing because they like to, just as pianists play Liszt rhapsodies. Well, thirty years ago they used to sing Blumenthal's "Message"; and the air from "Irene" is surely an advance upon that! Mr. Williams was loudly and deservedly applauded after both his selections.

The next programme is: Dvorak, overture, "Carneval," opus 92; Max Bruch, Scotch fantasy for violin, opus 46; Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem No. 2, "Phaéton," opus 39; Berlioz, symphony No. 3, in G major, "Harold en Italie," opus 16 (viola obligata, Mr. Franz Kneisel). Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the solo violinist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 5, 1899.

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Two solo performers, in a way, figured in the Symphony program last week and both were drawn from the forces of our famous orchestra. Mr Kneisel undertook the viola obligato in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphony and demonstrated effectively his command over the musical possibilities of an instrument which is far from being appreciated at its true value by modern music lovers. The performance of the Berlioz work made heavy drafts upon the endurance as well as skill of the orchestra, but every draft was honored, and the peculiar effects designed to be attained by the eccentric French composer received full justice at the player's hands.

Mr Timothie Adamowski, who performed the solo part of Max Bruch's Scotch fantasia, added another to his long list of successes on our concert stage. He interpreted every theme with a skill and appreciation that won hearty plaudits, even from a matinee audience. Although Bruch's Germanized Scotch songs are sometimes rather difficult to recognize and follow they are always interesting, and the orchestra supplemented the soloist's work with even more than their usual skill. Mr Adamowski was recalled with enthusiasm.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture and Saint Saens' symphonic poem were among the offerings of a program that lacked something of the "old master" flavor, but proved a decidedly good drawing card. Both works were presented with care and success. The throng at the rehearsal included Melba, who thoroughly appreciated, of course, the merit of the offering.

Miss Adele aus der Ohe will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, performing Brahm's concerto for the pianoforte. Beethoven's third overture to "Leonore" and Bruckner's fourth symphony will be the selections for the orchestra.

——Mme Melba was one of the most interested listeners at the symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon and generously applauded the several numbers. She was becomingly dressed in a gown of black net over black silk, the net heavily jetted, wearing a coat of persian lamb, turned back with chinchilla, and a muff of the same fur. Her toque was blue tulle, with black ostrich tips. Others in the audience were Mr and Mrs Arthur Astor Carey, Mr and Mrs Richard C. Dixey, Mr and Mrs Robert C. Hooper, Mrs Hall Curtis, Mrs John Sedgwick, Mr S. Lothrop Thorndike, Dr Bigelow, Mrs Solomon Lincoln, Mr and Mrs Eben D. Jordan, Mrs A. F. Freeman, Mrs George Putnam of Brookline, Mrs Stephen Henry Williams, Mrs Arthur Kennard, Miss Henrietta Dana, Mr James P. Stearns and Mr Charles P. Curtis.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 6, 1899.

Scotch Melodies in the Symphony Concert.

Dvorak's "Carnival Overture" began the programme of Saturday evening. It is not a new work, but it attained rather a new flavor by the speed at which it was taken and which seems fitting for the subject. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist of the concert, and chose Max Bruch's "Scotch Fantasie" for the violin as his number. One may question the wisdom of this choice, for the work is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, and in its brilliant thematic treatment, the Gaelic flavor is pretty thoroughly washed away.

It is the highest tribute to the power of the Scottish folk-song that German and French composers have endeavored to use specimens of it in their works, and have also tried, but vainly, to imitate the lilt and style of the melodies of Caledonia.

Beethoven arranged several Scottish melodies for Mr. Thomson, the publisher of Edinburgh, in which there is the same defect that exists in Bruch's treatment of the folk-themes, the characteristic flavor is not aided but interfered with by the skilful musical treatment. Schumann tried his hand at setting some of the Burns poems, but achieved no more than an introduction of the "Scotch snap," (a sixteenth note, followed by a dotted eighth), and an occasional touch of the pentatonic, or hexachordal, scale.

That the two last points form a strong factor in Gaelic music is undeniable, and the Italian composer of "Within a Mile of Edinboro' Toun" was able to foist a foreign production into the folk-song repertoire by using these effects, (employing a hexachordal scale); but these are not all the length and breadth of Scottish music. Mendelssohn's "O, Wert thou in the Cauld Blast" is true Scottish music without possessing the above attributes, and in the Scherzo of his "Scotch Symphony," this composer achieves probably the only true bit of Scottish music ever written in symphony by a foreign composer.

Max Bruch does not stand beside Mendelssohn in his use of the folk-song in the classical instrumental forms; Bruch is attracted to the Scotch music chiefly because of its warlike side, for he is the most martial of modern composers.

That he loves the subject may be gathered from the fact that he once stated to the present writer that he knew 400 Scotch melodies by heart; but this does not enable him to catch that difficult simplicity which should surround the treatment of Scottish themes. In his "Fair Ellen," the old melody (composed in 1568) of "The Campbells are comin'," which, by the way, has also been wrongly employed by Volkmann, is thematically treated in the grandest possible manner, until it seems like a rustic beauty attired in silks and diamonds.

In this "Scotch Fantasy," the yet older melody of "Scots wha hae" is made use of for a climax, and the very life embellished out of it. The origin of this old folk-song will probably never be discovered, but Scottish historians claim it to have been used as Robert Bruce's March to Bannockburn.

Mr. Adamowski played the broad climax which is made of this tune with commendable power, a greater ruggedness than we had supposed him to be possessed of; his G string work was especially effective, and, if an occasional insecurity of intonation took place, these lapses were very few, and amply atoned for by the beauty of his harmonics and the hearty "abandon" with which he invested the work.

The Scherzo presented brusquerie rather than merriment, and naturally tended towards drone-bass effects. Let no man dare to despise the bag-pipe! Its drone and chanter permeate almost the entire repertoire of many schools of folk-music, and it is not improbable that the old Greeks used the drone bass. Surely the etymology of the Italian work "Zumpogna" (a bagpipe now in use in some parts of Italy) points to the old Greek "Sumphonia" applied so freely to the most ancient orchestral music, and the Italian pipers, the "Zumpognari," made their appearance in the Scherzo of the Berlioz symphony, played later in the evening, as their relatives, the Scotch pipers did in this.

Mr. Adamowski grew steadily greater up to the end of the work and certainly deserved the enthusiastic recalls with which he was greeted.

Now followed St, Saens' "Phaeton," which we like least among his orchestral tone-poems. These poemes symphoniques (always remembering that the French "Symphonique" means merely "Orchestral") are in the domain of Music what the painter's sketch is in the field of art; there is not the finish of the painting but there is more of dash and spirit than one often finds in the more elaborate work. The number received a very sturdy and masculine performance and Zeus launched his thunderbolt in a most powerful manner, the team collapsing with the suddenness of the deacon's one-horse shay at the end of its century.

The climax of the concert came with with Berlioz's "Childe Harold" Symphony. Berlioz is the Edgar Allen Poe of music, but just as Poe has been passed in the race for morbidness by Maeterlinck and others, so Berlioz's frenzies seem comparatively tame when compared to the delirium tremens of Richard Strauss & Co. But as a study of orchestral tone-color the symphony remains one of the most interesting in the repertoire. If any instrument is the personification of the Byronic hero it is the viola, and this work, having its inception in a viola concerto, is still the most important viola work of the entire repertoire.

Berlioz, to be sure, does not endeavor to give any outline of the poem, but Byron's description

> "And now Childe Harold was sore sick at heart,
> And from his fellow-bacchanals would flee;
> 'Tis said, at times, the sullen tear would start,
> But Pride congealed the drop within his ee;
> Apart he stalked in joyless reverie," is perfectly carried out by the mournful character of the ever-recurring melody, and the brooding melancholy which is the chief characteristic of the viola, certainly became the embodiment of the mood of the unhappy wanderer, the modest and musicianly performance of Mr. Kneisel never exaggerating the composer's intention.

We thought the horn somewhat overforced in the March of the Pilgrims, in the wonderful bell effect which Berlioz has achieved by uniting the harp and horn, but nothing could have been more perfect than the end of this movement where the high and low-pitched bells sound in alternation.

The merry melody of the pipers, already alluded to, was given with becoming heartiness and the tender serenade of the young lover was in excellent contrast.

The finale once upon a time appeared fiery and fierce, but the excesses that have taken place in modern music have caused its fervor to grow pale; it may have been that the reading was somewhat conservative, but the ferocious orgies of the brigands seemed almost as orderly as a vestry meeting, in fact more so than some that can be recalled.

Of course, this ending, with its hero dying amid wild debauchery, is purely Berlioz, and Byron's final lines

> "My task is done—my song hath ceased,—my theme > Has died into an echo,"

are contradicted by the music employed here; the fiery French composer will have none of echoes, and one leaves the scene with the brigands in a very high state of hilarity, probably to be followed, the next day, by an extreme fit of depression, and possibly doses of bromo-seltzer.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, With Mr. Kneisel as Viola Player—Mr. Adamowski Plays Bruch's Scottish Fantasia.

The program of the 14th Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Carnival"	Dvorák
Fantasia on Scotch Folk Melodies, for Violin, op. 46	Max Bruch
Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton"	Saint-Saëns
Symphony, "Harold in Italy"	Berlioz

The compiler of the program-book, speaking of Berlioz's "Childe Harold," says: "The work was first given in public at the Conservatoire in Paris on Nov. 23, 1834; but Berlioz introduced many alterations into the score afterwards. Paganini was present at the first performance; he expressed his delight with the work by sending Berlioz a check for twenty thousand francs the next day, which sum the poor composer devoted to paying off some crying debts, but especially to buying leisure to write his Roméo et Juliette symphony, which he dedicated to Paganini."

But Paganini was not present at the first performance. He did not hear the work until Nov. 25, 1838. He had heard the "Symphonie fantastique" in 1833, and it was then that he asked Berlioz to write a piece of importance for the viola. Berlioz promised to write a viola solo which should express the "Last Moments of Mary Stuart," but he abandoned this idea, and finally wrote "Childe Harold."

And now a word about Paganini's gift of 20,000 francs to Berlioz. Some have stated that the money came really from Bertin; but Liszt told another story, which is accepted by the latest biographers of Berlioz. It seems that Paganini, having made large sums of money in Paris, refused to play gratuitously at a concert for the benefit of the hospitals in that city. The public began to show its teeth. Jules Janin, a great admirer of Paganini, suggested to him that he should give 20,000 francs to Berlioz: "You will be able to give eight concerts with a crowded hall instead of the four concerts that remain." Paganini at first pulled a long face; but he finally yielded, and Janin tromboned pompously in the Débats the generosity of the violinist.

This symphony of Berlioz is still a remarkable work in certain respects, when you consider that it was first produced in 1834. Compare it with orchestral works of its time. Even the revised edition, which was played in 1838, is four years older than Wagner's "Rienzi," which first saw the light in 1842, and in "Rienzi" Wagner showed himself a clumsy fellow by the side of Berlioz. The whole idea of the symphony is foreign to us. Byron today is the man of "Beppo" and "Don Juan" and the letters, not the scowling poet of "Childe Harold," and the idea of having a solo instrument play such an important part in a symphony was not a fortunate one. Portions of the work seem, in 1899, barren of musical ideas—thus the "Orgy of Brigands" might be spared, although the composer himself took it seriously and spoke of "brazen throats belching forth blasphemies." But the first movement is interesting, and the orchestration was remarkable for the day. The "March of Pilgrims" is still a feat of singular originality, by far the most striking movement. As a whole the symphony is the one of Berlioz's important works that has suffered the most severely at the hands of time.

It was a pleasure to hear "Phaëton" again. It is the one of Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems that never met with great success in Paris, if the critics are to be believed, and yet it is a work of indisputable talent. Saint-Saëns never rises to any great height of imagination nor has he elemental passion; but he is a master of technic and his taste and skill keep him from vulgarity, even when he is dangerously near thematic triviality.

The overture, which Dvorak's publishers saw fit to name "Carnival," is specious music, decorative and all that, but I fear that it has no bowels.

Mr. Adamowski was not at his best last night either in intonation or in fullness of tone. He is a man of true virtuoso blood, and, like all virtuosos, he has his moods. He was heard to best vantage in the third movement of Bruch's kailyard fantasia, and he was applauded heartily at the end.

Mr. Kneisel played the violo obligata with infinite care and purity of tone. Adolphe Jullien once said that if Vieuxtemps, Viotti and some other great violinist were all united in one and the same person they could not make this viola part effective throughout the work.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 36.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Reading of Some Spirited Compositions.

Dvorak's "Carnival" Given with Fine Effect—Saint-Saens' "Phaeton" Charmingly Played—Berlioz Symphony Brings Out Some Good Orchestration.

For the 14th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, the following programme was played:

Overture, "Carnival"..................Dvorak
Scotch fantasia for violin..............Bruch
Symphonic poem, "Phaeton".......Saint-Saens
Symphony, "Harold in Italy"...........Berlioz

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist.

The Dvorak overture had an exceptionally brilliant reading and performance. Mr. Gericke took the opening movement at a much more spirited pace than has been usual in the playing of the work here, and the effect was, in consequence, much more exhilarating and intensified. Saint-Saens' "Phaeton" is less interesting than the "Jeunesse d'Hercule," the "Danse Maccabre" and the "Roust d'Omphale." The orchestration is not so piquant, nor are the themes so flowing. The rhythm of the galloping horses and of the pattering of their hoofs are cleverly indicated, but when one reflects that the chariot is driven over the clouds, the rhythm and the pattering are perplexing rather than convincing. The thunderbolt is far more realistic. However, the work was charmingly played and delightfully colored

The Berlioz symphony wears well, all except the last movement, which now appears to be an exceedingly mild brigand orgie, and of no great interest. The opening movement still impresses by its warm and deep poetic feeling and its exquisitely fine orchestration. The Pilgrim march has lost none of its fascination of simplicity, nor the serenade its freshness and tenderness. In this era, when orchestration is so noisy and the command of its resources so abused, it is comforting to listen to Berlioz's discreet use of them. He may be looked upon as the father of modern instrumentation, and he had it at his fingers' ends, but his fortissimos never degenerate into mere noise, even when he employs the full force of the orchestra. He is always clear, every instrument is distinctly heard, the right note is invariably in the right place, and is so located that its timbre makes itself felt. His massing of the brass is singulary brilliant in effect, and never discovers the thickness that characterizes it in the hands of his successor. Mr. Gericke read the work splendidly, and in its performance the orchestra was heard at its very best, particularly in the march and the serenade. Mr. Franz Kneisel played the obligato viola part with beautiful grace and sincerity of style, and with an artistic discretion that prevented him from forcing the instrument into undue prominence, and from impressing on the music the aspect of an independent solo.

The Bruch Scotch fantasy is the least interesting of the composer's larger works for the violin. It often drags, notably in the introduction, and the adago that follows it, and his frolicsome treatment of the large and noble air, "Scots who ha' wi Wallace bled," to say nothing of his unnecessary distortion of the melody, which forms the principal theme of the finale, is frivolous, and the whole movement is little else than mere show work that is rarely effective. Mr. Adamowski played the solo part spiritedly, but not invariably with faultless intonation. He was at his best in the slow movements, which, in the main, were excellent in interpretation and performance. There was much vigorous applause and numerous very hearty recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Brahms; and symphony, No. 4, Bruckner. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe is to be the soloist.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Fred P. Bacon Writes a Letter Containing Indorsement of His Plan to Every Stockholder.

Mr. Fred P. Bacon has sent to each of the stockholders in the proposed new music hall a copy of the following letter:

To the stockholders of the New Boston Music Hall Association:

I take the liberty of calling your attention to some expressions of opinion regarding the proposed action of your corporation, received by me in reply to my circular letter of inquiries, mailed you recently.

The Hon. Albert E. Pillsbury writes me:

> Your pointed and vigorous interrogatories addressed to the Music Hall victims ought to have been noticed before. I am glad that at least one man has spirit to protest against the methods of the management, and if any combination can be made to make the influence of the stockholders felt, I may be counted upon to support it.

Col. Albert A. Pope writes me:

> I have lost all faith in the present scheme. If we are going to have a music hall, we should have it big enough to have opera in it, and not simply for the Symphony concerts.

Many other similarly strong expressions of approval of my opposition to the unwise, extravagant and unwarrantable past and contemplated management of the property of your association have come to me. If you desire to prevent a firm of architects from experimenting at your expense in a line of building operations, about which there is little or no practical information, either attend the coming meeting of your corporation, or sign the following proxy, which will be duly stamped upon its receipt.

Do not underestimate the importance of this matter as affecting the future of musical Boston. FRED P. BACON,
649 Tremont Building, Boston.

Mr. Bacon attaches to the letter a proxy form to be filled out by such members as are unable to attend, and who agree with him in his views of the subject.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C. FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, February 4, 1899.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented for orchestral numbers: Tchaikowsky's Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," and Schumann's Symphony No. 3. Mr. Evan Williams was the soloist, and sang Händel's "Waft Her Angels," and the air, "Send Me Your Aid," from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba."

The orchestral numbers were read by Gericke in rather a perfunctory manner. There was nothing of repose and delicacy, and little dynamic contrast in the playing. Piano was mezzo forte; the latter was forte, and forte amounted to little less than fff, and no difference was made between p and ppp, which rule held good throughout all the playing. This robbing the composition of its legitimate dynamic intention is so absolutely unlike Gericke's efforts of his first term, that one fears he may have become deaf in the interim. This discrepancy in his readings nowadays is not creditable to one who formerly represented the highest standpoint in this direction.

Mr. Williams is a singer of artistic instincts and musical feeling, and sings in a broad manner. His voice has lost much of its native quality, and he sang with great caution on this occasion. It was not the caution demanded because of indisposition, but physical disability, because of a loss of confidence in his vocal ability. His fine voice has not been correctly schooled; and I am afraid that his condition must become worse, consecutively, because of a false location of the column of air. This difficulty should be remedied, else his vocal powers must necessarily become permanently impaired. It would be lamentable should such a splendid voice become sacrificed to false instruction; but I can't see what other result will follow. It was refreshing to hear the English language used once more in our concert halls.

Gericke showed little discretion in his accompaniments, which were coarse and overpowering much of the time. He should go and study Seppilli in this direction.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 5, 1899.

The thirteenth Symphony programme included nothing new. The orchestral numbers were the picturesque and emotional "Romeo and Juliet" overture of Tschaikowsky, the familiar concert extracts from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," and Schumann's third symphony. All of these were rendered as they should be for clearness of statement, polish of manner, susceptibility to change of phase and firm emphasis. Especially splendid was the evocation and illumination of the successive themes of Siegfried, his conquests and his love, and the genial symphony was equally notable for grace, suavity and lightness. Mr. Evan Williams made his first appearance in these concerts. and sang those two great and esteemed tenor scenes, "Deeper and deeper still," from "Jephtha," and "Lend me your aid," from "The Queen of Sheba." He was in virtually perfect voice, so that beauty of tone, sustained phrasing, and that growth of climax in which he has a peculiar skill, prevailed throughout his singing, while his verbal enunciation was wonderfully clear. But he might have chosen his selections better.

The fourteenth of the Symphonies demands attention for nothing but its excellent performance. The programme, although made up of modern compositions, included nothing not perfectly familiar, the work of latest date being Dvorak's "Carnival" overture; while its earliest date was attached to the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz. Between these were placed the "Scotch" fantasy of Bruch, in which Mr. Adamowski played the solo violin with his accustomed grace, elegance and refined sentiment,—and the "Phaeton" symphonic poem of Saint-Saens. Mr. Gericke and the orchestra held their entente cordiale throughout, and of course Mr. Kneisel's large, sweet viola tone filled out the obbligato in the symphony impressively.

The next programme is: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Brahms, Concerto for Pianoforte, Miss Aus der Ohe, solo player; Bruckner, Symphony No. 4.

Post Feb 10

MUSIC HALL PROPERTY SOLD.

A very important real estate deal is the sale of Music Hall property, just completed, together with the estates 413 and 415 Washington street, which abut, and give a frontage through to Washington street, almost opposite Summer street. The amount involved is something over $700,000.

It is only eleven months ago that Music Hall was bought by the Boston real estate trust, of which Robert Codman was one of the trustees. The assessed value of the property then was $415,000, but the selling price was above $500,000.

The selling price and the names of the syndicate which has bought it are not yet made public.

The Boston real estate trust still holds the adjoining estate on Winter street and Music Hall place, which was bought at the same time in order to give a larger and direct entrance from Winter street.

But the new syndicate has purchased from the president and fellows of Harvard College the abutting property numbered 413 and 415 Washington street, which comprises a lot of land with a frontage of about 24 feet and a depth of about 170 feet. The lot has a total area of 3970 square feet. It is covered by a four-story brick and stone building.

The Music Hall property comprises about 18,000 square feet of land and a large brick building, which was erected in 1852. The Washington street property is assessed for $190,000.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB 5, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Excellent Programme Presented With Mr. T. Adamowski the Soloist.

The fourteenth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. The principal number was the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz, which has been rarely given here in late years, and is practically a novelty to many. The symphony is in character something like the composer's other symphonies, the "Fantastic" and the "Romeo and Juliet," but it has the peculiar feature of a solo viola obligato, which appears throughout the work. The subject of the symphony is taken from Byron's "Childe Harold." The first movement is not particularly inspiring, but the three other movements have a decided interest.

The performance was a fine one, Mr. Kneisel making much of the solo viola part. Another number of the programme which has not been heard here for some years was Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton." This used to be given quite frequently, but lately has rather fallen by the wayside. It shows all of Saint-Saens's ingenuity of instrumentation, and was received with much applause. Dvorak's "Carneval" overture, which was the opening number, was given with great effect.

Mr. Adamowski gave an admirable performance of Max Bruch's "Scotch Fantasy" for violin and orchestra, which was written for Sarasate.

In this work Mr. Adamowski displayed the many excellencies for which his playing is noted, and he received several recalls.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist at the next rehearsal and concert. She will probably be heard in Brahms's B flat major concerto.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
FRIDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1899.

Music Hall Building Resold—Winter Pl. Transfer.

Boston Music Hall has been sold by the Boston Real Estate Trust, which bought it 11 months ago through C. W. Whittier, who has just made a resale of it to a client, whose name is withheld for the present.

Mr. Whittier has also sold to the same buyer for Harvard College its building numbered 413-415 Washington st., purchased from the Dix estate in 1897.

The trust is understood to have paid between $425,000 and $450,000 and Harvard College $190,000 to $200,000, and each sells at a profit.

As there are leases on the Washington st. property running for four years, the old Music Hall building will stand for that much longer, and probably the hall will remain as it is.

By securing the Harvard College parcel, the new owner of the hall obtains an entrance to his property from Washington st., making the bulk of it much more available for many purposes. The Winter st. parcel, on the corner of Music Hall pl., purchased by the Boston Real Estate Trust, in connection with the hall, is not included in the deal.

The property in the hands of the new owner will have entrances on Washington st., Music Hall pl. and Hamilton pl., and, through a passageway, on Bromfield st.

The total assessed valuation is $620,000; the selling price was much more. The Music Hall estate is valued at $430,000, of which $317,300 is on the 18,593 sq. ft. of land. The land is assessed in two parcels, the smaller one of 2093 being valued at $25 a foot, being that lying next to Hamilton pl., and the larger one for $16. The Washington st. piece is assessed for $190,000, $178,700 being on 3970 ft. of land, or at the rate of $45 a sq. ft.

TRANSCRIPT,
AY, FEBRUARY 8, 18

NEW MUSIC HALL FINANCES

Treasurer Cotting Reports Upon Them for the Annual Meeting Feb. 15

Treasurer Charles E. Cotting of the New Boston Music Hall has prepared his annual report to the stockholders, under date of Feb. 3, which is for the year which closed Jan. 1, 1899. It shows cash on hand, $387; borrowed of subscription committee (demand loan at four per cent), $2000; cash received during the year, $550; total, $2936. The taxes amounted to $2279; premium on liability insurance, $25; office expenses, $106; registration of transfers, rent, etc., $367; balance cash on hand, $159; total, $2936. The balance sheet of the corporation shows: Capital stock, $200,000; notes payable, $2500; total, $202,500; real estate, $183,488; construction, $18,853; cash, $159; total, $202,500.

The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held in room 320, Tremont Building, Feb. 15, at 12 M.

Post Feb 9

MUSIC HALL RESOLD.

Boston Music Hall has been sold by the Boston Real Estate Trust, which bought it eleven months ago through C. W. Whittier, who has just made a resale of it to a client, whose name is withheld for the present.

Mr. Whittier has also sold to the same buyer for Harvard College its building numbered 413-415 Washington street, purchased from the Dix estate in 1897.

The trust is understood to have paid between $425,000 and $450,000 and Harvard College $190,000 to $200,000, and each sells at a profit.

As there are leases on the Washington street property running for four years, the old Music Hall building will stand for that much longer, and probably the hall will remain as it is.

Feb 6

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

Berlioz's Great "Harold in Italy" Symphony Was the Feature—Mr. T. Adamowski the Soloist.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fourteenth concert; the programme;

Overture, "Carnival"................Dvorak
Fantasia on Scotch Folk Melodies, for Violin, op. 46.........Max Bruch
Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton"..Saint-Saens
Symphony, "Harold in Italy"......Berlioz

The feature of real interest in the concert was the magnificent symphony of Berlioz, as fresh, splendid and stirring as when it first saw the light. It seems impossible to believe that it is over 60 years old; it might have been written yesterday for all the marks of time it shows. In view of this ever-young quality in his music, I am sometimes inclined to believe that Berlioz will outlive every one of the great composers of the first half of this century, Beethoven included. At any rate, there is a thrill in his music today that is found less and less in the works of the others. The symphony was played with great beauty throughout. Mr. Kneisel's admirable viola obligato added to the delight of listening.

I have heard Mr. Adamowski play the Scotch Fantasia—does he not give it at about every appearance as soloist with our orchestra?—with far more ability than he displayed on this occasion. His tone was inclined to roughness in the upper register and his intonation was shaky in several places. But his phrasing, especially of the third movement of the piece, was that of an artist, as ever.

The Saint-Saens "Phaeton" tone poem missed its effect altogether. It is quite possible that after the tremendous "Ride of the Valkyries" earlier in the week nothing in the equestrian line of music could make much of an illusion. It was admirably played, so the fault could not have lain in that direction.

Dvorak's brilliant "Carnival" overture, with its slap-bang impetuosity and lack of any genuine musical invention, went with just the right dash and style. Surely Mr. Gericke cannot be accused of excess of formality in these days.

WILDER D. QUINT.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
DAY, FEBRUARY 8, 18

NEW MUSIC HALL

Mr. Charles E. Cotting, treasurer of the new Boston Music Hall, submits a report to the stockholders of date Feb. 3 for the year ending Jan. 1, 1899. The report shows: Cash on hand, $387; borrowed of subscription committee (demand loan 4 per cent.), $2000; cash received during year, $550; total, $2936. Taxes amounted to $2279; premium on liability insurance, $25; office expenses, $106; registrar of transfers, rent, etc., $367; balance cash on hand, $159; total, $2936. Balance sheet shows: Capital, $200,000; notes payable, $2500; total, $202,5000; real estate, $183,488; construction, $18,853; cash, $159; total, $202,500.

The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held at room 320 Tremont Building Feb. 15, at 12 M.

Herald Feb 5

It is a fine plan to train up the Boston child in the classical Symphony rehearsal way he or she should go, but I do not believe in taking youngsters to such concerts without providing for them other seats than their mothers' or governesses' laps. One seat in Music Hall will not hold two persons. A restless child is sure to move about and bump against the occupants of the row in front, and while Boston children are perfect little angels, of course, with a taste for Bach and Brahms, strangers will fail to appreciate their precocity, particularly when their own back hair is in danger of disarangement by them. In former times "children in arms" were relegated to the galleries of theatres or "not admitted" at all, but nowadays parents smuggle in their offspring wherever they go without regard to their neighbors' convenience. It has been offered as an excuse for this unwarrantable proceeding that some suburban lady with a child, in town for shopping, and, wishing to hear the Symphony rehearsal, carries sonny along to stand beside her on the crowded bench. Perhaps it may come to checking children in cloakrooms, or perhaps in new Music Hall there will be a nursery, where mammas can leave their darlings during the performance. At all events, chairs in the aisles are no more obtrusive and out of place than the child without a seat to itself, on which it can nestle about or go to sleep on comfortably. There is not the slightest doubt but every note of a Max Bruch number is appreciated, and Toddlekins is a splendid amateur critic who knows if a player's intonation is "impeccable" or the reverse, but he would be a heap better off at home.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV. NO. 36.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Reading of Some Spirited Compositions.

Dvorak's "Carnival" Given with Fine Effect—Saint-Saens' "Phaeton" Charmingly Played—Berlioz Symphony Brings Out Some Good Orchestration.

For the 14th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, the following programme was played:

Overture, "Carnival"	Dvorak
Scotch fantasia for violin	Bruch
Symphonic poem, "Phaeton"	Saint-Saens
Symphony, "Harold in Italy"	Berlioz

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist.

The Dvorak overture had an exceptionally brilliant reading and performance. Mr. Gericke took the opening movement at a much more spirited pace than has been usual in the playing of the work here, and the effect was, in consequence, much more exhilarating and intensified. Saint-Saens' "Phaeton" is less interesting than the "Jeunesse d'Hercule," the "Danse Maccabre" and the "Roust d'Omphale." The orchestration is not so piquant, nor are the themes so flowing. The rhythm of the galloping horses and of the pattering of their hoofs are cleverly indicated, but when one reflects that the chariot is driven over the clouds, the rhythm and the pattering are perplexing rather than convincing. The thunderbolt is far more realistic. However, the work was charmingly played and delightfully colored

The Berlioz symphony wears well, all except the last movement, which now appears to be an exceedingly mild brigand orgie, and of no great interest. The opening movement still impresses by its warm and deep poetic feeling and its exquisitely fine orchestration. The Pilgrim march has lost none of its fascination of simplicity, nor the serenade its freshness and tenderness. In this era, when orchestration is so noisy and the command of its resources so abused, it is comforting to listen to Berlioz's discreet use of them. He may be looked upon as the father of modern instrumentation, and he had it at his fingers' ends, but his fortissimos never degenerate into mere noise, even when he employs the full force of the orchestra. He is always clear, every instrument is distinctly heard, the right note is invariably in the right place, and is so located that its timbre makes itself felt. His massing of the brass is singulary brilliant in effect, and never discovers the thickness that characterizes it in the hands of his successor. Mr. Gericke read the work splendidly, and in its performance the orchestra was heard at its very best, particularly in the march and the serenade. Mr. Franz Kneisel played the obligato viola part with beautiful grace and sincerity of style, and with an artistic discretion that prevented him from forcing the instrument into undue prominence, and from impressing on the music the aspect of an independent solo.

The Bruch Scotch fantasy is the least interesting of the composer's larger works for the violin. It often drags, notably in the introduction, and the adago that follows it, and his frolicsome treatment of the large and noble air, "Scots who ha' wi Wallace bled," to say nothing of his unnecessary distortion of the melody, which forms the principal theme of the finale, is frivolous, and the whole movement is little else than mere show work that is rarely effective. Mr. Adamowski played the solo part spiritedly, but not invariably with faultless intonation. He was at his best in the slow movements, which, in the main, were excellent in interpretation and performance. There was much vigorous applause and numerous very hearty recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Brahms; and symphony, No. 4, Bruckner. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe is to be the soloist.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Fred P. Bacon Writes a Letter Containing Indorsement of His Plan to Every Stockholder.

Mr. Fred P. Bacon has sent to each of the stockholders in the proposed new music hall a copy of the following letter:

To the stockholders of the New Boston Music Hall Association:

I take the liberty of calling your attention to some expressions of opinion regarding the proposed action of your corporation, received by me in reply to my circular letter of inquiries, mailed you recently.

The Hon. Albert E. Pillsbury writes me:

> Your pointed and vigorous interrogatories addressed to the Music Hall victims ought to have been noticed before. I am glad that at least one man has spirit to protest against the methods of the management, and if any combination can be made to make the influence of the stockholders felt, I may be counted upon to support it.

Col. Albert A. Pope writes me:

> I have lost all faith in the present scheme. If we are going to have a music hall, we should have it big enough to have opera in it, and not simply for the Symphony concerts.

Many other similarly strong expressions of approval of my opposition to the unwise, extravagant and unwarrantable past and contemplated management of the property of your association have come to me. If you desire to prevent a firm of architects from experimenting at your expense in a line of building operations, about which there is little or no practical information, either attend the coming meeting of your corporation, or sign the following proxy, which will be duly stamped upon its receipt.

Do not underestimate the importance of this matter as affecting the future of musical Boston. FRED P. BACON,
649 Tremont Building, Boston.

Mr. Bacon attaches to the letter a proxy form to be filled out by such members as are unable to attend, and who agree with him in his views of the project.

MUSICAL AMERICA

New York, February 4, 1899.

The thirteenth concert of the Bosto. Symphony Orchestra presented for orchestral numbers: Tchaikowsky's Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," and Schumann's Symphony No. 3. Mr. Evan Williams was the soloist, and sang Händel's "Waft Her Angels," and the air, "Send Me Your Aid," from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba."

The orchestral numbers were read by Gericke in rather a perfunctory manner. There was nothing of repose and delicacy, and little dynamic contrast in the playing. Piano was mezzo forte; the latter was forte, and forte amounted to little less than fff, and no difference was made between p and ppp, which rule held good throughout all the playing. This robbing the composition of its legitimate dynamic intention is so absolutely unlike Gericke's efforts of his first term, that one fears he may have become deaf in the interim. This discrepancy in his readings nowadays is not creditable to one who formerly represented the highest standpoint in this direction.

Mr. Williams is a singer of artistic instincts and musical feeling, and sings in a broad manner. His voice has lost much of its native quality, and he sang with great caution on this occasion. It was not the caution demanded because of indisposition, but physical disability, because of a loss of confidence in his vocal ability. His fine voice has not been correctly schooled; and I am afraid that his condition must become worse, consecutively, because of a false location of the column of air. This difficulty should be remedied, else his vocal powers must necessarily become permanently impaired. It would be lamentable should such a splendid voice become sacrificed to false instruction; but I can't see what other result will follow. It was refreshing to hear the English language used once more in our concert halls.

Gericke showed little discretion in his accompaniments, which were coarse and overpowering much of the time. He should go and study Seppilli in this direction.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 5, 1899.

The thirteenth Symphony programme included nothing new. The orchestral numbers were the picturesque and emotional "Romeo and Juliet" overture of Tschaikowsky, the familiar concert extracts from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," and Schumann's third symphony. All of these were rendered as they should be for clearness of statement, polish of manner, susceptibility to change of phase and firm emphasis. Especially splendid was the evocation and illumination of the successive themes of Siegfried, his conquests and his love, and the genial symphony was equally notable for grace, suavity and lightness. Mr. Evan Williams made his first appearance in these concerts, and sang those two great and esteemed tenor scenes, "Deeper and deeper still," from "Jephtha," and "Lend me your aid," from "The Queen of Sheba." He was in virtually perfect voice, so that beauty of tone, sustained phrasing, and that growth of climax in which he has a peculiar skill, prevailed throughout his singing, while his verbal enunciation was wonderfully clear. But he might have chosen his selections better.

The fourteenth of the Symphonies demands attention for nothing but its excellent performance. The programme, although made up of modern compositions, included nothing not perfectly familiar, the work of latest date being Dvorak's "Carnival" overture; while its earliest date was attached to the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz. Between these were placed the "Scotch" fantasy of Bruch, in which Mr. Adamowski played the solo violin with his accustomed grace, elegance and refined sentiment,—and the "Phaeton" symphonic poem of Saint-Saens. Mr. Gericke and the orchestra held their entente cordiale throughout, and of course Mr. Kneisel's large, sweet viola tone filled out the obbligato in the symphony impressively.

The next programme is: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Brahms, Concerto for Pianoforte, Miss Aus der Ohe, solo player; Bruckner, Symphony No. 4.

Post

MUSIC HALL PROPERTY SOLD.

A very important real estate deal is just completed, the sale of Music Hall property, together with the estates 413 and 415 Washington street, which abut, and give a frontage through to Washington street, almost opposite Summer street. The amount involved is something over $700,000.

It is only eleven months ago that Music Hall was bought by the Boston real estate trust, of which Robert Codman was one of the trustees. The assessed value of the property then was $415,000, but the selling price was above $500,000.

The selling price and the names of the syndicate which has bought it are not yet made public.

The Boston real estate trust still holds the adjoining estate on Winter street and Music Hall place, which was bought at the same time in order to give a larger and direct entrance from Winter street.

But the new syndicate has purchased from the president and fellows of Harvard College the abutting property numbered 413 and 415 Washington street, which comprises a lot of land with a frontage of about 24 feet and a depth of about 170 feet. The lot has a total area of 3970 square feet. It is covered by a four-story brick and stone building.

The Music Hall property comprises about 18,000 square feet of land and a large brick building, which was erected in 1852. The Washington street property is assessed for $190,000.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB 5, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Excellent Programme Presented With Mr. T. Adamowski the Soloist.

The fourteenth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. The principal number was the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz, which has been rarely given here in late years, and is practically a novelty to many. The symphony is in character something like the composer's other symphonies, the "Fantastic" and the "Romeo and Juliet," but it has the peculiar feature of a solo viola obligato, which appears throughout the work. The subject of the symphony is taken from Byron's "Childe Harold." The first movement is not particularly inspiring, but the three other movements have a decided interest.

The performance was a fine one, Mr. Kneisel making much of the solo viola part. Another number of the programme which has not been heard here for some years was Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton." This used to be given quite frequently, but lately has rather fallen by the wayside. It shows all of Saint-Saens's ingenuity of instrumentation, and was received with much applause. Dvorak's "Carneval" overture, which was the opening number, was given with great effect.

Mr. Adamowski gave an admirable performance of Max Bruch's "Scotch Fantasy" for violin and orchestra, which was written for Sarasate.

In this work Mr. Adamowski displayed the many excellencies for which his playing is noted, and he received several recalls.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist at the next rehearsal and concert. She will probably be heard in Brahms's B flat major concerto.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

FRIDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1899.

Music Hall Building Resold—Winter Pl. Transfer.

Boston Music Hall has been sold by the Boston Real Estate Trust, which bought it 11 months ago through C. W. Whittier, who has just made a resale of it to a client, whose name is withheld for the present.

Mr. Whittier has also sold to the same buyer for Harvard College its building numbered 413-415 Washington st., purchased from the Dix estate in 1897.

The trust is understood to have paid between $425,000 and $450,000 and Harvard College $190,000 to $200,000, and each sells at a profit.

As there are leases on the Washington st. property running for four years, the old Music Hall building will stand for that much longer, and probably the hall will remain as it is.

By securing the Harvard College parcel, the new owner of the hall obtains an entrance to his property from Washington st., making the bulk of it much more available for many purposes. The Winter st. parcel, on the corner of Music Hall pl., purchased by the Boston Real Estate Trust, in connection with the hall, is not included in the deal.

The property in the hands of the new owner will have entrances on Washington st., Music Hall pl. and Hamilton pl., and, through a passageway, on Bromfield st.

The total assessed valuation is $620,000; the selling price was much more. The Music Hall estate is valued at $430,000, of which $317,300 is on the 18,593 sq. ft. of land. The land is assessed in two parcels, the smaller one of 2093 being valued at $25 a foot, being that lying next to Hamilton pl., and the larger one for $16. The Washington st. piece is assessed for $190,000, $178,700 being on 3970 ft. of land, or at the rate of $45 a sq. ft.

TRANSCRIPT,
AY, FEBRUARY 8, 18

NEW MUSIC HALL FINANCES

Treasurer Cotting Reports Upon Them for the Annual Meeting Feb. 15

Treasurer Charles E. Cotting of the New Boston Music Hall has prepared his annual report to the stockholders, under date of Feb. 3, which is for the year which closed Jan. 1, 1899. It shows cash on hand, $387; borrowed of subscription committee (demand loan at four per cent), $2000; cash received during the year, $550; total, $2936. The taxes amounted to $2279; premium on liability insurance, $25; office expenses, $106; registration of transfers, rent, etc., $367; balance cash on hand, $159; total, $2936. The balance sheet of the corporation shows: Capital stock, $200,000; notes payable, $2500; total, $202,500; real estate, $183,488; construction, $18,853; cash, $159; total, $202,500.

The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held in room 320, Tremont Building, Feb. 15, at 12 M.

MUSIC HALL RESOLD.

Boston Music Hall has been sold by the Boston Real Estate Trust, which bought it eleven months ago through C. W. Whittier, who has just made a resale of it to a client, whose name is withheld for the present.

Mr. Whittier has also sold to the same buyer for Harvard College its building numbered 413-415 Washington street, purchased from the Dix estate in 1897.

The trust is understood to have paid between $425,000 and $450,000 and Harvard College $190,000 to $200,000, and each sells at a profit.

As there are leases on the Washington street property running for four years, the old Music Hall building will stand for that much longer, and probably the hall will remain as it is.

Feb 6

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

Berlioz's Great "Harold In Italy" Symphony Was the Feature—Mr. T. Adamowski the Soloist.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fourteenth concert; the programme:

Overture, "Carnival"	Dvorak
Fantasia on Scotch Folk Melodies, for Violin, op. 46	Max Bruch
Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton"	Saint-Saens
Symphony, "Harold in Italy"	Berlioz

The feature of real interest in the concert was the magnificent symphony of Berlioz, as fresh, splendid and stirring as when it first saw the light. It seems impossible to believe that it is over 60 years old; it might have been written yesterday for all the marks of time it shows. In view of this ever-young quality in his music, I am sometimes inclined to believe that Berlioz will outlive every one of the great composers of the first half of this century, Beethoven included. At any rate, there is a thrill in his music today that is found less and less in the works of the others. The symphony was played with great beauty throughout. Mr. Kneisel's admirable viola obligato added to the delight of listening.

I have heard Mr. Adamowski play the Scotch Fantasia—does he not give it at about every appearance as soloist with our orchestra?—with far more ability than he displayed on this occasion. His tone was inclined to roughness in the upper register and his intonation was shaky in several places. But his phrasing, especially of the third movement of the piece, was that of an artist, as ever.

The Saint-Saens "Phaeton" tone poem missed its effect altogether. It is quite possible that after the tremendous "Ride of the Valkyries" earlier in the week nothing in the equestrian line of music could make much of an illusion. It was admirably played, so the fault could not have lain in that direction.

Dvorak's brilliant "Carnival" overture, with its slap-bang impetuosity and lack of any genuine musical invention, went with just the right dash and style. Surely Mr. Gericke cannot be accused of excess of formality in these days.

WILDER D. QUINT.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
DAY, FEBRUARY 8, 189

NEW MUSIC HALL

Mr. Charles E. Cotting, treasurer of the new Boston Music Hall, submits a report to the stockholders of date Feb. 3 for the year ending Jan. 1, 1899. The report shows: Cash on hand, $387; borrowed of subscription committee (demand loan 4 per cent.), $2000; cash received during year, $550; total, $2936. Taxes amounted to $2279; premium on liability insurance, $25; office expenses, $106; registrar of transfers, rent, etc., $367; balance cash on hand, $159; total, $2936. Balance sheet shows: Capital, $200,000; notes payable, $2500; total, $202.5000; real estate, $183,488; construction, $18,853; cash, $159; total, $202,500.

The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held at room 320 Tremont Building Feb. 15, at 12 M.

It is a fine plan to train up the Boston child in the classical Symphony rehearsal way he or she should go, but I do not believe in taking youngsters to such concerts without providing for them other seats than their mothers' or governesses' laps. One seat in Music Hall will not hold two persons. A restless child is sure to move about and bump against the occupants of the row in front, and while Boston children are perfect little angels, of course, with a taste for Bach and Brahms, strangers will fail to appreciate their precocity, particularly when their own back hair is in danger of disarrangement by them. In former times "children in arms" were relegated to the galleries of theatres or "not admitted" at all, but nowadays parents smuggle in their offspring wherever they go without regard to their neighbors' convenience. It has been offered as an excuse for this unwarrantable proceeding that some suburban lady with a child, in town for shopping, and, wishing to hear the Symphony rehearsal, carries sonny along to stand beside her on the crowded bench. Perhaps it may come to checking children in cloakrooms, or perhaps in new Music Hall there will be a nursery, where mammas can leave their darlings during the performance. At all events, chairs in the aisles are no more obtrusive and out of place than the child without a seat to itself, on which it can nestle about or go to sleep on comfortably. There is not the slightest doubt but every note of a Max Bruch number is appreciated, and Toddlekins is a splendid amateur critic who knows if a player's intonation is "impeccable" or the reverse, but he would be a heap better off at home.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CV., NO. 40.

THURSDAY, FEB. 9, 1899.

MUSIC HALL RESOLD.

Building on Washington Street in the Deal.

Harvard College Owned the Latter Piece.

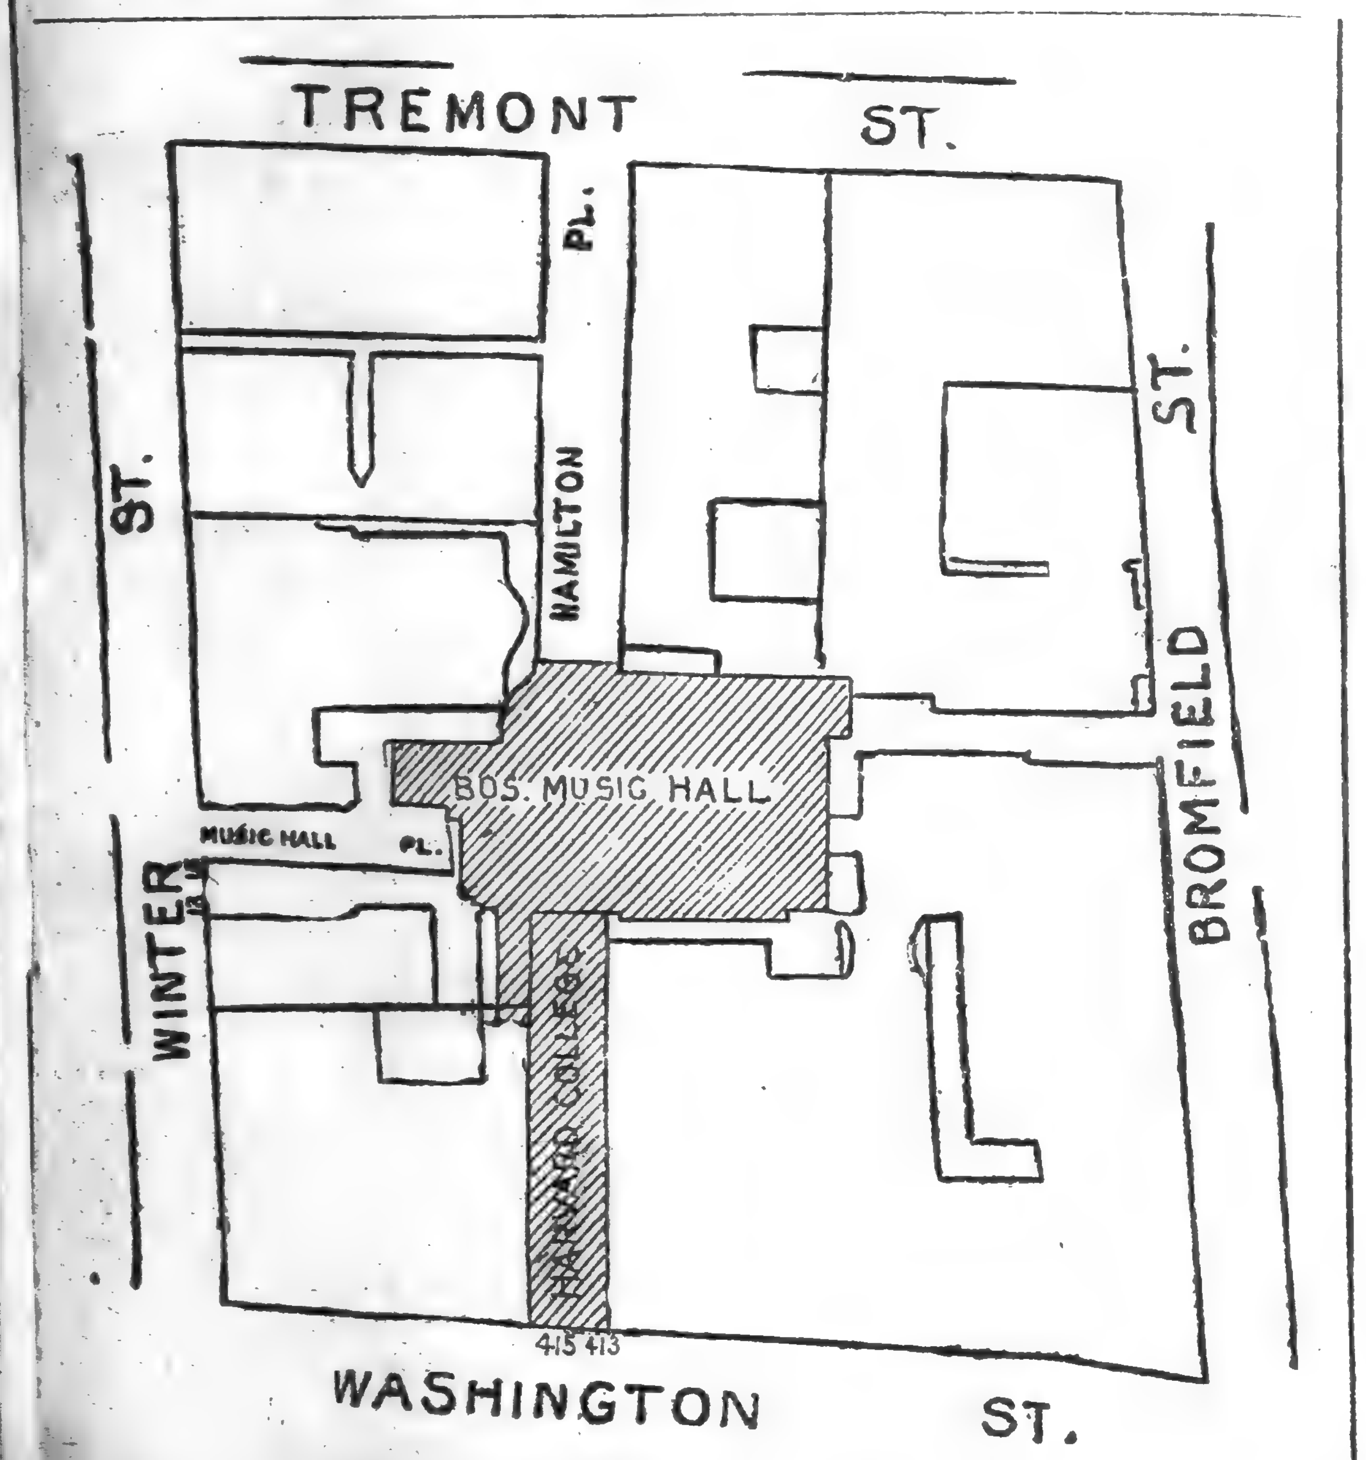
Both Parcels Are Assessed for $620,000.

One of the Largest Trades of This Season.

Smaller City and Suburban Sales and Transfers.

Boston Music Hall has been sold by the Boston Real Estate Trust, which bought it 11 months ago through C. W. Whittier, who has just made a resale of it to a client, whose name is withheld for the present.

Mr. Whittier has also sold to the same buyer for Harvard College its building numbered 413-415 Washington street, purchased from the Dix estate in 1897.



The trust is understood to have paid between $425,000 and $450,000 and Harvard College $190,000 to $200,000, and each sells at a profit.

As there are leases on the Washington street property running for four years, the old Music Hall building will stand for that much longer, and probably the hall will remain as it is.

By securing the Harvard College parcel, the new owner of the hall obtains an entrance to his property from Washington street, making the bulk of it much more available for many purposes. The Winter street parcel, on the corner of Music Hall place, purchased by the Boston Real Estate Trust, in connection with the hall, is not included in the deal.

The property in the hands of the new owner will have entrances on Washington street, Music Hall place and Hamilton place, and, through a passageway, on Bromfield street.

The accompanying diagram shows the properties purchased. Their total assessed valuation is $620,000; the selling price was much more. The Music Hall estate is valued at $430,000, of which $317,300 is on the 18,593 square feet of land. The land is assessed in two parcels, the smaller one of 2093 being valued at $25 a foot, being that lying next to Hamilton place, and the larger one for $16. The Washington street piece is assessed for $190,000, $178,700 being on 3970 square feet of land, or at the rate of $45 a square foot. Harvard College has made some improvements in the building since its purchase.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval," opus 92.
Max Bruch: Fantasia on Scotch Folk-Melodies, for Violin, opus 46.
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Phaéton," opus 39.
Berlioz: Symphony No. 3, in G major, with Viola obbligata, "Harold en Italie," opus 16.
(Viola obbligata by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Mr. Timothée Adamowski was the solo violinist.

Dvorak's overture does not add much to the world's supply of music; it has a certain skin-deep brilliancy, but that seems about all. It was superbly played.

Saint-Saëns's "Phaéton" also is but a superficial bit of cleverness; but then, what enormous cleverness! You admire the skill with which it is done, you enjoy the beauty of color, you sit by with unruffled, Hellenic composure as it is reeled off before you. Perhaps the story of Phaëton might arouse other emotions in you, if told with more genius; but Saint-Saëns and the emotions are, for the most part, strangers; and you feel that anything subjectively strenuous, in face of his super-elegance, would be in bad form. This "Phaéton" of his has the Corinthian brilliance of many-hued jewels, not the splendid blaze of noon; it would show black against the sun. The performance was in every way exhaustive; in a word, perfect.

Berlioz's "Harold" seems, as a whole, the least fine of his three symphonies written for the concert room; the second, the "Funèbre et Triomphale," for wind instruments, written for performance in the open air, we know only from the score; we have never heard it. Although Berlioz gave up all idea of writing a viola concerto when the first movement of "Harold" was but sketched out, he had evidently got too far on with his sketch to be willing to alter the plan of the movement very materially; almost throughout the Allegro one feels something of the constraint he must have experienced in treating a solo instrument as a factor in a symphonic work; Harold's viola has more to do in this one movement than in the three others put together, and the composer does not speak with the freedom of one who uses his native idiom. He strikes one as, say, Verdi, does, when he writes a choral fugue. But the second and third movements are as characteristically beautiful and individual in their way as anything Berlioz ever wrote; here you have Berlioz double-distilled, and at his best. Never has he been more successful in giving musical expression to a poetically picturesque conception. As pieces of coloring, these movements stand alone; where else can be found, for instance, anything more beautifully individual than the effect of those arpeggj sul ponticello of the solo viola? The finale is less good; but we think that this movement is one of the least understood of the composer's orchestral things.

The performance was technically impeccable, one of the most exquisite bits of playing we have heard from our orchestra; in the first three movements it was also exhaustive from every point of view. Mr. Kneisel's playing of the viola part had greatness in it. It is no shame for even such an artist as he to have made progress. Time was when his playing of this part, with all its technical and intellectual mastery, seemed to us prosaic, lacking in poetry of temperament; but he has cured all that now; he now plays the part, so to speak, like Harold himself, not merely like an excellent solo violist. We must, however, again protest against his playing the part standing, "en évidence" before the eyes of the audience. Even though the posture may give him somewhat greater freedom in bowing, we think the objections to it more than outweigh this. There are so many passages in which the solo viola is used orchestrally, merely doubling other instruments in the orchestra, adding its color to theirs, with no prominence of its own, that one is uncomfortable while seeing the violist play something which one cannot really hear.

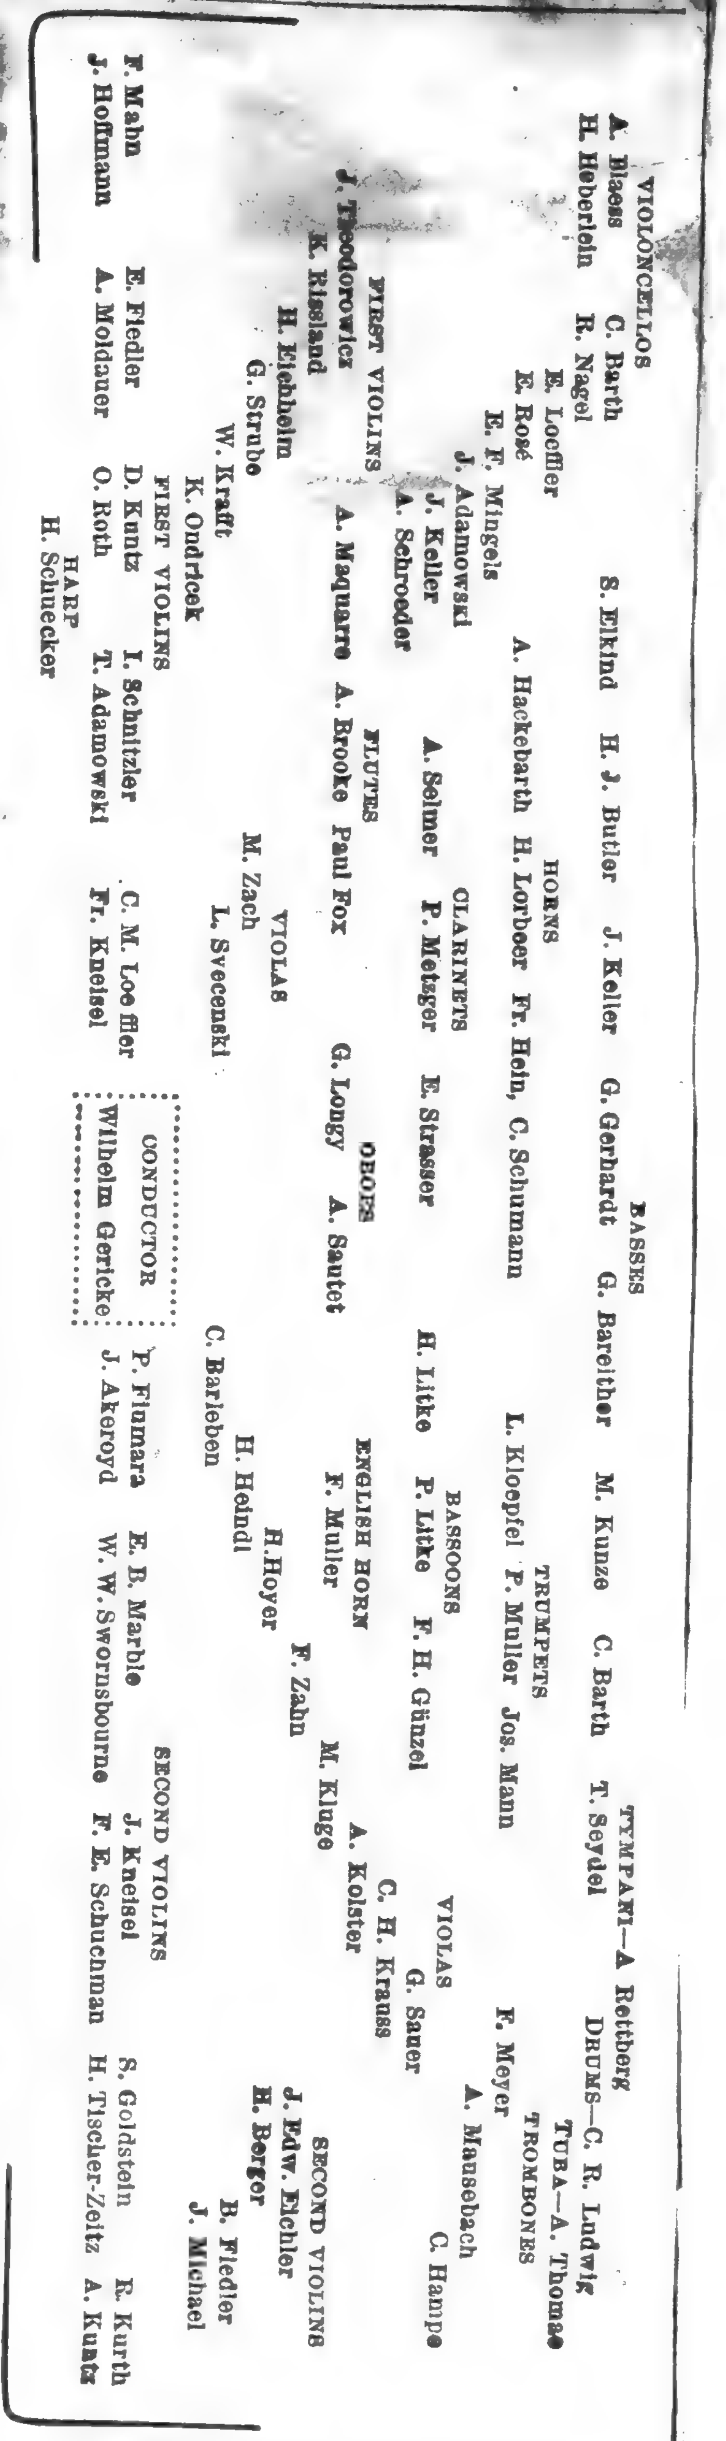
The last movement seemed to us played diametrically wrong. We admit that we know nothing of the metronome-marking in the score; but the tempo taken last Saturday surely had nothing of the "Allegro frenetico" about it. The movement sounded less like an orgy of brigands than like a prize drill of the Independent Corps of Cadets—which organization is equally noted for its accuracy in drill and for a certain chastened sadness of physiognomy while undergoing that ordeal. We have more than once heard this movement taken at the same tempo before; but always with the same result: it came to nothing! Only once, when it was taken considerably faster, have we found musical coherence and meaning in it; then it was great indeed.

Max Bruch's Scotch Fantasia seems to us one of the most enjoyable works in the violinist's modern repertory. It is not deep as some wells we know of, but it is music! There is beauty of melody, harmony and feeling in it; moreover, it is violin music, it is favorably written for the instrument. Mr. Adamowski played it excellently well, especially in the matters of poetic conception and temperamental warmth and grace of feeling. He showed forth the poetry of the thing. In point of technique, he is less noteworthy. His technique, in its present condition, would probably be quite adequate to the needs of a more circumspect and less emotional player than he; but Mr. Adamowski has that in him which imperatively prompts him to take risks in playing, and his virtuosity is not quite such as to make such risks always prudent (pardon the bull). Nevertheless, the impression he made was, as a whole, distinctly fine. He was loudly applauded and recalled.

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3, opus 72; Brahms, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 83; Bruckner, symphony No. 4 (first time in Boston). Miss Adele aus der Ohe will be the pianist.

[illegible] of the Symphony Orchestra

We give below a diagram of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arranged as definitely and with as much accuracy as is possible in the compass of a newspaper column:



MUSIC HALL OPPOSITION

A Call Issued for Proxies, but the "Management" Says That the Plan of the Directors Is Generally Approved

According to those most heavily interested in the new Music Hall for Boston, they do not expect any more opposition among the stockholders than can easily be allayed as soon as the new plans of McKim, Mead & White are ready for inspection. The annual meeting of the New Music Hall Association will be held this month; but its date is not yet announced. It is not likely that anything more than routine business, which will include the report of the treasurer and the election of the officers, will be transacted at the meeting. The plans of the new structure, which the stockholders are expected to examine before they authorize the beginning of construction, will not be ready to show for about two weeks, when it is intended to place them on exhibition for a few days or longer, and then call a special meeting of the stockholders to authorize the signing of contracts.

It is at this meeting, provided that the annual meeting does not consider the plans, that whatever opposition there is to the scheme of a music hall pure and simple is expected to develop. This opposition has taken the form of a desire that the new building shall be adapted to the presentation of opera, and that it shall also be constructed so that offices in it may be let to music teachers and affiliated professional people, thus promising more likelihood of a return in dividends to the stockholders. Colonel Henry L. Higginson's statement that the Music Hall as planned—although he favors the present plan—does not assure financial return to the stockholders is being quoted to show that it is only reasonable to establish some such assurance when it can be done as well as not. The opposition to the present plan because it would provide nothing except a music hall, has in the last few days issued a circular to the stockholders, asking for their proxies, in which Hon. A. E. Pillsbury and Colonel Albert A. Pope are quoted. Mr. Pillsbury writes: "Your pointed and vigorous interrogatories addressed to the Music Hall victims ought to have been noticed before. I am glad that at least one man has spirit to protest against the methods of the management, and if any combination can be made to make the influence of the stockholders felt, I may be counted upon to support it." Colonel Pope writes: "I have lost all faith in the present scheme. If we are going to have a Music Hall we should have it big enough to have opera in it, and not simply for the Symphony concerts."

Notwithstanding these persistent efforts, the management dismisses opposition with a smile, and says that the great majority of the stockholders are perfectly satisfied with the decision of the directors, as generally exemplified in the forthcoming plans of the architects, although, they add, there undoubtedly will be more or less discussion over details.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1899.

A Bruckner Symphony at the End of the Operatic Season.

We have had too much of operatic high living recently, and Dr. Gericke has prescribed a musical blue bill and black draught, which were duly administered on Saturday night. A Bruckner symphony of overwhelming length, earnestness and abstruseness therefore began the concert.

Bruckner is the missing link between Wagner and Brahms; his half-way house stands on a road which we hope few travelers will traverse.

Believing Wagner to be the operatic genius of the world, we yet feel that there can never be a "Wagner School" of opera, and we can go beyond this and state our belief that there never ought to be a Wagnerian style of symphony! The constant reiteration which Wagner so wonderfully employs in his musical construction becomes monotonous tautology when applied to a large symphonic structure; at its very best the symphony needs to become "programme-music" if such a device is to be continually used.

The Bruckner symphony given on this occasion is called the "Romantic," and is the fourth in his series of eight, but at a first hearing it seemed about as romantic as a voting list or a tailor's bill. Much of learning, of contrapuntal skill, of the science of figure development, may at once be conceded to the composer, but of inspiration, of the glow of genius, there is scarcely a trace. In fact, one feels that Wagner has himself described the effort of his friend and admirer in the graphic phrase "Kapellmeister Musik!"

Such a skilful pedant never knows where to stop, and Bruckner has here given a symphony about the length of Beethoven's ninth. Of course the direct art of pleasing is scorned in this work, for almost all modern composers have forgotten that beauty is an element of art. One could watch with interest the evolution of themes from figures, the careful and skilful joining and contrasting of different divisions of the sonata-allegro-form, throughout the first movement, yet without feeling the slightest exaltation or enthusiasm; it was no more soul-stirring than a good black-board demonstration in algebra would have been.

The Andante also was of ascetic chilliness, in spite of the well-played viola theme. Its variations and development were carried to prolixity.

The Scherzo began much better with a series of rollicking fanfares that suggested a jovial hunting party; if the "tinkling cymbal" was not heard, the "sounding brass" certainly was, and the movement had a virility that suggested that the hunt for inspiration had at last started some game. Its Trio, too, beginning in the old-fashioned "Musette" style, with a drone bass, was in charming contrast and tuneful.

As if repentant of having given a concession to clearness and beauty, the composer gave a finale that was full of fortissimo shocks; Hamlet's "thousand natural shocks" were multiplied in this movement, and everything was disjointed, vehement and abrupt. There were, however, such clear evidences of mastery of orchestra and of form (at least in figure-work) that the reviewer must hesitate to condemn utterly on a first hearing. Yet such a symphony, at its very best, needs elucidation, clues and explanations, like the puzzle pictures and the mystical plays that are distorting the other branches of the art of the present.

The symphonic masters, even to the modern Brahms, do not require such a set of crutches, and we suspect that the instrumental composition that cannot stand without them is not in the healthiest state.

The performance of the new work was a wonderful one, full of breadth and power, and if the symphony did not make its due effect not a shadow of the blame can be laid upon the interpretation.

Such a long and complicated work was the poorest possible introduction to the intellectual piano concerto (No. 2, in B flat) by Brahms. Fortunately Brahms's intellectuality of development has plenty of intrinsic beauty; certainly after Bruckner he seemed a composer of the romantic school.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the pianist and was at her best. It is always a work of self-abnegation to play Brahms's second piano-concerto, which is far more of a symphony than a bit of solo display; it has four movements, like a symphony, it has true symphonic development, and it makes an orchestral impression first of all. There is an instance of this at the very threshold of the work, where the horn phrase announces a subject which is elaborated all through the movement.

Every point in this movement is to the purpose; a great pianist once told the present writer that on beginning the study of this concerto he was repelled by seemingly needless difficulties, but after a degree of practicing he came to the firm conviction that not a single technicality was present in the work, but with a definite purpose, not a difficulty could be spared without marring some of the beauty.

The second movement, not a true Scherzo but a tumultuous display of passion and impetuosity, is an instance of this technical difficulty used as a means rather than as an end, and most excellently did Miss Aus der Ohe render it, while the orchestral work was like that of a single instrument.

The exquisite violoncello obbligato in the third movement made an admirable foil to the romance of the piano, a duet of great beauty resulting. The embellishment of this orchestral theme by the piano was a noble employment of an old device and became the most delightful part of the concerto. Not often does Brahms attain such direct romantic charm. The finale, with its sharp and decisive Rondo sprightliness, its second theme of Hungarian folk-character, makes a dashing and well-contrasted ending to one of the greatest concertos of the world.

Miss Aus der Ohe was applauded heartily and three times recalled at the close of her task. Such a success with an audience that had been heavily weighted at the beginning, speaks volumes for the power of the charming pianist.

After the small "b" which began the programme, the greater one which continued it, there came a capital "B" to close the proceedings; a steady crescendo —Bruckner--Brahms--Beethoven! The "Leonora" overture, No. III, ended the concert. It was long past the usual time for the end of a symphony concert and eight classical movements had already been listened to, yet there was not an extreme exodus and a large audience remained to hear a very brilliant reading of one of the greatest dramatic overtures in existence.

What a model such a work ought to be! Here is melody, figure-development, emotional power, everything that can charm musician and non-musician. Who will pretend that it is made weaker because it is intelligible, or that it becomes feeble when it becomes melodic?

The trumpet call was splendidly given and shaded just right. It is a noticeable fact that Beethoven wrote at a time when the trumpet was in a period of decadence. This passage (and the similar one in "Leonore, No. 2") is the most prominent trumpet phrase that the composer ever wrote. All through the scores of Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, and other composers of the so-called "classical epoch," one searches in vain for a difficult or very striking trumpet passage, and Mozart even went so far as to tamper with the brilliant trumpet passages of Handel, simplifying them and transferring some of them to the clarinette.

The violins gave the final rush of triumph, in this overture, with superb power and unity. Those who stayed to the end were well rewarded.

And now having done penance for our sins in the matter of "La Traviata" and "La Boheme," and for our bowing down before the golden calf of the operatic ballet, by devout attention to Bruckner, we return to the fold ready to be thankful for our weekly symphony, and that we are to have Beethoven's "Eroica" next Saturday.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB. 12, 1899.

Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The celebrated pianist, Miss Aus der Ohe, was the soloist at last week's symphony concert, Anton Bruckner's fourth symphony for orchestra was played for the first time here, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture opened the long program. The most interesting feature of the concert was the appearance of Miss Aus der Ohe, an artist of great technical power and artistic individuality, whose talents have matured and broadened since she last played in this city. Brahm's second pianoforte concert is immensely difficult, and among the most surprising points of the interpretation was the untiring strength and zeal shown by the pianist up to the closing phrases of the final movement.

Brahm's concerto is considered by many as rather pedantic and somewhat uninteresting, and gives the player but few opportunities to shine in brilliant solo work, the orchestra and piano scores being so entwined that only a person familiar with the composition can judge of the real merit of the pianist, the musical stumbling blocks not being generally in evidence on account of the accompanying instruments. In everything that Miss Aus der Ohe did she gave evidence of a fluent technique and a dignity and poise in interpretation that was of the highest power. She was singularly unaffected and sincere in her work, her style was modest in the extreme, the touch was virile and of a beautiful quality, skilfully varied to suit the moods of the composer, and her cantabile tone is delightful. As for finger dexterity, this she appears to possess in perfection, and her fortissimo shows no trace of feminine weakness. Her interpretation was masterful, if the word is allowable for a performance by one of the gentler sex, and the audience fairly gave her an ovation at the close of her playing. Miss Aus der Ohe will be heard in several concerts during the week, and then a better judgment of her abilities may be formed.

The Bruckner symphony was splendidly played by the orchestra. There is much scoring for the horns and other brasses in the first two movements, and as their work stands out so conspicuously a word of special praise is due this contingent. The odd phrases and calls in the first part were presented with a tonality and harmony that was almost faultless in clarity and unison, and in the second movement, and also in the opening of the third, the horn phrases were very sweet and melodic. The three themes of the second part were admirably given by the successive contingents, although the third theme was a trifle ragged in the first few bars. The joviality of the third movement found sympathetic interpreters, and the very elaborate fourth part went very smoothly, the violins doing excellent work here. The violas in the first movement sang the cantabile phrases beautifully. The finale to the symphony was stupendous in volume.

The "Leonore" overture was well performed, the familiar and popular number receiving much applause. This week Lady Halle (Norman Neruda) will be the soloist, and the program will be as follows: Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Spohr's violin concerto, No. 8; "Istar," D'Indy, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 43.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One of Bruckner's Works Given for the First Time Here.

It Is the Second of His Symphonies To Be Presented to Bostonians—A Rather Long and Grave Effort—Miss Aus der Ohe Performs an Exacting Concerto Well.

The programme for the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Symphony, No. 4, in E flat, "Romantic".. Bruckner
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in B flat. Brahms
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.........Beethoven

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist.

The symphony had not been heard here before, though it has been played in both Chicago and New York. Bruckner wrote seven symphonies, and previous to last evening only one of them, the seventh, had been given in Boston, and that was 12 years ago this month, under Mr. Gericke's direction.

The work performed last night requires more than one hearing to obtain a clear understanding of it, not that it is by any means vague, except in the finale, whose meaning is utterly baffling on a brief acquaintance, but because there is so much in it that hovers between the old school and the new, and is consequently perplexing in its uncertainty. The harmonic treatment and the orchestration are in the extreme modern vein, and constantly suggest the influence of Wagner; in fact, there are times in the opening allegro and in the andante that are violently reminiscent of Wagner, and that have all the effect of plagiarism, so close is the resemblance.

The symphony, however, abounds in charming movements that are strikingly original in their freshness, grace of theme and daintiness of treatment. The andante is pervaded by a quiet poetic feeling, and a tender warmth of color that make it deeply interesting, and there is a delightful piquancy in the scherzo. And yet, even these qualities in the work leave the listener somewhat unsatisfied with it as a whole.

The orchestration is exceedingly elaborate, but is always clear, seldom noisy, and quite free from the excesses of the modern school. What it seems to lack most is the effect of spontaneity in inspiration. It takes an hour, within two or three minutes, for its performance, and it does not appear that what the symphony really says of importance should take so long in the saying. However, a second hearing may make a wholly different impression, but it is doubtful if any number of hearings will cause it to be esteemed a great work, or even a work indicating any notably original individuality in its composer. It was beautifully and sympathetically read and played, and though it was listened to with profound attention, it did not seem to make any very deep impression on the audience.

The long and grave Brahms concerto, following as it did so long and grave a symphony, was heard somewhat at a disadvantage, notably in its opening movement. As the programme stood originally, the concerto was to have preceded the symphony, which would have been a better arrangement for the concerto; but then the symphony would have suffered. The juxtaposition of the two works was unfortunate, but, all things considered, it was wiser to place the symphony at the opening than at the close of the concert. for by that plan the work was more certain to be heard from beginning to end by the whole audience.

Miss Aus der Ohe's performance of the exacting concerto was clean-cut, able and brilliant in its technique, and virile, thoughtful and intelligent in its other features. The interpretation, in its largeness and dignity of style and purity of taste, as well as in its earnest loftiness of sentiment, strongly marked the player's growth in the finer and higher essentials of her art. It was an admirable and an interesting effort throughout, and the cordial plaudits and recalls that rewarded it were fairly won. No artist could have asked for more perfect assistance than was given by Mr. Gericke in his conducting of the orchestral part of the work.

The programme for the next concert includes Schumann's "Genovera" overture; Spohr's concerto, No. 8, for violin; D'Indy's "Istar," first time, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Lary Halle (Norman Neruda) is to be the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Bruckner's "Romantic" Symphony Played for the First Time in Boston—Miss Adele Aus der Ohe the Pianist.

The program of the 15th symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3........Beethoven
Piano concerto No. 2 ....Brahms
Miss Aus der Ohe.
Symphony No. 4, E flat major........Bruckner
(First time in Boston.)

Von Bülow was for a time talking and writing incessantly about "the three B's"—Bach, Beethoven, Brahms—possibly hoping that some one would say, "You forget yourself; there are four."

The program last night was devoted to three B's—and, by the way, the program was too long.

Is Bruckner one of the great B's? I have no opinion on this subject, for I heard music by him last night for the first time.

I had been warned against it. I had been told by some that his symphonies were drearier than the dreariest pages of Brahms. Others had whispered in my ear that he was a genius—at remembering Wagner. Then, too, there was the saying of some German musician who heard one of Bruckner's symphonies: "The wild dream of an orchestra-player who had been unduly excited by twenty rehearsals of 'Tristan.'"

There was this consolation: The symphony was at the end of the concert; if it became unendurable, the door was close at hand.

This consolation was taken away. Mr. Gericke, with Yankee shrewdness, changed the order; and lo, the symphony came first.

The disappointment was great. I mean by this that I enjoyed the first three movements of the symphony hugely. The influence of Wagner was not disturbing. For a moment there was the suggestion of Siegfried in the forest; and there were a few other hints at "the Ring" and "Tristan"; but Bruckner had plenty to say on his own account, and he said it in his own way.

Here is music that gives a new sensation, and by means that are often artfully artless. Themes that are apparently insignificant are extremely effective in development. The harmonic structure and the orchestration are of constant interest. And there is so much that is fresh and clean! The style, in the first three movements at least, which had been described as so complex and cumbrous, is often as straightforward as the English of Defoe.

After the first movement, it was easy to breathe freely. A man that could write such beautiful music would surely not go to pieces in the next five minutes or develop suddenly into a fearsome bore. The andante is even more beautiful than the preceding movement. Mr. Apthorp refers to it in the program book as a sort of romanza. I heard it rather as a dirge, a burial fantasia, but without the vulgar pomp of hearse and horses draped in black, without the thought of thread-bare crape and tears. It is more like the apostrophe to Death in Whitman's sonorous nocturn, "When lilacs last in the door-yard bloomed." Now the idea of death may have been farthest from Bruckner's mind when he composed this music, which to one hearer may have suggested a summer night, to another the chorus of the spheres. But the music is more than decorative; it is exceedingly suggestive, whatever mood you choose.

The scherzo is also a rare delight, with its invitation to the hunt, with the trio that tells of village dance and simple joy. Bruckner's peasants are of the soil. They are not Watteau, smirking figures, or operetta characters with ribboned hats and rakes.

The finale staggered me. I could not discover what the man was driving at. There are imposing passages, preludes to great events, that are postponed; then it seems as though Bruckner suddenly said to himself, "This will never do; I must try another tack." There are haltings, as though in deliberation or doubt. There are harassing, vexing changes of thought. In one or two instances apparently downright triviality follows the almost sublime. This is the only movement that disappointed. It disappointed, not from lack of skill, but from seeming absence of cohesion and logical development. There is counterpoint galore, but the train of thought is as though it were subject to constant interruption from an outsider.

⁂

Miss Aus der Ohe played the concerto by Brahms with great thoughtfulness. The fiery Liszt player was subdued, was in a state of Brahmsian contemplation; but in the fascinating finale her keen sense of rhythm and proportion, her clear touch, and her ample technic were revealed in the grateful service of the composer. The first movement is to me an abomination. No doubt it is pregnant with "thought"; but was it not Richard Grant White who said of a certain kind of German thinker that the deeper his plunge the muddier he became? Miss Aus der Ohe gave an intellectual performance. It was a study in black and white, rather than a study in dazzling color. In other words, she was often more inclined toward architecture than painting. Thus was she faithful to the composer; and her objective virtuoso power is so firmly established that she can well afford to pay tribute to Brahms.

Philip Hale.

NOTE

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1899.

A Bruckner Symphony at the End of the Operatic Season.

We have had too much of operatic high living recently, and Dr. Gericke has prescribed a musical blue bill and black draught, which were duly administered on Saturday night. A Bruckner symphony of overwhelming length, earnestness and abstruseness therefore began the concert.

Bruckner is the missing link between Wagner and Brahms; his half-way house stands on a road which we hope few travelers will traverse.

Believing Wagner to be the operatic genius of the world, we yet feel that there can never be a "Wagner School" of opera, and we can go beyond this and state our belief that there never ought to be a Wagnerian style of symphony! The constant reiteration which Wagner so wonderfully employs in his musical construction becomes monotonous tautology when applied to a large symphonic structure; at its very best the symphony needs to become "programme-music" if such a device is to be continually used.

The Bruckner symphony given on this occasion is called the "Romantic," and is the fourth in his series of eight, but at a first hearing it seemed about as romantic as a voting list or a tailor's bill. Much of learning, of contrapuntal skill, of the science of figure development, may at once be conceded to the composer, but of inspiration, of the glow of genius, there is scarcely a trace. In fact, one feels that Wagner has himself described the effort of his friend and admirer in the graphic phrase "Kapellmeister Musik!"

Such a skilful pedant never knows where to stop, and Bruckner has here given a symphony about the length of Beethoven's ninth. Of course the direct art of pleasing is scorned in this work, for almost all modern composers have forgotten that beauty is an element of art. One could watch with interest the evolution of themes from figures, the careful and skilful joining and contrasting of different divisions of the sonata-allegro-form, throughout the first movement, yet without feeling the slightest exaltation or enthusiasm; it was no more soul-stirring than a good black-board demonstration in algebra would have been.

The Andante also was of ascetic chilliness, in spite of the well-played viola theme. Its variations and development were carried to prolixity.

The Scherzo began much better with a series of rollicking fanfares that suggested a jovial hunting party; if the "tinkling cymbal" was not heard, the "sounding brass" certainly was, and the movement had a virility that suggested that the hunt for inspiration had at last started some game. Its Trio, too, beginning in the old-fashioned "Musette" style, with a drone bass, was in charming contrast and tuneful.

As if repentant of having given a concession to clearness and beauty, the composer gave a finale that was full of fortissimo shocks; Hamlet's "thousand natural shocks" were multiplied in this movement, and everything was disjointed, vehement and abrupt. There were, however, such clear evidences of mastery of orchestra and of form (at least in figure-work) that the reviewer must hesitate to condemn utterly on a first hearing. Yet such a symphony, at its very best, needs elucidation, clues and explanations, like the puzzle pictures and the mystical plays that are distorting the other branches of the art of the present.

The symphonic masters, even to the modern Brahms, do not require such a set of crutches, and we suspect that the instrumental composition that cannot stand without them is not in the healthiest state.

The performance of the new work was a wonderful one, full of breadth and power, and if the symphony did not make its due effect not a shadow of the blame can be laid upon the interpretation.

Such a long and complicated work was the poorest possible introduction to the intellectual piano concerto (No. 2, in B flat) by Brahms. Fortunately Brahms's intellectuality of development has plenty of intrinsic beauty; certainly after Bruckner he seemed a composer of the romantic school.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the pianist and was at her best. It is always a work of self-abnegation to play Brahms's second piano-concerto, which is far more of a symphony than a bit of solo display; it has four movements, like a symphony, it has true symphonic development, and it makes an orchestral impression first of all. There is an instance of this at the very threshold of the work, where the horn phrase announces a subject which is elaborated all through the movement.

Every point in this movement is to the purpose; a great pianist once told the present writer that on beginning the study of this concerto he was repelled by seemingly needless difficulties, but after a degree of practicing he came to the firm conviction that not a single technicality was present in the work, but with a definite purpose, not a difficulty could be spared without marring some of the beauty.

The second movement, not a true Scherzo but a tumultuous display of passion and impetuosity, is an instance of this technical difficulty used as a means rather than as an end, and most excellently did Miss Aus der Ohe render it, while the orchestral work was like that of a single instrument.

The exquisite violoncello obbligato in the third movement made an admirable foil to the romance of the piano, a duet of great beauty resulting. The embellishment of this orchestral theme by the piano was a noble employment of an old device and became the most delightful part of the concerto. Not often does Brahms attain such direct romantic charm. The finale, with its sharp and decisive Rondo sprightliness, its second theme of Hungarian folk-character, makes a dashing and well-contrasted ending to one of the greatest concertos of the world.

Miss Aus der Ohe was applauded heartily and three times recalled at the close of her task. Such a success with an audience that had been heavily weighted at the beginning, speaks volumes for the power of the charming pianist.

After the small "b" which began the programme, the greater one which continued it, there came a capital "B" to close the proceedings; a steady crescendo —Bruckner--Brahms--Beethoven! The "Leonora" overture, No. III, ended the concert. It was long past the usual time for the end of a symphony concert and eight classical movements had already been listened to, yet there was not an extreme exodus and a large audience remained to hear a very brilliant reading of one of the greatest dramatic overtures in existence.

What a model such a work ought to be! Here is melody, figure-development, emotional power, everything that can charm musician and non-musician. Who will pretend that it is made weaker because it is intelligible, or that it becomes feeble when it becomes melodic?

The trumpet call was splendidly given and shaded just right. It is a noticeable fact that Beethoven wrote at a time when the trumpet was in a period of decadence. This passage (and the similar one in "Leonore, No. 2") is the most prominent trumpet phrase that the composer ever wrote. All through the scores of Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, and other composers of the so-called "classical epoch," one searches in vain for a difficult or very striking trumpet passage, and Mozart even went so far as to tamper with the brilliant trumpet passages of Handel, simplifying them and transferring some of them to the clarinette.

The violins gave the final rush of triumph, in this overture, with superb power and unity. Those who stayed to the end were well rewarded.

And now having done penance for our sins in the matter of "La Traviata" and "La Boheme," and for our bowing down before the golden calf of the operatic ballet, by devout attention to Bruckner, we return to the fold ready to be thankful for our weekly symphony, and that we are to have Beethoven's "Eroica" next Saturday. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB. 12, 1899.

Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The celebrated pianist, Miss Aus der Ohe, was the soloist at last week's symphony concert, Anton Bruckner's fourth symphony for orchestra was played for the first time here, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture opened the long program. The most interesting feature of the concert was the appearance of Miss Aus der Ohe, an artist of great technical power and artistic individuality, whose talents have matured and broadened since she last played in this city. Brahm's second pianoforte concert is immensely difficult, and among the most surprising points of the interpretation was the untiring strength and zeal shown by the pianist up to the closing phrases of the final movement.

Brahm's concerto is considered by many as rather pedantic and somewhat uninteresting, and gives the player but few opportunities to shine in brilliant solo work, the orchestra and piano scores being so entwined that only a person familiar with the composition can judge of the real merit of the pianist, the musical stumbling blocks not being generally in evidence on account of the accompanying instruments. In everything that Miss Aus der Ohe did she gave evidence of a fluent technique and a dignity and poise in interpretation that was of the highest power. She was singularly unaffected and sincere in her work, her style was modest in the extreme, the touch was virile and of a beautiful quality, skilfully varied to suit the moods of the composer, and her cantabile tone is delightful. As for finger dexterity, this she appears to possess in perfection, and her fortissimo shows no trace of feminine weakness. Her interpretation was masterful, if the word is allowable for a performance by one of the gentler sex, and the audience fairly gave her an ovation at the close of her playing. Miss Aus der Ohe will be heard in several concerts during the week, and then a better judgment of her abilities may be formed.

The Bruckner symphony was splendidly played by the orchestra. There is much scoring for the horns and other brasses in the first two movements, and as their work stands out so conspicuously a word of special praise is due this contingent. The odd phrases and calls in the first part were presented with a tonality and harmony that was almost faultless in clarity and unison, and in the second movement, and also in the opening of the third, the horn phrases were very sweet and melodic. The three themes of the second part were admirably given by the successive contingents, although the third theme was a trifle ragged in the first few bars. The joviality of the third movement found sympathetic interpreters, and the very elaborate fourth part went very smoothly, the violins doing excellent work here. The violas in the first movement sang the cantabile phrases beautifully. The finale to the symphony was stupendous in volume.

The "Leonore" overture was well performed, the familiar and popular number receiving much applause. This week Lady Halle (Norman Neruda) will be the soloist, and the program will be as follows: Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Spohr's violin concerto, No. 8; "Istar," D'Indy, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 43.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One of Bruckner's Works Given for the First Time Here.

It Is the Second of His Symphonies To Be Presented to Bostonians—A Rather Long and Grave Effort—Miss Aus der Ohe Performs an Exacting Concerto Well.

The programme for the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Symphony, No. 4, in E flat, "Romantic".. Bruckner
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in B flat. Brahms
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.......... Beethoven

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist.

The symphony had not been heard here before, though it has been played in both Chicago and New York. Bruckner wrote seven symphonies, and previous to last evening only one of them, the seventh, had been given in Boston, and that was 12 years ago this month, under Mr. Gericke's direction.

The work performed last night requires more than one hearing to obtain a clear understanding of it, not that it is by any means vague, except in the finale, whose meaning is utterly baffling on a brief acquaintance, but because there is so much in it that hovers between the old school and the new, and is consequently perplexing in its uncertainty. The harmonic treatment and the orchestration are in the extreme modern vein, and constantly suggest the influence of Wagner; in fact, there are times in the opening allegro and in the andante that are violently reminiscent of Wagner, and that have all the effect of plagiarism, so close is the resemblance.

The symphony, however, abounds in charming movements that are strikingly original in their freshness, grace of theme and daintiness of treatment. The andante is pervaded by a quiet poetic feeling, and a tender warmth of color that make it deeply interesting, and there is a delightful piquancy in the scherzo. And yet, even these qualities in the work leave the listener somewhat unsatisfied with it as a whole.

The orchestration is exceedingly elaborate, but is always clear, seldom noisy, and quite free from the excesses of the modern school. What it seems to lack most is the effect of spontaneity in inspiration. It takes an hour, within two or three minutes, for its performance, and it does not appear that what the symphony really says of importance should take so long in the saying. However, a second hearing may make a wholly different impression, but it is doubtful if any number of hearings will cause it to be esteemed a great work, or even a work indicating any notably original individuality in its composer. It was beautifully and sympathetically read and played, and though it was listened to with profound attention, it did not seem to make any very deep impression on the audience.

The long and grave Brahms concerto, following as it did so long and grave a symphony, was heard somewhat at a disadvantage, notably in its opening movement. As the programme stood originally, the concerto was to have preceded the symphony, which would have been a better arrangement for the concerto; but then the symphony would have suffered. The juxtaposition of the two works was unfortunate, but, all things considered, it was wiser to place the symphony at the opening than at the close of the concert, for by that plan the work was more certain to be heard from beginning to end by the whole audience.

Miss Aus der Ohe's performance of the exacting concerto was clean-cut, able and brilliant in its technique, and virile, thoughtful and intelligent in its other features. The interpretation, in its largeness and dignity of style and purity of taste, as well as in its earnest loftiness of sentiment, strongly marked the player's growth in the finer and higher essentials of her art. It was an admirable and an interesting effort throughout, and the cordial plaudits and recalls that rewarded it were fairly won. No artist could have asked for more perfect assistance than was given by Mr. Gericke in his conducting of the orchestral part of the work.

The programme for the next concert includes Schumann's "Genovera" overture; Spohr's concerto, No. 8, for violin; D'Indy's "Istar," first time, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Lary Halle (Norman Neruda) is to be the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Bruckner's "Romantic" Symphony Played for the First Time in Boston—Miss Adele Aus der Ohe the Pianist.

The program of the 15th symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3........ Beethoven
Piano concerto No. 2 .... Brahms
Miss Aus der Ohe.
Symphony No. 4, E flat major........ Bruckner
(First time in Boston.)

Von Bülow was for a time talking and writing incessantly about "the three B's"—Bach, Beethoven, Brahms—possibly hoping that some one would say, "You forget yourself; there are four."

The program last night was devoted to three B's—and, by the way, the program was too long.

Is Bruckner one of the great B's? I have no opinion on this subject, for I heard music by him last night for the first time.

I had been warned against it. I had been told by some that his symphonies were drearier than the dreariest pages of Brahms. Others had whispered in my ear that he was a genius—at remembering Wagner. Then, too, there was the saying of some German musician who heard one of Bruckner's symphonies: "The wild dream of an orchestra-player who had been unduly excited by twenty rehearsals of 'Tristan.' "

There was this consolation: The symphony was at the end of the concert; if it became unendurable, the door was close at hand.

This consolation was taken away. Mr. Gericke, with Yankee shrewdness, changed the order; and lo, the symphony came first.

The disappointment was great. I mean by this that I enjoyed the first three movements of the symphony hugely. The influence of Wagner was not disturbing. For a moment there was the suggestion of Siegfried in the forest; and there were a few other hints at "the Ring" and "Tristan"; but Bruckner had plenty to say on his own account, and he said it in his own way.

Here is music that gives a new sensation, and by means that are often artfully artless. Themes that are apparently insignificant are extremely effective in development. The harmonic structure and the orchestration are of constant interest. And there is so much that is fresh and clean! The style, in the first three movements at least, which had been described as so complex and cumbrous, is often as straightforward as the English of Defoe.

After the first movement, it was easy to breathe freely. A man that could write such beautiful music would surely not go to pieces in the next five minutes or develop suddenly into a fearsome bore. The andante is even more beautiful than the preceding movement. Mr. Apthorp refers to it in the program book as a sort of romanza. I heard it rather as a dirge, a burial fantasia, but without the vulgar pomp of hearse and horses draped in black, without the thought of thread-bare crape and tears. It is more like the apostrophe to Death in Whitman's sonorous nocturn, "When lilacs last in the door-yard bloomed." Now the idea of death may have been farthest from Bruckner's mind when he composed this music, which to one hearer may have suggested a summer night, to another the chorus of the spheres. But the music is more than decorative; it is exceedingly suggestive, whatever mood you choose.

The scherzo is also a rare delight, with its invitation to the hunt, with the trio that tells of village dance and simple joy. Bruckner's peasants are of the soil. They are not Watteau, smirking figures, or operetta characters with ribboned hats and rakes.

The finale staggered me. I could not discover what the man was driving at. There are imposing passages, preludes to great events, that are postponed; then it seems as though Bruckner suddenly said to himself, "This will never do; I must try another tack." There are haltings, as though in deliberation or doubt. There are harassing, vexing changes of thought. In one or two instances apparently downright triviality follows the almost sublime. This is the only movement that disappointed. It disappointed, not from lack of skill, but from seeming absence of cohesion and logical development. There is counterpoint galore, but the train of thought is as though it were subject to constant interruption from an outsider.

⁂

Miss Aus der Ohe played the concerto by Brahms with great thoughtfulness. The fiery Liszt player was subdued, was in a state of Brahmsian contemplation; but in the fascinating finale her keen sense of rhythm and proportion, her clear touch, and her ample technic were revealed in the grateful service of the composer. The first movement is to me an abomination. No doubt it is pregnant with "thought"; but was it not Richard Grant White who said of a certain kind of German thinker that the deeper his plunge the muddier he became? Miss Aus der Ohe gave an intellectual performance. It was a study in black and white, rather than a study in dazzling color. In other words, she was often more inclined toward architecture than painting. Thus was she faithful to the composer; and her objective virtuoso power is so firmly established that she can well afford to pay tribute to Brahms.

Philip Hale.

NOTE

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
Feb 11
ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the fifteenth symphony concert was:

Overture "Lenore," No. 3, op. 72.. ....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, B flat major, op. 83............Brahms
Symphony, No. 4, E flat, major.... ....Bruckner

Soloist, Adele Aus Der Ohe.

The program was interesting, and it was most adequately interpreted; the overture to "Leonore" was most brilliantly and satisfactorily read and played. In the Brahms concerto Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was at her best, and to those who are acquainted with the work of this artist there can be no higher praise. As the rule allowances must be made for women pianists out of consideration for their sex; but Miss Aus Der Ohe requires none; she may be judged by her work alone and, having made all possible comparisons by rights of her intelligence and her fine art work she stands in the front rank of the master players of the pianoforte. Her work is always satisfying and reasonable; her style is broad and large, and she has the unerring instinct to get at the heart meaning of the work she plays. The Brahms concerto was played in a solid, broad and dignified manner, in which there was no trace of femininity; even in the light graceful passages there was no yielding to sentimentalism, but it was stern, unflinching master work throughout, equally praiseworthy in the technical as on the interpretative side.

The Bruckner symphony is worth the hearing; but it shows little evidence of genius or of the inherent vitality born of inspiration. At intervals the man of talents rises above the academician; and the grooves of learning are freed from the glooms favorable to scientific imagination; at other times one wonders at the natural simplicity of the man of learning, but the twilight quickly gathers again, aesthetics retire with the singing birds, and the voice of the pedagogue is heard through the gloom. The symphony shows the heights to which a clever and experienced musician can rise; it is always interesting if never convincing and, as has been already said, there are moments that delight one with their suggestion of the spontaneous outburst of a poetic imagination touched, new-morn-rise, with the glow of inspiration. The work was delightfully played, and won the hearty applause of the audience.

Another feature of the concert was the delightful 'cello work of Mr. Schroeder in the third movement of the Brahms concerto.

The program for the next concert is: Overture, "Genvoera," Schumann; Concerto for Violin, No. 8, Spohr; "Istar," D'Indy; Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven. The soloist will be Lady Halle (Norman Neruda.)

Boston Journal.
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1899.

Such thoughtfulness and benevolence as that shown by the manager of Music Hall, who not only opened the hospitable doors of his spacious property to those forced to spend Monday night away from home and who could find no accommodations at the hotels, but who also sent notifications of his provisions far and wide, are as remarkable as the length and fury of the storm itself.

The Music Hall management, realizing the impossibility of getting home which many people would experience, decided to keep Bumstead Hall open all night for the accommodation of those who chose to avail themselves of it.

The cushioned benches were occupied to the limit, the intention being to give women the preference, but no one was turned away as long as the hall would [illegible] another person.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 12, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifteenth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. The programme opened with Bruckner's "Romantic Symphony, No. 4, in E flat." The works of Anton Bruckner are but little known here. He has written seven symphonies, also a great deal of church music, and was well known also as an organist. He died in Vienna in 1896. The fourth symphony, heard here last evening for the first time, seems to be decidedly interesting in the first two movements. The themes are excellent and original, and the orchestral treatment very clever. The scherzo is commonplace, and the last movement rather dull and uninspired. It is, however, a much better symphony than many heard here recently, and should be heard again another season. The orchestra played finely at every point.

Then came Brahms's second piano concerto, with Miss Adele Aus der Ohe the soloist. This work has had sional performance during the last teen years, but never made a decided pression until Mr. Joseffy played it years ago. Then the greatness of work was made fully manifest, and incomparable performance is still in the minds of those who heard it.

Miss Aus der Ohe overcame the technical difficulties of the work in a surprising manner, and her artistic conception was such as to make her performance one of great excellence, even if she did not quite reach the ideal standard established by Mr. Joseffy, whom many consider the greatest Brahms player living.

An excellent performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3 closed the programme. At the next rehearsal and concert Lady Halle (Norman Neruda) will make her first appearance in this city in Spohr's eighth violin concerto.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C. FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

New York, February 11, 1899.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented for a programme: Dvorâk's "Carneval" overture; "Scotch Fantasy," by Max Bruch, for violin; Saint Saëns' symphonic poem, "Phäeton," and Berlioz's symphony No. 3, "Harold in Italy." Mr. Tim Adamowski was the violin soloist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel played the viola obligato in the Berlioz piece.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the evening was loud and coarse, and not at all creditable to the former reputation of Gericke. There was not one delicate touch; not even an attempt to gain effect through any gradation of power other than very loud and less loud. In the palmy days of Nikisch's slipshod, boisterous readings there was not heard a more crude, colorless and inartistic performance, as regards shading, than was the general character of Gericke's readings on this occasion. There was nothing to commend except the precision of the band.

Adamowski was not up to his best mark. His execution was slovenly at times, and there were many lapses in his intonation. A player of the real ability possessed by this performer should exert himself to make a better showing of his talents.

The accompaniment, under Gericke's baton, was overloud and without discrimination.

As a programme maker Gericke is a back-number.

I have always been a great advocate of Gericke, basing my claim as regards his superiority upon the results gained by him during his first engagement. I am sadly disappointed in the showing of his present term.

There is a nice little rumpus now in motion concerning the building of the new Music Hall on Hutington avenue. The opposition to the plans of Mr. H. L. Higginson and his confrères is headed by Mr. F. P. Bacon, formerly the musical editor of the Boston "Herald," who has issued a circular to the stockholders, urging them to combine against the plans of Mr. Higginson and others, and thus "prevent a firm of architects experimenting at the expense of the stockholders." What Mr. Higginson and his associates want is a music hall, pure and simple. Mr. Bacon and his followers advocate a music hall and opera house combined. We shall soon see how this comes out, as a meeting of the corporation is shortly to be held.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1899.

Music Hall Thrown Open.

"But there are no rooms at the hotels," said her escort.

"Well, we will stay at the station," said the little woman.

"You can't sleep sitting upright," said the man.

"Then I will go to the police station," said the lady.

This conversation was repeated perhaps 500 times, with variations. The stations were full; the trains had been pulled in on the tracks, and coupled up, were full of people who slept sitting, and still men and women roamed the streets, trying to get friends to take them in. It looked a desperate case for respectable people by midnight. Luckily for Bostonians, there is always the right man to think at times like these, when wives or sisters stand a chance of freezing in the streets or sitting up all night after working all day.

Mr. Louis Mudgett, the manager of Music Hall, was the man in this case. He conceived the idea that it would be a good thing to throw open his hall for the accommodation of those who had no other beds. Music Hall itself would not do very well for the obvious reason that there are arms between the seats in the hall, and to sleep under these would be impossible, while to sleep across them would crimp a man into the semblance of an inchworm in full crawl. Accordingly, Mr. Mudgett threw open Bumstead Hall, below, where there are long pew-like seats, well cushioned and soft. He sent notice of this to the railroad stations and to the police, saying at first that he would reserve the hall for women entirely. It was found later, however, that there was ample room for all, and no person was denied admittance.

Several men were accommodated, but the news spread slowly in the little-populated night, and the bell rang at frequent intervals up to 2 o'clock. Two or three men with their wives came in, and, with one and another, there are a number of people in Boston today who are sending Mr. Mudgett bouquets of various kinds. It was a most kindly, public-spirited and thoughtful thing. He himself, by the way, slept in the hal, as did the entire staff, with the exception of Mr. Blaisdell, who had the pleasure of answering the rings of the homeless.

Boston Daily Globe.
THURSDAY, FEB. 16, 1899.

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.

Architects at Work on Plans After the Leipsic Idea.

Col Higginson presided at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the new Boston music hall, held yesterday in the Tremont building.

Pres Higginson said the architects had been instructed to prepare a new set of plans. The old Greek theater plan had been given up, because, among other reasons, it would be largely an experiment and might not fulfil acoustic requirements. The architects are now at work upon plans which follow, in the main, the Leipsic music hall.

It is contemplated that the new hall will be longer, but narrower, than the old hall, with one balcony running clear around and a second balcony at the back. The floor will be sloping, to allow those in the rear an unobstructed view of the stage. The new hall must be completed by April 1, 1900, the date when the purchasers of the old hall property will take possession of it. The seating capacity of the new hall will be about equal to that of the Winter st hall.

Col Higginson informed the meeting that three of the directors had purchased land adjoining or in the immediate vicinity of that on which the new hall is to be built. This step was taken by them, he said, to prevent the occupation of the land for uses which might operate disadvantageously for the objects for which the new hall was to be devoted. The near location of mechanical or manufacturing purposes would depreciate the value of new music hall. This land bought by these three gentlemen they were willing to dispose of to the association without any personal profit.

Of the total of 3472 shares thus far issued, 1847 were voted in the unanimous election of directors and auditors for the ensuing year. These are Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears and Charles E. Cotting directors, and Horace D. Chapin, William P. Blake and William Hooper auditors; Charles E. Cotton clerk-treas.

Boston [illegible]
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 18[illegible]

MR. HIGGINSON QUESTIONED

Opposition to the Plan of the New Boston Music Hall Makes a Few Inquiries at the Stockholders' Annual Meeting, but Directors Have Unanimous Election

No excitement whatever characterized the annual meeting of the New Boston Music Hall in the Tremont Building this noon, although the "opposition" to the plans of the directors was represented in the person of Fred P. Bacon, who took part in the meeting by virtue of nine proxies representing five persons, and who asked a few questions which were fully and promptly answered.

President Henry L. Higginson presided, and there were 1847 of the total 3472 shares represented in person or by proxy. The report of Treasurer Charles E. Cotting was approved, but not read, as it had already been sent to stockholders and published by the daily press. In reply to a question Mr. Cotting explained that the item "Construction, $18,853," in the balance sheet represented taxes, organization, architects' fees, office and other expenses of maintenance since the land was bought. The auditors reported the books to have been properly kept.

Colonel Higginson, as at the recent special meeting, spoke of the plans, which he hoped would be ready to show within a few weeks. The hall would, he said, be after that of Leipsic, with the stage reversed, the floor narrower and considerably longer, one gallery all around, a second in the rear and probably along the sides, and the floor sloping; the hall may seat a trifle more than the 2397 of the present Music Hall. Repuying to a question, he said the seats would give about the same individual room as the "new ones" put in a dozen years ago in Music Hall.

Mr. Bacon inquired of Colonel Higginson how that gentleman reconciled his published letter of 1893, stating that the enterprise would be more profitable if in the form of an opera house with his latter decision to build a music hall, and his later statement, also, that the chance for financial return will not be great.

Colonel Higginson replied that he did not remember his letter of 1893, but it did at that time seem best to build an opera house, but he had taken expert advice, which agreed that a music hall would be best for several reasons; first, that it would cost more to build and maintain, second, that European experience favored the music hall; third, that the music hall could be leased, and its profits, if any, go directly to the stockholders, while an opera house could not. As to profits, it would be a zold man that would guarantee any; it was a grave question whether all patronage would follow the building, as was hoped, and whether the summer concerts could be given there or the hall would be much used for dinners.

Mr. Bacon inquired how many architects had been consulted; whether others than McKim, Mead & White.

Colonel Higginson replied that he did not know how many, but a great many others had been consulted. He also sketched rapidly the characteristics of various American music halls, and said that the directors had come to their conclusions after careful investigation, whether that conclusion be right or wrong. Few criticisms of the plan of the directors had reached him, he said, except through Mr. Bacon.

Upon vote being taken, in which Mr. Bacon with his proxies declined to take part, the following-named were unanimously reëlected directors: Henry L. Higginson, Charles E. Cotting, Edward S. Hooper, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears. The president appointed William Hooper, H. D. Chapin and William P. Blake an auditing committee.

---

4 Feb 16

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

NEW MUSIC HALL PLANS.

At the annual meeting of the New Boston Music Hall yesterday noon. Treasurer Charles E. Cotting explained that the item "Construction, $18,853," in the balance sheet represented taxes, architects' fees and other expenses of maintenance.

Colonel Higginson spoke of the plans which he hoped would be ready to show within a few weeks. The hall would be after that of Leipsic, with the stage reversed, the floor narrower and considerably longer, one gallery all around, a second in the rear and probably along the sides, and the floor sloping; the hall may seat a trifle more than the 2397 of the present Music Hall.

He said the seats would give about the same individual room as the "new ones" put in a dozen years ago in Music Hall. He explained why it was inadvisable to have a hall adapted to opera.

The following-named were unanimously elected directors: Henry L. Higginson, Charles E. Cotting, Edward S. Hooper, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears. The president appointed William Hooper, H. D. Chapin and William P. Blake an auditing committee.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the fifteenth symphony concert was:

Overture "Lenore," No. 3, op. 72.. ....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, B flat major, op. 83............Brahms
Symphony, No. 4, E flat, major.... ....Bruckner
Soloist, Adele Aus Der Ohe.

The program was interesting, and it was most adequately interpreted; the overture to "Leonore" was most brilliantly and satisfactorily read and played. In the Brahms concerto Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was at her best, and to those who are acquainted with the work of this artist there can be no higher praise. As the rule allowances must be made for women pianists out of consideration for their sex; but Miss Aus Der Ohe requires none; she may be judged by her work alone and, having made all possible comparisons by rights of her intelligence and her fine art work she stands in the front rank of the master players of the pianoforte. Her work is always satisfying and reasonable; her style is broad and large, and she has the unerring instinct to get at the heart meaning of the work she plays. The Brahms concerto was played in a solid, broad and dignified manner, in which there was no trace of femininity; even in the light graceful passages there was no yielding to sentimentalism, but it was stern, unflinching master work throughout, equally praiseworthy in the technical as on the interpretative side.

The Bruckner symphony is worth the hearing; but it shows little evidence of genius or of the inherent vitality born of inspiration. At intervals the man of talents rises above the academician; and the grooves of learning are freed from the glooms favorable to scientific imagination; at other times one wonders at the natural simplicity of the man of learning, but the twilight quickly gathers again, aesthetics retire with the singing birds, and the voice of the pedagogue is heard through the gloom. The symphony shows the heights to which a clever and experienced musician can rise; it is always interesting if never convincing and, as has been already said, there are moments that delight one with their suggestion of the spontaneous outburst of a poetic imagination touched, new-morn-rise, with the glow of inspiration. The work was delightfully played, and won the hearty applause of the audience.

Another feature of the concert was the delightful 'cello work of Mr. Schroeder in the third movement of the Brahms concerto.

The program for the next concert is: Overture, "Genvoera," Schumann; Concerto for Violin, No. 8, Spohr; "Istar," D'Indy; Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven. The soloist will be Lady Halle (Norman Neruda.)

Boston Journal.
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1899.

Such thoughtfulness and benevolence as that shown by the manager of Music Hall, who not only opened the hospitable doors of his spacious property to those forced to spend Monday night away from home and who could find no accommodations at the hotels, but who also sent notifications of his provisions far and wide, are as remarkable as the length and fury of the storm itself.

The Music Hall management, realizing the impossibility of getting home which many people would experience, decided to keep Bumstead Hall open all night for the accommodation of those who chose to avail themselves of it.

The cushioned benches were occupied to the limit, the intention being to give women the preference, but no one was turned away as long as the hall would admit another person.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 12, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifteenth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. The programme opened with Bruckner's Romantic Symphony, No. 4, in E flat. [illegible] works of Anton Bruckner are bu[illegible] known here. He has written seve[illegible] phonies, also a great deal of [illegible] music, and was well known also as an organist. He died in Vienna in 1896. [illegible] fourth symphony, heard here last [illegible] ing for the first time, seems to be decidedly interesting in the first two movements. The themes are excellent, original, and the orchestral treatment very clever. The scherzo is commonplace, and the last movement rather [illegible] and uninspired. It is, however, a m[illegible] better symphony than many heard [illegible] recently, and should be heard again [illegible] other season. The orchestra played [illegible] at every point.

Then came Brahms's second piano concerto, with Miss Adele Aus der Ohe the soloist. This work has had [illegible] sional performance during the las[illegible] teen years, but never made a decided impression until Mr. Joseffy played it [illegible] years ago. Then the greatness [illegible] work was made fully manifest, a[illegible] incomparable performance is still in the minds of those who heard it.

Miss Aus der Ohe overcame the [illegible] nical difficulties of the work in a surprising manner, and her artistic conception was such as to make her performance one of great excellence, even if she did not quite reach the ideal standard established by Mr. Joseffy, whom many consider the greatest Brahms player living.

An excellent performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, closed the programme. At the next rehearsal and concert Lady Halle (Norman Neruda) will make her first appearance in this city in Spohr's eighth violin concerto.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
New York, February 11, 1899.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented for a programme: Dvorák's "Carneval" overture; "Scotch Fantasy," by Max Bruch, for violin; Saint Saëns' symphonic poem, "Phäeton," and Berlioz's symphony No. 3, "Harold in Italy." Mr. Tim Adamowski was the violin soloist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel played the viola obligato in the Berlioz piece.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the evening was loud and coarse, and not at all creditable to the former reputation of Gericke. There was not one delicate touch; not even an attempt to gain effect through any gradation of power other than very loud and less loud. In the palmy days of Nikisch's slipshod, boisterous readings there was not heard a more crude, colorless and inartistic performance, as regards shading, than was the general character of Gericke's readings on this occasion. There was nothing to commend except the precision of the band.

Adamowski was not up to his best mark. His execution was slovenly at times, and there were many lapses in his intonation. A player of the real ability possessed by this performer should exert himself to make a better showing of his talents.

The accompaniment, under Gericke's baton, was over-loud and without discrimination.

As a programme maker Gericke is a back-number.

I have always been a great advocate of Gericke, basing my claim as regards his superiority upon the results gained by him during his first engagement. I am sadly disappointed in the showing of his present term.

There is a nice little rumpus now in motion concerning the building of the new Music Hall on Hutington avenue. The opposition to the plans of Mr. H. L. Higginson and his confrères is headed by Mr. F. P. Bacon, formerly the musical editor of the Boston "Herald," who has issued a circular to the stockholders, urging them to combine against the plans of Mr. Higginson and others, and thus "prevent a firm of architects experimenting at the expense of the stockholders." What Mr. Higginson and his associates want is a music hall, pure and simple. Mr. Bacon and his followers advocate a music hall and opera house combined. We shall soon see how this comes out, as a meeting of the corporation is shortly to be held.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1899.

Music Hall Thrown Open.

"But there are no rooms at the hotels," said her escort.

"Well, we will stay at the station," said the little woman.

"You can't sleep sitting upright," said the man.

"Then I will go to the police station," said the lady.

This conversation was repeated perhaps 500 times, with variations. The stations were full; the trains had been pulled in on the tracks, and coupled up, were full of people who slept sitting, and still men and women roamed the streets, trying to get friends to take them in. It looked a desperate case for respectable people by midnight. Luckily for Bostonians, there is always the right man to think at times like these, when wives or sisters stand a chance of freezing in the streets or sitting up all night after working all day.

Mr. Louis Mudgett, the manager of Music Hall, was the man in this case. He conceived the idea that it would be a good thing to throw open his hall for the accommodation of those who had no other beds. Music Hall itself would not do very well for the obvious reason that there are arms between the seats in the hall, and to sleep under these would be impossible, while to sleep across them would crimp a man into the semblance of an inchworm in full crawl. Accordingly, Mr. Mudgett threw open Bumstead Hall, below, where there are long pew-like seats, well cushioned and soft. He sent notice of this to the railroad stations and to the police, saying at first that he would reserve the hall for women entirely. It was found later, however, that there was ample room for all, and no person was denied admittance.

Several men were accommodated, but the news spread slowly in the little-populated night, and the bell rang at frequent intervals up to 2 o'clock. Two or three men with their wives came in, and, with one and another, there are a number of people in Boston today who are sending Mr. Mudgett bouquets of various kinds. It was a most kindly, public-spirited and thoughtful thing. He himself, by the way, slept in the hal, as did the entire staff, with the exception of Mr. Blaisdell, who had the pleasure of answering the rings of the homeless.

Boston Daily Globe.
THURSDAY, FEB. 16, 1899.

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.

Architects at Work on Plans After the Leipsic Idea.

Col Higginson presided at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the new Boston music hall, held yesterday in the Tremont building.

Pres Higginson said the architects had been instructed to prepare a new set of plans. The old Greek theater plan had been given up, because, among other reasons, it would be largely an experiment and might not fulfil acoustic requirements. The architects are now at work upon plans which follow, in the main, the Leipsic music hall.

It is contemplated that the new hall will be longer, but narrower, than the old hall, with one balcony running clear around and a second balcony at the back. The floor will be sloping, to allow those in the rear an unobstructed view of the stage. The new hall must be completed by April 1, 1900, the date when the purchasers of the old hall property will take possession of it. The seating capacity of the new hall will be about equal to that of the Winter st hall.

Col Higginson informed the meeting that three of the directors had purchased land adjoining or in the immediate vicinity of that on which the new hall is to be built. This step was taken by them, he said, to prevent the occupation of the land for uses which might operate disadvantageously for the objects for which the new hall was to be devoted. The near location of mechanical or manufacturing purposes would depreciate the value of new music hall. This land bought by these three gentlemen they were willing to dispose of to the association without any personal profit.

Of the total of 3472 shares thus far issued, 1847 were voted in the unanimous election of directors and auditors for the ensuing year. These are Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears and Charles E. Cotting directors, and Horace D. Chapin, William P. Blake and William Hooper auditors; Charles E. Cotton clerk-treas.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1899

MR. HIGGINSON QUESTIONED

Opposition to the Plan of the New Boston Music Hall Makes a Few Inquiries at the Stockholders' Annual Meeting, but Directors Have Unanimous Election

No excitement whatever characterized the annual meeting of the New Boston Music Hall in the Tremont Building this noon, although the "opposition" to the plans of the directors was represented in the person of Fred P. Bacon, who took part in the meeting by virtue of nine proxies representing five persons, and who asked a few questions which were fully and promptly answered.

President Henry L. Higginson presided, and there were 1847 of the total 3472 shares represented in person or by proxy. The report of Treasurer Charles E. Cotting was approved, but not read, as it had already been sent to stockholders and published by the daily press. In reply to a question Mr. Cotting explained that the item "Construction, $18,853," in the balance sheet represented taxes, organization, architects' fees, office and other expenses of maintenance since the land was bought. The auditors reported the books to have been properly kept.

Colonel Higginson, as at the recent special meeting, spoke of the plans, which he hoped would be ready to show within a few weeks. The hall would, he said, be after that of Leipsic, with the stage reversed, the floor narrower and considerably longer, one gallery all around, a second in the rear and probably along the sides, and the floor sloping; the hall may seat a trifle more than the 2397 of the present Music Hall. Repuying to a question, he said the seats would give about the same individual room as the "new ones" put in a dozen years ago in Music Hall.

Mr. Bacon inquired of Colonel Higginson how that gentleman reconciled his published letter of 1893, stating that the enterprise would be more profitable if in the form of an opera house with his latter decision to build a music hall, and his later statement, also, that the chance for financial return will not be great.

Colonel Higginson replied that he did not remember his letter of 1893, but it did at that time seem best to build an opera house, but he had taken expert advice, which agreed that a music hall would be best for several reasons; first, that it would cost more to build and maintain, second, that European experience favored the music hall; third, that the music hall could be leased, and its profits, if any, go directly to the stockholders, while an opera house could not. As to profits, it would be a zold man that would guarantee any; it was a grave question whether all patronage would follow the building, as was hoped, and whether the summer concerts could be given there or the hall would be much used for dinners.

Mr. Bacon inquired how many architects had been consulted; whether others than McKim, Mead & White.

Colonel Higginson replied that he did not know how many, but a great many others had been consulted. He also sketched rapidly the characteristics of various American music halls, and said that the directors had come to their conclusions after careful investigation, whether that conclusion be right or wrong. Few criticisms of the plan of the directors had reached him, he said, except through Mr. Bacon.

Upon vote being taken, in which Mr. Bacon with his proxies declined to take part, the following-named were unanimously reëlected directors: Henry L. Higginson, Charles E. Cotting, Edward S. Hooper, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears. The president appointed William Hooper, H. D. Chapin and William P. Blake an auditing committee.

4

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

NEW MUSIC HALL PLANS.

At the annual meeting of the New Boston Music Hall yesterday noon, Treasurer Charles E. Cotting explained that the item "Construction, $18,853," in the balance sheet represented taxes, architects' fees and other expenses of maintenance.

Colonel Higginson spoke of the plans which he hoped would be ready to show within a few weeks. The hall would be after that of Leipsic, with the stage reversed, the floor narrower and considerably longer, one gallery all around, a second in the rear and probably along the sides, and the floor sloping; the hall may seat a trifle more than the 2397 of the present Music Hall.

He said the seats would give about the same individual room as the "new ones" put in a dozen years ago in Music Hall. He explained why it was inadvisable to have a hall adapted to opera.

The following-named were unanimously elected directors: Henry L. Higginson, Charles E. Cotting, Edward S. Hooper, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears. The president appointed William Hooper, H. D. Chapin and William P. Blake an auditing committee.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CV., NO. 46.
WEDNESDAY, FEB. 15, 1899.

PLAN OF MUSIC HALL.

Stockholders Hold Their Annual Meeting.

Some Little Excitement Is Introduced.

Queries as to Why Original Idea Was Changed.

The Proposed Combination with Opera House.

Henry L. Higginson Makes a Statement.

There was some little excitement at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the new Boston Music Hall, which was held in room 320, Tremont building, at noon today.

Frederick P. Bacon, representing several stockholders, asked Mr. Henry L. Higginson why the original plan of the new Music Hall was changed, and criticised the manner in which the opera house idea was abandoned.

There were 1847 shares out of the 3472 represented.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson presided. In opening the meeting he said the plans of the new Boston Music Hall would soon be ready. The hall would be fashioned on the lines of the "Liepsic plan." The new hall would be very much like the present hall. The stage will be recessed, drawn back, he continued, and the hall will be considerably narrower. There will have to be one gallery all around the hall as in the present Music Hall. There will also have to be a second gallery in order to get plenty of sitting room. We shall have to have the approval of the stockholders in building the hall.

The new Boston Music Hall must be built before April, 1900, and it must be occupied at that time. So far as the plans go on the part of the architects they have been assiduous in their efforts and are perfectly willing to sacrifice the architectural side to the acoustic side and the seating capacity.

The first floor will slope somewhat, but will be arranged so that it can be utilized for such purposes where a level floor is desired.

Mr. Higginson told of three of the directors who had bought a portion of the land adjoining the new Music Hall so that there would be no objectionable neighbors. If the stockholders wished to buy the land for the cost and taxes they would have that privilege providing it was bought at a reasonable time.

At this point Mr. Frederick P. Bacon arose, and addressed the chair. Mr. Bacon said:

I have been asked by those whom I am representing to get some information from you, personally. I do not wish to intrude myself. They subscribed to this stock upon the strength of a letter which was published over your signature in the Boston daily papers at that time, saying that it would be possible to make this enterprise far more profitable if the building erected was put in the shape of an opera house, which could be used for a greater variety of purposes than a music hall.

They say that after subscriptions were subscribed for, a statement stated to be from yourself was published to the effect that there was no chance for financial return from the stock, and that people who subscribed for it should do so in the benefit of art, or the benefit of the elevation of musical interests in Boston.

They fail to be able to make these two statements agree, and I have yet to hear any statement from yourself or from any of the directors which would make these two statements agree. I do not ask it as a matter of course, but simply as business.

Why should you ask people to enter into this enterprise as a paying investment and promise or urge the building of an opera house and then withdraw your support and urge the building of a music hall?

Mr. Higginson then arose and said: Ladies and gentlemen, this is Mr. Bacon, who put out a circular some time ago soliciting your votes. I do not remember any letter published in 1893.

It seemed to me at that time quite possible to have a Music Hall and Opera House, and some of the subscribers wanted it. Advice was taken from the architects, such as we knew, and from people who had been busy with such matters, particularly from one man who had much to do with the building of the Boston Theatre. They all agreed that the building of the two together would be very difficult. We should have either one or the other. The hall would not be good for music and it would not be so good for opera. Also the cost of running a theatre and opera house would be much larger than that of a music hall, therefore the yearly expenses would be much larger.

Therefore it seemed to the directors unwise to try the double experiment. It was, as suggested by one gentleman, making a Dutch hoe and rake out of one instrument. In considering the question further, they have been confirmed in their belief.

Another objection to the opera house was that it would cost so much money that we could not do it. There was nobody who would take a lease of the opera house. The concert hall could be let for expenses and taxes and the return, whatever may come, would go to the stockholders.

That guarantees the stockholders against any loss. What has been said here that there would be no return on the investment was said simply as a matter of precaution. The present Music Hall has not paid at certain times. We are going to a new region, where it is to be hoped the audiences will follow, and it is hoped there will be some returns. It is a grave question, however, whether it will pay. The directors do not believe that a concert hall and opera house can be combined.

Mr. Bacon—Excuse me, Mr. Higginson, your remarks lead to one other question. You speak of architects advising this and that—may I ask you what class of architects have been consulted in this matter? How many architects?

Mr. Higginson—I don't remember.

Mr. Bacon—My reason for speaking in this way is this. At the time this enterprise was started, the statement was made to me that you desired a music hall and an opera house built. In my position then it was possible to know a great many people in musical circles. People wrote to me and came to me and asked me about the affair. They also contributed their money.

After they found that the plans were to be changed they could not sell their stock. I interviewed several prominent architects of Boston and New York who are familiar with the class of buildings contemplated — that is, an opera house and a music hall, and I found the greater part of them were entirely in favor of building an opera house rather than a music hall. Now, I naturally ask you (addressing the chair) whether you take the opinion of certain architects who may have no experience in building an opera house, or whether you take the opinion of people familiar with both sides of the case Why should this corporation take the chance of making a failure in building a music hall when it is practically possible to insure success in building an opera house.

Mr. Higginson—Music halls differ. The Carnegie Hall is not good for some; the New York Opera House is very bad for concerts, and just by luck the Philadelphia Theatre was made good. It is useless to go through a long list of them. It is a matter of opinion in regard to building a music hall.

Mr. Bacon—It seems unfortunate that the bulk of the subscriptions which I represent are small ones. I am representing people who will not come to you (addressing the chair), who dare not come to you. I do not mean to say you inspire them with fear. They feel, however, that you, individually, are controlling this affair.

Mr. Higginson—There are two ways of getting the news. One is by coming here and getting it, or listening to or getting the news from you (addressing Mr. Bacon). I am sure I always try to treat people civilly if they treat me civilly.

Mr. Bacon then left the hall, refusing to participate in the voting.

The following officers were elected by the stockholders for the ensuing year: President, Henry L. Higginson; secretary and treasurer, Charles E. Cotting; directors, Henry L. Higginson, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears, Charles E. Cotting and E. W. Hooper.

The chair appointed the following directors: Horace D. Chapin, William P. Blake and William Hooper.

Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, FEB. 15, 1899.

LEIPSIC IDEA

In Building Boston's New Music Hall.

Old Greek Theater Plan Has Been Abandoned.

Sloping Floor and Balcony All Way Round.

Col Higginson Answers Mr. Bacon's Inquiry.

Why Opera House and Music Hall Are Not Feasible.

Col Higginson presided at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the new Boston music hall, held at noon today in the Tremont building.

After the records of the previous meeting had been received and approved, Pres Higginson related what was being done about the plans for the new hall. He said that McKim, Mead & White, the architects, had been instructed to prepare a new set. The old Greek theater plan had been given up, because, among other reasons, that it would be largely an experiment, and might not fulfil acoustic requirements. The firm is now at work upon plans which follow, in the main, the Leipsic music hall. When they are sufficiently advanced they will be submitted for the association's approval, and, if satisfactory, the work of construction will then be entered upon. It is contemplated that the new hall will be longer, but narrower, than the old hall, with one balcony running clear around, and a second balcony at the back. The floor will be sloping, to allow those in the rear an unobstructed view of the stage. The new hall must be completed by April 1, 1900, the date when the purchasers of the old hall property will take possession of it. The seating capacity of the new hall will be about equal to that of the Winter st hall.

The report of the board of auditors certifying to the correctness of the association's accounts was received. These have already been published.

Col Higginson informed the meeting that three of the directors had purchased land adjoining or in the immediate vicinity of that on which the new hall is to be built. This step was taken by them, he said, to prevent the occupation of the land for uses which might operate disadvantageously for the objects for which the new hall was to be devoted. The near location of mechanical or manufacturing purposes would depreciate the value of new music hall. This land bought by these three gentlemen they were willing to dispose of to the association without any personal profit.

Mr Fred P. Bacon, former musical editor on a Boston newspaper, at this point arose and stated that he desired to make some inquiries as to the reasons which had induced the association to deviate from its first purpose of putting up a structure which could be used as a combined opera house and music hall. He said that several persons had subscribed for stock with the understanding that the investment would be pecuniarily a profitable one as well as being solely for the enhancement of art interests.

Mr Bacon said that, with the knowledge and consent of the management of his paper he had advocated the project as it was first broached, and many had been induced to invest on his advocacy of the scheme.

These, principally holders of a few shares, had since held him responsible for their participation in the affair. Mr Bacon spoke of a letter which Col Higginson had written in 1893, in which the duplex plan was spoken of.

Col Higginson answered that he could not at the moment recall the terms used in the letter referred to. It was tentative and was written before the association was formed. In the beginning he thought that the opera house and music hall plan would work. Subsequent investigation had convinced the directors that the thing could not be successfully managed.

It would be a boldly confident man, he said, who would assure returns on an investment of this kind. The architects didn't believe a structure could be built which would serve equally well for both purposes.

Mr Bacon thought the directors should have consulted architects who have made a specialty, as it were, in the building of structures of this kind, and not have allowed themselves to be governed by the ideas of one firm.

Col Higginson replied that the directors had taken the very course that Mr Bacon recommended. Other architects had been consulted. A consideration which had weight with the directors was that a lessee for an opera house could not be secured, while a music hall could be readily leased. All the income above expenses would go to the stockholders.

[illegible] was pro[illegible] with the proxies [illegible] holders holding in the aggregate n[illegible] shares. He did not vote on them, however, having left the meeting before the balloting for officers began.

Of the total of 3472 shares thus far issued, 1847 were voted in the unanimous election of directors and auditors for the ensuing year. These are Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hopper, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears and Charles E. Cotting, directors, and Horace D. Chapin, William P. Blake and William Hooper, auditors; Charles E. Cotton, clerk-treas

---

"This Country, with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

NEW MUSIC HALL

To Be Finished in a Year—Stockholders Meet.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the new Boston Music Hall was held at noon today in the Tremont building. H. L. Higginson called the gathering to order. Some 25 stockholders were present, among them being six ladies, representing 1847 shares out of a total of 3472. The report of Treasurer C. E. Cotting was presented as already published.

Mr. Higginson explained that the old plans for the hall had been given up as they were too costly and would have been in the nature of an experiment. Half a dozen plans had been worked over, but none really accepted. The idea most approved was to have something similar to the old hall.

The floor would have to be sloped. There would be one gallery clear around, and a second gallery at the far end.

The plans would soon be ready to submit to the stockholders. The seating capacity would be about the same as the present Music Hall, 2400, and the seats would be of about the same description as those now used. The new hall would have to be finished by April, 1900.

It was inquired if the sloping floor could have a false floor to be used when a level one was wanted, and if more room could not be given the seats than with those in the old hall to insure more comfort.

Mr. Higginson said they hoped so. He went on that the directors thought more land might be needed, and as it was particular to have desirable neighbors three of the directors had bought the adjacent land, paid for it, and would hold it subject to the wish of the corporation for a reasonable time.

F. P. Bacon asked for information for the benefit of certain parties he represented. It had been thought that a better financial return could be secured if the new hall combined the features of an opera house. He said Mr. Higginson stated in 1893 that the opera house idea would be supported, but later withdrew from it in favor of an out and out music hall. He wanted to know from Mr. Higginson how that was.

"Is that all, Mr. Bacon?" asked Mr. Higginson.

THAT WAS ALL.

"It is," answered Mr. Bacon.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Mr. Higginson, "this is Mr. Bacon who issued a circular to you." Mr. Higginson went on that the architects found the combination of a music hall and opera house could not be carried out with good effect and within a reasonable expense.

Mr. Bacon—"Let me ask what class of architects have been consulted in this matter? When this plan was proposed I was musical editor of the Herald, and believing the plan of an opera house and music hall combined would be carried through the Herald's influence was given to that idea, and quite a number of people were induced to interest themselves. Now they do not like the abandonment of the plan as it was first proposed."

Mr. Higginson said the directors were satisfied after a careful investigation that the combination was not desirable. He had heard of no objections except from Mr. Bacon.

Mr. Bacon—I represent a number of small stockholders who do not care to call on Mr. Higginson. They regard him as the controlling power in this movement, and they are afraid of him."

Mr. Higginson—"I should regret to think any stockholder was afraid to call on me. Any one calling courteously receives courteous treatment."

A call for Mr. Bacon's stock representation showed him as proxy for nine shares. The discussion was dropped and Mr. Bacon withdrew.

C. E. Cotting was re-elected clerk and treasurer.

H. L. Higginson, W. S. Bigelow, H. F. Sears, E. W. Hooper and C. E. Cotting were elected directors.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1899.

BOSTON'S MUSIC HALL.

Rather Lively Meeting of Its Stockholders Today —Outline of Proposed Building.

The annual meeting of the New Music Hall Association, which was held at Room 320 in the Tremont Building this noon, turned out an interesting few moments while Mr. Fred P. Bacon was assailing the attitude of Col. Henry L. Higginson and the Directors of the company in abandoning the opera house phase of the original building intentions. Mr. Bacon held the proxies for nine shares of the stock, and protested, for his proxies, that these latter "would not dare" to bring the matter of their dissatisfaction at the abandoning of the opera house idea.

Col. Higginson replied: "I have not heard of any dissatisfaction, and I think none of the stockholders would be afraid to meet me. There are two ways of getting the information you ask; one is by coming here, and the other is by coming to me courteously. A courteous man will receive courteous treatment."

Mr. Bacon shortly afterward left the meeting.

There were some 25 people present. Charles E. Cotting was re-elected Clerk and Treasurer. His report, already published, was read.

Col. Higginson explained the recent action of the special meeting, and again told of the change in the plans of the Directors, and the practical adoption of the present plan, subject to the approval of the stockholders. This plan contemplates a music hall pure and simple, like the present hall, but with a sloping floor. There is one gallery all around in the plan, and an upper gallery that may go only across the end of the hall. The hall is calculated to seat about 2400, the capacity of the present hall, with much the same pattern seats. As the hall must be ready by April, 1900, the plans will have to be submitted to the stockholders.

It was asked whether the sloping floor could be a false floor, so that a level floor could be made available, and Col. Higginson answered that he hoped it could.

Then uprose Mr. Bacon, saying, with apologies: "It is believed by some of your stockholders that better financial returns could be had if the features of an opera house and a music hall were combined in this new enterprise."

Mr. Bacon said that Col Higginson, in '93, had said the opera house idea would be supported, but that later he had withdrawn in favor of a music hall alone.

Col. Higginson's reply was a rebuke to those stockholders who regard the enterprise as a money-making scheme. Looking at the mere business probabilities, Col. Higginson said that the question of profit was extremely uncertain. "Some years, the present hall has paid and in some years it has not paid."

Some of the entertainments, like dinners, balls and the like, could not be held profitably in the new hall on account of the location uptown, and altogether it would be a foolish man who would predict financial success.

Said Mr. Bacon: "I was musical editor of a Boston paper when the shares were being subscribed, several years ago, and as such had some influence, which I used to get people to put their money into this scheme. A majority of those who were influenced in this way put their money in with the understanding that an opera house was to be erected, or at least a combination of music hall and opera house. I should like to ask, also, what class of architects has been consulted in regard to the plans. We hear that the architects have done or decided this or that as though they were in full charge. Has anybody except Messrs. McKim, Mead & White been consulted? I ask this because I am held responsible by the people whose money I influenced. I interviewed the prominent architects of Boston and New York, and found the most prominent favored the opera house rather than the music hall. I cannot find that McKim, Mead & White have had any experience in building opera houses. Perhaps it was not known, when this company took their op'nion in the matter, that there is a prominent firm of architects in New York that has made a specialty of building opera houses. The people I represent want to know why the company takes the chance of failure with a music hall when an opera house would be an assured success?"

Col. Higginson discussed the various halls and theatres in other cities where the Symphony has played, and then went on: "It was understood by a majority of the stockholders that the company was committed to neither one thing nor the other. I have heard no protest against their decision, nor any dissatisfaction with it."

"It is unfortunate," retorted Mr. Bacon, "that a majority of the stock is held in small blocks, by people who will not come to you, who do not dare to come to you, and who realize that the company is practically controlled by Col. Higginson."

The only business transacted was the election of officers for this year, the proxies being voted unanimously, the opposition not voting. There were 847 votes cast, all for President Henry L. Higginson, and for Directors Henry L. Higginson, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears, Edward W. Hooper and Charles E. Cotting. Mr. Cotting was re-elected Clerk and Treasurer, and President Higginson appointed as Auditors Horace D. Chapin, William P. Blake and William Hooper.

The New York Times

Illustrated Magazine Supplement.

FEBRUARY 19, 1899.

THE DEBUT OF LADY HALLE.

Lady Hallé, born Wilma Neruda, who is to make her début in this country in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its February tournée, comes from a family of musicians.

The father of Wilma, Josef Neruda, was organist of the Cathedral at Bruenn, and Wilma was born in this town March 29, 1839. When she was scarcely four years old she began to take lessons on the violin from her father. He sent her, in her sixth year, to Vienna, where she studied a year with Leopold Jansa.

With her elder sister, Amalie, she appeared in Vienna parlors in 1846, and in January of the next year she gave three public concerts, at the last of which Jenny Lind sang. About this time their brother Victor, a 'cello player, joined them.

She married the Swedish conductor and composer, Ludwig Norman, in 1864, and went with him to Stockholm. They were soon separated, and Norman died in 1885.

She continued to travel as a virtuoso, and visited Copenhagen, Leipsic, Bruenn, Frankfort, and Cologne. Especially pronounced was her success at Paris in 1868.

She won similar tributes in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Brussels. In 1869 she made London her home, and became a most prominent figure in concerts of every kind. She was heard in orchestral concerts, in recitals with Charles Hallé, whom she married in 1888, and in chamber concerts with Piatti, Reeves, Zerbini, and her brother Franz.

She also made many tours, going in 1874 and 1877 to Germany, in 1878 to Paris, in 1879 to Holland, in 1880 and 1881 to all the chief capitals of the Continent. While in South Africa in 1895 she had many curious adventures. On one occasion, over 1,000 Kafirs danced their war dances and sang in her honor.

Lady Halle, Violinist,
Who Will Make Her American Début This Week.

NING TRANSCRI

FEBRUARY 16, 1899

LADY HALLE IN BOSTON

The Distinguished Violinist Rehearses with the Symphony Orchestra—Her Remarkable Career

Lady Hallé, better known as Norman Neruda, the distinguished violinist, wife of the famous composer and director, Sir Charles Hallé, is in this city. She arrived in New York on the Etruria which should have made port on Saturday last at six o'clock, but owing to the tremendous storms and heavy seas was not docked until Tuesday at one o'clock. After remaining for one day in New York, Lady Hallé left there at five o'clock and arrived at the Park-square station a little after midnight, the train being an hour and a half late. She was accompanied by her maid, and was met at the station by Mr. F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which organization Lady Hallé makes her début in this country on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. The week following she goes on a tour with the orchestra, playing Monday night in Philadelphia, Tuesday night in Baltimore, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening in New York and Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Brooklyn, it being of course her début in all of these cities. It is perhaps worthy of comment, in this connection, that she is the third noted representative artist brought to this city the present season by the Symphony Orchestro, the others being Willy Burmester and Emil Sauer.

Lady Hallé kindly granted an interview at her apartments at the Parker House this afternoon after rehearsal with the orchestra at Music Hall, and chatted pleasantly about herself and her art. She anticipates much pleasure from her short sojourn in this city, which will terminate on Sunday afternoon, as, owing to her high social position in London, she brings letters of introduction to many Boston people. Although Lady Hallé does not lay claim to any such distinction, it is said that the title conferred on her husband was meant as a direct recognition of her services to art, and he was made the recipient of the compliment in order to avoid violating a rule not to confer a title directly on a woman.

Lady Hallé inherits her talents from a generation of musical ancestors, of whom the earliest known was Jakob Neruda, a native of Rossiez, near Prague, who died in 1732, leaving two sons, Johann Chrysostom and Johann Baptist. Both were accomplished performers and held important posts as Capellmeisters, the second being moreover a voluminous composer. Johann Baptist's two sons, Ludwig and Anton, were chamber musicians to the Elector of Dresden. Lady Hallé was born at Bruenn on March 29, 1839, and so early did her gifts assert themselves that before reaching the age of four she was studying the violin under the tuition of her father, Joseph Neruda, organist of the Cathedral of Bruenn. Her progress was so rapid that ere she had attained her sixth year it was deemed advisable to send her to Vienna, where she might have the advantage of instruction from Leopold Jansa, the director of music at the University. After one year's study little Wilma, assisted by her elder sister as pianist, made her first appearance in public. The Viennese public were amazed at the strength of her bow arm, her facility of execution, and with their natural enthusiasm lauded her gifts far and wide. This success encouraged Josef Neruda to undertake a concert tour with little Wilma, her sister and her brother Franz, as violoncellist. They journeyed through the chief cities of North Germany, Holland and Belgium, eventually reaching England.

Shortly afterwards the little lady appeared at a Philharmonic Society concert, playing De Beriot's Concerto in D with inevitable success. The family now migrated to Russia, where they had the misfortune to lose the violoncellist of the group. His place, however, was soon filled by another brother, and when the remaining sister joined the party as second violinist, the trio became a quartet. So cordial was their reception in Russia that they revisited that country annually during the next ten years, arousing more and more enthusiasm in proportion as they became more popular and their talents matured. Now came their appearance at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, and their trip to Denmark and Sweden. At Stockholm they appeared before the king, who presented Wilma with the gold medal for art and science, and appointed her chamber violinist to the court. It was at this time that she made the acquaintance of her future husband, Louis Norman, the director of the music at the Chapel Royal and conductor of the Opera and Philharmonic concerts at Stockholm. She was married shortly afterwards, and the following year the two sisters, with the assistance of Messrs. Danberd, Lindblad and Sodermann, founded a society for the performance of chamber music. Later still, Madam Norman-Neruda went to Paris, appearing at "les concerts populaires," then conducted by Pasdeloup, meeting with the accustomed tokens of admiration.

From there she went to London and made her reappearance in that city at a Philharmonic concert. Influence was brought to bear that induced Mme. Neruda to prolong her stay, and the following autumn the director of the famous London "Monday popular" concerts made the announcement that:) "Mme. Norman Neruda is engaged as principal violin at all the concerts before Christmas." On her first appearance in this capacity she Mendelssohn's quartet, op. 44 No. 1, and that by Haydn in B flat (op. 64, No. 5), and took part in Mozart's sonata in B flat for violin and piano. Since that time her name has been as intimately associated with this unique seris of concerts as those of Joachim and Piatti. Mme. Neruda then took up her abode in London and became closely identified with the concert life of Great Britain generally. She grew to be as great a favorite in the provinces as in London and abroad, and became so much the fashion that it is safe to attribute largely to her example the number of lady violinists who today may be found in every centre of the land.

In 1885 Mme. Neruda was left a widow and in 1888 she married the great musician whose name has so often figured with hers in musical entertainments. Lady Hallé accompanied her husband in 1890 to Australia where they were lionized to an extent that spoke as highly for the artistic appreciation as for the hospitality of their hosts and in 1895 they made together a concert tour of South Africa. Very soon after their return Sir Charles was taken suddenly ill, and breathed his last before his wife could reach his side.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1899.

BOSTON'S MUSIC HALL.

Rather Lively Meeting of Its Stockholders Yesterday—Outline of Proposed Building.

The annual meeting of the New Music Hall Association, which was held at Room 320 in the Tremont Building yesterday, turned out an interesting few moments while Mr. Fred P. Bacon was assailing the attitude of Col. Henry L. Higginson and the Directors of the company in abandoning the opera house phase of the original building intentions. Mr. Bacon held the proxies for nine shares of the stock, and protested, for his proxies, that these latter "would not dare" to bring the matter of their dissatisfaction at the abandoning of the opera house idea.

Col. Higginson replied: "I have not heard of any dissatisfaction, and I think none of the stockholders would be afraid to meet me. There are two ways of getting the information you ask; one is by coming here, and the other is by coming to me courteously. A courteous man will receive courteous treatment."

Mr. Bacon shortly afterward left the meeting.

There were some 25 people present. Charles E. Cotting was re-elected Clerk and Treasurer. His report, already published, was read.

Col. Higginson explained the recent action of the special meeting, and again told of the change in the plans of the Directors, and the practical adoption of the present plan, subject to the approval of the stockholders. This plan contemplates a music hall pure and simple, like the present hall, but with a sloping floor. There is one gallery all around in the plan, and an upper gallery that may go only across the end of the hall. The hall is calculated to seat about 2400, the capacity of the present hall, with much the same pattern seats. As the hall must be ready by April, 1900, the plans will have to be submitted to the stockholders.

It was asked whether the sloping floor could be a false floor, so that a level floor could be made available, and Col. Higginson answered that he hoped it could.

Then uprose Mr. Bacon, saying, with apologies: "It is believed by some of your stockholders that better financial returns could be had if the features of an opera house and a music hall were combined in this new enterprise."

Mr. Bacon said that Col Higginson, in '93, had said the opera house idea would be supported, but that later he had withdrawn in favor of a music hall alone.

Col. Higginson's reply was a rebuke to those stockholders who regard the enterprise as a money-making scheme. Looking at the mere business probabilities, Col. Higginson said that the question of profit was extremely uncertain. "Some years, the present hall has paid and in some years it has not paid."

Some of the entertainments, like dinners, balls and the like, could not be held profitably in the new hall on account of the location uptown, and altogether it would be a foolish man who would predict financial success.

Said Mr. Bacon: "I was musical editor of a Boston paper when the shares were being subscribed, several years ago, and as such had some influence, which I used to get people to put their money into this scheme. A majority of those who were influenced in this way put their money in with the understanding that an opera house was to be erected, or at least a combination of music hall and opera house. I should like to ask, also, what class of architects has been consulted in regard to the plans. We hear that the architects have done or decided this or that as though they were in full charge. Has anybody except Messrs. McKim, Mead & White been consulted? I ask this because I am held responsible by the people whose money I influenced. I interviewed the prominent architects of Boston and New York, and found the most prominent favored the opera house rather than the music hall. I cannot find that McKim, Mead & White have had any experience in building opera houses. Perhaps it was not known, when this company took their op'nion in the matter, that there is a prominent firm of architects in New York that has made a specialty of building opera houses. The people I represent want to know why the company takes the chance of failure with a music hall when an opera house would be an assured success?"

Col. Higginson discussed the various halls and theatres in other cities where the Symphony has played, and then went on: "It was understood by a majority of the stockholders that the company was committed to neither one thing nor the other. I have heard no protest against their decision, nor any dissatisfaction with it."

"It is unfortunate," retorted Mr. Bacon, "that a majority of the stock is held in small blocks, by people who will not come to you, who do not dare to come to you, and who realize that the company is practically controlled by Col. Higginson."

The only business transacted was the election of officers for this year, the proxies being voted unanimously, the opposition not voting. There were 847 votes cast, all for President Henry L. Higginson, and for Directors Henry L. Higginson, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears, Edward W. Hooper and Charles E. Cotting. Mr. Cotting was re-elected Clerk and Treasurer, and President Higginson appointed as Auditors Horace D. Chapin, William P. Blake and William Hooper.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1899.

BOSTON'S MUSIC HALL.

Rather Lively Meeting of Its Stockholders Today —Outline of Proposed Building.

The annual meeting of the New Music Hall Association, which was held at Room 320 in the Tremont Building this noon, turned out an interesting few moments while Mr. Fred P. Bacon was assailing the attitude of Col. Henry L. Higginson and the Directors of the company in abandoning the opera house phase of the original building intentions. Mr. Bacon held the proxies for nine shares of the stock, and protested, for his proxies, that these latter "would not dare" to bring the matter of their dissatisfaction at the abandoning of the opera house idea.

Col. Higginson replied: "I have not heard of any dissatisfaction, and I think none of the stockholders would be afraid to meet me. There are two ways of getting the information you ask; one is by coming here, and the other is by coming to me courteously. A courteous man will receive courteous treatment."

Mr. Bacon shortly afterward left the meeting.

There were some 25 people present. Charles E. Cotting was re-elected Clerk and Treasurer. His report, already published, was read.

Col. Higginson explained the recent action of the special meeting, and again told of the change in the plans of the Directors, and the practical adoption of the present plan, subject to the approval of the stockholders. This plan contemplates a music hall pure and simple, like the present hall, but with a sloping floor. There is one gallery all around in the plan, and an upper gallery that may go only across the end of the hall. The hall is calculated to seat about 2400, the capacity of the present hall, with much the same pattern seats. As the hall must be ready by April, 1930, the plans will have to be submitted to the stockholders.

It was asked whether the sloping floor could be a false floor, so that a level floor could be made available, and Col. Higginson answered that he hoped it could.

Then uprose Mr. Bacon, saying, with apologies: "It is believed by some of your stockholders that better financial returns could be had if the features of an opera house and a music hall were combined in this new enterprise."

Mr. Bacon said that Col Higginson, in '93, had said the opera house idea would be supported, but that later he had withdrawn in favor of a music hall alone.

Col. Higginson's reply was a rebuke to those stockholders who regard the enterprise as a money-making scheme. Looking at the mere business probabilities, Col. Higginson said that the question of profit was extremely uncertain. "Some years, the present hall has paid and in some years it has not paid."

Some of the entertainments, like dinners, balls and the like, could not be held profitably in the new hall on account of the location uptown, and altogether it would be a foolish man who would predict financial success.

Said Mr. Bacon: "I was musical editor of a Boston paper when the shares were being subscribed, several years ago, and as such had some influence, which I used to get people to put their money into this scheme. A majority of those who were influenced in this way put their money in with the understanding that an opera house was to be erected, or at least a combination of music hall and opera house. I should like to ask, also, what class of architects has been consulted in regard to the plans. We hear that the architects have done or decided this or that as though they were in full charge. Has anybody except Messrs. McKim, Mead & White been consulted? I ask this because I am held responsible by the people whose money I influenced. I interviewed the prominent architects of Boston and New York, and found the most prominent favored the opera house rather than the music hall. I cannot find that McKim, Mead & White have had any experience in building opera houses. Perhaps it was not known, when this company took their opinion in the matter, that there is a prominent firm of architects in New York that has made a specialty of building opera houses. The people I represent want to know why the company takes the chance of failure with a music hall when an opera house would be an assured success?"

Col. Higginson discussed the various halls and theatres in other cities where the Symphony has played, and then went on: "It was understood by a majority of the stockholders that the company was committed to neither one thing nor the other. I have heard no protest against their decision, nor any dissatisfaction with it."

"It is unfortunate," retorted Mr. Bacon, "that a majority of the stock is held in small blocks, by people who will not come to you, who do not dare to come to you, and who realize that the company is practically controlled by Col. Higginson."

The only business transacted was the election of officers for this year, the proxies being voted unanimously, the opposition not voting. There were 817 votes cast, all for President Henry L. Higginson, and for Directors Henry L. Higginson, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears, Edward W. Hooper and Charles E. Cotting. Mr. Cotting was re-elected Clerk and Treasurer, and President Higginson appointed as Auditors Horace D. Chapin, William P. Blake and William Hooper.

The New York Times

Illustrated Magazine Supplement.

FEBRUARY 19, 1899.

THE DEBUT OF LADY HALLE.

Lady Hallé, born Wilma Neruda, who is to make her début in this country in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its February tournée, comes from a family of musicians.

The father of Wilma, Josef Neruda, was organist of the Cathedral at Bruenn, and Wilma was born in this town March 29, 1839. When she was scarcely four years old she began to take lessons on the violin from her father. He sent her, in her sixth year, to Vienna, where she studied a year with Leopold Jansa.

With her elder sister, Amalie, she appeared in Vienna parlors in 1846, and in January of the next year she gave three public concerts, at the last of which Jenny Lind sang. About this time their brother Victor, a 'cello player, joined them.

She married the Swedish conductor and composer, Ludwig Norman, in 1864, and went with him to Stockholm. They were soon separated, and Norman died in 1885.

She continued to travel as a virtuoso, and visited Copenhagen, Leipsic, Bruenn, Frankfort, and Cologne. Especially pronounced was her success at Paris in 1868.

She won similar tributes in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Brussels. In 1869 she made London her home, and became a most prominent figure in concerts of every kind. She was heard in orchestral concerts, in recitals with Charles Hallé, whom she married in 1888, and in chamber concerts with Piatti, Reeves, Zerbini, and her brother Franz.

She also made many tours, going in 1874 and 1877 to Germany, in 1878 to Paris, in 1879 to Holland, in 1880 and 1881 to all the chief capitals of the Continent. While in South Africa in 1895 she had many curious adventures. On one occasion, over 1,000 Kafirs danced their war dances and sang in her honor.

Lady Halle, Violinist,

Who Will Make Her American Début This Week.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 16, 1899

LADY HALLE IN BOSTON

The Distinguished Violinist Rehearses with the Symphony Orchestra—Her Remarkable Career

Lady Hallé, better known as Norman Neruda, the distinguished violinist, wife of the famous composer and director, Sir Charles Hallé, is in this city. She arrived in New York on the Etruria, which should have made port on Saturday last at six o'clock, but owing to the tremendous storms and heavy seas was not docked until Tuesday at one o'clock. After remaining for one day in New York, Lady Hallé left there at five o'clock and arrived at the Park-square station a little after midnight, the train being an hour and a half late. She was accompanied by her maid, and was met at the station by Mr. F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which organization Lady Hallé makes her début in this country on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. The week following she goes on a tour with the orchestra, playing Monday night in Philadelphia, Tuesday night in Baltimore, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening in New York and Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Brooklyn, it being of course her début in all of these cities. It is perhaps worthy of comment, in this connection, that she is the third noted representative artist brought to this city the present season by the Symphony Orchestro, the others being Willy Burmester and Emil Sauer.

Lady Hallé kindly granted an interview at her apartments at the Parker House this afternoon after rehearsal with the orchestra at Music Hall, and chatted pleasantly about herself and her art. She anticipates much pleasure from her short sojourn in this city, which will terminate on Sunday afternoon, as, owing to her high social position in London, she brings letters of introduction to many Boston people. Although Lady Hallé does not lay claim to any such distinction, it is said that the title conferred on her husband was meant as a direct recognition of her services to art, and he was made the recipient of the compliment in order to avoid violating a rule not to confer a title directly on a woman.

Lady Hallé inherits her talents from a generation of musical ancestors, of whom the earliest known was Jakob Neruda, a native of Rossiez, near Prague, who died in 1732, leaving two sons, Johann Chrysostom and Johann Baptist. Both were accomplished performers and held important posts as Capellmeisters, the second being moreover a voluminous composer. Johann Baptist's two sons, Ludwig and Anton, were chamber musicians to the Elector of Dresden. Lady Hallé was born at Bruenn on March 29, 1839, and so early did her gifts assert themselves that before reaching the age of four she was studying the violin under the tuition of her father, Joseph Neruda, organist of the Cathedral of Bruenn. Her progress was so rapid that ere she had attained her sixth year it was deemed advisable to send her to Vienna, where she might have the advantage of instruction from Leopold Jansa, the director of music at the University. After one year's study little Wilma, assisted by her elder sister as pianist, made her first appearance in public. The Viennese public were amazed at the strength of her bow arm, her facility of execution, and with their natural enthusiasm lauded her gifts far and wide. This success encouraged Josef Neruda to undertake a concert tour with little Wilma, her sister and her brother Franz, as violoncellist. They journeyed through the chief cities of North Germany, Holland and Belgium, eventually reaching England.

Shortly afterwards the little lady appeared at a Philharmonic Society concert, playing De Beriot's Concerto in D with inevitable success. The family now migrated to Russia, where they had the misfortune to lose the violoncellist of the group. His place, however, was soon filled by another brother, and when the remaining sister joined the party as second violinist, the trio became a quartet. So cordial was their reception in Russia that they revisited that country annually during the next ten years, arousing more and more enthusiasm in proportion as they became more popular and their talents matured. Now came their appearance at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, and their trip to Denmark and Sweden. At Stockholm they appeared before the king, who presented Wilma with the gold medal for art and science, and appointed her chamber violinist to the court. It was at this time that she made the acquaintance of her future husband, Louis Norman, the director of the music at the Chapel Royal and conductor of the Opera and Philharmonic concerts at Stockholm. She was married shortly afterwards, and the following year the two sisters, with the assistance of Messrs. Danberd, Lindblad and Sodermann, founded a society for the performance of chamber music. Later still, Madam Norman-Neruda went to Paris, appearing at "les concerts populaires," then conducted by Pasdeloup, meeting with the accustomed tokens of admiration.

From there she went to London and made her reappearance in that city at a Philharmonic concert. Influence was brought to bear that induced Mme. Neruda to prolong her stay, and the following autumn the director of the famous London "Monday popular" concerts made the announcement that:) "Mme. Norman Neruda is engaged as principal violin at all the concerts before Christmas." On her first appearance in this capacity she Mendelssohn's quartet, op. 44 No. 1, and that by Haydn in B flat (op. 64, No. 5), and took part in Mozart's sonata in B flat for violin and piano. Since that time her name has been as intimately associated with this unique seris of concerts as those of Joachim and Piatti. Mme. Neruda then took up her abode in London and became closely identified with the concert life of Great Britain generally. She grew to be as great a favorite in the provinces as in London and abroad, and became so much the fashion that it is safe to attribute largely to her example the number of lady violinists who today may be found in every centre of the land.

In 1885 Mme. Neruda was left a widow and in 1888 she married the great musician whose name has so often figured with hers in musical entertainments. Lady Hallé accompanied her husband in 1890 to Australia where they were lionized to an extent that spoke as highly for the artistic appreciation as for the hospitality of their hosts and in 1895 they made together a concert tour of South Africa. Very soon after their return Sir Charles was taken suddenly ill, and breathed his last before his wife could reach his side.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1899.

BOSTON'S MUSIC HALL.

Rather Lively Meeting of Its Stockholders Yesterday—Outline of Proposed Building.

The annual meeting of the New Music Hall Association, which was held at Room 320 in the Tremont Building yesterday, turned out an interesting few moments while Mr. Fred P. Bacon was assailing the attitude of Col. Henry L. Higginson and the Directors of the company in abandoning the opera house phase of the original building intentions. Mr. Bacon held the proxies for nine shares of the stock, and protested, for his proxies, that these latter "would not dare" to bring the matter of their dissatisfaction at the abandoning of the opera house idea.

Col. Higginson replied: "I have not heard of any dissatisfaction, and I think none of the stockholders would be afraid to meet me. There are two ways of getting the information you ask; one is by coming here, and the other is by coming to me courteously. A courteous man will receive courteous treatment."

Mr. Bacon shortly afterward left the meeting.

There were some 25 people present. Charles E. Cotting was re-elected Clerk and Treasurer. His report, already published, was read.

Col. Higginson explained the recent action of the special meeting, and again told of the change in the plans of the Directors, and the practical adoption of the present plan, subject to the approval of the stockholders. This plan contemplates a music hall pure and simple, like the present hall, but with a sloping floor. There is one gallery all around in the plan, and an upper gallery that may go only across the end of the hall. The hall is calculated to seat about 2400, the capacity of the present hall, with much the same pattern seats. As the hall must be ready by April, 1930, the plans will have to be submitted to the stockholders.

It was asked whether the sloping floor could be a false floor, so that a level floor could be made available, and Col. Higginson answered that he hoped it could.

Then uprose Mr. Bacon, saying, with apologies: "It is believed by some of your stockholders that better financial returns could be had if the features of an opera house and a music hall were combined in this new enterprise."

Mr. Bacon said that Col Higginson, in '93, had said the opera house idea would be supported, but that later he had withdrawn in favor of a music hall alone.

Col. Higginson's reply was a rebuke to those stockholders who regard the enterprise as a money-making scheme. Looking at the mere business probabilities, Col. Higginson said that the question of profit was extremely uncertain. "Some years, the present hall has paid and in some years it has not paid."

Some of the entertainments, like dinners, balls and the like, could not be held profitably in the new hall on account of the location uptown, and altogether it would be a foolish man who would predict financial success.

Said Mr. Bacon: "I was musical editor of a Boston paper when the shares were being subscribed, several years ago, and as such had some influence, which I used to get people to put their money into this scheme. A majority of those who were influenced in this way put their money in with the understanding that an opera house was to be erected, or at least a combination of music hall and opera house. I should like to ask, also, what class of architects has been consulted in regard to the plans. We hear that the architects have done or decided this or that as though they were in full charge. Has anybody except Messrs. McKim, Mead & White been consulted? I ask this because I am held responsible by the people whose money I influenced. I interviewed the prominent architects of Boston and New York, and found the most prominent favored the opera house rather than the music hall. I cannot find that McKim, Mead & White have had any experience in building opera houses. Perhaps it was not known, when this company took their opinion in the matter, that there is a prominent firm of architects in New York that has made a specialty of building opera houses. The people I represent want to know why the company takes the chance of failure with a music hall when an opera house would be an assured success?"

Col. Higginson discussed the various halls and theatres in other cities where the Symphony has played, and then went on: "It was understood by a majority of the stockholders that the company was committed to neither one thing nor the other. I have heard no protest against their decision, nor any dissatisfaction with it."

"It is unfortunate," retorted Mr. Bacon, "that a majority of the stock is held in small blocks, by people who will not come to you, who do not dare to come to you, and who realize that the company is practically controlled by Col. Higginson."

The only business transacted was the election of officers for this year, the proxies being voted unanimously, the opposition not voting. There were 847 votes cast, all for President Henry L. Higginson, and for Directors Henry L. Higginson, William S. Bigelow, Henry F. Sears, Edward W. Hooper and Charles E. Cotting. Mr. Cotting was re-elected Clerk and Treasurer, and President Higginson appointed as Auditors Horace D. Chapin, William P. Blake and William Hooper.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifteenth symphony concert in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Bruckner: Symphony No. 4, in E-flat major, "Romantische."
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 83.
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.
Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the pianist.

Bruckner is a composer of whom the average theatre-goer knows little. He had a small if enthusiastic party of sworn admirers in Vienna during the latter half of his lifetime; but never attained to anything that could justly be called popularity. Perhaps he owed his prominence in the eyes of the Viennese public more to the polemical attitude of his adherents than to his music itself; for the "Brucknerianer" were determined "anti-Brahmsianer"—which antagonism the "Brahmsianer" returned with interest—and the production of a new work by Bruckner was likely as not to turn the concert-hall into a battlefield. The public at large, however, cared more for the row than for the music.

Bruckner's peculiarity as a composer was his standing as a sort of middle term, as a tertium quid, between Wagnerianism and classicism. He was a fervid admirer of the Bayreuth master, while apparently rejecting some of his theories; he insensibly appropriated a good deal of Wagner's style—his cut of melody and harmonic habits—and applied this style to writing in pretty strict traditional forms, and that severely logical development and working out which belonged to them. That Wagner's peculiar style was essentially incompatible with the spirit of these forms does not seem to have occurred to him. If we mistake not, all that had been heard of Bruckner here before this concert was his seventh symphony in E major, which was given under Mr. Gericke in 1887; few of either public or critics could make much out of it; it was received with something akin to horror!

But the "Romantic" symphony given last Saturday seems a very different work. The first three movements are both interesting and impressive, full of power and beauty. About the fitness of the title, "Romantic," there may be some doubts; what of romanticism there is in the work is, at all events, a very mild article compared with what Berlioz and Wagner, let alone the modern Russians, have taught us to accept as romantic; it even pales before the romanticism of Mendelssohn and Schumann; but there is no need of quibbling about titles; if the spirit of the work seemed romantic to the composer, that should be enough. To us the symphony—that is, in its first three movements—is infinitely welcome in these days of ultra-romanticism and unbridled strenuousness, of startling effects and dramatic feverishness, as a sanely logical piece of musical development, based upon thematic material of rare beauty, and carried through with the hand of a master. It is far removed as possible from mere "Kapellmeister-Musik"; that little something in style and harmony which Bruckner caught from Wagner gives it an unmistakably modern air, while the composer wears his classic symphonic garb with freedom and grace, as to the manner born. The music reflects a genial, warmly feeling, beauty-loving soul and, what is more, a distinct individuality. One finds it hard to account for the legend that "Bruckner had no sense for beauty," for what strikes you at once in some of the most strongly emotional moments in this symphony is their purely musical beauty. Of the last movement, however, we can only say that we can find nothing in it; it seems like the disjecta membra of music, without hang-together or consistent meaning. The symphony was admirably played, though rather coldly received by the audience. Was it caviare to the general?

Brahms's B-flat concerto strikes one more and more as a great work of true genius. If it have a fault, it is that it hardly fulfils one of the first requirements of a concerto: that is, to show off the performer. Perhaps Brahms had too little sympathy with display of any sort, too little comprehension of what it meant, to write an impeccable concerto; he took himself and his music too seriously, too grimly, for that. The pianoforte part in this concerto is enormously, almost inordinately difficult technically, but it is not in the least showy; the pianist who demands something more than fine music to play will inevitably find it rather thankless. To the pianist, on the other hand, who asks for nothing more than intrinsically great and beautiful music to play, this work is as noble a task as can be found in the modern literature of the instrument. Miss aus der Ohe played it admirably indeed, especially the first three movements. Her profound and keen musical sense, her warm, generous nature, her quantity of being—not to mention her enormous technique—well fit her for doing full justice to the mighty work. Perhaps she took the music just a thought too reverently, and held herself in too cautiously; especially in the last movement we felt that she might have let herself go more unreservedly in the direction of brilliance and dash. But hers was profound, thoughtful, soulful playing; well rounded in conception, strong and clear in execution; it was all on a grand, heroic scale, with an exquisite touch of poetry at the right moments. Miss aus der Ohe impresses one more and more as a true artist of very high rank; she is eminently one of the great ones.

Beethoven's "Leonore" was wonderfully played, in a word, to perfection; the trumpet solo behind the stage was given with more effect than we have heard it since the days of old Heinicke—and he, poor man, only played a cornet! Indeed it was, accent for accent, stringendo for stringendo, Heinicke's rendering of the passage, as the latter lies in our memory; just what one imagines lay in Beethoven's mind when he wrote it.

The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," opus 81; Spohr, concerto for violin, No. 8, in A minor, "Gesangszene," opus 47; d'Indy, "Istar" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55. Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda) will be the solo violinist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 20, 1899.

Schumann in the Symphony Concert—Lady Halle's Debut.

The concert of Saturday began innocently enough with Schumann's overture to "Genovena." The subject is first cousin to "Euryanthe," and if anything were needed to emphasize the lack of dramatic force or theatrical effect in Schumann, the comparison of Weber's treatment of the subject with the subjective style of "Genoveva" would do it.

The overture is decidedly the best portion of the work, yet it pales before the power of "Euryanthe" overture. The diminished ninth chords placed in vivid contrast with a most delicate violin passage seem to indicate a combat between good and evil at the very outset, and the Coda is a very well arranged climax, while the horn passages sufficiently indicate the sylvan character of the subject, but the bold touches of a Weber are not in the work, much as one may admire its beauties. The performance was an admirable one.

Now followed Lady Halle, greatest of female violinists, with a very fine performance of a very conventional work, Spohr's Concerto—"In modo d'una Scena Cantante." At first one was inclined to think that the celebrated violinist had underrated her audience, but the fact that she made her rentree in Vienna, in 1880, with this same work, seems to indicate that she admires the composition.

If ever there was an example of musical sugar-water, it is to be found in this violin concerto which apes the effects of the operatic "star." Ten measures of the preluding of Bruch's G minor concerto would sink the long-drawn-out recitative of this composition into oblivion. It prolixity is exasperating; never was a composer so long in saying nothing! The mountain after heavy labor brings forth the tiniest of mouselets!

But to chafe against the work is not necessary to animadvert upon its performance. Lady Halle proved that she still stands among violinists as Clara Schumann stood, even in her ripest years, among pianists. It is long ago since a great musician gave her the title of "die Geigenfee" ("the violin fairy"), and the term may still apply, for fairies never grow old. The player who charmed Hanslick in 1846 (she was then a little girl named Wilhelmine Neruda) can still charm every auditor, as was thoroughly proven by more than a half-dozen recalls after the performance of the pallid work.

Lady Halle has not a heavy tone, although she gave some broad passages upon the G string, but her intonation is perfect, her surety inspiring, her double-stopping clean and finely balanced. We hope that Boston may have the opportunity of hearing her in some nobler composition, for it is difficult to dissociate the strength of the artist from the weakness of the concerto.

After this excess of conventionality the programme swept to the other extreme and presented a set of symphonic distortions (called, however—"Symphonic Variations"), by Vincent d'Indy, upon an ancient Assyrian subject—"Istar." The Assyrians are long since dust, but "the evil that men do lives after them," and they left enough poetry to inspire this Gallic Wagnerette to commit his discords. Istar is a sort of female Orpheus who goes to the infernal regions to rescue a male Euridice—the old Nature-myth in a new form; at the different gates the warders despoil her, the first taking her tiara, the second her earrings, the third her necklace, until finally the last takes even the veil which clothes her, until, as the programme-book in a Walt Whitman burst of enthusiasm informs us—"she stands forth in the full splendor of nudity."

We could not quite follow this at a first hearing; we heard her lose a trombone and then a tuba, and then a few other instruments, but the work was to us arrayed in the full splendor of emptiness at the beginning as at the end. We were reminded of the game of younger days when we sang "John Brown's Body," chopping off one syllable at a time until nothing was left. To get the true effect of variations this composition must be played through backwards!

Wagner is the Loreley who is tempting all these talented moderns to shipwreck upon the rocks;

Und das hat mit seinem singen
Der Bayreuther gethan.

Richard Strauss, Bruckner, d'Indy, are all good musicians who have left the highway of art to scratch through the brambles in the hope that what Wagner did gloriously in opera may in some way be done also in symphony, the result being only unrest and ugliness. Even at a single hearing one can recognize d'Indy's mastery of the modern orchestra in a degree probably beyond any Frenchman except St. Saens; one must acknowledge too great a degree of originality, something close akin to genius, but the result is not art, it is rather an exhibition of power and skill. As regards giving pleasure to the auditor that has long since dropped out of the scheme.

After this Mr. Gericke washed our ears out thoroughly with Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony." This was the work with which the true Beethoven first revealed himself, the symphony which first really established the Scherzo (for the "Scherzo" of the second symphony clings closely to the style of a minuet) and the first full application of symphonic variations to a finale; a really "epoch-making" work.

It received a superb performance. That curious bit of iconoclasm, the entrance of the horn in the tonic against the violins in the dominant harmony, was toned down by forcing the strings to an inaudible pianissimo; the Funeral March was taken at just the right tempo, not too slow, and the oboe and the violoncello distinguished themselves in their prominent work. The final sobs of the melody, at the close of the march, were exquisitely given. The horn trio also comes in for praise, for it was given with excellent balance and shading. When one bears in mind that this was composed for the wald-horn, the horn without keys, one must still wonder at the ingenuity which brought forth such rich melody and harmony on an instrument which could not give a complete scale.

One always longs for a touch of trombones in the finale of this heroic work, but the trombones had not yet entered the symphonic orchestra (Beethoven first introduced them in his fifth symphony) and the trumpets were not a much-used instrument in the composer's time; therefore the military scoring is not very prominent in the work.

The capricious variations were very daintily performed. Here everything was tangible and clear, for Beethoven did not, as M. d'Indy, shatter the old saying—"Variatio Delectat."

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1899

LADY HALLE.

Her First Appearance in America at the Symphony Concert Last Light—D'Indy's "Istar" Played Here for the First Time.

The program of the 16th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, last night in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture to "Genoveva"............Schumann
Concerto for violin, No. 8, in A minor.
"Scena cantante," op. 47...............Spohr
Lady Hallé.
Symphonic variations, "Istar," op. 42..
Vincent d'Indy
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".........Beethoven

"Istar" is the work of an eminently serious Frenchman. In search of a subject to inspire his orchestral fancy he went back to one of the two mythological Assyrian poems that have come down to us intact—the descent of Istar into Hades. It might be an agreeable pastime to dilate on the development of solar warships, but if you wish to read the poem, I refer you to Lenormant's books and the Sar's novel "Istar," a story of French provincial life in which the old legend is introduced curiously.

D'Indy, truly, hit on an original idea. He gives the variations before the theme, and, as one bilious critic put it in Paris, when the theme is given out in full and in unison and octaves "you find that it has no likeness to any one of the variations." This is hardly true. (The same writer insists that Istar went to the abode of the dead in search of eau de vie instead of eaux de la vie.)

Istar, according to the legend, went to Hades, clad chiefly in jewelry. There were seven gates; at each gate a warder; they in turn stripped her of tiara, earrings, necklaces, breast jewels, girdle, rings from hands and feet, the last veil. There is a variation for each stripping, and when, as Mr. Apthorp says in the program-book, "she stands forth in the full splendor of nudity," the theme is heard fortissimo.

I should like to see a panorama or a series of living pictures with this music. For the music is necessarily panoramic. Such exhibitions may be possible in the new hall.

The work, however, is one of much musical interest in harmonic and orchestral treatment. D'Indy's melodic vein never seemed to me a rich one; but he is thoughtful, daring, and sincere. There are tone pictures in "Istar" of true and surprising beauty; there are ravishing harmonic progressions; but I should like to be better acquainted with the work, which, by the way, is of exceeding difficulty in performance. It was played last night with great care and with brilliant effect. The apparition of the complete theme is clothed with the richest, the most gorgeous sonorousness, just when the beauty of Istar is revealed in full; and the effect was irresistible.

The Genoveva overture was to me dry and scrappy, inherent faults which conductor and players tried vainly to remedy. The Eroica was finely read and, on the whole, effectively played.

* * *

Lady Hallé, known still to many as Norman-Neruda, made her first appearance in America last night. She had honored South Africa and Australia before she crossed the North Atlantic.

She is a most welcome visitor. The concerto is old-fashioned and in certain ways her playing is old-fashioned or traditional, as in ending a piano phrase with a sforzato on the final note, a habit that is disturbing. Her playing is old-fashioned also in the best sense. Her tone is small, but remarkably fine, and it is warm and penetrating. Her bowing—but why talk of the details of her technic, which has been praised by the best judges for many years? It is more to the point to say that she plays in most womanly manner. She does not ape man's strength, she does not assume Ercles' vein. A true woman uses the violin most skilfully to express a woman's emotions. There are tender, caressing appeals, there is the revelation of simplicity, trust, affection—and all this in the sugar-sweet old-fashioned music of Spohr. Her performance was one of singular individuality, and even the most hardened concert goer hearing her for the first time, experienced a new sensation. Although the music played by another might have bored him, as played by her it put him in emotional and reminiscent mood.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 19, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 16th in this season's series of symphony concerts was given in Music hall last evening and the audience was even larger than usual. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Genoveva," op 81.Robert Schumann
Concerto for violin, No 8, in A minor,
"Scena cantante," op 47.........Louis Spohr
Symphonic variations, "Istar," op 42,....
Vincent d'Indy
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica."
Op 55 ....Ludwig van Beethoven

The soloist was Lady Halle, who, although long well and favorably known here by reputation, had not before played in Boston. Lady Halle is regarded in England, where she has been prominent in musical circles for nearly half a century, as foremost among women violinists. Whether as Wilma Neruda, or Mme Norman-Neruda, or Lady Halle, there has been no time during the last generation that her name has not been spoken with respect and admiration. She is now 60 years of age, and during her long career as a virtuoso she has played in every country of Europe, and her tours abroad have included Australia and South Africa. It is surprising that she has not before visited America.

The symphony audiences received her with great cordiality, and applauded her playing with sincere enthusiasm. Only words of kindest praise can be written regarding her performance of Spohr's showily brilliant concerto. She gave the work a thoroughly intelligent reading and, technically an absolutely correct interpretation. She is gracefully dignified in manner and bearing, and her playing is utterly devoid of the ostentatious display so often associated with musical genius. As a virtuoso she is not lacking in brilliancy, and poetic temperament is evident, but her playing is more interesting for refinement of technique and classic purity of tone than for appealing sentiment, impassioned fire or other magnetic quality. She is an artist deserving of the utmost respect, and the warmth of her reception Friday afternoon and evening was gratifying evidence of the symphony audiences' consideration and intelligent appreciation.

The novelty played by the orchestra was Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." It is a symphonic poem based upon parts of the sixth canto of the old Assyrian epic, "Izdubar." The seven variations are intended to represent the seven stages of Istar's being disrobed at the gates of the "immutable land," and a finely attuned imagination can have no difficulty in appreciating the poetic pictures suggested by the composer. The work is richly scored and is brilliant with high colored orchestral ornamentations of the modern school. It is both interesting and enjoyable, and the splendid interpretation given by the orchestra last evening made the composition a notable feature of the concert.

The Schumann "Genoveva" overture is a scholarly and dignified work, but it is not especially entertaining, and there is no occasion for surprise that it does not more often find a place on a modern concert program. Conductor Gericke can scarcely be too warmly praised for his superb reading of Beethoven's grand symphony. It can be said, without hesitation, that this masterpiece had never received a more satisfactory performance from the Boston symphony orchestra.

There will be no symphony concert this week, as the orchestra will be away from Boston. The program announced for the next concert is: Symphony, "La Chasse," Haydn; "Bourree Fantasque," Chabrier; symphony No. 2, Brahms.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Appearance in America of Lady Halle (Norman Neruda), the Eminent English Violiniste.

The sixteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last evening, was of especial interest, in that it introduced to a Boston audience for the first time Lady Halle (Norman Neruda). She has long been known as one of the greatest of violinistes and has for may years been chiefly identified with English musical life.

She comes to America apparently past meridian of life, but that she is still a great artiste there is not the least question. She chose for her first appearance Spohr's concerto No. 8, in A minor, a work that, while not offering the greatest amount of technical difficulty to the present day violinist, still calls for a great amount of artistic skill, especially in sustained cantabile.

Lady Halle plays with a singularly beautiful tone, not, however, very strong, but her intonation is in all respects absolutely true and her phrasing always clear and logical. Her playing in general is of the thoughtful, unassuming kind, rather than any way sensational or tricky.

The concerto received an almost ideal performance, and Lady Halle received an immense ovation, over a half dozen recalls being in order. She must be gratified exceedingly at the success of her first American appearance.

The orchestral selections were Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, a new work entitled "Symphonic variations" Istar, by D'Indy, a French writer of the latter-day school, and Beethoven's third symphony.

D'Indy's composition, like many another of its kind, is rather unintelligible at a first hearing, leaving everything to the imagination. It is brilliantly scored, and the performance was well received. The orchestra was as admirable as ever.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CV., NO. 50.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

New Variations Puzzle the People Who Hear Them.

The Story of Istar Told in Musical Numbers—Novel Features Admirably Portrayed—Lady Halle, the Soloist, Received with Great Cordiality by the Audience.

The programme for the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture, "Genoveva"..............Schumann
Concerto for violin, No. 8, in A minor...Spohr
Symphonic Variations, "Istar"..Vincent d'Indy
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"........Beethoven

The soloist was Lady Halle.

The Symphonic Variations were new to Boston. They deal with an episode in the sixth canto of the ancient Assyrian epic, "Izdubar." Istar, the daughter of Sin, goes toward the seven-gated abode of the dead. At the first gate the warder deprives her of her tiara; at the second, the warder takes the pendants from her ears; at the third, she is deprived of her necklace of precious stones; at the fourth, the jewels that adorn her breast are taken from her; at the sixth, the rings are taken from her ankles and from her hands, and at the seventh, the last veil that covers her body is taken from her and she stands nude. Each of the variations represents one of these seven stages. That music can in any way or in any sense portray these things, it would be absurd to debate. Even with the description given, it is not easy by the most severe stretch of the imagination to connect the text and the music.

The score is in the extreme modern vein in regard to themes, harmonies and orchestration. Everything in it is so strange and so vague, the color is so peculiarly bizarre and the treatment is of such curious originality that one is puzzled, on a single hearing, to know what to think of the work. Unlike most of the extravagant music of its kind that the modern school has produced, it does not antagonize the listener who hears it for the first time. It has a certain wild grace, a logical self-consistency and an appealing intensity of emotionality that both attract and interest. There is also a picturesqueness of effect that is strikingly impressive. Many of the instrumental combinations are of rare and decided beauty. On the other hand, there are daring harmonic devices that set the teeth on edge. A second hearing would undoubtedly reveal charms that escape one on the first.

Much stress has been laid on the composer's complete succumbing to the influence of Wagner, but in this work there is nothing that suggests him, except one or two moments in which there is a direct bit of plagiarizing from "Die Meistersinger." Otherwise, Wagner in his most wayward mood is lucidity itself, compared with this example of d'Indy. Still, the work seems to have something in it that warrants a desire for a better acquaintance with it, and it is to be hoped that it may be given again to the furthering of that end. It was beautifully played and with a fine appreciation of its remarkable richness and originality of tone color.

Mr. Gericke gave a brilliant interpretation of the "Genoveva" overture. His reading of the symphony was large and noble. He was particularly felicitous in his tempi. The funeral march was not dragged, and a stirring vivacity was given to the scherzo. There was no attempt at modernizing the work nor at finding new effects. The performance was splendid in its clearness and brilliancy.

Lady Halle was received with great cordiality. Her playing of the graceful and melodious Spohr concerto was delightful in its refined intelligence, its delicacy of style and its deep artistic feeling. She has a small tone, but it is clear, round and pure. Her intonation is faultless; her technique ample and of exquisite finish; her bowing is large and free; her phrasing perfect, and her musical feeling irreproachable. Nor is she lacking in warmth, tenderness and fire. No deeper and keener sympathy with the composer could be desired than was that with which Lady Halle performed this work. She fully sustained the high reputation which preceded her hither, and proved to be an artist of the first rank in that broad, simple and undemonstrative style in which she is so thoroughly and so fascinatingly at home. Her success with her audience was immediate and complete. She was tremendously applauded, and was recalled eight times with an enthusiasm that was both excited and exciting.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next performance is: Symphony, "La Chasse," Haydn, first time; "Bourree Fantasque," Chabrier, first time; Symphony No. 2, Brahms.

Lady Halle created even more of a furor than was expected upon her first appearance in America at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon. For a day audience, and the majority women, such a demonstration was unusual in its fervor. Lady Halle was recalled six times at the end of her masterly rendering of Spohr's concerto. Even the first violins, who do not warm up except on great occasions, let their enthusiasm have full scope, and followed the lady into the artist's room to personally express their delight over her exquisite art. The English violinist was becomingly gowned in clinging black silk, heavily embroidered in black, a bunch of violets the only touch of color in the costume. Her brown hair was worn crimped low on her forehead after the English fashion. Lady Halle is not a handsome woman by any means, and she is no longer young, but she has a [illegible] interesting face, full of intelligence and virility, and her high breeding is unmistakable in appearance and [illegible]. In the great audience which [illegible] the hall were the Hon. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, the Rev. Fr. Bodfish, Mr. and Mrs. J. Livingston Grandin, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Mrs. William Gericke and her mother, Mrs. Hall Curtis, with her daughter, Mrs. Robert C. Heaton, Mrs. James H. Blake, Mrs. Charles Faulkner and her daughter, Col. and Mrs. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. George Armstrong, Mr. and Mrs. Zerrahn, Mr. Henry Wainwright, the Rev. J. W. Austin, Dr. Bigelow, Mrs. William Whitman and Miss Whitman, Mr. A. Parker Brown, Mr. aud Mrs. Lang, the Rev. E. R. Shippen, Mrs. John Osborn, Mrs. W. W. Blackmar and Miss Brewer, Mrs. J. W. Kenney and Miss Kenney, Miss Bullard, Miss Sturgis, Frau Flamme, Mrs. William Lindsey, Mrs. R. M. Field, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Pratt, Miss Harriet Shaw and Mr. and Mrs. Grew. Last night Lady Halle had another enormous audience and an even warmer reception.

Lady Halle has captured Boston with her interesting personality, and since seeing her it is easy to understand the hold Norman Neruda has on the London public. She was truly a pathetic picture as, simply dressed in mourning, she stood there, at the Symphony rehearsal, and every woman's heart there went out to her, from that great audience, in the warmest manifestation of applause.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the seventeenth symphony concert was:

Overture, "Genoveva," op. 81..Schumann
Concerto for violin, No. 8, A minor, op. 47 ....Spohr
Symphonic ariations, "Istar," op. 42 D'Indy
Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica," op. 55 Beethoven

Soloist—Lady Halle.

The interest of the concert naturally centered on the soloist, whose work aroused unusual interest in the audience, and it would be difficult to exactly explain the reason why. Lady Halle cannot be classed with the great violinists, but her playing is very charming. The violin is reticent under her gentle touch; it never pours forth its full soul, but it sings in the neatest, daintiest and prettiest manner, in a manner that would be fully satisfying in a small room, but loses some of its more amiable qualities in a large hall. It is careful, finished, intelligent work, always graceful, and it holds the attention as a sweet voice will hold it, indifferent to the words spoken. This is not great, but it is fascinating art, with a certain old-fashioned quaintness in its graciousness. There is a certain formality in its friendliness, for it is always on its good behavior; it instinctively obeys all the rules of good breeding and is more attractive because of the formal little restraints that it places on itself. It is impossible to forget the sex of the artist in her work; it is womanly playing, tactful, daintily finished and always appealing. It is the best of its kind and the kind is good, if not the highest, art. It was the species of art that directly appealed to the audience, and to thunderous applause Lady Halle was recalled many times to bow her acknowledgements.

The d'Indy symphonic variations were a pleasant surprise; an explanatory program naturally accompanied them, but they were interesting in themselves as music. The work is weird, but the weirdness is not produced in the modern method by leaving out ideas, for the motive is easily followed, and the orchestral setting is original and of the most effective kind. It is a brilliant piece of tone color and under Mr. Gericke's sympathetic reading its merits were brought out in full relief.

There will be no public rehearsal and no concert next week.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1899.

The most important musical incident of the week, and one of the most important of the whole season, was the debut of Mme. Norman Neruda—Lady Halle—whom well-won fame has long placed at the head of women violinists. This entrance was effected in Spohr's eighth concerto, at the sixteenth Symphony rehearsal, followed by the regular reappearance at the concert. It is now many years since we used to hear Mme. Neruda in the great concerts of London, when she was distinguished for the delicate grace, the womanly softness, the fine penetration and the quiet expressiveness of her young artist's style. Now that years have passed over her, bringing joys, honors, promotions, losses and griefs, we find that style ripened into perfect beauty and warmed by an unspeakable tenderness. Yet it has vitality, also, quick spirit, and a simple but searching strength. The concerto she chose was written by Spohr to please the Italian taste of his time, and its three connected movements take the form of a recitative, an air and a cavatina. Indeed, it has been known as "the dramatic scene." From the first long sustained notes so slender and filmy that one might almost doubt whether his ears were not deceiving him and he were but imagining a sound, to the broad, firm, animated and stirring phrases of the finale, Mme. Neruda held her audience as by a fairy spell, so intent was the silence, and even the rehearsal hearers recalled her eight times. Masculine force and fullness of volume she has not—nor does she need it; for within the range of her perfect purity of tone and method she can enlighten the intellect and touch the heart as surely if not as mightily as if she had the massiveness of an Ysaye or the ardor of a Sarasate. It was a performance as suggestive and instructive as it was gracious and lovely.

A real novelty was on the programme—Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic variations upon a theme, which, as thus presented, may be taken to illustrate an episode in the history of Sofar, the heroine of an ancient Assyrian legend, from whom it takes its name. It is an indescribable music—free, romantic, poetic, fanciful and very, very in the qualities which make abstract music. At the outset it suggests Delibas—for of course it is entirely French in its fashion—but its author's individuality soon stamps itself clearly on its fascinating pages, which grow in elaboration and effectiveness as they are turned. It was heard with much delight and greatly applauded.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture began the concert, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony ended it—both splendidly achieved.

A fortnight hence the programme will be:—Haydn, Symphony ("La Chasse"), (first time,) Chabrier, Bourree Fantasque; (first time,) Brahms, Symphony No. 2.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1899.

BOSTON, Mass., February 12, 1899.

THE program for the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Symphony No. 4, Romantic..............................Bruckner
Concerto, No. 2, for piano..................................Brahms
Overture, Leonore, No. 3...............................Beethoven

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist.

This was the first hearing accorded the symphony here. Some twelve years ago the same composer's seventh symphony was performed here, also under Mr. Gericke's direction, since which time no important work of his has been given in this city. My memories of the first played symphony have lashed me down to this very day. They were painful, yawn permeated and peace disturbing owing to the great length of the work and its solemn dullness. Hence it was with no pleasing anticipation that I contemplated hearing another composition of the same order from the same source. However, the results were far less trying than I imagined they would be, for I found the symphony to abound in charming moments, grace of theme, freshness of idea and felicity in harmonic and orchestral treatment—that is, in the first three movements. The finale was utterly incomprehensible on a first hearing, and suggested that Bruckner himself was by no means clear regarding what he had to say nor how to say it. The rest of the work holds the interest steadily. It is strongly redolent of Wagner, with here a bit of "Siegfried," there a fragment of "Tristan," now a reminiscence of "Lohengrin" and then of "Die Walküre." These things were less potent incentives to fault finding than they would have been if Bruckner had not enough and to spare to say for himself and in a fashion that was not Wagnerian. The whole of the opening movement is delightful in its tender suavity. The andante is lovely in its quiet, poetic feeling and its delicate warmth of color. The scherzo is a little gem in its dainty brightness and its refined simplicity. After all this lucidity the crabbed and incomprehensible finale, to use the language of Richard Swiveller, came as a regular staggerer. What the work seems to lack as a whole is the effect of spontaneity in inspiration. Then, too, the symphony takes within a few minutes of an hour for its performance, and it does not appear that what it says of importance should have taken so long in the saying. However, a second hearing may make an entirely different impression, though I doubt if any number of hearings will cause it to be esteemed a really great work, or even a work denoting the possession of a marked original individuality by the composer. It was splendidly read and played, but was coldly received.

The long and grave Brahms Concerto following immediately after so long and grave a symphony was heard somewhat at a disadvantage. The juxtaposition was unfortunate for both the music and the soloist. Miss Aus der Ohe's performance, however, did her ample credit and won her as ample honor. It was thoughtful and able, dignified in style and pure in taste, and was particularly interesting as an evidence of the artist's growth in the higher and finer essentials of her art.

THE TIMES

Feb 19

ESTABLISHED 1864.

MR. APTHORP'S BOOK.

Work by the Editor of the Symphony Concert Programmes.

"We take pleasure in sending to you herewith for review a copy of 'By the Way' (2 vols.), by William Foster Apthorp, which sells at $1.50 retail," etc. Once upon a time, a matter of seven or eight years, maybe, a newly arrived but famous orchestra leader exclaimed: "I care not who is flute soloist or who the one to agitate the cats' intestines with hairs from horse's tail, but I must be permitted to say who shall edit the programme books of our symphonic concerts." The able manager caught his breath as soon as possible, then whistled down, "Marry, come up," to his careful assistant. "Come, eh?" inquired the latter, being of cautious build. "Yes, Comee, and p. d. q.," was the swift reply. And when the assistant had arrived the manager asked: "Now pray what think you Nikisch wants? and the assistant thought it over for awhile, then said: "Of course I am not dead sure about it, but it is either an introduction to Philip Hale or a drawing-room to himself in the Pullman next time we go to Cambridge." Thereupon the able manager smiled wearily. Time passed, so, too, did the cars in Tremont row, for the subway wickedness was not yet conceived. Then the Teutonic kappellmeister again entered the sanctum of the HALL and brusquely demanded:

"Mein guter freund, haben sie den schreiber fur mich gefunden?"

"Well, rather!" was the reply, and so it came about that seeds of thought and philosophical observations on persons and music were sown "By the Way," for the man thus chosen was none other than the distinguished critic of the Transcript, Mr. Apthorp, aforementioned.

The wit and wisdom of these two volumes when printed originally in the official programmes of the Boston Symphony concerts undoubtedly saved many lives, particularly so during that period of infliction when Emil Paur conducted the sad ceremonies. It was indeed a siliculous pleasure, after having to endure allegro risolutos, poco allegrettos, adagio lomentosos, and all those other so-so's and woes, to read these "entr'actes." It was such a delight to get, in so few lines, the whole glittering lot of musico-philosophico summed up, "a travers le mauvais air," in a nutshell. Moreover, while reading Mr. Apthorp's comment we at least escaped the curious wristing of Timotheus the fiddler, contemplation of the leader's ill-fitting trousers and the awful noise of musical sounds as caused by foreign composers.

It is these entr'acte dissertations which are now published in book form, and the two volumes are pretty specimens of the printer's art. Here and there are some slang words which sound out of tune with the production as a whole, and some of the circumlocutory sentences are rather bewildering. Another thing. The author excuses himself for "the system of dividing words at the end of a line followed in these volumes," but he makes no apology for his use of u's. We find an u in honor and one in color; but le pire de tous is where he tells us of a concert in the Ninth-regiment armoury! Still, Milton and Ben Jonson spelled armory with a u, but so, too, does little Zangwill.

(Copeland & Day, Boston.)

HENRY HAYNIE.

[105]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 50.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

New Variations Puzzle the People Who Hear Them.

The Story of Istar Told in Musical Numbers—Novel Features Admirably Portrayed—Lady Halle, the Soloist, Received with Great Cordiality by the Audience.

The programme for the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture, "Genoveva"...............Schumann
Concerto for violin, No. 8, in A minor...Spohr
Symphonic variations, "Istar"..Vincent d'Indy
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"........Beethoven

The soloist was Lady Halle.

The Symphonic Variations were new to Boston. They deal with an episode in the sixth canto of the ancient Assyrian epic, "Isdubar." Istar, the daughter of Sin, goes toward the seven-gated abode of the dead. At the first gate the warder deprives her of her tiara; at the second, the warder takes the pendants from her ears; at the third, she is deprived of her necklace of precious stones; at the fourth, the jewels that adorn her breast are taken from her; at the sixth, the rings are taken from her ankles and from her hands, and at the seventh, the last veil that covers her body is taken from her and she stands nude. Each of the variations represents one of these seven stages. That music can in any way or in any sense portray these things, it would be absurd to debate. Even with the description given, it is not easy by the most severe stretch of the imagination to connect the text and the music.

The score is in the extreme modern vein in regard to themes, harmonies and orchestration. Everything in it is so strange and so vague, the color is so peculiarly bizarre and the treatment is of such curious originality that one is puzzled, on a single hearing, to know what to think of the work. Unlike most of the extravagant music of its kind that the modern school has produced, it does not antagonize the listener who hears it for the first time. It has a certain wild grace, a logical self-consistency and an appealing intensity of emotionality that both attract and interest. There is also a picturesqueness of effect that is strikingly impressive. Many of the instrumental combinations are of rare and decided beauty. On the other hand, there are daring harmonic devices that set the teeth on edge. A second hearing would undoubtedly reveal charms that escape one on the first.

Much stress has been laid on the composer's complete succumbing to the influence of Wagner, but in this work there is nothing that suggests him, except one or two moments in which there is a direct bit of plagiarizing from "Die Meistersinger." Otherwise, Wagner in his most wayward mood is lucidity itself, compared with this example of d'Indy. Still, the work seems to have something in it that warrants a desire for a better acquaintance with it, and it is to be hoped that it may be given again to the furthering of that end. It was beautifully played and with a fine appreciation of its remarkable richness and originality of tone color.

Mr. Gericke gave a brilliant interpretation of the "Genoveva" overture. His reading of the symphony was large and noble. He was particularly felicitous in his tempi. The funeral march was not dragged, and a stirring vivacity was given to the scherzo. There was no attempt at modernizing the work nor at finding new effects. The performance was splendid in its clearness and brilliancy.

Lady Halle was received with great cordiality. Her playing of the graceful and melodious Spohr concerto was delightful in its refined intelligence, its delicacy of style and its deep artistic feeling. She has a small tone, but it is clear, round and pure. Her intonation is faultless; her technique ample and of exquisite finish; her bowing is large and free; her phrasing perfect, and her musical feeling irreproachable. Nor is she lacking in warmth, tenderness and fire. No deeper and keener sympathy with the composer could be desired than was that with which Lady Halle performed this work. She fully sustained the high reputation which preceded her hither, and proved to be an artist of the first rank in that broad, simple and undemonstrative style in which she is so thoroughly and so fascinatingly at home. Her success with her audience was immediate and complete. She was tremendously applauded, and was recalled eight times with an enthusiasm that was both excited and exciting.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next performance is: Symphony, "La Chasse," Haydn, first time; "Bourree Fantasque," Chabrier, first time; Symphony No. 2, Brahms.

Lady Halle created even more of a furor than was expected upon her first appearance in America at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon. For a day audience, and the majority women, such a demonstration was unusual in its fervor. Lady Halle was recalled six times at the end of her masterly rendering of Spohr's concerto. Even the first violins, who do not warm up except on great occasions, let their enthusiasm have full scope, and followed the lady into the artist's room to personally express their delight over her exquisite art. The English violinist was becomingly gowned in clinging black silk, heavily embroidered in black, a bunch of violets the only touch of color in the costume. Her brown hair was worn crimped low on her forehead after the English fashion. Lady Halle is not a handsome woman by any means, and she is no longer young, but she has a most interesting face, full of intelligence and virility, and her high breeding is unmistakable in appearance and movement. In the great audience which [illegible] the hall were the Hon. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, the Rev. Fr. Bodfish, Mr. and Mrs. J. Livingston Grandin, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Mrs. William Gericke and her mother, Mrs. Hall Curtis, with her daughter, Mrs. Robert C. Heaton, Mrs. James H. Blake, Mrs. Charles Faulkner and her daughter, Col. and Mrs. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. George Armstrong, Mr. and Mrs. Zerrahn, Mr. Henry Wainwright, the Rev. J. W. Austin, Dr. Bigelow, Mrs. William Whitman and Miss Whitman, Mr. A. Parker Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Lang, the Rev. E. R. Shippen, Mrs. John Osborn, Mrs. W. W. Blackmar and Miss Brewer, Mrs. J. W. Kenney and Miss Kenney, Miss Bullard, Miss Sturgis, Frau Flamme, Mrs. William Lindsey, Mrs. R. M. Field, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Pratt, Miss Harriet Shaw and Mr. and Mrs. Grew. Last night Lady Halle had another enormous audience and an even warmer reception.

Lady Halle has captured Boston with her interesting personality, and since seeing her it is easy to understand the hold Norman Neruda has on the London public. She was truly a pathetic picture as, simply dressed in mourning, she stood there, at the Symphony rehearsal, and every woman's heart there went out to her, from that great audience, in the warmest manifestation of applause.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the seventeenth symphony concert was:

Overture, "Genoveva," op. 81..Schumann
Concerto for violin, No. 8, A minor, op. 47 ....Spohr
Symphonic ariations, "Istar," op. 42 D'Indy
Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica," op. 55 Beethoven
Soloist—Lady Halle.

The interest of the concert naturally centered on the soloist, whose work aroused unusual interest in the audience, and it would be difficult to exactly explain the reason why. Lady Halle cannot be classed with the great violinists, but her playing is very charming. The violin is reticent under her gentle touch; it never pours forth its full soul, but it sings in the neatest, daintiest and prettiest manner, in a manner that would be fully satisfying in a small room, but loses some of its more amiable qualities in a large hall. It is careful, finished, intelligent work, always graceful, and it holds the attention as a sweet voice will hold it, indifferent to the words spoken. This is not great, but it is fascinating art, with a certain old-fashioned quaintness in its graciousness. There is a certain formality in its friendliness, for it is always on its good behavior; it instinctively obeys all the rules of good breeding and is more attractive because of the formal little restraints that it places on itself. It is impossible to forget the sex of the artist in her work; it is womanly playing, tactful, daintily finished and always appealing. It is the best of its kind and the kind is good, if not the highest, art. It was the species of art that directly appealed to the audience, and to thunderous applause Lady Halle was recalled many times to bow her acknowledgements.

The d'Indy symphonic variations were a pleasant surprise; an explanatory program naturally accompanied them, but they were interesting in themselves as music. The work is weird, but the weirdness is not produced in the modern method by leaving out ideas, for the motive is easily followed, and the orchestral setting is original and of the most effective kind. It is a brilliant piece of tone color and under Mr. Gericke's sympathetic reading its merits were brought out in full relief.

There will be no public rehearsal and no concert next week.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1899.

The most important musical incident of the week, and one of the most important of the whole season, was the debut of Mme. Norman Neruda—Lady Halle—whom well-won fame has long placed at the head of women violinists. This entrance was effected in Spohr's eighth concerto, at the sixteenth Symphony rehearsal, followed by the regular reappearance at the concert. It is now many years since we used to hear Mme. Neruda in the great concerts of London, when she was distinguished for the delicate grace, the womanly softness, the fine penetration and the quiet expressiveness of her young artist's style Now that years have passed over her, bringing joys, honors, promotions. losses and griefs, we find that style ripened into perfect beauty and warmed by an unspeakable tenderness. Yet it has vitality, also, quick spirit, and a simple but searching strength. The concerto she chose was written by Spohr to please the Italian taste of his time, and its three connected movements take the form of a recitative, an air and a cavatina. Indeed, it has been known as "the dramatic scene." From the first long sustained notes so slender and filmy that one might almost doubt whether his ears were not deceiving him and he were but imagining a sound, to the broad, firm, animated and stirring phrases of the finale, Mme. Neruda held her audience as by a fairy spell, so intent was the silence, and even the rehearsal hearers recalled her eight times. Masculine force and fullness of volume she has not—nor does she need it; for within the range of her perfect purity of tone and method she can enlighten the intellect and touch the heart as surely if not as mightily as if she had the massiveness of an Ysaye or the ardor of a Sarasate. It was a performance as suggestive and instructive as it was gracious and lovely.

A real novelty was on the programme—Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic variations upon a theme, which, as thus presented, may be taken to illustrate an episode in the history of Sofar, the heroine of an ancient Assyrian legend, from whom it takes its name. It is an indescribable music—free, romantic, poetic, fanciful and very, very in the qualities which make abstract music. At the outset it suggests Delibas—for of course it is entirely French in its fashion—but its author's individuality soon stamps itself clearly on its fascinating pages, which grow in elaboration and effectiveness as they are turned. It was heard with much delight and greatly applauded.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture began the concert, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony ended it—both splendidly achieved.

A fortnight hence the programme will be:—Haydn, Symphony ("La Chasse"), (first time,) Chabrier, Bourree Fantasque; (first time,) Brahms, Symphony No. 2.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1899.

Boston, Mass., February 12, 1899.

The program for the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Symphony No. 4, Romantic..............................Bruckner
Concerto, No. 2, for piano..............................Brahms
Overture, Leonore, No. 3..............................Beethoven

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist.

This was the first hearing accorded the symphony here. Some twelve years ago the same composer's seventh symphony was performed here, also under Mr. Gericke's direction, since which time no important work of his has been given in this city. My memories of the first played symphony have lashed me down to this very day. They were painful, yawn permeated and peace disturbing owing to the great length of the work and its solemn dullness. Hence it was with no pleasing anticipation that I contemplated hearing another composition of the same order from the same source. However, the results were far less trying than I imagined they would be, for I found the symphony to abound in charming moments, grace of theme, freshness of idea and felicity in harmonic and orchestral treatment—that is, in the first three movements. The finale was utterly incomprehensible on a first hearing, and suggested that Bruckner himself was by no means clear regarding what he had to say nor how to say it. The rest of the work holds the interest steadily. It is strongly redolent of Wagner, with here a bit of "Siegfried," there a fragment of "Tristan," now a reminiscence of "Lohengrin" and then of "Die Walküre." These things were less potent incentives to fault finding than they would have been if Bruckner had not enough and to spare to say for himself and in a fashion that was not Wagnerian. The whole of the opening movement is delightful in its tender suavity. The andante is lovely in its quiet, poetic feeling and its delicate warmth of color. The scherzo is a little gem in its dainty brightness and its refined simplicity. After all this lucidity the crabbed and incomprehensible finale, to use the language of Richard Swiveller, came as a regular staggerer. What the work seems to lack as a whole is the effect of spontaneity in inspiration. Then, too, the symphony takes within a few minutes of an hour for its performance, and it does not appear that what it says of importance should have taken so long in the saying. However, a second hearing may make an entirely different impression, though I doubt if any number of hearings will cause it to be esteemed a really great work, or even a work denoting the possession of a marked original individuality by the composer. It was splendidly read and played, but was coldly received.

The long and grave Brahms Concerto following immediately after so long and grave a symphony was heard somewhat at a disadvantage. The juxtaposition was unfortunate for both the music and the soloist. Miss Aus der Ohe's performance, however, did her ample credit and won her as ample honor. It was thoughtful and able, dignified in style and pure in taste, and was particularly interesting as an evidence of the artist's growth in the higher and finer essentials of her art.

THE TIMES
ESTABLISHED 1864.

Feb 19

MR. APTHORP'S BOOK.

Work by the Editor of the Symphony Concert Programmes.

"We take pleasure in sending to you herewith for review a copy of 'By the Way' (2 vols.), by William Foster Apthorp, which sells at $1.50 retail," etc. Once upon a time, a matter of seven or eight years, maybe, a newly arrived but famous orchestra leader exclaimed: "I care not who is flute soloist or who the one to agitate the cats' intestines with hairs from horse's tail, but I must be permitted to say who shall edit the programme books of our symphonic concerts." The able manager caught his breath as soon as possible, then whistled down, "Marry, come up," to his careful assistant. "Come, eh?" inquired the latter, being of cautious build. "Yes, Comee, and p. d. q.," was the swift reply. And when the assistant had arrived the manager asked: "Now pray what think you Nikisch wants? and the assistant thought it over for awhile, then said: "Of course I am not dead sure about it, but it is either an introduction to Philip Hale or a drawing-room to himself in the Pullman next time we go to Cambridge." Thereupon the able manager smiled wearily. Time passed, so, too, did the cars in Tremont row, for the subway wickedness was not yet conceived. Then the Teutonic kappellmeister again entered the sanctum of the HALL and brusquely demanded:

"Mein guter freund, haben sie den schreiber fur mich gefunden?"

"Well, rather!" was the reply, and so it came about that seeds of thought and philosophical observations on persons and music were sown "By the Way," for the man thus chosen was none other than the distinguished critic of the Transcript, Mr. Apthorp, aforementioned.

The wit and wisdom of these two volumes when printed originally in the official programmes of the Boston Symphony concerts undoubtedly saved many lives, particularly so during that period of infliction when Emil Paur conducted the sad ceremonies. It was indeed a siliculous pleasure, after having to endure allegro risolutos, poco allegrettos, adagio lomentosos, and all those other so-so's and woes, to read these "entr'actes." It was such a delight to get, in so few lines, the whole glittering lot of musico-philosophico summed up, "a travers le mauvais air," in a nutshell. Moreover, while reading Mr. Apthorp's comment we at least escaped the curious wristing of Timotheus the fiddler, contemplation of the leader's ill-fitting trousers and the awful noise of musical sounds as caused by foreign composers.

It is these entr'acte dissertations which are now published in book form, and the two volumes are pretty specimens of the printer's art. Here and there are some slang words which sound out of tune with the production as a whole, and some of the circumlocutory sentences are rather bewildering. Another thing. The author excuses himself for "the system of dividing words at the end of a line followed in these volumes," but he makes no apology for his use of u's. We find an u in honor and one in color; but le pire de tous is where he tells us of a concert in the Ninth-regiment armoury! Still, Milton and Ben Jonson spelled armory with a u, but so, too, does little Zangwill.

(Copeland & Day, Boston.)

Henry Haynie.

[105]

[illegible] Transcript

FEBRUARY 20, 1899

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.
Spohr: Concerto for Violin, No. 8, in A minor, "In modo d'una scena cantante," opus 47.
Vincent d'Indy: Symphonic Variations, "Istar," opus 42. (First time in Boston.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55.

Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda) was the solo violinist.

Schumann wrote two overtures which can distinctly be called great—the "Genoveva," opus 81, and the "Manfred," opus 115. Save that both are sharply characteristic of the finest phases of his genius, and that both show true mastery, the two are quite different in character. The "Genoveva" is romantic and brilliant, if with a constant undercurrent of emotional depth; the "Manfred," grand, tragic, unbridled in its passionateness. If the second can be called greater than the first it is only in virtue of what, in a poem, would be called the superior greatness of its subject, the profounder spring from which the emotion flows. But the "Genoveva" is quite as perfect in its way; it may stand long as a model of the serious romantic style of which Schumann was a master. A more irresistibly exciting final climax can hardly be found this side of Beethoven; in point of pure musical beauty, the work is impeccable! It was played to perfection last Saturday evening, with admirable technical finish, with just the right brilliancy and vigor of accent.

Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" had raised great expectations; and it proved no disappointment. A good deal might be said in admiration of the originality and poetic beauty of the plan of the work, were that the really important point. But, as Erich Prieger said in reply to those who laid great stress upon the deeply poetic plan of a certain "St. Luke-Passion," ascribed to Sebastian Bach, that this was, in itself, no sufficient proof of the work's authenticity, and no proof at all, considering that the musical working-out of this plan showed none of Bach's mastery, so may it also be said of this "Istar" that the poetic beauty of its scheme is no sufficient earnest of its value as a composition. Let it only be said in passing that the idea of identifying a theme with the demi-goddess who is gradually disrobed to nakedness, as she passes successively through the seven gates of heaven, and of letting this theme appear in its completeness (and in bare unisons and octaves, too) only after the last veil has fallen from her body, is intrinsically and highly poetic; and poetic in a finer, more natural way than one often finds emanating from the Gallic brain. The idea is at once "saisissant" and on an elevated poetic plane. So fine is this idea, indeed, that many a compatriot of d'Indy's might have been content to stop at it, to let it do all the work in his composition, restricting the musical embodiment of it to a few conventional, commonplace hints. But d'Indy has done otherwise; instead of making this idea the be-all and end-all, the final goal of his composition, he has merely taken it for his starting-point. In how far his music is successively suggestive of the seven stages of his heroine's disrobing, and of the several articles of attire—tiara, jewels, girdle, veil—of which she is stripped, we cannot well judge after but a single hearing; it often takes study and familiarity to enable one to see clearly into matters of this sort, and it is no discredit to a musical composition that this should be so. For this, too, is a matter of secondary artistic importance. It is by the intrinsic beauty of the music itself that d'Indy here takes us captive. Of course we can speak only of first impressions here; but the impression made upon us last Saturday by this symphonic poem—we prefer this title to "symphonic variations"—was that we know of hardly anything in modern French music that can fairly be placed beside it. There is such an earnestness of feeling in the music, showing the composer to be fully possessed with and inspired by the beauty of his subject, to the point of becoming quite unconscious of the cleverness of his own technique, that we should be tempted to call it un-French, were it not that we find this feeling so unmistakably in some French painters. Truly, d'Indy here shows both the sincerity and the depth of emotion, the superiority to self-consciousness that one finds in Corot and Millet. Save in Berlioz and Gounod, we know not where to look for anything of the sort in modern French composers; and Gounod's sincerity is as that of a child in arms compared with d'Indy's! With all the patent Wagnerishness of matter and manner, there is still an individual note in this work. The man has musical originality. Perhaps he shows his originality most convincingly as a colorist; and by originality in coloring we do not mean the mere discovery of unheard-of and "unedited" combinations; we mean that keen eye for the harmony of color with form, for a fine scheme of color-values, which is never anything but individual, which cannot be acquired nor copied. Such a sense for coloring belongs only to those who can see; and a man really sees only with his own eyes. He who sees so sees not only clearly but profoundly. In this composition of d'Indy's the ear is met by perturbing shades of tone that seem to come from the secret heart of things; they lay bare to you the very essence of his emotion, and you thrill with him. Moreover, you everywhere feel the orchestral color to be the direct outgrowth of the musical form itself; it has the appositeness of Nature! This is what we call being a musical colorist; not merely a man—say, like Carl Goldmark—with an opulent palette and a natural taste for sumptuousness. A colorist in the sense that Mozart, Beethoven, Berlioz, Wagner were great colorists. The work was, as far as we could judge, admirably, superbly read and played; Mr. Gericke seemed to find himself sympathetically at home in its atmosphere, and the performance was convin-

[illegible] was grandly played, at once with Beethovenish fire and intensity and with classic measure. Was the scherzo taken a thought too slow? We are not sure. But of the Marcia funebre we can heartily say that the performance was in every way exhaustive; first movement and finale, too, went to perfection. As for the effect of the great work, a word or two may not be superfluous. There is no denying that both it and the "Genoveva" rather paled, in one way, beside the "Istar;" some of the best musicians in the orchestra found the "Eroica" a little dull after d'Indy's poem. And we are not such prejudiced classicists as to find fault with them. It took us some time to get acclimated to the Beethoven orchestra after d'Indy's more imposing glow of color. The style, too, seemed at first rather homely and small after the Frenchman's broader sweep of phrase. But it did not take long to get back to the "Eroica" plane. Still the very fact of its taking any time at all is suggestive. Of what? To our mind of this: that neither the classic style—the cut of phrase and mode of development—nor the classic orchestration is made for the large halls in which our more modern music of today finds its natural home. We have said this before, but tire less and less of repeating it. No matter what a composer's intrinsic power may be, there is no sane denying that some purely physical qualities have infinitely much to do with vigor of impression. Size and its correlatives are factors which cannot safely be left out of account. It is equal folly to sky a Meissonnier and to look at a Michael Angelo through a magnifying glass; the one may be as intrinsically great and strong as the other, only one is bigger than the other, and its true focus is at a greater distance. Both the modern melodic style, the cut of phrase and the modern instrumentation are on a larger scale than the classic; and that is all that is important in the difference between the two. Give the great orchestral classics in a hall of appropriate size, and we defy any modern work you please to make them seem weak by comparison; but, like all works of art, they demand their own conditions, and, if these conditions are unfulfilled, they will fail of producing their true effect.

Lady Hallé's playing of Spohr's "Gesangszene" was very beautiful indeed. Warm purity of tone, immaculate intonation, beauty of feeling, technical brilliance, grace and sensibility of phrasing—save for a tendency to indulge too often in the upward slide of the finger along the string, and to take somewhat more than the allotted breathing time between phrases—were all richly there. A more thoroughly artistic performance, in its way, we have seldom listened to. It was all of a piece; it showed true mastery, a fine and finely cultivated artistic nature. Yet it came like a breath from long-forgotten days; there was something almost ghostly about it. It seemed like the dim shadow of dead music; to be greeted with tender reverence, like all dead beauty. Somehow it kept making us think of Cranford and Miss Matty; these closing years of our century seemed all too rough a place for it, one felt like sheltering it from the eager air of our modern musical feeling, as a thing too delicate, too unused to the world to consort with that of which our minds and souls are now full. It had a something of grandmotherly tenderness, and we felt as though we ought to become little children again to be worthy of it. The audience enjoyed it hugely; that was evident enough, for applause and recalls seemed as if they would know no end.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, March 3, and Saturday evening, March, 4 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Haydn, symphony in D major, "La Chasse" (Rieter-Biedermann edition, No. 5); Chabrier, Bourrée Fantasque; Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1899

NO WANAMAKER STORE.

Rumor That He Had Purchased Music Hall Denied—No Intention of Opening Another Store.

New York, Feb. 25.—It is denied here that John Wanamaker intends to establish a branch department in Boston.

The report in Boston that Music Hall was to be utilized as a store for the well-known Philadelphia and New York dry goods merchant is therefore erroneous. Similar reports have been received here from time to time from other cities, but have proved to be entirely without foundation. It is probable that these rumors have arisen from the fact that Mr. Wanamaker has been approached by representative business men from many of the leading cities of the country with offers of suitable sites for a department store such as is established here and in Philadelphia. While Mr. Wanamaker has had some of these proposals under consideration, he ultimately arrived at the conclusion that an enlargement of his present business would be beyond the managing powers of an individual firm.

There is, however, a rumor among the dry goods trade that the present firm is to be merged into a corporation capitalized at a large sum, to the end of establishing first-class branches in many of the leading cities. This rumor cannot be confirmed, but at the same time will not be downed.

The report that he was to establish a branch in Boston, and that he had purchased Music Hall in that city as the initiative step, was emphatically denied by his New York manager, Mr. Ogden, this morning.

When questioned on the matter by the New York representative of the Boston Journal, he said: "You may quote me as saying that Mr. Wanamaker never entertained any such proposal."

"The purchase of the Boston Music Hall for the purpose of establishing a branch store was never under consideration, and I am at a loss to understand how such a rumor came into circula-

---

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

First American Appearance of Lady Halle, the Famous Violinist—Initial Hearing of Vincent D'Indy's "Istar."

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixteenth concert, Lady Halle, soloist. The programme:

Overture, "Genoveva"..........Schumann
Concerto for violin, No. 8, in A minor ....Spohr
Symphonic variations, "Istar" Vincent d'Indy
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"......Beethoven

D'Indy's "Istar" is a fresh illustration of the fact that beyond a few of the elementary emotions music can represent nothing—or, better, be made to represent everything. Here is a story of the Assyrian princess who descended into Hades on a mission best known to herself, and is held up at each of the seven gates to that abode of despair. At each of them some portion of her adornment is removed by a warder, until at the last she "stands forth in the full splendor of nudity."

No one in his senses could contend that the rich and passionate music of D'Indy suggests anything of the story, nor can any programme music do so much as that. The question is, does it fit itself to the various scenes after one knows what those are? In a certain way, yes, although why the removing of a girdle should be musically different from the removal of a tiara is not fully apparent. But the climax of the piece is brought out with such beauty and splendor that it may easily be accepted as the tone painting of the mental picture. The work as a whole is of the fiery modern style, more irregular and unhampered by the usual laws of progressions than is Wagner, but infinitely less beautiful and majestic.

Lady Halle, famous in her youthful days as Norman-Neruda, made her American debut on this occasion. She created an impression of great refinement, the most perfect musical taste and a warm and sympathetic nature. She handles the violin in a tender and caressing way, and never forgets her femininity. Her tone is not large, but it is full of an appealing charm, and absolutely true in intonation. Her technical ability is worthy her great reputation, but it is never projected beyond the bounds of good taste. Her playing of the Spohr concerto was in accord with its old-fashioned grace and melodiousness, and was practically without a flaw. She was very heartily applauded by the delighted audience.

The ever-noble "Eroica" was read with care and played with all the skill we are accustomed to expect. The "Genoveva" overture also went with elegance and facility.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1899.

THE program for the sixteenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture to Genoveva..Schumann
Concerto for violin No. 8, in A minor, Scena Cantante, op. 47 ....Spohr
Symphonic Variations, Istar, op. 42..................Vincent d'Indy
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, Eroica......................................Beethoven

The soloist was Lady Hallé, who on this occasion made her first appearance in this country. After having made professional visits to nearly every other land, including Australia and South Africa, it was fully time that she should come hitherward. Her reception was exceedingly cordial. At the close of her performance of the concerto there was a tremendous fury of plaudits, and the artist was recalled eight times. The concerto is old fashioned and affords the artist little opportunity for virtuoso show, and Lady Hallé's playing is old fashioned—delightfully so, but still, old fashioned. Her tone is not large, but it is warm, pure and searching. From the beginning to the end of this concerto both her reading and her playing were charming in their fine artistic intelligence and sincerity of feeling. Her style is broad, simple and undemonstrative, and, as fitly emphasized in its application to the somewhat effeminate music of the concerto, fascinatingly womanly. The suave delicacy, the graceful flow, winning individuality and the utter abstention from mere display that are characteristic of her work made listening to her an unalloyed pleasure. Just the same, however, I am none the less surprised that the huge audience should have taken so spontaneously and so enthusiastically to an artist in whom there is not a trace of modern sensationalism, who does not devote herself to the glorification of mere technic and who makes no attempt to dazzle and astonish for the reward of popular applause.

D'Indy's "Istar" is a curious work, program music pure and simple, in which the composer has tried to make the orchestra depict in tone-color things that are wholly beyond its reach. These variations, seven in number, deal with an episode in the sixth canto of the old Assyrian epic "Isdubar." Istar goes toward the seven-gated abode of the dead. Before she reaches the end of her journey she is stripped of all she wears, until at length, according to the program-book, she stands forth "in the full splendor of nudity." Fortunately, music is incapable of presenting nakedness with anything approaching vividness, even with naked fifths, and hence there is no good excuse for the interference of the police or of the society for the protection of public morality.

Istar does not seem to have been clad at the outset in any more charm-concealing wearing apparel than jewelry. At the first gate the warden deprives her of her tiara; at the second the pendants are removed from her ears; at the third she is deprived of her necklace of precious stones; at the fourth the jewels that adorn her breast are taken from her; at the fifth the girdle is removed from her waist; at the sixth the rings are taken from her hands and her ankles, and at the seventh the veil that covers her body is removed and she stands nude. In this condition she is permitted to enter the abode of the dead in search of the waters of life—or, as one profane French critic has put it—the brandy and waters.

Each variation depicts a stripping, and when it comes to the last and the veil is removed there is an immense fortissimo of the orchestra; whether intended for astonished admiration or for vigorous protest the music does not say clearly. An understanding of the score would be greatly assisted by a succession of stereopticon views thrown on a screen, one for each variation.

Everything in this music is so strange and so vague, the color is so curiously bizarre, that one is puzzled what to think of it on a single hearing. Oddly enough, unlike most of the extravagant works in kind that the modern school has produced, it does not antagonize the listener who hears it for the first time. It has a certain wild grace and an appealing intensity of emotion that attract and interest. Much of the instrumentation is of rare originality and of decided beauty. There are also daring harmonic progressions that set the teeth on edge, but which one accepts without protest, and, oh, the sinfulness of it!—finds singularly effective.

I read that D'Indy has delivered himself up soul and body to the influence of Wagner, but I failed to detect it in this work except in two of the variations where there are phrases that are strongly reminiscent of moments in the overture to "Die Meistersinger." Compared with D'Indy in this composition, Wagner in his most abstract mood is lucidity itself.

The work, which is very exacting on the orchestra, was beautifully and effectively played and with an admirable appreciation of its extraordinary richness and originality of tone color.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARNEGIE HALL, NEW YORK.
PROGRAMS.

Wednesday Afternoon, February 22.

Overture, Carnival, op. 92..............................Dvorák
Concerto for violin, No. 8..................................Spohr
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72..............Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in G major, with viola obligato, Harold in Italy, op. 16..................................Berlioz
(Viola obligato by Franz Kneisel.)
Soloist, Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda).

Thursday Evening, February 23.

Overture-Fantasy, Romeo and Juliet........Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor..............Bruch
Symphonic Variations, Istar (first time)............d'Indy
Symphony No. 3, Eroica..................................Beethoven
Soloist, Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda).

[106]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.
Spohr: Concerto for Violin, No. 8, in A minor, "In modo d'una scena cantante," opus 47.
Vincent d'Indy; Symphonic Variations, "Istar," opus 42. (First time in Boston.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55.

Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda) was the solo violinist.

Schumann wrote two overtures which can distinctly be called great—the "Genoveva," opus 81, and the "Manfred," opus 115. Save that both are sharply characteristic of the finest phases of his genius, and that both show true mastery, the two are quite different in character. The "Genoveva" is romantic and brilliant, if with a constant undercurrent of emotional depth; the "Manfred," grand, tragic, unbridled in its passionateness. If the second can be called greater than the first it is only in virtue of what, in a poem, would be called the superior greatness of its subject, the profounder spring from which the emotion flows. But the "Genoveva" is quite as perfect in its way; it may stand long as a model of the serious romantic style of which Schumann was a master. A more irresistibly exciting final climax can hardly be found this side of Beethoven; in point of pure musical beauty, the work is impeccable! It was played to perfection last Saturday evening, with admirable technical finish, with just the right brilliancy and vigor of accent.

Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" had raised great expectations; and it proved no disappointment. A good deal might be said in admiration of the originality and poetic beauty of the plan of the work, were that the really important point. But, as Erich Prieger said in reply to those who laid great stress upon the deeply poetic plan of a certain "St. Luke-Passion," ascribed to Sebastian Bach, that this was, in itself, no sufficient proof of the work's authenticity, and no proof at all, considering that the musical working-out of this plan showed none of Bach's mastery, so may it also be said of this "Istar" that the poetic beauty of its scheme is no sufficient earnest of its value as a composition. Let it only be said in passing that the idea of identifying a theme with the demi-goddess who is gradually disrobed to nakedness, as she passes successively through the seven gates of heaven, and of letting this theme appear in its completeness (and in bare unisons and octaves, too) only after the last veil has fallen from her body, is intrinsically and highly poetic; and poetic in a finer, more natural way than one often finds emanating from the Gallic brain. The idea is at once "saisissant" and on an elevated poetic plane. So fine is this idea, indeed, that many a compatriot of d'Indy's might have been content to stop at it, to let it do all the work in his composition, restricting the musical embodiment of it to a few conventional, commonplace hints. But d'Indy has done otherwise; instead of making this idea the be-all and end-all, the final goal of his composition, he has merely taken it for his starting-point. In how far his music is successively suggestive of the seven stages of his heroine's disrobing, and of the several articles of attire—tiara, jewels, girdle, veil—of which she is stripped, we cannot well judge after but a single hearing; it often takes study and familiarity to enable one to see clearly into matters of this sort, and it is no discredit to a musical composition that this should be so. For this, too, is a matter of secondary artistic importance. It is by the intrinsic beauty of the music itself that d'Indy here takes us captive. Of course we can speak only of first impressions here; but the impression made upon us last Saturday by this symphonic poem—we prefer this title to "symphonic variations"—was that we know of hardly anything in modern French music that can fairly be placed beside it. There is such an earnestness of feeling in the music, showing the composer to be fully possessed with and inspired by the beauty of his subject, to the point of becoming quite unconscious of the cleverness of his own technique, that we should be tempted to call it un-French, were it not that we find this feeling so unmistakably in some French painters. Truly, d'Indy here shows both the sincerity and the depth of emotion, the superiority to self-consciousness that one finds in Corot and Millet. Save in Berlioz and Gounod, we know not where to look for anything of the sort in modern French composers; and Gounod's sincerity is as that of a child in arms compared with d'Indy's! With all the patent Wagnerishness of matter and manner, there is still an individual note in this work. The man has musical originality. Perhaps he shows his originality most convincingly as a colorist; and by originality in coloring we do not mean the mere discovery of unheard-of and "unedited" combinations; we mean that keen eye for the harmony of color with form, for a fine scheme of color-values, which is never anything but individual, which cannot be acquired nor copied. Such a sense for coloring belongs only to those who can see; and a man really sees only with his own eyes. He who sees so sees not only clearly but profoundly. In this composition of d'Indy's the ear is met by perturbing shades of tone that seem to come from the secret heart of things; they lay bare to you the very essence of his emotion, and you thrill with him. Moreover, you everywhere feel the orchestral color to be the direct outgrowth of the musical form itself; it has the appositeness of Nature! This is what we call being a musical colorist; not merely a man—say, like Carl Goldmark—with an opulent palette and a natural taste for sumptuousness. A colorist in the sense that Mozart, Beethoven, Berlioz, Wagner were great colorists. The work was, as far as we could judge, admirably, superbly read and played; Mr. Gericke seemed to find himself sympathetically at home in its atmosphere, and the performance was convin-

Beethoven's "Eroica" was grandly played, at once with Beethovenish fire and intensity and with classic measure. Was the scherzo taken a thought too slow? We are not sure. But of the Marcia funebre we can heartily say that the performance was in every way exhaustive; first movement and finale, too, went to perfection. As for the effect of the great work, a word or two may not be superfluous. There is no denying that both it and the "Genoveva" rather paled, in one way, beside the "Istar;" some of the best musicians in the orchestra found the "Eroica" a little dull after d'Indy's poem. And we are not such prejudiced classicists as to find fault with them. It took us some time to get acclimated to the Beethoven orchestra after d'Indy's more imposing glow of color. The style, too, seemed at first rather homely and small after the Frenchman's broader sweep of phrase. But it did not take long to get back to the "Eroica" plane. Still the very fact of its taking any time at all is suggestive. Of what? To our mind of this: that neither the classic style—the cut of phrase and mode of development—nor the classic orchestration is made for the large halls in which our more modern music of today finds its natural home. We have said this before, but tire less and less of repeating it. No matter what a composer's intrinsic power may be, there is no sane denying that some purely physical qualities have infinitely much to do with vigor of impression. Size and its correlatives are factors which cannot safely be left out of account. It is equal folly to sky a Meissonnier and to look at a Michael Angelo through a magnifying glass; the one may be as intrinsically great and strong as the other, only one is bigger than the other, and its true focus is at a greater distance. Both the modern melodic style, the cut of phrase and the modern instrumentation are on a larger scale than the classic; and that is all that is important in the difference between the two. Give the great orchestral classics in a hall of appropriate size, and we defy any modern work you please to make them seem weak by comparison; but, like all works of art, they demand their own conditions, and, if these conditions are unfulfilled, they will fail of producing their true effect.

Lady Hallé's playing of Spohr's "Gesangszene" was very beautiful indeed. Warm purity of tone, immaculate intonation, beauty of feeling, technical brilliance, grace and sensibility of phrasing—save for a tendency to indulge too often in the upward slide of the finger along the string, and to take somewhat more than the allotted breathing time between phrases—were all richly there. A more thoroughly artistic performance, in its way, we have seldom listened to. It was all of a piece; it showed true mastery, a fine and finely cultivated artistic nature. Yet it came like a breath from long-forgotten days; there was something almost ghostly about it. It seemed like the dim shadow of dead music; to be greeted with tender reverence, like all dead beauty. Somehow it kept making us think of Cranford and Miss Matty; these closing years of our century seemed all too rough a place for it, one felt like sheltering it from the eager air of our modern musical feeling, as a thing too delicate, too unused to the world to consort with that of which our minds and souls are now full. It had a something of grandmotherly tenderness, and we felt as though we ought to become little children again to be worthy of it. The audience enjoyed it hugely; that was evident enough, for applause and recalls seemed as if they would know no end.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, March 3, and Saturday evening, March, 4 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Haydn, symphony in D major, "La Chasse" (Rieter-Biedermann edition, No. 5); Chabrier, Bourrée Fantasque; Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1899.

NO WANAMAKER STORE.

Rumor That He Had Purchased Music Hall Denied—No Intention of Opening Another Store.

New York, Feb. 25.—It is denied here that John Wanamaker intends to establish a branch department in Boston.

The report in Boston that Music Hall was to be utilized as a store for the well-known Philadelphia and New York dry goods merchant is therefore erroneous. Similar reports have been received here from time to time from other cities, but have proved to be entirely without foundation. It is probable that these rumors have arisen from the fact that Mr. Wanamaker has been approached by representative business men from many of the leading cities of the country with offers of suitable sites for a department store such as is established here and in Philadelphia. While Mr. Wanamaker has had some of these proposals under consideration, he ultimately arrived at the conclusion that an enlargement of his present business would be beyond the managing powers of an individual firm.

There is, however, a rumor among the dry goods trade that the present firm is to be merged into a corporation capitalized at a large sum, to the end of establishing first-class branches in many of the leading cities. This rumor cannot be confirmed, but at the same time will not be downed.

The report that he was to establish a branch in Boston, and that he had purchased Music Hall in that city as the initiative step, was emphatically denied by his New York manager, Mr. Ogden, this morning.

When questioned on the matter by the New York representative of the Boston Journal, he said: "You may quote me as saying that Mr. Wanamaker never entertained any such proposal."

"The purchase of the Boston Music Hall for the purpose of establishing a branch store was never under consideration, and I am at a loss to understand how such a rumor came into circulation.

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

First American Appearance of Lady Halle, the Famous Violinist—Initial Hearing of Vincent D'Indy's "Istar."

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixteenth concert, Lady Halle, soloist. The programme:

Overture, "Genoveva"..........Schumann
Concerto for violin, No. 8, in A minor ....Spohr
Symphonic variations, "Istar" Vincent d'Indy
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"......Beethoven

D'Indy's "Istar" is a fresh illustration of the fact that beyond a few of the elementary emotions music can represent nothing—or, better, be made to represent everything. Here is a story of the Assyrian princess who descended into Hades on a mission best known to herself, and is held up at each of the seven gates to that abode of despair. At each of them some portion of her adornment is removed by a warder, until at the last she "stands forth in the full splendor of nudity."

No one in his senses could contend that the rich and passionate music of D'Indy suggests anything of the story, nor can any programme music do so much as that. The question is, does it fit itself to the various scenes after one knows what those are? In a certain way, yes, although why the removing of a girdle should be musically different from the removal of a tiara is not fully apparent. But the climax of the piece is brought out with such beauty and splendor that it may easily be accepted as the tone painting of the mental picture. The work as a whole is of the fiery modern style, more irregular and unhampered by the usual laws of progressions than is Wagner, but infinitely less beautiful and majestic.

Lady Halle, famous in her youthful days as Norman-Neruda, made her American debut on this occasion. She created an impression of great refinement, the most perfect musical taste and a warm and sympathetic nature. She handles the violin in a tender and caressing way, and never forgets her femininity. Her tone is not large, but it is full of an appealing charm, and absolutely true in intonation. Her technical ability is worthy her great reputation, but it is never projected beyond the bounds of good taste. Her playing of the Spohr concerto was in accord with its old-fashioned grace and melodiousness, and was practically without a flaw. She was very heartily applauded by the delighted audience.

The ever-noble "Eroica" was read with care and played with all the skill we are accustomed to expect. The "Genoveva" overture also went with elegance and facility.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1899.

THE program for the sixteenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture to Genoveva..Schumann
Concerto for violin No. 8, in A minor, Scena Cantante, op. 47 ....Spohr
Symphonic Variations, Istar, op. 42..................Vincent d'Indy
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, Eroica....................................Beethoven

The soloist was Lady Hallé, who on this occasion made her first appearance in this country. After having made professional visits to nearly every other land, including Australia and South Africa, it was fully time that she should come hitherward. Her reception was exceedingly cordial. At the close of her performance of the concerto there was a tremendous fury of plaudits, and the artist was recalled eight times. The concerto is old fashioned and affords the artist little opportunity for virtuoso show, and Lady Hallé's playing is old fashioned—delightfully so, but still, old fashioned. Her tone is not large, but it is warm, pure and searching. From the beginning to the end of this concerto both her reading and her playing were charming in their fine artistic intelligence and sincerity of feeling. Her style is broad, simple and undemonstrative, and, as fitly emphasized in its application to the somewhat effeminate music of the concerto, fascinatingly womanly. The suave delicacy, the graceful flow, winning individuality and the utter abstention from mere display that are characteristic of her work made listening to her an unalloyed pleasure. Just the same, however, I am none the less surprised that the huge audience should have taken so spontaneously and so enthusiastically to an artist in whom there is not a trace of modern sensationalism, who does not devote herself to the glorification of mere technic and who makes no attempt to dazzle and astonish for the reward of popular applause.

D'Indy's "Istar" is a curious work, program music pure and simple, in which the composer has tried to make the orchestra depict in tone-color things that are wholly beyond its reach. These variations, seven in number, deal with an episode in the sixth canto of the old Assyrian epic "Isdubar." Istar goes toward the seven-gated abode of the dead. Before she reaches the end of her journey she is stripped of all she wears, until at length, according to the program-book, she stands forth "in the full splendor of nudity." Fortunately, music is incapable of presenting nakedness with anything approaching vividness, even with naked fifths, and hence there is no good excuse for the interference of the police or of the society for the protection of public morality.

Istar does not seem to have been clad at the outset in any more charm-concealing wearing apparel than jewelry. At the first gate the warden deprives her of her tiara; at the second the pendants are removed from her ears; at the third she is deprived of her necklace of precious stones; at the fourth the jewels that adorn her breast are taken from her; at the fifth the girdle is removed from her waist; at the sixth the rings are taken from her hands and her ankles, and at the seventh the veil that covers her body is removed and she stands nude. In this condition she is permitted to enter the abode of the dead in search of the waters of life—or, as one profane French critic has put it—the brandy and waters.

Each variation depicts a stripping, and when it comes to the last and the veil is removed there is an immense fortissimo of the orchestra; whether intended for astonished admiration or for vigorous protest the music does not say clearly. An understanding of the score would be greatly assisted by a succession of stereopticon views thrown on a screen, one for each variation.

Everything in this music is so strange and so vague, the color is so curiously bizarre, that one is puzzled what to think of it on a single hearing. Oddly enough, unlike most of the extravagant works in kind that the modern school has produced, it does not antagonize the listener who hears it for the first time. It has a certain wild grace and an appealing intensity of emotion that attract and interest. Much of the instrumentation is of rare originality and of decided beauty. There are also daring harmonic progressions that set the teeth on edge, but which one accepts without protest, and, oh, the sinfulness of it!—finds singularly effective.

I read that D'Indy has delivered himself up soul and body to the influence of Wagner, but I failed to detect it in this work except in two of the variations where there are phrases that are strongly reminiscent of moments in the overture to "Die Meistersinger." Compared with D'Indy in this composition, Wagner in his most abstract mood is lucidity itself.

The work, which is very exacting on the orchestra, was beautifully and effectively played and with an admirable appreciation of its extraordinary richness and originality of tone color.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARNEGIE HALL, NEW YORK.
PROGRAMS.

Wednesday Afternoon, February 22.

Overture, Carnival, op. 92..............................Dvorák
Concerto for violin, No. 8..............................Spohr
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72...............Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in G major, with viola obligato, Harold in Italy, op. 16...............................Berlioz
(Viola obligato by Franz Kneisel.)
Soloist, Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda).

Thursday Evening, February 23.

Overture-Fantasy, Romeo and Juliet.......Tschaikowsky
Concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor...............Bruch
Symphonic Variations, Istar (first time)............d'Indy
Symphony No. 3, Eroica.............................Beethoven
Soloist, Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda).

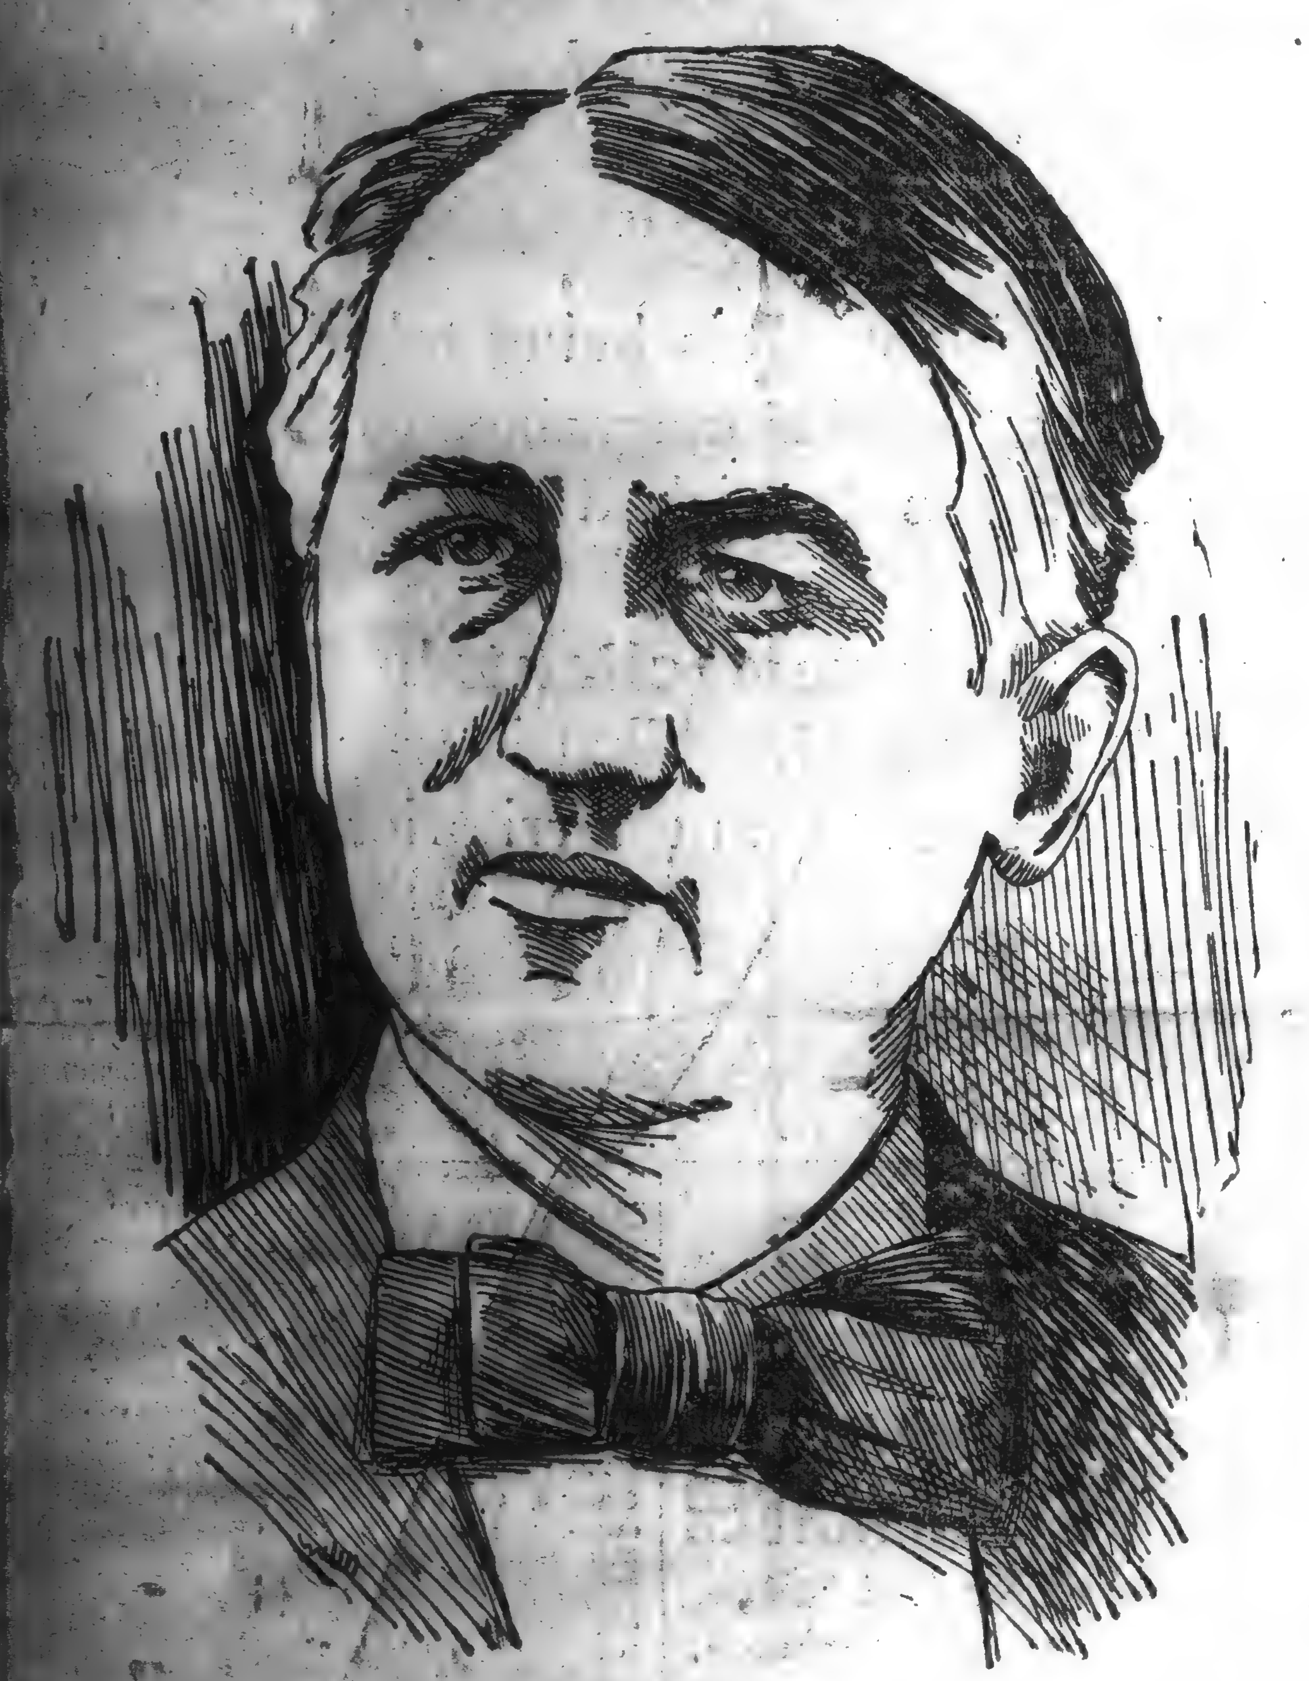
[106]

The Boston Traveler

WANAMAKER COMING TO TOWN

He Owns Music Hall Property With Entrances on Tremont, Bromfield, Winter and Washington Streets.

TO OPEN A BIG DEPARTMENT STORE



JOHN WANAMAKER.

Philadelphia merchant—the most famous Sunday School superintendent in the world, and ex-postmaster-general in President Harrison's cabinet. He has large department stores in Philadelphia, New York and Chicago. It is understood that he now contemplates opening in Boston, on the Music Hall site, the biggest department store in the city, with entrances on Winter, Bromfield and Washington streets, and another entrance on Hammond place, leading from Tremont street.

John Wanamaker of Philadelphia, it is understood, is soon to have a store in Boston that will eclipse anything in the line of a department store ever opened here.

Large parcels of real estate in the block bounded by Washington, Bromfield, Tremont and Winter streets, have been sold and resold during the past year. A mystery has been hanging over these sales, and all the leading business men of this city have been trying to ascertain the last purshaser's name.

The principal transaction of all was the sale of the Boston Music Hall property by the Boston Real Estate Trust, which bought it a little more than 11 months ago through C. W. Whittier.

The latter, about three weeks ago, made a resale to a client, whose name at the time was unknown, but whom it has been since learned is John Wanamaker. Business reasons were given for withholding the name of the purchaser.

Mr. Whittier then sold to the same buyer the valuable parcel of land numbered 413-415 Washington street, owned by Harvard College trustees, and purchased from the Dix estate in 1897.

The price paid for the Music Hall property is said to be between $425,000 and $450,000, and for the Harvard College property about $190,000. Each parcel was sold at a profit.

It is now understood that the same buyer has the option on the Wesleyan building, 36 Bromfield street. This is owned by the Wesleyan Building Association, composed of leading Methodists.

It is a known fact that the "unknown" buyer has an option on this building because others in this city have tried to buy this building and were told it was about to be sold.

Another parcel of land on Tremont street, numbered 114 and 116 Tremont street, is at present occupied by a furniture concern. The unknown buyer, John Wanamaker, is about to take this valuable parcel of land, which will give him entrances on four of the principal streets of this city to the Music Hall property.

As near as can be learned Mr. Wanamaker proposes to come to this city and start an emporium similar to those he is at present conducting in other large cities. With Music Hall remodelled he would have one of the largest stores in this city, and the other buildings remodelled would add to the size of the store. Moreover, it would give four spacious entrances: Winter, Washington, Bromfield and Tremont streets.

While at present there is an entrance on Winter street, Mr. Wanamaker's agent in this city, C. W. Whittier, is trying to get the buildings on either side of Winter place. As there are leases on the Harvard College property running for four years, the old Music Hall property will probably stand for some time unless the leases are bought, which is a probability.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 26, 1899.

—Maj H. L. Higginson and Mrs Higginson had a jolly party of New York friends lunching with them at the Albemarle Wednesday, having gone over to enjoy the repetition at Carnegie Music hall of the symphony concert program of last Friday. Others there were Mr and Mrs F. H. Shapleigh, who are moving to Lakewood and thence to Wash-

---

4 Feb 25

BOSTON POST.

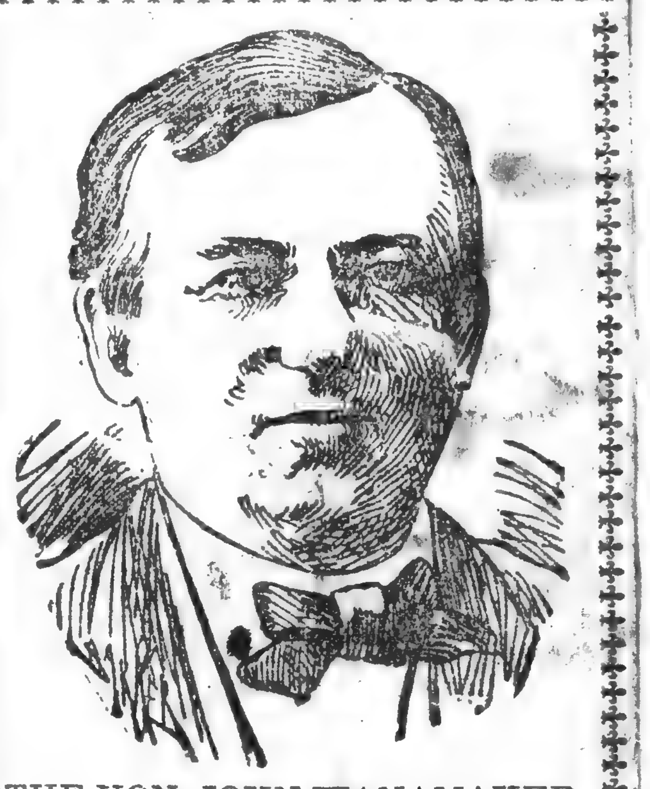
WANAMAKER'S PLAN.

To Open Large Department Store in Boston — Music Hall and Other Buildings Said to Have Been Purchased.

A report is current that John Wanamaker of Philadelphia is to open a large department store in this city, and that it will occupy Music Hall and other buildings after such structures have been remodelled to suit the needs of a well equipped modern department store.

During the past year large parcels of real estate have passed hands in the area bounded by Washington, Bromfield, Tremont and Winter streets, and to these transactions there has been more or less of mystery.

The Music Hall property is said to have been sold to Wanamaker through C. W. Whittier about three weeks ago. Mr. Whittier could not be seen yesterday, as he is out of town. He is said to have also sold to the same purchaser the property numbered 413-415 Washington street, which was owned by the trustees of Harvard College, and which was a part of the Dix estate until 1897. It is said that the price brought by the Music Hall property approximated $450,000; that bought by the Harvard College property nearly $200,000. Wanamaker, through his representative, is also said to have an option on the Wesleyan building, 36 Bromfield street, owned by the Wesleyan Building Association, and also on the property 114-116 Tremont street.



THE HON. JOHN WANAMAKER,
Who is to build a big department store on the site of the old Music Hall in Boston.

Mr. Whittier, it is learned, is endeavoring to get the buildings on either side of Winter place.

As near as can be learned Mr. Wanamaker proposes to come to this city and start an emporium similar to those he is at present conducting in other large cities. With Music Hall remodelled he would have one of the largest stores in this city, and the other buildings remodelled would add to the size of the store. Moreover, it would give four spacious entrances: Winter, Washington, Bromfield and Tremont streets.

MUSICAL AMERICA

New York, February 25, 1899.

BOSTON, Feb. 20, 1899.

The sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was notable in that it presented to an American audience for the first time, the famous violinist, Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda), who chose for her number Spohr's concerto No. 8, in A minor, op. 47.

Lady Hallé was warmly welcomed, and after the concerto was recalled many times by the enthusiastic audience.

Her playing was marked by delicacy, clearness, pure intonation and a facility as regards technic that was ample in easily surmounting the difficulties of the composition. Her tone, although not large, was pure and possessed of carrying power. In most every respect she played in an unaffected, simple manner. The exception was in the slow movement, which was rendered dead and draggy in its effect because of a constant "shoving" about for intervals that gave the movement a sickly, sentimental twang not at all in accord with her otherwise highly artistic and definite interpretation. Mr. Gericke accompanied the concerto exquisitely.

The orchestral numbers were Schumann's "Genoveva," overture; symphonic variations, "Istar," by Vincent d'Indy; and Beethoven's symphony No. 3. "Istar" is a work in the ultra modern vein, in which color, orchestral devices, harmonies and dynamic contrasts appear in the most extravagant shapes and juxtaposition. Even as programme music it was obscure; as music pure and simple, melodic and harmonic, it was nothing; as a curiosity in modern musical invention, it was extremely interesting.

The Schumann overture and Beethoven symphony were read by Mr. Gericke in the loud and coarse manner of his present mode.

The skill and precision of the orchestra in the "Istar" number were superbly displayed.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The only event of unusual interest at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, last Wednesday and Thursday, was the appearance of Lady Hallé, who has long been known in Europe as one of the best violinists of modern times.

She made an excellent impression, playing Spohr's eighth concerto and Bruch's G minor concerto with technical facility, finished phrasing and unusually elegant bowing. It cannot be said, however, that her interpretations were distinguished by any particular breadth of style. All was polished, correct, and even brilliant, but there was little warmth of the kind that carries conviction to the hearers.

Twenty years ago Lady Hallé's playing might have been accepted as almost the last word on the violin; to-day, the day of Isaye, Sarasate and Burmester, it commands only respectful attention.

Nevertheless, Lady Hallé may find many admirers in this country, particularly among those musicians who preach objectivity as the aim of interpretative art. The orchestra accompanied well.

* * *

The opposition presented at the meeting of the New Music Hall Corporation, by the faction antagonistic to Mr. Higginson's ideas, did not prevail, being rather a feeble effort. The arrangements for the building of the new hall will now be carried forward to completion with as much despatch as possible.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1899.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The feature of yesterday afternoon's Boston symphony concert was the violin playing of Lady Hallé. This was her first appearance here, and it is much to be regretted that it was deferred until now. Lady Hallé is about 60 years old, but neither her appearance nor her playing indicates her age. She was heard in the eighth Spohr concerto (the "Gesangscene"), a work which permitted the violinist to exhibit her genius in all its phases. Her execution is dignified and refined. The cantabile passages were beautifully played with a delightfully sweet and pure tone and with admirable repose.

Her attack is positive. She does not give her hearers that feeling of nervous apprehension which some artists cause, but rather inspires them with a sense of security. Lady Hallé's intonation is pure and her phrasing artistic. Her playing of the passage in double stops and of the cadenza at the close of the famous concerto were brilliant exhibitions of her power. Her tone is full without being forced; this is due to her excellent bowing. Her left hand is finely developed, as her performance of the technically difficult portions of the "Gesangscene" showed. Lady Hallé impresses the listener with the perfect balance of her art.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra always plays well; yesterday it played even better than usual. Two great overtures, the "Carnival," by Dvorák, and Beethoven's "Leonore" and the "Harold" symphony, by Berlioz, were given under Mr. Gericke's direction. The viola obligato in the symphony was played by Mr. Kneisel, who revealed no new beauty in the work. The composition is neither a symphony nor a concerto; it does not afford the viola player a grateful medium, and as an orchestral work is not of great importance.

The overtures, representing composers of the beginning and end of the century, were given with spontaneity and fire. The orchestra's playing was an evidence of the fine material contained in it. The men reflected the unusual animation which Mr. Gericke displayed.

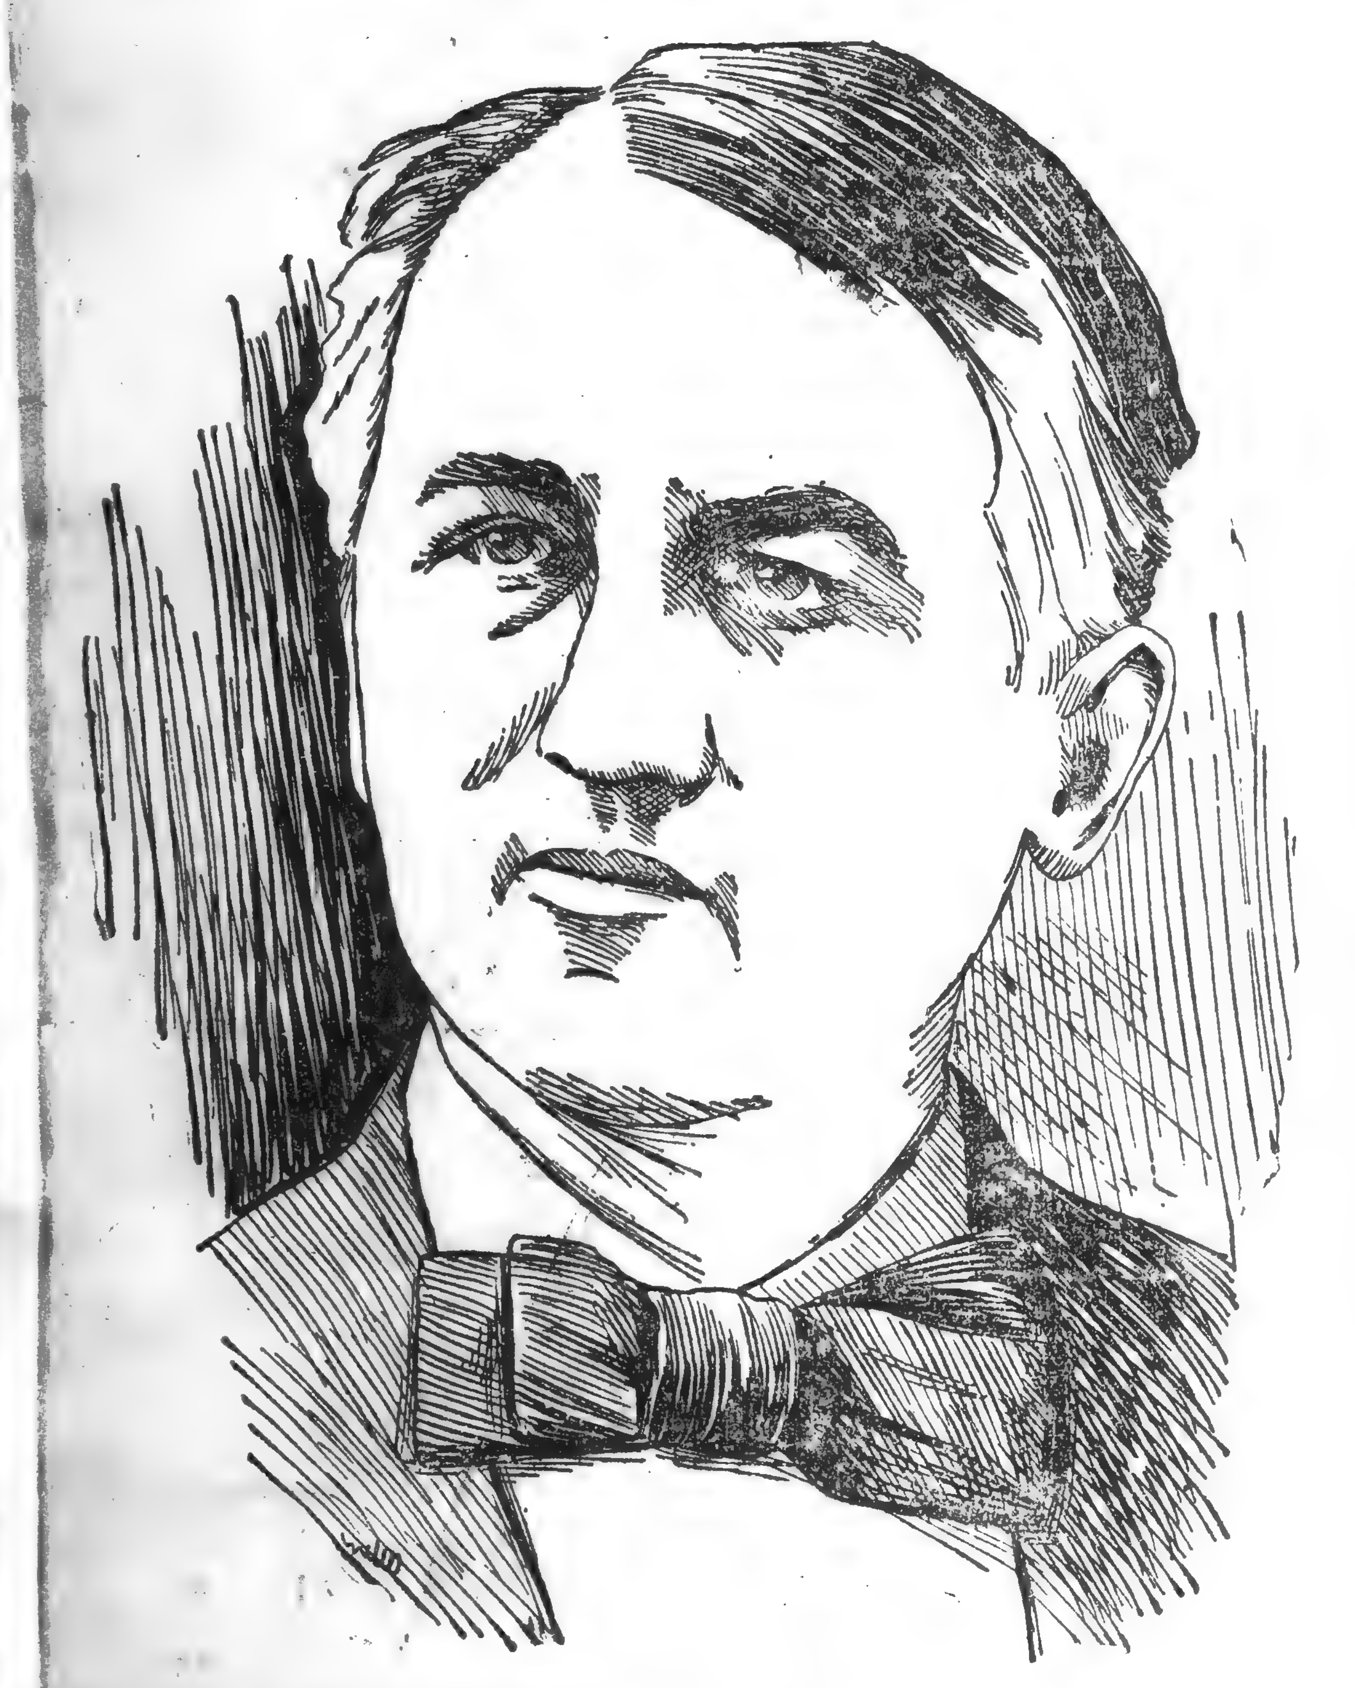
[illegible] 24

The Boston Traveler

WANAMAKER COMING TO TOWN

He Owns Music Hall Property With Entrances on Tremont, Bromfield, Winter and Washington Streets.

TO OPEN A BIG DEPARTMENT STORE



JOHN WANAMAKER.

Philadelphia merchant—the most famous Sunday School superintendent in the world, and ex-postmaster-general in President Harrison's cabinet. He has large department stores in Philadelphia, New York and Chicago. It is understood that he now contemplates opening in Boston, on the Music Hall site, the biggest department store in the city, with entrances on Winter, Bromfield and Washington streets, and another entrance on Hammond place, leading from Tremont street.

John Wanamaker of Philadelphia, it is understood, is soon to have a store in Boston that will eclipse anything in the line of a department store ever opened here.

Large parcels of real estate in the block bounded by Washington, Bromfield, Tremont and Winter streets, have been sold and resold during the past year. A mystery has been hanging over these sales, and all the leading business men of this city have been trying to ascertain the last pursHaser's name.

The principal transaction of all was the sale of the Boston Music Hall property by the Boston Real Estate Trust, which bought it a little more than 11 months ago through C. W. Whittier.

The latter, about three weeks ago, made a resale to a client, whose name at the time was unknown, but whom it has been since learned is John Wanamaker. Business reasons were given for withholding the name of the purchaser.

Mr. Whittier then sold to the same buyer the valuable parcel of land numbered 413-415 Washington street, owned by Harvard College trustees, and purchased from the Dix estate in 1897.

The price paid for the Music Hall property is said to be between $425,000 and $450,000, and for the Harvard College property about $190,000. Each parcel was sold at a profit.

It is now understood that the same buyer has the option on the Wesleyan building, 36 Bromfield street. This is owned by the Wesleyan Building Association, composed of leading Methodists.

It is a known fact that the "unknown" buyer has an option on this building because others in this city have tried to buy this building and were told it was about to be sold.

Another parcel of land on Tremont street, numbered 114 and 116 Tremont street, is at present occupied by a furniture concern. The unknown buyer, John Wanamaker, is about to take this valuable parcel of land, which will give him entrances on four of the principal streets of this city to the Music Hall property.

As near as can be learned Mr. Wanamaker proposes to come to this city and start an emporium similar to those he is at present conducting in other large cities. With Music Hall remodelled he would have one of the largest stores in this city, and the other buildings remodelled would add to the size of the store. Moreover, it would give four spacious entrances: Winter, Washington, Bromfield and Tremont streets.

While at present there is an entrance on Winter street, Mr. Wanamaker's agent in this city, C. W. Whittier, is trying to get the buildings on either side of Winter place. As there are leases on the Harvard College property running for four years, the old Music Hall property will probably stand for some time unless the leases are bought, which is a probability.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 26, 1899.

Maj H. L. Higginson and Mrs Higginson had a jolly party of New York friends lunching with them at the Albemarle Wednesday, having gone over to enjoy the repetition at Carnegie Music hall of the symphony concert program of last Friday. Others there were Mr and Mrs F. H. Shapleigh, who are moving to Lakewood and thence to Washington.

4

BOSTON POST,

WANAMAKER'S PLAN.

To Open Large Department Store in Boston — Music Hall and Other Buildings Said to Have Been Purchased.

A report is current that John Wanamaker of Philadelphia is to open a large department store in this city, and that it will occupy Music Hall and other buildings after such structures have been remodelled to suit the needs of a well equipped modern department store.

During the past year large parcels of real estate have passed hands in the area bounded by Washington, Bromfield, Tremont and Winter streets, and to these transactions there has been more or less of mystery.

The Music Hall property is said to have been sold to Wanamaker through C. W. Whittier about three weeks ago. Mr. Whittier could not be seen yesterday, as he is out of town. He is said to have also sold to the same purchaser the property numbered 413-415 Washington street, which was owned by the trustees of Harvard College, and which was a part of the Dix estate until 1897. It is said that the price brought by the Music Hall property approximated $450,000; that bought by the Harvard College property nearly $200,000. Wanamaker, through his representative, is also said to have an option on the Wesleyan building, 36 Bromfield street, owned by the Wesleyan Building Association, and also on the property 114-116 Tremont street.

THE HON. JOHN WANAMAKER.

Who is to build a big department store on the site of the old Music Hall in Boston.

Mr. Whittier, it is learned, is endeavoring to get the buildings on either side of Winter place.

As near as can be learned Mr. Wanamaker proposes to come to this city and start an emporium similar to those he is at present conducting in other large cities. With Music Hall remodelled he would have one of the largest stores in this city, and the other buildings remodelled would add to the size of the store. Moreover, it would give four spacious entrances: Winter, Washington, Bromfield and Tremont streets.

MUSICAL AMERICA

EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND

PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

New York, February 25, 1899.

BOSTON, Feb. 20, 1899

The sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was notable in that it presented to an American audience for the first time, the famous violinist, Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda), who chose for her number Spohr's concerto No 8, in A minor, op. 47.

Lady Hallé was warmly welcomed, and after the concerto was recalled many times by the enthusiastic audience.

Her playing was marked by delicacy, clearness, pure intonation and a facility as regards technic that was ample in easily surmounting the difficulties of the composition. Her tone, although not large, was pure and possessed of carrying power. In most every respect she played in an unaffected, simple manner. The exception was in the slow movement, which was rendered dead and draggy in its effect because of a constant "shoving" about for intervals that gave the movement a sickly, sentimental twang not at all in accord with her otherwise highly artistic and definite interpretation. Mr. Gericke accompanied the concerto exquisitely.

The orchestral numbers were Schumann's "Genoveva," overture; symphonic variations, "Istar," by Vincent d'Indy; and Beethoven's symphony No. 3. "Istar" is a work in the ultra modern vein, in which color, orchestral devices, harmonies and dynamic contrasts appear in the most extravagant shapes and juxtaposition. Even as programme music it was obscure; as music pure and simple, melodic and harmonic, it was nothing; as a curiosity in modern musical invention, it was extremely interesting.

The Schumann overture and Beethoven symphony were read by Mr. Gericke in the loud and coarse manner of his present mode.

The skill and precision of the orchestra in the "Istar" number were superbly displayed.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The only event of unusual interest at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, last Wednesday and Thursday, was the appearance of Lady Hallé, who has long been known in Europe as one of the best violinists of modern times.

She made an excellent impression, playing Spohr's eighth concerto and Bruch's G minor concerto with technical facility, finished phrasing and unusually elegant bowing. It cannot be said, however, that her interpretations were distinguished by any particular breadth of style. All was polished, correct, and even brilliant, but there was little warmth of the kind that carries conviction to the hearers.

Twenty years ago Lady Hallé's playing might have been accepted as almost the last word on the violin; to-day, the day of Isaye, Sarasate and Burmester, it commands only respectful attention.

Nevertheless, Lady Hallé may find many admirers in this country, particularly among those musicians who preach objectivity as the aim of interpretative art. The orchestra accompanied well.

◆

The opposition presented at the meeting of the New Music Hall Corporation, by the faction antagonistic to Mr. Higginson's ideas, did not prevail, being rather a feeble effort. The arrangements for the building of the new hall will now be carried forward to completion with as much despatch as possible.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1899.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The feature of yesterday afternoon's Boston symphony concert was the violin playing of Lady Hallé. This was her first appearance here, and it is much to be regretted that it was deferred until now. Lady Hallé is about 60 years old, but neither her appearance nor her playing indicates her age. She was heard in the eighth Spohr concerto (the "Gesangscene"), a work which permitted the violinist to exhibit her genius in all its phases. Her execution is dignified and refined. The cantabile passages were beautifully played with a delightfully sweet and pure tone and with admirable repose.

Her attack is positive. She does not give her hearers that feeling of nervous apprehension which some artists cause, but rather inspires them with a sense of security. Lady Hallé's intonation is pure and her phrasing artistic. Her playing of the passage in double stops and of the cadenza at the close of the famous concerto were brilliant exhibitions of her power. Her tone is full without being forced; this is due to her excellent bowing. Her left hand is finely developed, as her performance of the technically difficult portions of the "Gesangscene" showed. Lady Hallé impresses the listener with the perfect balance of her art.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra always plays well; yesterday it played even better than usual. Two great overtures, the "Carnival," by Dvorák, and Beethoven's "Leonore" and the "Harold" symphony, by Berlioz, were given under Mr. Gericke's direction. The viola obligato in the symphony was played by Mr. Kneisel, who revealed no new beauty in the work. The composition is neither a symphony nor a concerto; it does not afford the viola player a grateful medium, and as an orchestral work is not of great importance.

The overtures, representing composers of the beginning and end of the century, were given with spontaneity and fire. The orchestra's playing was an evidence of the fine material contained in it. The men reflected the unusual animation which Mr. Gericke displayed.

The New York Times.
"All the News That's Fit to Print."
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEB. 23, 1899.

MUSIC HEARD YESTERDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Afternoon Concert.

Some of the features of the fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, call for an earnest, though possibly useless, protest from the New York supporters of the organization. In the first place these concerts are advertised to begin "at 2 o'clock precisely." Yesterday afternoon's entertainment began at 2:25. It is customary to make prompt attendants at concerts wait ten minutes for those people who never consider any one beside themselves, but when it comes to keeping part of an audience nearly half an hour, it is time to object. However, this is a purely business matter, and will perhaps be remedied.

The other cause for complaint is even more serious because it is related to the artistic doings of the orchestra. The assertion has been made this season, and hotly denied, that the conductors of different orchestras indulge in a childish forcing of comparisons. If Mr. Paur conducts a certain work, some one else is sure to conduct it soon afterward, and thus the public is invited to hear the same composition twice simply in order to be convinced that this conductor reads it more beautifully than that one. The conductors vehemently vow that they are never actuated by such motives, yet the cold facts are not disconcerted by their avowals.

Not a great while ago Mr. Paur and his orchestra gave us Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, with Nahan Franko as the performer of the violin obbligato. Yesterday Mr. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave us the same work, with Mr. Kneisel as the viola player—and that, too, in spite of the fact that the soloist of the concert was a violinist. The number of persons in this city who hunger and thirst to hear this symphony twice in one season is painfully small, and it is not kind of Mr. Gericke to play it at us just to show that his men can do it better than ours. We are willing to admit that without hearing it. In fact we would be glad to admit that the Irkutsk Gruendhaus (if there be one) can play it better than ours because in that case we should not have to undergo the demonstration. As far as the authority of this journal goes, let it now proclaim with all its might and all its main that the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play the "Harold in Italy" symphony better than any other orchestra west of the meridian of Paris, and that Mr. Kneisel can make Childe Harold sing arpeggios through his nose in a manner that leaves nothing to be desired except a long and thoughtful silence, during which the congregation may be permitted to wonder what it is all about. These admissions having been made, we trust that we shall not again be arpeggioed to make a Berlioz holiday.

A more pleasant topic for discussion is the soloist of yesterday's concert, Lady Hallé, a violinist who has long enjoyed a well-earned reputation and who is one of the permanent favorites of London. Lady Hallé elected to make herself known to New York music lovers through the medium of Spohr's eighth violin concerto, the "Scena Concertanti," which he wrote in operatic style for use in his Italian tour, and which he played to the children of sunny Tuscany with great success. It was a wise choice, for if yesterday's performance was an adequate revelation of Lady Hallé's style, we should say that it was as classic as the composition.

A large tone is not expected of a woman, but Lady Hallé's tone is neither diminutive nor thin. It is large enough for such a work as that played yesterday, and it is uncommonly pure, sweet, and round. It is a smooth, fresh, and reposeful tone, natural, unforced, and penetrating, and it made a substantial foundation for a clean, graceful, and well-balanced performance. Lady Hallé's stopping is excellent—it rarely strays from accuracy, even in double notes—and her bowing is, while not forceful, clear, elastic, free, and elegant. She played yesterday with fine finish, with authority, and without tricks or affectations of any kind whatever. It cannot be said that her work was notable for warmth or expressiveness, but that was as much the fault of the composition as of the player. There was a lack of incisiveness in her accentuation of the last theme of the concerto, but aside from that her reading was one to command hearty praise. If yesterday's performance was a fair sample of her work, Lady Hallé may be regarded as a very accomplished artist of the classic school. She was warmly applauded.

In addition to the Berlioz symphony the orchestra played Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, and Beethoven's overture "Leonora," No. 3. Mr. Gericke's reading of the latter number was cold and conventional. The "Carnival" was excellently played. To-night a wholly different programme will be presented.

The Evening Post.
New York, Friday, February 24, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Halle was again the soloist at last evening's concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, where a large audience had occasion to admire her beautiful tone, adroit bowing, and refined art of interpretation, although even she could not conceal the fact that Bruch's concertos are cheap in their ornamentation and shallow in sentiment. The orchestra gave a finished performance of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," but there was not much of the Russian spirit in it. In the "Eroica" symphony the first movement held out a promise which was hardly kept in the funeral march, in which there was no agony. In the scherzo both orchestra and conductor were admirable. The novelty of the concert was Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," concerning which it is perhaps safe to defer judgment till after further hearing. It seemed chaotic, but brilliant and finely colored. Perhaps the chaos will resolve itself into order by and by.

The Evening Sun.
Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
The Evening Sun, per month .... .30
The Evening Sun, per year $2.00
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Gerick gave last night the fourth of its evening concerts at Carnegie Hall, and the audience that fill d nearly every chair in the hall was again an evidence of the established popularity of this Boston band with the musical public of Manhattan. Chief interest in last evening's concert, as in that of Wednesday afternoon, attached to the soloist of the two occasions, Lady Hallé, a violinist of established high position in England, but playing here for the first time.

Lady Hallé in appearance is a woman no longer young, with a pale, tired face that lights up most agreeably in response to the intentions of a composer or the attentions of an audience. She handicapped herself unnecessarily last evening with an unbecoming English gown of black satin, with elbow sleeves and white lace borders. The gown did not disguise, however, a slender, well-poised figure, that added grace and womanly strength to the general appearance of the violinist.

A full, sympathetic tone is the musicianly virtue of Lady Hallé's playing. Her selection last night was Bruch's concerto, No. 1, Op. 26, in G minor. There was a nervous stiffness in the opening allegro moderato, but this gave place to wholly graceful effect in the three-time adagio that, without interruption, followed it. The closing allegro energico made broader demands upon the violinist, but she met them with a dignity and skill that won uncommon approval from her audience. The recalls were enthusiastic and so persistent that, after a considerable interval of bows and bravas, it took a genuine hiss from half the audience to suppress the other half in order that the concert might go on.

The orchestral programme began and ended with familiar numbers, Tchaikowsky's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica." The symphony was played with dignified, if not inspiring, effect, and the tone of the orchestra was superb, happily no unusual achievement for the Boston players. The overture was neither highly picturesque nor highly romantic, but it appeared to give pleasure.

There was heard for the first time here a work of Vincent d'Indy, symphonic variations under the name of "Istar," which was not only strange to the audience, but also to the writer of programme explanations, who had pages of comment for the other numbers, but not one line for "Istar." If that writer had turned to ancient mythology, he might have found in Istar the Assyrian love-goddess who descended into the nether-world in search of her lover, and, being required to surrender some one garment or jewel to every gatekeeper, entered at last without dress or covering. The musical composition heard yesterday was a modern example of shimmery, shivery orchestral effects, through which a melody made itself at first only felt, then later became more distinct, and finally was heard in the simplicity of orchestral unison. This number was received with mental confusion, not to say actual alarm, by some persons in last night's house. It is likely to be heard again, however, and is sure to be received with interest.

Telegram.
HIGH WATER MARK
Circulation . . 320,000
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1899.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted a large and most attentive audience to Carnegie Hall last night. The programme offered could not have failed to please the most fastidious, and as played last night afforded an evening of pure musical delight. It consisted of Tchaikovsky's Overture Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" Max Bruch's concerto for violin No. 1, in G minor; symphonic variations, "Istar," by Vincent d'Indy, played here for the first time, and the "Ervica" symphony, by Beethoven.

Lady Halle was again the soloist and charmed her audience by the manner in which she played the Bruch concerto. An interpretation such as this artist gave of that beautiful work could only be given by one who was as thoroughly equipped with every artistic essential as is Lady Halle, gifted with musical instincts of an exceptional nature and a technique that knows no difficulties. Lady Halle played the concerto with great dignity and power. Her tone flowed from her instrument in a pure, sweet and penetrating stream; she threw a wealth of feeling into her work, and at the same time gave exquisite attention to every detail.

The novelty on the programme, the symphonic variations, is one of those modern descriptive compositions so frequently heard in recent times. It purposes to tell some tale of Eastern life, but as we are left to infer what the story is from the composition, it must be confessed we are still in the dark, as the music fails to suggest anything like a connected story. The tempi change so frequently, the themes have apparently so little connection with each other, and there are so many changes in the rhythms as to create an impression of dissatisfaction.

The Tchaikowsky number was superbly played and the "Eroica" symphony was given with a breadth and dignity that was highly impressive. The funeral march was well read. The chorus covered themselves with glory in the scherzo, and the tutti were splendid in their solidity and brilliance of tone.

The Evening Post.
New York, Thursday, Feb. 23, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fifty-three years after making her public début as a violinist, Lady Hallé has undertaken to conquer a new continent. She conquered Australia in 1890, South Africa in 1895—why not America in 1899? She was only seven years old when she played for the first time in Vienna, and won instantaneous success. She belongs to a family noted for its musical proclivities as far back as the beginning of the eighteenth century. The Nerudas constituted in the days of her childhood, a family band, and travelled in Russia, Germany, and Scandinavia. In Sweden, Miss Neruda not only won the usual laurels as a violinist, but a husband, Louis Norman. Three years after his death, she married, in 1888, the man whose name she now bears. For several decades she has been identified with the chamber-music interests in London, and her talent, success, and social position are believed to have had much to do with making the violin a fashionable instrument for young ladies to play.

Lady Hallé could not have appeared in this city under more favorable auspices than in association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and that finished accompanist Mr. Gericke. She played Spohr's eighth concerto, an old-fashioned piece, which, however, as she played it, was not tiresome. Her tone, without being strong, is deliciously pure and always agreeable. There is a feminine sweetness and tenderness about it which is as fascinating as a beautiful, smiling face. From her technique no one would infer her age; her runs are as smooth and flawless as they can have ever been, and her intonation is never at fault, even in the most difficult double stops. Her cantabile is expressive, and the only thing she seemed to lack was vigor; but that was perhaps the concerto's fault. At any rate it is pleasant, once in a while, to find a female artist whose shortcomings are on the masculine, not the feminine side.

The performance of Beethoven's Leonore overture was notable for the fine trumpet solo; but Mr. Gericke did not reveal the dramatic spirit of this famous work. Perhaps it would be unfair to chide him for not reading between the lines, and making a miniature music-drama of it as Wagner and Seidl did; but he might at least observe the written signs where they call for a climax. Toward the close, where the trombones come in, Beethoven uses not merely the ordinary fortissimo but fff. By attending to those, Anton Seidl used to produce a swelling climax suggesting the surging chords in "Tristan." He was accused of "Wagnerizing" Beethoven; but in this case he simply followed the letter of the text. Mr. Gericke's reading of Berlioz's "Harold" symphony was more satisfactory, and Mr. Kneisel's playing of the solo viola part was of ravishing beauty and effect, the performance of a true artist. There is much that is beautiful in this symphony, and much that is ugly. It should have been "boiled down" by its composer.

The [illegible] Press
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1899.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was made notable by the appearance of Lady Halle, the celebrated violinist, whose European reputation is of the highest and whose vogue in England is particularly marked. Lady Halle was heard in Max Bruch's concerto in G minor, which, while not giving her the full opportunity to display her varied powers at their best, did not prevent the beauty of her tone, her almost masculine technique, and her complete command of the instrument from being brought home to her auditors. In the first and second movement a certain suave melodiousness made the ringing sympathetic tone of Lady Halle's work particularly delightful and, in the adagio, there was some splendidly smooth and impressive interpretation, while the final movement was marked by technical difficulties in which the player evinced that thorough knowledge of her art as well as dexterity that easily justified her great reputation and the reception she received.

The orchestral selections afforded special contrasts in that the modernity of Dvorah and Wagner were set off against the ever-wonderful Eroica of Beethoven. The Dvorah carnival overture was rendered with splendid spirit, but the Wagner selections as arranged by Richter hardly met the dramatic possibilities by reason of their disjointed, haphazard character, though as a potpourri, the work is naturally on a higher plane than most arrangements of opera and music dramas. Yet the relation between Wagner's music and action is so close that the selections no matter how well welded, seem to be out of place and a trifle chaotic and unmeaning, particularly as Mr. Geriche is not much given to broad dramatic effects.

The symphony was Beethoven's No. 3, in E flat major, the Eroica, the reading of Mr. Geriche being scholarly, if at times a little draggy, his effort being to give Beethoven after the older manner. The orchestra was as usual in fine form and the interpretation was finish itself.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.
THURSDAY EVENING, FEB. 23, 1899.

Although Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is frequently dubbed a classicist, the term being used with the implied reproach of not being in sympathy with romantic music, he put to his credit yesterday afternoon a reading of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture that must have stirred every hearer, and that did so, if one could judge by the spontaneous applause of the big Carnegie Hall audience. It is some time since this brilliant composition of the Bohemian master has been played here with the refined strength, the intensity coupled with delicacy in the more intricate parts, that Mr. Gericke and his men gave to its presentation yesterday.

Mr. Seidl frequently conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra through its difficult mazes, painting in broad strokes and using bright lights and heavy shadows; the effect was often magical even though the orchestra's occasional crudities tended toward brutalizing some of Dvorak's more energetic passages, for Mr. Seidl knew Dvorak's secrets and sympathized with his ideas, better than any other living conductor. Mr. Gericke's reading lacked the reckless, daring, fascinating quality of Mr. Seidl's, but instead it had a confident, intelligent, snappy air that counted for much and that made the overture a thing of exuberant beauty.

From Dvorak in one of his most headlong dashes to Spohr at a mincing gait that seemed to lead backward as often as forward and that frequently degenerated to "marking time," was the contrast afforded by yesterday's programme. The Spohr piece was one of the composer's most amiable productions, his eighth concerto for violin, frequently called the "Gesangszene," the soloist being Lady Halle, whose maiden name, Norman Neruda, is as thoroughly familiar as her present title. Spohr's composition has so little in common with the thought of to-day, save, perhaps, in its earlier portion, that its appeal has shrunk to small dimensions. Lady Halle played it in a way that suggested her entire satisfaction with the composition and its limitations. Her tone was small enough and her style precise enough to fit easily into the shallow mold. Lady Halle, who is a newcomer here, though she has won fame in nearly every other civilized country of the world, played with spirit and an evident enjoyment of her task. Barring a tendency toward sentimentality, not surprising under the circumstances, her performance of the Spohr concerto was extremely satisfactory.

To-night, when Lady Halle plays the G minor Bruch concerto, her powers may be more fully summoned forth than yesterday. Bruch is not a giant, by any means, but his music calls for a little more masculinity than Spohr's. The audience yesterday gave Lady Halle an uncommonly enthusiastic welcome.

The Beethoven "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" symphony, the latter with viola obligato, played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, constituted the second half of the programme. With Beethoven, Mr. Gericke is on terms as familiar as is consonant with respect. The "Leonore" overture went with a steady and resistless progress that was often thrilling.

In the Berlioz symphony, the Boston men played with all the finesse called for by this always extraordinary music. In the second movement, "March of the Pilgrims," the delicacy and shrewdness of touch with which the fascinating rhythms and harmonies were brought out was quite captivating. The last movement, with its roar and rush and rattle, was also played admirably. Mr. Kneisel, who, by the way, held himself in reserve until the Berlioz symphony begun, did full justice to the viola obligato.

At this evening's Carnegie Hall concert the Boston Symphony orchestra will play the Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, and set of symphonic variations by Vincent d'Indy, entitled "Istar," which latter the Boston critics pronounced remarkably interesting when it was played there last week. Lady Halle, as already mentioned, will play the first Bruch violin concerto.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

The New York Press
DAILY EDITION.
New York, Thursday, Feb. 23, 1899.

LADY HALLE IN CONCERT.

Gifted Violinist Heard at Symphony Orchestra Matinee.

At the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carregie Hall yesterday, Lady Halle (Norma Neruda), the violinist, played in masterful manner the Spohr concerto, No. 8, in A minor.

Lady Halle is too well known to need any description of her work. That she is one of the greatest artists of the day is conceded. To-night she will play the Max Bruch concerto, No. 1, in G minor, op. 26.

The orchestra, under Mr. Gericke, played the Carnival overture, op. 92, by Dvorak; Beethoven's Leonore overture, No. 3, op. 72, and the Harold symphony, No. 3, in G major, by Berlioz, with viola obligato, played by Franz Kneisel.

To-night's programme is: Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky; concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, op. 26, Max Bruch; symphonic variations, "Istar," Vincent d'Indy, and the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven.

[illegible]

[illegible]DAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Lady Hallé was again the solo performer at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth visit to New-York this season. The concert took place last night in Carnegie Hall, and proved to be one of the most delightful affairs of its kind that the winter has offered. Lady Hallé played Bruch's first concerto for violin with faultless intonation and with considerable more breadth and depth of tone than were manifest in the Spohr concerto on Wednesday afternoon. Her success with the audience was complete and emphatic, and deservedly so, though a certain nervousness of manner prevented the first movement from sounding as reposeful and authoritative as did the finale. Here there was a youthful dash and vivacity which took her listeners quite off their feet.

Besides the concerto, the programme contained three numbers, two of which were familiar and one was an utter novelty. They were Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (which will be played by the New-York Philharmonic Society this afternoon and to-morrow evening); Beethoven's symphony, "Eroica," and a set of symphonic variations by Vincent d'Indy, entitled "Istar." With the last Mr. Gericke gave the orchestra's patrons as pretty a puzzle as they have ever had. The annotated programme contained many pages about the familiar music, but not one about the fantasia composition, whose title was probably as bewildering as its form to the vast majority of those who heard it. Much is asked of those who would follow the progress of latter-day music; in this case nothing less than a chapter of Assyrian mythology.

In the absence of information on the subject of the composer's intentions, it may be assumed that M. d'Indy attempted a musical delineation of Istar's descent into Hades in search of her husband-lover Tammuz. Istar was an Oriental love-goddess of unspeakable antiquity. In visiting the underground world she was compelled by each of the guardians of its portals to divest herself of an article of ornament and dress, till at last she passed through the last portal entirely nude. The composer of the variations invented an ingenious scheme to illustrate the series of adventures, the most novel feature of which was to reverse the old process and present the variations first and the theme last. Only a fragment of the theme is heard at the outset, and this is tricked out with a deal of scintillant ornament. As the music goes on the melodic foundation is augmented until at last the theme stalks forth in its whole stature and in complete nudity—a pompous unisono of the strings and brass. Whatever else may be said about the music, which it is impossible to grasp fully at a single hearing, the structural device is at least ingenious, and we should like its better acquaintance. It is a favorite amusement of smart critics of late to affect contempt for the notes which have become the rule on symphonic programmes. No doubt some of them are foolish and idle enough, but it would be interesting to know what sort of an idea of Vincent d'Indy's variations was carried away last night by the people to whom the title "Istar" conveyed no information.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1899.

LADY HALLE'S DEBUT.

The feature of special interest at the Boston Symphony concert, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon, was the appearance of Lady Hallé, the violinist. Lady Hallé, or Norman Neruda, to give the name by which she is best known, is making her first tour of this country. She comes of a family which has been continuously active in German musical circles, especially as violin players, since the early part of the last century.

Lady Hallé played yesterday Spohr's violin concerto, No. 8, in A minor, "In Modo d'Una Scena Cantante." She displayed an excellent technical command of the instrument, produced a warm, vibrant, though not very large tone, and her interpretation was musicianly and expressive. She was very well received.

The orchestra played with its usual proficiency and tonal beauty Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Berlioz's "Harold" symphony.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Lady Hallé's Violin Playing Again the Centre of Interest.

The interest of the audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie [illegible] night again centred in the playing [illegible] Lady Hallé, the violinist. She gave Bruch's G minor concerto, an effective medium, in a manner which betokened the experienced and developed artist. She forced her tone somewhat in the first movement, but redeemed herself in the adagio, which she played with the utmost delicacy and sweetness. The finale was given with an impetuosity and brilliance surprising even those who knew the artist's abilities. An unpleasant quality of Lady Hallé's playing is a tendency to slide too slowly from one note to another on the same string, in slow passages. But when [illegible] other admirable points of her work are considered, this can be forgiven.

The orchestra played Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Eroica" symphony, and symphonic variations entitled [illegible] by Vincent d'Indy, heard here [illegible] the first time. The scoring of [illegible] composition is in the end-of-the-century [illegible] and it is dependent for interest on [illegible] effects and combinations in orchestration [illegible] than on its intrinsic merits. [illegible] splendidly throughout. [illegible] the symphony is ele[illegible] inspired. [illegible] audience was

---

The New-York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 24, 1899.

MUSIC HEARD YESTERDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Lady Halle Play Excellently.

Whatever dissatisfaction may have been aroused by the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée concert on Wednesday, there could not have been any with the entertainment given at Carnegie Hall last night. It was the fourth evening concert of the season and it was attended by a numerous and apparently critical audience. There was certainly an attitude of calm observation when Lady Halle, who was again the soloist, began her share of the evening's work; but when she had finished it, the audience bestowed upon her an unqualified demonstration, marred only by the foolish persistence of some encore demanders who continued to bruise their palms after it had been made clear to all others that no encore number was to be forthcoming. Lady Halle deserves praise for refusing to dim in the minds of the judicious the bright impression of her playing of the concerto, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Gericke will see to it that the Boston Symphony concerts never cater to those who ask for more than has been promised them in return for their money.

The programme last night consisted of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture in fantasia form, Max Bruch's G minor violin concerto, Vincent d'Indy's symphonic poem, "Istar," heard for the first time here, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This formed a compact and well-balanced programme, and did not necessarily weary the hearer. As a rule creative work takes precedence of interpretation, and d'Indy's composition might under that rule claim the place of honor, but we unhesitatingly accord the position to the lady. It was an almost unalloyed delight to hear such a clean, straightforward, musicianly performance of the Bruch concerto as Lady Halle gave last evening. The alloy was infused into the enjoyment by some uncertainty in the intonation of the higher double-stopping in the finale and by a slight deficiency in incisiveness of accent and general brightness of style in that movement.

Her playing of the first two movements, however, was beautiful, and could have been done only by a true artist, well equipped with technical skill and stage experience, and gifted with strong musical instincts. It was a performance conspicuous for its lofty serenity, its fine poise, its polished dignity. It was not cold—far from it; it was full of feeling. But it was feeling guided in artistic channels. The contour of the melos was never blurred; the details of the phrasing were never slurred. The music flowed from the instrument in a stream of pure, vibrant, penetrating tone, with a wealth of nuance in its utterance, with breadth and dignity of style, with just a delicious touch of womanly reserve, without attempts at exaggeration. The slow movement was fluently and thoughtfully sung, and its close left the hearer with a feeling of complete satisfaction.

D'Indy's composition, suggested by a psychologic tale in Eastern poetry, proved to be one of those works which are common in our day. Mr. Apthorp, who writes the programme books of these concerts, dealt the work a deadly blow by leaving it to tell its own story, which it utterly failed to to. Music can express moods, but when it tries to tell a story it needs the help of text. D'Indy's composition contains all the changes of tempo and thematic matter, alterations of rhythm, and tricks of instrumentation which are common to story-telling music; but music has to be judged as music, and as such this work must be pronounced fragmentary in matter, disjointed, and for three-quarters of its length dry and wearisome. It closing passage is one of real effectiveness written for violins, violas, cellos, horns, and trombones in unison. The work was well played, but there was a scherzando passage, composed in an idiom so foreign to the orchestra, that not even the Boston artists could make it sound well.

Except for one unfortunate and inexplicable false note by the tuba, the Tschaikowsky number was superbly played, with a solidity, richness, and balance of tone quite perfect, with flawless precision and unanimity, and with splendid masculinity of style. Such a reading as Mr. Gericke gave this work was enough to prove that he is not always in a cold mood. His interpretation of the "Eroica" was broad, vigorous, and dramatic, without wholly sacrificing the traditions of the classic style. He did not make some of the ritardandi employed by many conductors in the first movement, and possibly may have given the impression that his tempo was much too fast, but it was very little more than that indicated by the metronome mark. The funeral march was nobly read, the climax at the first return of the brass theme being admirably produced. The horns, as usual, covered themselves with glory in the trio of the scherzo, and the tutti were always solid and brilliant in tone. Altogether it was a notably good concert.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Programmes for this Wednesday afternoon and to-morrow, Thursday evening, respectively: Dvorak, overture, "Carnival," op. 92; Spohr, concerto for violin No. 8; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72; Berlioz, symphony No. 3, in G major, with viola obligata by Franz Kneisel, "Harold in Italy," op. 16.——Tschaikowsky, overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" Bruch, concerto for violin No. 1, in G minor; Vincent d'Indy, symphonic variations, "Istar" (first time); Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica." Soloist: Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda).

New-York [illegible]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday, and Carnegie Hall was well filled with an audience that rejoiced, as New-York audiences have often rejoiced before, at the marvellously beautiful tonal quality, balance and sonority of that band, which seemed yesterday at one of its highest points of excellence, and at the noble and eloquent readings which Mr. Gericke gives of music with which he is in complete sympathy. They heard such readings as Dvorak's "Carnival" overture and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. Both were played with splendid eloquence and vigor, and the "Leonore" with a breadth of view and dramatic accent that put it high among Mr. Gericke's achievements. Dvorak's "Carnival," though it does not, perhaps, stand among his productions of the first rank, is one of the ruddiest and fullest-blooded of them, and justifies its title—the justification being furthered yesterday by the rich color and expansive spirit in which it was reproduced. The symphony was that of Berlioz's called "Harold in Italy," in which Mr. Kneisel played the viola obbligata part. Not all the care which the orchestra lavished upon its details nor the consummate art of Mr. Kneisel's playing could make this piece seem alive or bring it into relation with the living art of to-day. Like so much else of Berlioz's music, repeated scrutiny discloses it to be the skilful manufacture of a man desperately anxious to be among the great ones, and to say great things, but often able to give voice to nothing deeper than grandiose phraseology, a gaunt framework of empty phrases dressed in the gorgeous habiliments of glittering orchestration. But orchestration, as we have frequent occasion to observe in the works of some of the young men of to-day, is not enough to carry through a lack of idea; most clever conservatory pupils, having got the seed, can raise the flowers. And even Berlioz's orchestration, nowadays, sometimes begins to show a frayed edge. There are places in the "Harold" symphony, for instance, where it seems wiry and unpleasing, with more of noise than richness.

The concert had a special interest in that it introduced to a New-York audience a violinist of distinguished reputation, Lady Halle. She has for long years been one of the most noted of her craft in England—noted alike for her performances of the great works of the solo violinist's repertory and as a member of string quartets that have given London some of the keenest musical delights. The New-York public has learned to distrust the estimates put by European publics upon their favorites, particularly when they reach these shores with the momentum acquired by long-standing traditions of success and enveloped with the authority therefrom derived. Such estimates have frequently been reversed; in the case of Lady Halle, fortunately, there need be no such disagreeable proceeding. She is an artist of high attainments and high ideals; that was made unmistakable at the very beginning of her performance. Her tone is small, but of charming quality, and her technique fluent and dextrous. Her art is, perhaps, small, but it is none the less exquisite, and exercises a potent charm. The Spohr concerto called the "Gesangscene," in which she chose first to display her powers, is a somewhat saccharine work of old-fashioned substance, and is eminently adapted to the kind of treatment she gave it, though, doubtless, it may be made somewhat more robust. It may appear to-night, when she will play Bruch's G minor concerto, that she commands a broader style than she showed yesterday, but she will scarcely give greater pleasure. Lady Halle's playing does not illumine the chambers of the heart that are reserved for the greatest emotions, but it is delightfully feminine in its attributes.

The North American

Daily Advertiser and United States Gazette.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One of the Best Musical Entertainments of the Season Given Last Night.

At the Academy of Music last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of the present season. Mr. William Gericke was again in command, and a most beautiful and well selected programme was enjoyed.

These concerts are the most delightful musical events of the season, and the one given last evening was no deviation from the rule, hence the rare enjoyment by the large and intelligent audience. The opening numbers of the programme were admirably given, Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, so full of rippling melody and musical rhythm, and Richter's arrangement of selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," found rich expression in the skilful orchestration. The feature of the concert, however, was the grand third symphony of Beethoven, generally known as the "Eroica."

In this wonderful composition the author takes up the divine art where Mozart and Haydn left it, and carries it to a height which no other musician of any time has ever rivalled. The music is marvellously descriptive, and the wonderful scherzo is by some said to represent "the revel of the unburied dead," while the funeral march has certainly never been equalled. Although very familiar to this city, new beauties were unfolded by the skilful treatment of the leader.

Mme. Norman Neruda was the soloist of the occasion, and played Max Bruch's concerto for the violin, No. 1. While the composition is obscure as an entirety, it afforded the soloist opportunities to display her splendid control of the violin. Her execution leaves very little to be desired, while her grip upon the instrument and her bowing reminds one of M. Wieniawski.

[illegible]

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 21, 1899.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Lady Halle's Success—A Violinist of Wonderful Accomplishments—A Misarranged Programme.

There should be, and doubtless are, many symphonies within the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which might be chosen to complete a programme containing modern works by Dvorak, Bruch and Wagner in its first part without the necessity of misplacing Beethoven's Eroica Symphony as the final number, and there can therefore be little excuse offered for the arrangement of that most stupid sequence of musical contributions which constituted last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Everything that preceded the Beethoven number, and the whole balance of the programme preceded it, operated against a complete enjoyment of the symphony. Even the few minutes occupied by the "entr' acte" would be insufficient to reinstate a mind at the point where the beauty of primitive simplicity might be fully appreciated after the whirlwind of melody which preceded it. But when even the efficacy of this medicinal solitude has an antidote in Wagner's music a result is attained where musical intoxication demands some profferment more elaborate in form and thought than the Eroica Symphony to conclude an evening's enjoyment. In short, if there ever was a place on any programme where that work should not have been it was the position occupied by it last night.

Up to the time when that number began the concert had been one of unalloyed pleasure. Every phrase of the orchestra was a unanimous paragraph, and the compositions were read with great vigor and intelligence. The soloist, Lady Halle, heard here for the first time, illustrated her great art with the first few phrases which were uttered from her instrument. The Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, is a composition which abounds with musical difficulties. Whether these extend to extraordinary technical demands from the executant, only a skilled violinist may say. Most certainly they could not convey that impression to one who witnessed Lady Halle's easy mastery of them. The principal great characteristics of this great woman's musical accomplishments seem to be in the absolute perfection of her pianissimo and the completeness of her rhythmical accent. Her arpeggios are turned with beautiful grace and charm, and the pulse of the tone her instrument emits, particularly from the lower strings, is strong in sympathy and carries an insinuation with its command that cannot be denied. Per contra, it may be said that some of this quality disappeared in the forte passages, and the near strings were less characteristic, but these are slight discrepancies when taken in connection with her great strength of musical phrase and her perfection of rhythm. The instrument she used was a Stradivarius of 1709, which at one time belonged to Ernst.

Wilhelm Gericke conducted with a far greater authority than on the occasion of his last concert, at which time his virility had been impaired through sickness, and it may be concluded that he has the men thoroughly instructed in his mode of discipline by this time. It may, therefore, be concluded that the standard of excellence, for this season at least, was reached by the orchestra last night, and as an illustration of ensemble excellence it is hard to imagine wherein it might be improved. But programmes arranged with a clearer idea of musical ethics and the presentation of a few of those novelties which are being heard elsewhere would tend to make the concerts more interesting. The final concert of the series takes place Monday, March 20, and, if the list of soloists as announced has no further change, Teresa Carreno will be the soloist.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, February 21, 1899.

Boston Symphony Concert — Academy of Music.

In these days of showy playing it is a pleasure to listen to a violinist like Lady Halle, who was the soloist of the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last evening. We have been treated so often to mere displays of clever technique that an artist such as she, who places sentiment above mere musical gymnastics, is something for which to be thankful. In the concerto in G minor, by Max Bruch, which was her selection for last evening, Lady Halle was heard at her best in the two first movements, her piano passages being particularly beautiful. The allegro energico, which constitutes the third movement, was somewhat lacking in strength, although its technical difficulties were finely handled. The rest of the programme consisted of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture; a series of selections from "Siegfried," and the "Twilight of the Gods," arranged by Hans Richter; and the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Lady Hallé was again the solo performer at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth visit to New-York this season. The concert took place last night in Carnegie Hall, and proved to be one of the most delightful affairs of its kind that the winter has offered. Lady Hallé played Bruch's first concerto for violin with faultless intonation and with considerable more breadth and depth of tone than were manifest in the Spohr concerto on Wednesday afternoon. Her success with the audience was complete and emphatic, and deservedly so, though a certain nervousness of manner prevented the first movement from sounding as reposeful and authoritative as did the finale. Here there was a youthful dash and vivacity which took her listeners quite off their feet.

Besides the concerto, the programme contained three numbers, two of which were familiar and one was an utter novelty. They were Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (which will be played by the New-York Philharmonic Society this afternoon and to-morrow evening); Beethoven's symphony, "Eroica," and a set of symphonic variations by Vincent d'Indy, entitled "Istar." With the last Mr. Gericke gave the orchestra's patrons as pretty a puzzle as they have ever had. The annotated programme contained many pages about the familiar music, but not one about the fantasia composition, whose title was probably as bewildering as its form to the vast majority of those who heard it. Much is asked of those who would follow the progress of latter-day music; in this case nothing less than a chapter of Assyrian mythology.

In the absence of information on the subject of the composer's intentions, it may be assumed that M. d'Indy attempted a musical delineation of Istar's descent into Hades in search of her husband-lover Tammuz. Istar was an Oriental love-goddess of unspeakable antiquity. In visiting the underground world she was compelled by each of the guardians of its portals to divest herself of an article of ornament and dress, till at last she passed through the last portal entirely nude. The composer of the variations invented an ingenious scheme to illustrate the series of adventures, the most novel feature of which was to reverse the old process and present the variations first and the theme last. Only a fragment of the theme is heard at the outset, and this is tricked out with a deal of scintillant ornament. As the music goes on the melodic foundation is augmented until at last the theme stalks forth in its whole stature and in complete nudity—a pompous unisono of the strings and brass. Whatever else may be said about the music, which it is impossible to grasp fully at a single hearing, the structural device is at least ingenious, and we should like its better acquaintance. It is a favorite amusement of smart critics of late to affect contempt for the notes which have become the rule on symphonic programmes. No doubt some of them are foolish and idle enough, but it would be interesting to know what sort of an idea of Vincent d'Indy's variations was carried away last night by the people to whom the title "Istar" conveyed no information.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1899.

LADY HALLE'S DEBUT.

The feature of special interest at the Boston Symphony concert, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon, was the appearance of Lady Hallé, the violinist. Lady Hallé, or Norman Neruda, to give the name by which she is best known, is making her first tour of this country. She comes of a family which has been continuously active in German musical circles, especially as violin players, since the early part of the last century.

Lady Hallé played yesterday Spohr's violin concerto, No. 8, in A minor, "In Modo d'Una Scena Cantante." She displayed an excellent technical command of the instrument, produced a warm, vibrant, though not very large tone, and her interpretation was musicianly and expressive. She was very well received.

The orchestra played with its usual proficiency and tonal beauty Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Berlioz's "Harold" symphony.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Lady Halle's Violin Playing Again the Centre of Interest.

The interest of the audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall last night again centred in the playing of Lady Hallé, the violinist. She gave Bruch's G minor concerto, an effective medium, in a manner which betokened the experienced and developed artist. She forced her tone somewhat in the first movement, but redeemed herself in the adagio, which she played with the utmost delicacy and sweetness. The finale was given with an impetuosity and brilliance surprising even those who knew the artist's abilities. An unpleasant quality of Lady Hallé's playing is a tendency to slide too slowly from one note to another on the same string, in slow passages. But when the other admirable points of her work are considered, this can be forgiven.

The orchestra played Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Eroica" symphony, and symphonic variations entitled "Istar" by Vincent d'Indy, heard here for the first time. The scoring of this composition is in the end-of-the-century style and it is dependent for interest on its unusual effects and combinations in orchestration rather than on its intrinsic merits. The orchestra played splendidly throughout. Mr. Gericke's reading of the symphony is elegant and polished if not deeply inspired. A very large and friendly audience was

---

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 24, 1899.

MUSIC HEARD YESTERDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Lady Halle Play Excellently.

Whatever dissatisfaction may have been aroused by the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée concert on Wednesday, there could not have been any with the entertainment given at Carnegie Hall last night. It was the fourth evening concert of the season and it was attended by a numerous and apparently critical audience. There was certainly an attitude of calm observation when Lady Halle, who was again the soloist, began her share of the evening's work; but when she had finished it, the audience bestowed upon her an unqualified demonstration, marred only by the foolish persistence of some encore demanders who continued to bruise their palms after it had been made clear to all others that no encore number was to be forthcoming. Lady Halle deserves praise for refusing to dim in the minds of the judicious the bright impression of her playing of the concerto, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Gericke will see to it that the Boston Symphony concerts never cater to those who ask for more than has been promised them in return for their money.

The programme last night consisted of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture in fantasia form, Max Bruch's G minor violin concerto, Vincent d'Indy's symphonic poem, "Istar," heard for the first time here, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This formed a compact and well-balanced programme, and did not necessarily weary the hearer. As a rule creative work takes precedence of interpretation, and d'Indy's composition might under that rule claim the place of honor, but we unhesitatingly accord the position to the lady. It was an almost unalloyed delight to hear such a clean, straightforward, musicianly performance of the Bruch concerto as Lady Halle gave last evening. The alloy was infused into the enjoyment by some uncertainty in the intonation of the higher double-stopping in the finale and by a slight deficiency in incisiveness of accent and general brightness of style in that movement.

Her playing of the first two movements, however, was beautiful, and could have been done only by a true artist, well equipped with technical skill and stage experience, and gifted with strong musical instincts. It was a performance conspicuous for its lofty serenity, its fine poise, its polished dignity. It was not cold—far from it; it was full of feeling. But it was feeling guided in artistic channels. The contour of the melos was never blurred; the details of the phrasing were never slurred. The music flowed from the instrument in a stream of pure, vibrant, penetrating tone, with a wealth of nuance in its utterance, with breadth and dignity of style, with just a delicious touch of womanly reserve, without attempts at exaggeration. The slow movement was fluently and thoughtfully sung, and its close left the hearer with a feeling of complete satisfaction.

D'Indy's composition, suggested by a psychologic tale in Eastern poetry, proved to be one of those works which are common in our day. Mr. Apthorp, who writes the programme books of these concerts, dealt the work a deadly blow by leaving it to tell its own story, which it utterly failed to to. Music can express moods, but when it tries to tell a story it needs the help of text. D'Indy's composition contains all the changes of tempo and thematic matter, alterations of rhythm, and tricks of instrumentation which are common to story-telling music; but music has to be judged as music, and as such this work must be pronounced fragmentary in matter, disjointed, and for three-quarters of its length dry and wearisome. It closing passage is one of real effectiveness written for violins, violas, cellos, horns, and trombones in unison. The work was well played, but there was a scherzando passage, composed in an idiom so foreign to the orchestra, that not even the Boston artists could make it sound well.

Except for one unfortunate and inexplicable false note by the tuba, the Tschaikowsky number was superbly played, with a solidity, richness, and balance of tone quite perfect, with flawless precision and unanimity, and with splendid masculinity of style. Such a reading as Mr. Gericke gave this work was enough to prove that he is not always in a cold mood. His interpretation of the "Eroica" was broad, vigorous, and dramatic, without wholly sacrificing the traditions of the classic style. He did not make some of the ritardandi employed by many conductors in the first movement, and possibly may have given the impression that his tempo was much too fast, but it was very little more than that indicated by the metronome mark. The funeral march was nobly read, the climax at the first return of the brass theme being admirably produced. The horns, as usual, covered themselves with glory in the trio of the scherzo, and the tutti were always solid and brilliant in tone. Altogether it was a notably good concert.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Programmes for this Wednesday afternoon and to-morrow, Thursday evening, respectively: Dvorak, overture, "Carnival," op. 92; Spohr, concerto for violin No. 8; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72; Berlioz, symphony No. 3, in G major, with viola obligata by Franz Kneisel, "Harold in Italy," op. 16.——Tschaikowsky, overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" Bruch, concerto for violin No. 1, in G minor; Vincent d'Indy, symphonic variations, "Istar" (first time); Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica." Soloist: Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda).

New-York Daily Tribune.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday, and Carnegie Hall was well filled with an audience that rejoiced, as New-York audiences have often rejoiced before, at the marvellously beautiful tonal quality, balance and sonority of that band, which seemed yesterday at one of its highest points of excellence, and at the noble and eloquent readings which Mr. Gericke gives of music with which he is in complete sympathy. They heard such readings as Dvorak's "Carnival" overture and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. Both were played with splendid eloquence and vigor, and the "Leonore" with a breadth of view and dramatic accent that put it high among Mr. Gericke's achievements. Dvorak's "Carnival," though it does not, perhaps, stand among his productions of the first rank, is one of the ruddiest and fullest-blooded of them, and justifies its title—the justification being furthered yesterday by the rich color and expansive spirit in which it was reproduced. The symphony was that of Berlioz's called "Harold in Italy," in which Mr. Kneisel played the viola obbligata part. Not all the care which the orchestra lavished upon its details nor the consummate art of Mr. Kneisel's playing could make this piece seem alive or bring it into relation with the living art of to-day. Like so much else of Berlioz's music, repeated scrutiny discloses it to be the skilful manufacture of a man desperately anxious to be among the great ones, and to say great things, but often able to give voice to nothing deeper than grandiose phraseology, a gaunt framework of empty phrases dressed in the gorgeous habiliments of glittering orchestration. But orchestration, as we have frequent occasion to observe in the works of some of the young men of to-day, is not enough to carry through a lack of idea; most clever conservatory pupils, having got the seed, can raise the flowers. And even Berlioz's orchestration, nowadays, sometimes begins to show a frayed edge. There are places in the "Harold" symphony, for instance, where it seems wiry and unpleasing, with more of noise than richness.

The concert had a special interest in that it introduced to a New-York audience a violinist of distinguished reputation, Lady Halle. She has for long years been one of the most noted of her craft in England—noted alike for her performances of the great works of the solo violinist's repertory and as a member of string quartets that have given London some of the keenest musical delights. The New-York public has learned to distrust the estimates put by European publics upon their favorites, particularly when they reach these shores with the momentum acquired by long-standing traditions of success and enveloped with the authority therefrom derived. Such estimates have frequently been reversed; in the case of Lady Halle, fortunately, there need be no such disagreeable proceeding. She is an artist of high attainments and high ideals; that was made unmistakable at the very beginning of her performance. Her tone is small, but of charming quality, and her technique fluent and dextrous. Her art is, perhaps, small, but it is none the less exquisite, and exercises a potent charm. The Spohr concerto called the "Gesangscene," in which she chose first to display her powers, is a somewhat saccharine work of old-fashioned substance, and is eminently adapted to the kind of treatment she gave it, though, doubtless, it may be made somewhat more robust. It may appear to-night, when she will play Bruch's G minor concerto, that she commands a broader style than she showed yesterday, but she will scarcely give greater pleasure. Lady Halle's playing does not illumine the chambers of the heart that are reserved for the greatest emotions, but it is delightfully feminine in its attributes.

The North American

Daily Advertiser and United States Gazette.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One of the Best Musical Entertainments of the Season Given Last Night.

At the Academy of Music last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of the present season. Mr. William Gericke was again in command, and a most beautiful and well selected programme was enjoyed.

These concerts are the most delightful musical events of the season, and the one given last evening was no deviation from the rule, hence the rare enjoyment by the large and intelligent audience. The opening numbers of the programme were admirably given, Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, so full of rippling melody and musical rhythm, and Richter's arrangement of selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," found rich expression in the skilful orchestration. The feature of the concert, however, was the grand third symphony of Beethoven, generally known as the "Eroica."

In this wonderful composition the author takes up the divine art where Mozart and Haydn left it, and carries it to a height which no other musician of any time has ever rivalled. The music is marvellously descriptive, and the wonderful scherzo is by some said to represent "the revel of the unburied dead," while the funeral march has certainly never been equalled. Although very familiar to this city, new beauties were unfolded by the skilful treatment of the leader.

Mme. Norman Neruda was the soloist of the occasion, and played Max Bruch's concerto for the violin, No. 1. While the composition is obscure as an entirety, it afforded the soloist opportunities to display her splendid control of the violin. Her execution leaves very little to be desired, while her grip upon the instrument and her bowing reminds one of M. Wieniawski.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 21, 1899.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Lady Halle's Success—A Violinist of Wonderful Accomplishments—A Misarranged Programme.

There should be, and doubtless are, many symphonies within the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which might be chosen to complete a programme containing modern works by Dvorak, Bruch and Wagner in its first part without the necessity of misplacing Beethoven's Eroica Symphony as the final number, and there can therefore be little excuse offered for the arrangement of that most stupid sequence of musical contributions which constituted last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Everything that preceded the Beethoven number, and the whole balance of the programme preceded it, operated against a complete enjoyment of the symphony. Even the few minutes occupied by the "entr' acte" would be insufficient to reinstate a mind at the point where the beauty of primitive simplicity might be fully appreciated after the whirlwind of melody which preceded it. But when even the efficacy of this medicinal solitude has an antidote in Wagner's music a result is attained where musical intoxication demands some profferment more elaborate in form and thought than the Eroica Symphony to conclude an evening's enjoyment. In short, if there ever was a place on any programme where that work should not have been it was the position occupied by it last night.

Up to the time when that number began the concert had been one of unalloyed pleasure. Every phrase of the orchestra was a unanimous paragraph, and the compositions were read with great vigor and intelligence. The soloist, Lady Halle, heard here for the first time, illustrated her great art with the first few phrases which were uttered from her instrument. The Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, is a composition which abounds with musical difficulties. Whether these extend to extraordinary technical demands from the executant, only a skilled violinist may say. Most certainly they could not convey that impression to one who witnessed Lady Halle's easy mastery of them. The principal great characteristics of this great woman's musical accomplishments seem to be in the absolute perfection of her pianissimo and the completeness of her rhythmical accent. Her arpeggios are turned with beautiful grace and charm, and the pulse of the tone her instrument emits, particularly from the lower strings, is strong in sympathy and carries an insinuation with its command that cannot be denied. Per contra, it may be said that some of this quality disappeared in the forte passages, and the near strings were less characteristic, but these are slight discrepancies when taken in connection with her great strength of musical phrase and her perfection of rhythm. The instrument she used was a Stradivarius of 1709, which at one time belonged to Ernst.

Wilhelm Gericke conducted with a far greater authority than on the occasion of his last concert, at which time his virility had been impaired through sickness, and it may be concluded that he has the men thoroughly instructed in his mode of discipline by this time. It may, therefore, be concluded that the standard of excellence, for this season at least, was reached by the orchestra last night, and as an illustration of ensemble excellence it is hard to imagine wherein it might be improved. But programmes arranged with a clearer idea of musical ethics and the presentation of a few of those novelties which are being heard elsewhere would tend to make the concerts more interesting. The final concert of the series takes place Monday, March 20, and, if the list of soloists as announced has no further change, Teresa Carreno will be the soloist.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, February 21, 1899.

Boston Symphony Concert—Academy of Music.

In these days of showy playing it is a pleasure to listen to a violinist like Lady Halle, who was the soloist of the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last evening. We have been treated so often to mere displays of clever technique that an artist such as she, who places sentiment above mere musical gymnastics, is something for which to be thankful. In the concerto in G minor, by Max Bruch, which was her selection for last evening, Lady Halle was heard at her best in the two first movements, her piano passages being particularly beautiful. The allegro energico, which constitutes the third movement, was somewhat lacking in strength, although its technical difficulties were finely handled. The rest of the programme consisted of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture; a series of selections from "Siegfried," and the "Twilight of the Gods," arranged by Hans Richter; and the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The Commercial Advertiser Association.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 23, 1899.

It seemed scarcely possible to believe, when looking at the slender, black-gowned and youthful looking woman on the stage in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, that she, Lady Hallé, had been before the public as a musician for over a half century. To be sure, she was but a tiny child of six when she began to play, but even at that there were few signs of her fifty-nine years. Lady Hallé is the second violinist which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has introduced to New York this winter, and most of the patrons of that organization will probably agree that of the two she gives the greater pleasure and will win the greater success.

It is not often that the soloist overshadows in importance and interest the Boston orchestra, but at yesterday's concert such was the case. This was due partly to a natural interest in and curiosity about the personality and attainments of one who for many years has been England's favorite violinist and whose continental reputation has been nearly as great, and partly to the programme offered by Mr. Gericke. It contained nothing new or novel, and much that was not particularly interesting. Dvorak's Carnival overture and Beethoven's Leonore overture, No. 3, are always welcome numbers, especially when the Boston men play them, but the same cannot be said of Berlioz's Harold in Italy Symphony. This piece is neither fish nor flesh nor good red herring. It is not a symphony nor is it a viola concerto, and while it has its points of interest, we have already heard it this year, and that only two and a half months ago, by the Paur Symphony Orchestra. That is enough for one season.

The work of the band yesterday was of the highest order. Dvorak's overture is decidedly attractive, with its many rich colors and its melodious themes. It was played in a most brilliant fashion, with more spirit and life than one expects from Mr. Gericke. The Leonore overture also had a splendid performance. No piece brings out into clearer light the many beauties of the orchestra, its superb tonality, the perfection of balance and the eloquence of its different choirs. Likewise did Berlioz's work receive fine treatment. Mr. Kneisel played the solo viola, and played it well, as he does everything he undertakes. The two middle movements were the most attractive, not because the orchestra did better work in them, but because they are the most pleasing of the four. The final movement, the "Orgy of Brigands," perhaps was something less of an orgy than Mr. Paur's, but however it may be played, compared with some things which have been written since then, it will sound rather mild and subdued.

Lady Hallé chose Spohr's Eighth Concerto, the Gesangscene, as a vehicle for her introduction to New York, and doubtless she chose wisely, for it seemed to fit in perfectly with her temperament and her methods. It is a bit old-fashioned, rather mild in tone, and does not give much opportunity for the display of the player's individuality. On the other hand, it is melodious and graceful and gives abundant room for the exhibition of style and finish. Lady Hallé is a most graceful player. She bows easily and with freedom. There are no affectations; rather is the simplicity of her style always in evidence. Her work was not distinguished by warmth, but it was full of tenderness and care. It was most finished and was distinguished by an authority which never left the hearer in doubt as to the musician's ability and her thorough understanding of her own powers. She did not strive for masculine and virile effects, but seemed always to give herself to her work and be content with that. In other words, the grace, the tenderness and style was that of a woman who was willing to remain such.

Her tone was not large, but it was exceedingly pure, mellow and sweet. How well it will adapt itself to the works of the more strenuous moderns will be seen to-night, when she plays Bruch's G minor Concerto, but it fitted in with the Spohr piece perfectly. Her technique was quite sufficient to meet any demands the piece made on it. Her intonation was gratefully correct even in the most involved passages. After what we are so often compelled to submit to, this alone would be sufficient to recommend her. In short, her work, while not dashing and brilliant, was exquisite in its fineness and altogether satisfactory.

The programme for to-night's concert is Tchaikowsky's Overture-Fantasy, Romeo and Juliet, a novelty in d'Indy's Istar symphonic variations, the Eroica symphony and Bruch's G minor Concerto.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Feb. 21, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Lady Halle Delights the Audience with Her Violin Playing.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music, before an audience that filled every available nook and corner from floor to ceiling.

The four concerts cover a period of something over three months, enough to see what the installation of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor has effected. Not that any violent change could be expected; the orchestra was too good before to allow any vast room for improvement. So far as one could judge from the work of last night, it is very much as it was before, a slight gain in sentiment, perhaps, which has been offset by an equivalent in a something loss of virility; for, to take the test of last night's programme, while nothing could exceed the beauty of their interpretation of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture for poetic expression, coupled with perfection of precision, the "Eroica" symphony lacked fire, especially in the second movement, the marche funebre, which was so subdued as to be almost monotonous. And this recalls the fact that Mr. Gericke does not shine as a programme maker. The experiment of putting the symphony last was tried by him in last November, when Beethoven's symphony in C minor was played as a finale with soporific effect. Last night's "Eroica" symphony might better have followed the Max Bruch concerto, and left Hans Richter's delightful selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" for the final wind-up. These however, are but details; the orchestra gave a most delightful concert, and it is only by considering the highest possibilities of orchestral music that any fault can be found.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been the means of introducing to Philadelphia some of the greatest musicians of this generation, but few have placed themselves more quickly en rapport with their audience than Lady Charles Halle, who played Max Bruch's concerto in G minor in a way that went straight to every heart. The fire of the days of Normann-Neruda still sits in her finger tips, but with it there is an added tenderness of tone—rich and beautiful, a majesty of simplicity, a freedom from artifice, a precision and an accuracy that awaken the profoundest admiration. Her playing last night was irreproachable and secured for her at least half a dozen recalls, but, as she remarked afterwards, "What an inspiration it is to play with such an accompaniment."

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - - - - FEBRUARY 21, 1899

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Fourth Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, under the usual brilliant and auspicious conditions. Every part of the auditorium was crowded with people and the great audience followed the interpretation of the interesting program which had been arranged for the occasion with every indication of satisfaction and of delight. The symphony was Beethoven's third in E flat, the majestic "Eroica," and a nobler performance of this great work, one more elevated in spirit, more appreciative in intelligence, more profound in feeling or more perfect in execution could hardly be imagined and need not be desired.

Mr. Gericke's artistic growth during the past ten years is in nothing more marked than in his interpretation of Beethoven. It is an interpretation from which every trace of dilletantism, every suggestion of eccentricity or affectation has been eliminated. To express with the utmost eloquence and fidelity the ideas of the composer has become Mr. Gericke's only aim, and this aim, thanks to the unrivalled capacities of the orchestra, is accomplished with an incomparable measure of efficiency. Never did the impetuous allegro of the "Eroica" seem more brilliant or the funeral march more solemnly majestic, or the finale more inspiring than at last night's performance. The other orchestral selections were Dvorak's "Carnival" overture and an arrangement by Hans Richter from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdamerung," both of which numbers were superbly rendered.

That eminent violinist, Mme. Norman-Neruda, or Lady Charles Halle, as she is now, an artist who has long occupied a place in the front rank of European musicians, was the soloist. She played Bruch's first Concerto and played it in a manner that fully sustained her high reputation. Her tone is for a woman remarkably full and large, her intonation unfailingly accurate, her sentiment in admirable taste, and her execution extremely brilliant. She was enthusiastically applauded, and the audience eagerly demanded an encore which in accordance with Mr. Gericke's well-known practice, was firmly, though courteously, declined. It may be hoped that Philadelphia will have the pleasure of hearing Lady Halle again.

Boston Journal

FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1899.

MUSIC HALL SALE.

Marshall Wentworth of Dedham the New Owner—Declines to Divulge the Scheme Which Is Afoot.

The old Music Hall property and the estate at 413-415 Washington Street, about which so many rumors have been current, have passed into the possession of a group of Boston capitalists who are represented in the deeds by Marshall Wentworth of Dedham. The transaction became a matter of public knowledge yesterday, when they were duly recorded at the office of the Register of Deeds.

C. W. Whittier, the real estate man at 209 Washington Street, who negotiated the sale, later made the details public in a statement which he issued to the newspapers. The statement follows:

Mr. Whittier's Statement.

"The titles to Music Hall and the estate 413-415 Washington Street, both estates having been sold by C. W. Whittier in the early part of February, have gone on record today.

"The purchaser of the two parcels is Marshall Wentworth of Dedham.

"It is the intention of the new owner to make no change in the buildings until the termination of the leases which have some time to run.

"The new owner has already entered into negotiations, through C. W. Whittier, with a large dry goods concern which has previously been in negotiation with the former owners of Music Hall, to erect a new fire proof building on the two lots.

"It is impossible at the present time to make a definite statement as to what disposition will be made of this property, but it is certain that a large fire proof structure will be erected in the near future covering the whole lot.

"The assessed valuation of the two estates is as follows:

413-415 Washington Street..........	$190,000
Music Hall..........................	397,000
Total	$587,000

"The revenue stamps on the deed would show the consideration to have been for the estate 413-415 Washington Street, $300,000; Music Hall, $600,000; making a total of $900,000."

When seen by a Journal reporter, Mr. A. R. Whittier of the concern said that the statement contained all the information that could be given out now. He declined to state what dry goods firm was referred to in the written statement. Neither would he say anything concerning Mr. Wentworth, in whose name the purchase was made.

Mr. Wentworth Seen.

Mr. Wentworth was seen in Dedham by a Journal reporter last evening. He is a young man, a Harvard graduate and the past couple of years has been a teacher in and is now assistant master of the Dedham High School. He lives at East and Park Streets, in the family homestead. In response to the Journal reporter's inquiries Mr. Wentworth said:

"Yes, the property you refer to has been purchased by a syndicate of Boston capitalists, but to what use it will be put cannot now be told. Plans are not far enough advanced as yet to tell definitely. But that is a matter which I can say nothing about at present. The two lots purchased are adjoining and probably an edifice will be erected upon them, but how soon this will be done or for what purpose the buildings will be used are matters that cannot now be told in detail.

"As for the rumor that John Wanamaker is to come to Boston and carry on a department store on that site, I can only say that I have not been told by any of the gentlemen of the syndicate that such a movement was in contemplation. I can say the same thing regarding the rumors that other firms were to occupy the site.

"I do not care to give you the names of the gentlemen who form the syndicate. I do not think that they would wish to have their names made public at this time. There is no further information that I can give you now concerning the transaction."

Regarding Mr. Whittier's statement that the new owner was in communication with a large dry goods concern for the disposal of the property, Mr. Wentworth declined to talk. He would neither deny nor affirm the statement.

Mr. Wentworth stated that he had a certain interest in the transaction, and that he had been interested with the same gentlemen previously. He didn't want it understood that he was the sole owner of the property. His business, he said, was not real estate; he was a teacher.

There has been a great deal of gossip about the purchaser of this property ever since Mr. Whittier secured control of it, and he has been besieged with requests for the name of the purchaser and the purposes to which the property was to be put. He has good-naturedly said all along that the time was not ripe to disclose this knowledge and the statement printed above is the first authorized one from him.

One report has been that John Wanamaker was the purchaser and that he was to open a store on the site. This, however, was denied in an interview with Mr. Wanamaker's manager, recently printed in the Boston Journal.

Unexpired Leases.

The sale of the Music Hall property is subject to a lease to Henry L. Higginson, which expires in April, 1900, and of the Washington Street parcel subject to a lease to the Jacobs Brothers, of the firm of the "Six Little Tailors," which has several years to run.

Maj. Higginson, when seen by a Journal reporter last evening, said he could not give any information as to what dry goods house was to locate on the Music Hall site, if there was to be one.

5

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE fourth matinee and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening of last week at Carnegie Hall. There was a light attendance at the afternoon affair; but at the concert the house was a large and brilliant one. Curiosity to hear Lady Hallé doubtlessly stimulated this attendance, for, of late, thanks to the operatic fever, concert giving has been at low ebb in Greater New York. The program Wednesday afternoon was this:

Overture, Carnival, op. 92	Dvorák
Concerto for Violin, No. 8, in A minor, Gesangscene, op. 47	Spohr
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72	Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in G major, with viola obligato, Harold in Italy, op. 16	Berlioz

(Viola obligato by Franz Kneisel.)

Dvorák's Overture was written to inaugurate his visit to this country some years ago, when he was director of the National Conservatory. It is a highly colored, rather excited specimen of writing, and the very opening measures suggest, with rhythmical alterations, the familiar Rakoczy March. There is also a distinct flavor of the Venusberg music in the piece which is more pleasing than original. It was animatedly played. The Beethoven Overture sounded academic in conception. We are accustomed to freer and more dramatic readings. Why the "Harold" symphony and its viola philanderings were put in this scheme is something that the concertmaster of the orchestra may know, but no one else. In the first place, the work is a bore, and was heard here this season. Once in a decade is enough. Secondly, it gave us, with Lady Hallé, too much solo string music; thirdly, why was the concertmaster and not Louis Svecenski, the first viola of the orchestra, not selected? This question we may have to answer ourselves.

The violinist, better known to us as Norman Neruda than Lady Hallé, made her début here in the familiar Spohr selection. She seemed timid, almost apathetic, and not until she was well into the work were the good qualities of her playing manifest. She is musical, but not a virtuosa—virtuosa, in the modern sense, is the phrasing suffered on the side of a fatal fluency. There was much sliding, much clipping, of runs at their close, but there was also suavity of tone—her instrument, a magnificent one, was played upon by Ernst—ease in execution and certainty in technics. In the beginning her intonation was not impeccable. But of the distinction, elegance and beauty of her art—withal a little old-fashioned there can be no doubt. All was ripe, if not dazzling, and Lady Hallé may be said to have made an excellent impression. Mr. Gericke conducted sympathetically.

Thursday evening this was the program:

Overture-Fantaisie, Romeo and Juliet	Tschaikowsky
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G minor, op. 26	Bruch
Symphonic Variations, Istar (First time.)	D'Indy
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Eroica, op. 55	Beethoven

This concert was the best so far this season of this series. The attendance was large. Mr. Gericke was in good form and Lady Hallé, animated by her reception, played like another woman. Her gray mood of the day previous had vanished, and the artist put forth her best. She has no longer the physical strength of her youth and middle years, but her splendid technical training and spirit—purely a feminine one, be it understood—enabled her to carry off with honors the Brüch Concerto. There was not much breadth in the opening, the academic breadth of Camilla Urso or the impetuosity of Maud Powell, but there was a smooth, musical tone, a subtle understanding, a refinement of feeling. Lady Hallé is not a Valkyr of the violin, she does not storm, she is urbane, distinguished, yet never dry. The slow movement was delicate, the last full of vitality. She was recalled six times. Unfortunately Lady Hallé had a severe fall on the stairs leading to the stage—an awkwardly contrived place—and could not respond with an encore.

The symphony was well read, although not expansively so. The scherzo was played with wonderful finish, the horns in the trio being all that could be wished for. The march was impressive. The Tschaikowsky Overture lacked the dramatic note, and, lacking that, lacked all. However, it was—with one exception in the brass—technically remarkable.

We wonder if W. F. Apthorp, the learned maker of the analytical programs, dropped, with malice aforethought, all mention of the inner and outer meanings of "Istar," in his New York notes? We were compelled to listen to it as music per se and, thus divested of all symbolism, these variations stand out as something overwhelmingly clever and individual, as clever and individual, for example, as those for piano and orchestra by César Franck, played here last season by Raoul Pugno. We petition Mr. Gericke to repeat "Istar" at the next concert. Vincent D'Indy is not well known here. A symphonic poem, "Wallerstein," was given here some years ago, but it is a mere memory. This composer handles the orchestral apparatus in the plasticity of Richard Strauss and the jauntiness of Saint-Saëns. He has worshipped at the shrine of Wagner, of Franck, and at sundry strange haunts of his own. He delights in harmonic deviltry, and, to his technical invention there is seemingly no end. D'Indy plays the devil in his orchestra, rioting in harsh modulations, odd instrumental marriages and rhythmic variousness. But he never loses his head. His passion is cerebral; he watches, a slightly ennuied spectator, the astonishing contrapuntal tricks he devises. One trick—a Gallic one—is the giving forth of the theme in such low color relief as to make it practically unrecognizable. But from cloudy chaos it emerges into startling maturity, and here the orchestra—violins, violas, celli, horns and trombones in unisono—produce a startling climax. It is the principle of attrition of one's consciousness by massed effects, and so we become very conscious and even happy when M. D'Indy's well kept thematic secret sees the daylight.

But what is it all about; what does "Istar" mean? Last week our Boston correspondent, Mr. Ben Woolf, told us about the "libretto." We now purpose giving the story of another Boston critic—and once the Boston correspondent of THE MUSICAL COURIER—Mr. Philip Hale. Here is what Mr Hale found in "Istar":

"'Istar' is the work of an eminently serious Frenchman. In search of a subject to inspire his orchestral fancy he went back to one of the two mythological Assyrian poems that have come down to us intact—the descent of Istar into Hades. It might be an agreeable pastime to dilate on the development of solar warships, but if you wish to read the poem I refer you to Lenormant's books and the Sar's novel 'Istar,' a story of French provincial life in which the old legend is introduced curiously.

"D'Indy truly hit on an original idea. He gives the variations before the theme, and, as one billious critic put it in Paris, when the theme is given out in full and in unison and octaves 'you find that it has no likeness to any one of the variations.' This is hardly true. (The same writer insists that Istar went to the abode of the dead in search of eau de vie instead of eaux de la vie.)

Istar, according to the legend, went to Hades, clad chiefly in jewelry. There were seven gates; at each gate a warder; they in turn stripped her of tiara, earrings, necklaces, breast jewels, girdle, rings from the hands and feet, the last veil. There is a variation for each stripping, and when, as Mr. Apthorp says in the program book, "she stands forth in the full splendor of nudity," the theme is heard fortissimo.

Give us "Istar" again, Mr. Gericke?

BEETHOVEN, COMPOSER.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, played to a fairly large and appreciative audience Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. This is a simple enough statement, to be sure, but all that lies back of it is not so simple. What it means to a community to have such a work performed is not often taken into consideration. Were the public mind able understandingly to grasp and estimate the good such a gigantic creation has wrought in all climes and communities, were it able thoroughly to impress America with her crying need for permanent orchestras, which could give our people a chance to become elevated, refined, artistically humbled and spiritualized by such means as this, the public mind would once more have accomplished a glorious and beneficent thing.

The chastity, majesty and spirituality of such a work as this cannot but leave a lasting impress upon those with whom it comes in contact, if there is a molecule of brain and artistic sense resident within them. It is not every symphony, much less every composer, that can, after a lapse of many years, still be a pioneer, and still shine, like the smile of the Almighty, above all sorts and descriptions of musical creators who are now the vogue, and who are at the opposite artistic pole, fundamentally and radically. It is only Beethoven, who sits alone on a height almost invisible to the rude, unawakened, unaccustomed eye; who can artistically mold a nation as surely and lastingly as can an impeccable constitution.

His is the depth, the psychological and emotional power; his the simplicity of directly uttered messages; his the majesty, the dignity which cannot be smirched by earthly contact, which is born and lives at once deep in the heart and high above terrestrial frailties, sordidness and the perpetual exploitation of the uneternal Ego; his the touch, tender but strong, which lays bare the deepest hurts, to cleanse and heal them; his the gift of a constructive power so immense and powerful that from a few notes he can create an undying melody, can build episodes, polish phrases, punctuate and explain musical words of wisdom and comfort, sent to man by a beneficent, all-seeing power, who here and there thus inspires one of his elect that those who stop in the despairing race to listen and pray can there receive at once the answer, made of truth, light, solace and wisdom. It is Beethoven, the Heaven-endowed; Beethoven, the deep, mighty, beyond all the vanities of his contemporaries and successors, who avoided the pedantic, who knew no sensationalism nor the self-acknowledged weakness of named and specified "leitmotifs;" who sought not at all for things dramatic, realistic, descriptive; who sang the songs sung to him simply and honestly, without trick of instrumentation, without garish color contrasts; without abrupt transitions from mood to color, from color to meaningless ornamentation; without noise and nerve-destroying descriptive efforts; without all trickery, bluster and sham; without basing his music upon subjects sunken miles deep in unmentionable immoralities. Yes, it is this Beethoven who must preach the musical gospel to the approaching generation, who must build for us the foundation of our future music world, who must rescue us from the concealed, deadly, musical trap into which we have fallen; who must teach us to walk directly and honestly, who must establish his standard, which will be as the Cross to Satan, to mediocrity and presumption; who must save us against our knowledge and will. Beethoven remains to-day, after all has been said and done, experimented with, and stupidly made powerful, the greatest composer who has ever lived, and he stands alone above the heads of all but a pitifully small number of painters, poets, sculptors and dramatists. No one can properly nor justly estimate what it means to an unconscious public when one of these symphonies is performed, when Beethoven speaks to it, and illuminates the only real, true artistic path. Nota bene.

Rich feasts were provided by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Lady Hallé being the solo performer at each. The audiences at both were unusually large and listened with careful attention, though they could not be called demonstrative. The soloist was of course recalled many times, as is the usual fashion, and she played beautifully. No other word could be used to express the artistic sympathy of her interpretation. Her many years of violin study have given her a certain, serene surety and she plays with a refined authority and an exquisite warmth of tone, while her technic is above dispute. The first, soft, vibrant, long, opening note of the Spohr Concerto No. 8, the "Gesangzene," her selection of the afternoon, at once impressed her hearers with the knowledge of her absolute superiority. At the evening concert she played Max Bruch's G minor Concerto, which is familiar to our music lovers and which gave great pleasure.

Mr. Gericke had quite recovered from the effects of his illness, which were apparent at the concerts of last month, and led with breadth and freedom, while not departing from the accepted reading of the music. The afternoon numbers were the Schumann "Rhenish Symphony," the delightful overture to "Lenore," and selections from "Siegfried" (the passing of Siegfried through the fire to Brünnhilde's rock, third act) and "The Twilight of the Gods" (Siegfried's Rhine journey). In the evening Dvorák's joyous "Carnival" overture was the opening number. Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy, "Romet and Juliet," gave us the romantic love story from a Russian point of view. The sweet tenderness of Shakespeare's tale was replaced by a stormy, passionate conception of the characters, and the play evidently ended with the lovers being shot as Nihilists by a fusilade from a large body of soldiers.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, played with a rare perfection, closed the delightful concert.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1899.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert

Last week's symphony program comprised three orchestral selections, Haydn's D major symphony, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, and the D major symphony by Brahms. There were no solo performers. The selections gave Mr Gericke excellent opportunities for showing the band in work which was chiefly identified with his ideas of interpretations, for the Brahms symphony was the only familiar composition, the others being played for the first time at these concerts. The elaborate first part of the Haydn work was beautifully phrased, the prominence of the figures given to the different instruments being well preserved by each contingent when called upon to emerge from a harmonious background and become principal exponents of the varying themes. The modulations may have seemed rather strange to the ear, but as the progressions evidently were played precisely as scored, the team work of the band deserves high praise.

From the difficulties of the first to the simpler parts of the second and third movement was a long step, and the primitive themes called for no special display of skill on the part of the men. The repetitions of the andante were in prompt accordance with Mr Gericke's beat, and the menuetto was equally precise and smooth in presentation. The closing movement, "La Chasse," from which the symphony derives its name, brought the wind instruments to the fore with the hunting calls and other suggestions of the chase. The horns and oboes deserve favorable mention for harmonious unison work, and the same may be said of the rapid pasages played by the violins. The pianissimo finale was charmingly given.

The bourree is said to be an ancient dance of French origin, but Chabrier's grotesque composition certainly does not suggest this idea of its nationality. It is weird and inharmonic in many parts of the score, and generally turbulent withal, and bears a striking resemblance to a Hungarian or Russian work. Two themes, highly contrasted, form the basis of the bourree, the tempo is furious and the working out quite elaborate. The performance was effective, all the so-called "fantastique" elements being presented probably as the author intended and as Mottl, who orchestrated the piece from the piano score, indicated in his notation.

Brahms' second symphony is generally considered to be his master work, the first part being specially replete with ideas and feeling. Mr Gericke gave the work a carefully sympathetic reading, securing evenness of tonal balance, precision and delightful gradations in lights and shades from the orchestra. The whole performance was up to the usual standard of the symphony men.

At this week's concerts the orchestra will be assisted by Mme Margaret Boye-Jensen, Mr Herbert Johnson and a male chorus from the Cecilia society. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala;" overture from Beethoven's "Coriolanus" and "A Faust Symphony," by Liszt.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE fourth matinee and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening of last week at Carnegie Hall. There was a light attendance at the afternoon affair; but at the concert the house was a large and brilliant one. Curiosity to hear Lady Hallé doubtlessly stimulated this attendance, for, of late, thanks to the operatic fever, concert giving has been at low ebb in Greater New York. The program Wednesday afternoon was this:

Overture, Carnival, op. 92....................................Dvorák
Concerto for Violin, No. 8, in A minor, Gesangscene, op. 47....Spohr
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72..........................Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in G major, with viola obligato, Harold in Italy, op. 16..Berlioz
(Viola obligato by Franz Kneisel.)

Dvorák's Overture was written to inaugurate his visit to this country some years ago, when he was director of the National Conservatory. It is a highly colored, rather excited specimen of writing, and the very opening measures suggest, with rhythmical alterations, the familiar Rakoczy March. There is also a distinct flavor of the Venusberg music in the piece which is more pleasing than original. It was animatedly played. The Beethoven Overture sounded academic in conception. We are accustomed to freer and more dramatic readings. Why the "Harold" symphony and its viola philanderings were put in this scheme is something that the concertmaster of the orchestra may know, but no one else. In the first place, the work is a bore, and was heard here this season. Once in a decade is enough. Secondly, it gave us, with Lady Hallé, too much solo string music; thirdly, why was the concertmaster and not Louis Svecenski, the first viola of the orchestra, not selected? This question we may have to answer ourselves.

The violinist, better known to us as Norman Neruda than Lady Hallé, made her début here in the familiar Spohr selection. She seemed timid, almost apathetic, and not until she was well into the work were the good qualities of her playing manifest. She is musical, but not a virtuosa—virtuosa, in the modern sense, is the phrasing suffered on the side of a fatal fluency. There was much sliding, much clipping, of runs at their close, but there was also suavity of tone—her instrument, a magnificent one, was played upon by Ernst—ease in execution and certainty in technics. In the beginning her intonation was not impeccable. But of the distinction, elegance and beauty of her art—withal a little old-fashioned there can be no doubt. All was ripe, if not dazzling, and Lady Hallé may be said to have made an excellent impression. Mr. Gericke conducted sympathetically.

Thursday evening this was the program:

Overture-Fantaisie, Romeo and Juliet...................Tschaikowsky
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G minor, op. 26.................Bruch
Symphonic Variations, Istar...................................D'Indy
(First time.)
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Eroica, op. 55..........Beethoven

This concert was the best so far this season of this series. The attendance was large. Mr. Gericke was in good form and Lady Hallé, animated by her reception, played like another woman. Her gray mood of the day previous had vanished, and the artist put forth her best. She has no longer the physical strength of her youth and middle years, but her splendid technical training and spirit—purely a feminine one, be it understood—enabled her to carry off with honors the Brüch Concerto. There was not much breadth in the opening, the academic breadth of Camilla Urso or the impetuosity of Maud Powell, but there was a smooth, musical tone, a subtle understanding, a refinement of feeling. Lady Hallé is not a Valkyr of the violin, she does not storm, she is urbane, distinguished, yet never dry. The slow movement was delicate, the last full of vitality. She was recalled six times. Unfortunately Lady Hallé had a severe fall on the stairs leading to the stage—an awkwardly contrived place—and could not respond with an encore.

The symphony was well read, although not expansively so. The scherzo was played with wonderful finish, the horns in the trio being all that could be wished for. The march was impressive. The Tschaikowsky Overture lacked the dramatic note, and, lacking that, lacked all. However, it was—with one exception in the brass—technically remarkable.

We wonder if W. F. Apthorp, the learned maker of the analytical programs, dropped, with malice aforethought, all mention of the inner and outer meanings of "Istar," in his New York notes? We were compelled to listen to it as music per se and, thus divested of all symbolism, these variations stand out as something overwhelmingly clever and individual, as clever and individual, for example, as those for piano and orchestra by César Franck, played here last season by Raoul Pugno. We petition Mr. Gericke to repeat "Istar" at the next concert. Vincent D'Indy is not well known here. A symphonic poem, "Wallerstein," was given here some years ago, but it is a mere memory. This composer handles the orchestral apparatus in the plasticity of Richard Strauss and the jauntiness of Saint-Saëns. He has worshipped at the shrine of Wagner, of Franck, and at sundry strange haunts of his own. He delights in harmonic deviltry, and, to his technical invention there is seemingly no end. D'Indy plays the devil in his orchestra, rioting in harsh modulations, odd instrumental marriages and rhythmic variousness. But he never loses his head. His passion is cerebral: he watches, a slightly ennuied spectator, the astonishing contrapuntal tricks he devises. One trick—a Gallic one—is the giving forth of the theme in such low color relief as to make it practically unrecognizable. But from cloudy chaos it emerges into startling maturity, and here the orchestra—violins, violas, celli, horns and trombones in unisono—produce a startling climax. It is the principle of attrition of one's consciousness by massed effects, and so we become very conscious and even happy when M. D'Indy's well kept thematic secret sees the daylight.

But what is it all about; what does "Istar" mean? Last week our Boston correspondent, Mr. Ben Woolf, told us about the "libretto." We now purpose giving the story of another Boston critic—and once the Boston correspondent of THE MUSICAL COURIER—Mr. Philip Hale. Here is what Mr Hale found in "Istar":

"'Istar' is the work of an eminently serious Frenchman. In search of a subject to inspire his orchestral fancy he went back to one of the two mythological Assyrian poems that have come down to us intact—the descent of Istar into Hades. It might be an agreeable pastime to dilate on the development of solar warships, but if you wish to read the poem I refer you to Lenormant's books and the Sar's novel 'Istar,' a story of French provincial life in which the old legend is introduced curiously.

"D'Indy truly hit on an original idea. He gives the variations before the theme, and, as one billious critic put it in Paris, when the theme is given out in full and in unison and octaves 'you find that it has no likeness to any one of the variations.' This is hardly true. (The same writer insists that Istar went to the abode of the dead in search of eau de vie instead of eaux de la vie.)

Istar, according to the legend, went to Hades, clad chiefly in jewelry. There were seven gates: at each gate a warder: they in turn stripped her of tiara, earrings, necklaces, breast jewels, girdle, rings from the hands and feet, the last veil There is a variation for each stripping, and when, as Mr. Apthorp says in the program book, "she stands forth in the full splendor of nudity," the theme is heard fortissimo.

Give us "Istar" again, Mr. Gericke?

BEETHOVEN, COMPOSER.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, played to a fairly large and appreciative audience Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. This is a simple enough statement, to be sure, but all that lies back of it is not so simple. What it means to a community to have such a work performed is not often taken into consideration. Were the public mind able understandingly to grasp and estimate the good such a gigantic creation has wrought in all climes and communities, were it able thoroughly to impress America with her crying need for permanent orchestras, which could give our people a chance to become elevated, refined, artistically humbled and spiritualized by such means as this, the public mind would once more have accomplished a glorious and beneficent thing.

The chastity, majesty and spirituality of such a work as this cannot but leave a lasting impress upon those with whom it comes in contact, if there is a molecule of brain and artistic sense resident within them. It is not every symphony, much less every composer, that can, after a lapse of many years, still be a pioneer, and still shine, like the smile of the Almighty, above all sorts and descriptions of musical creators who are now the vogue, and who are at the opposite artistic pole, fundamentally and radically. It is only Beethoven, who sits alone on a height almost invisible to the rude, unawakened, unaccustomed eye, who can artistically mold a nation as surely and lastingly as can an impeccable constitution.

His is the depth, the psychological and emotional power; his the simplicity of directly uttered messages; his the majesty, the dignity which cannot be smirched by earthly contact, which is born and lives at once deep in the heart and high above terrestrial frailties, sordidness and the perpetual exploitation of the uneternal Ego; his the touch, tender but strong, which lays bare the deepest hurts, to cleanse and heal them; his the gift of a constructive power so immense and powerful that from a few notes he can create an undying melody, can build episodes, polish phrases, punctuate and explain musical words of wisdom and comfort, sent to man by a beneficent, all-seeing power, who here and there thus inspires one of his elect that those who stop in the despairing race to listen and pray can there receive at once the answer, made of truth, light, solace and wisdom. It is Beethoven, the Heaven-endowed; Beethoven, the deep, mighty, beyond all the vanities of his contemporaries and successors, who avoided the pedantic, who knew no sensationalism nor the self-acknowledged weakness of named and specified "leitmotifs;" who sought not at all for things dramatic, realistic, descriptive; who sang the songs sung to him simply and honestly, without trick of instrumentation, without garish color contrasts, without abrupt transitions from mood to color, from color to meaningless ornamentation; without noise and nerve-destroying descriptive efforts; without all trickery, bluster and sham; without basing his music upon subjects sunken miles deep in unmentionable immoralities. Yes, it is this Beethoven who must preach the musical gospel to the approaching generation, who must build for us the foundation of our future music world, who must rescue us from the concealed, deadly, musical trap into which we have fallen; who must teach us to walk directly and honestly, who must establish his standard, which will be as the Cross to Satan, to mediocrity and presumption; who must save us against our knowledge and will. Beethoven remains to-day, after all has been said and done, experimented with, and stupidly made powerful, the greatest composer who has ever lived, and he stands alone above the heads of all but a pitifully small number of painters, poets, sculptors and dramatists. No one can properly nor justly estimate what it means to an unconscious public when one of these symphonies is performed, when Beethoven speaks to it, and illuminates the only real, true artistic path. Nota bene.

Rich feasts were provided by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Lady Hallé being the solo performer at each. The audiences at both were unusually large and listened with careful attention, though they could not be called demonstrative. The soloist was of course recalled many times, as is the usual fashion, and she played beautifully No other word could be used to express the artistic sympathy of her interpretation. Her many years of violin study have given her a certain, serene surety and she plays with a refined authority and an exquisite warmth of tone, while her technic is above dispute. The first, soft, vibrant, long, opening note of the Spohr Concerto No. 8, the "Gesangzene," her selection of the afternoon, at once impressed her hearers with the knowledge of her absolute superiority. At the evening concert she played Max Bruch's G minor Concerto, which is familiar to our music lovers and which gave great pleasure.

Mr. Gericke had quite recovered from the effects of his illness, which were apparent at the concerts of last month, and led with breadth and freedom, while not departing from the accepted reading of the music. The afternoon numbers were the Schumann "Rhenish Symphony," the delightful overture to "Lenore," and selections from "Siegfried" (the passing of Siegfried through the fire to Brünnhilde's rock, third act) and "The Twilight of the Gods" (Siegfried's Rhine journey). In the evening Dvorák's joyous "Carnival" overture was the opening number. Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy, "Romet and Juliet," gave us the romantic love story from a Russian point of view. The sweet tenderness of Shakespeare's tale was replaced by a stormy, passionate conception of the characters, and the play evidently ended with the lovers being shot as Nihilists by a fusilade from a large body of soldiers.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, played with a rare perfection, closed the delightful concert.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1899.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert

Last week's symphony program comprised three orchestral selections, Haydn's D major symphony, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, and the D major symphony by Brahms. There were no solo performers. The selections gave Mr Gericke excellent opportunities for showing the band in work which was chiefly identified with his ideas of interpretations, for the Brahms symphony was the only familiar composition, the others being played for the first time at these concerts. The elaborate first part of the Haydn work was beautifully phrased, the prominence of the figures given to the different instruments being well preserved by each contingent when called upon to emerge from a harmonious background and become principal exponents of the varying themes. The modulations may have seemed rather strange to the ear, but as the progressions evidently were played precisely as scored, the team work of the band deserves high praise.

From the difficulties of the first to the simpler parts of the second and third movement was a long step, and the primitive themes called for no special display of skill on the part of the men. The repetitions of the andante were in prompt accordance with Mr Gericke's beat, and the menuetto was equally precise and smooth in presentation. The closing movement, "La Chasse," from which the symphony derives its name, brought the wind instruments to the fore with the hunting calls and other suggestions of the chase. The horns and oboes deserve favorable mention for harmonious unison work, and the same may be said of the rapid pasages played by the violins. The pianissimo finale was charmingly given.

The bourree is said to be an ancient dance of French origin, but Chabrier's grotesque composition certainly does not suggest this idea of its nationality. It is weird and inharmonic in many parts of the score, and generally turbulent withal, and bears a striking resemblance to a Hungarian or Russian work. Two themes, highly contrasted, form the basis of the bourree, the tempo is furious and the working out quite elaborate. The performance was effective, all the so-called "fantastique" elements being presented probably as the author intended and as Mottl, who orchestrated the piece from the piano score, indicated in his notation.

Brahms' second symphony is generally considered to be his master work, the first part being specially replete with ideas and feeling. Mr Gericke gave the work a carefully sympathetic reading, securing evenness of tonal balance, precision and delightful gradations in lights and shades from the orchestra. The whole performance was up to the usual standard of the symphony men.

At this week's concerts the orchestra will be assisted by Mme Margaret Boye-Jensen, Mr Herbert Johnson and a male chorus from the Cecilia society. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala;" overture from Beethoven's "Coriolanus" and "A Faust Symphony," by Liszt.

[illegible] ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
[illegible] MORNING, MARCH 6, [illegible]

Symphony Concert—Works of Haydn, Chabrier and Brahms

The concert of Saturday was entirely orchestral and presented two symphonies. The banquet was not indigestible on this account for the Haydn symphony was as light as an omelette souffle. This was the bright work in D major, the symphony known as "La Chasse," which ends with a hunting-scene so vivid that it may fairly be classed as programme-music.

The first three movements of this work had no message to convey to the latter-day concertgoer, for they were in that formal, extra-genteel style that imparts no greater thrill to the auditor than the beauty-patches and the hoops of a Bath belle of the time of Beau Nash could do.

This same decorous gentility caused Haydn to turn Adam and Eve (in "The Creation") into a very polite couple who bow and courtesy to each other, and pay mutual compliments in a manner that bears about the same relation to passion that Chesterfield's Letters do to enthusiasm.

Our orchestra played the symphony to perfection; and let no one imagine that Haydn is entirely free from difficulties; in a work of such simple and clear construction the slightest error stands forth like a smooch upon a white glove; concealment of faults is impossible; one may hide a dozen slips in the ultra-modern cacophony, but not one in Haydn! Of the first three movements about the only impression left upon the mind of the reviewer was the steadiness of the strings and the pretty work done by oboe and bassoon in the Minuet.

The last movement was quite another matter; here there was dash and fire, a certain swing, a suggestion of a species of "Ahunting-we-will-go" joviality, and the brass had plenty of fanfares to execute while the disappearance of the chase in the distance led to one of the finest of diminuendi. This movement won the most hearty applause, and, both for its performance and its subject matter, deserved it.

The Auvergnat is considered the most stupid type of Frenchman; if he dances such a Bourree as Chabrier has written (the dance is said to belong to Auvergn) he must also be subject to fits. The work, which Chabrier wrote for piano and his friend Mottl scored for orchestra, is a very disjointed one. It possesses some beautiful episodes, but with all its spasms of beauty and ugliness it gives nothing tangible to the hearer at a first audition. It might represent a peasant's carnival and its tender moments might portray a loving pair constantly interrupted by the merry-makers; but it is a dangerous task to supply meaning to the modern musical puzzle-pictures, and judged as pure music they become greater puzzles than ever.

With the Brahms's symphony (the second) which closed the concert, we "stood on the firm land" again, having like the ancient mariner, passed through some nightmare experiences. It was pleasant to note that there was no exodus until the last note of the work had been played, and the enthusiasm which followed the final climax (superbly played, too) was evidence that in Boston, at least, Brahms is not regarded as being the quintessence of ugliness.

We believe the second symphony to be one of Brahms's most poetic works. The wide difference between the first symphony of this master and his second may give the measure of his versatility, from pedantic to romantic. The second symphony of Brahms may even be called a popular work; the enthusiasm of its reception on Saturday is not an exceptional matter, for it was received with great applause on its first hearing in Vienna.

It was field night for the horn-players for not only had they done prominent work in the Haydn symphony but they were constantly in the foreground in Brahms's work as well, and it is not too much to say that their long-continued task was excellently done.

In the Brahms's symphony the horn-figure of the first measure becomes a large part of the subsequent development. The first movement is a long one, but it is clear, logical and beautiful, and its ending is a finely wrought-up climax.

The second movement is perhaps too intellectual for an ideal slow movement; one finds deliberation where one demands emotion, but it is not long and its thematic treatment makes it a good example of "musician's music."

The third movement is squarely in the domain of folk-music and is distinctly a popular composition. The rhythm of the minuet, the spirit of the Scherzo, are in this dainty Allegretto, and its scoring is the perfection of daintiness. From its musette-like beginning to its capricious close it has not a dull moment. "Give a dog a bad name and hang him,"—says the old proverb; many have become so used to hearing the accusation that Brahms is abstruse, complicated and dull, that they will hardly believe the statement that this movement is simple, melodic and popular; if they will listen to this Allegretto without prejudice they will discern the last-named qualities easily enough.

The finale was played with glorious breadth and its climax brought forth a torrent of applause. It was a worthy end to a strongly and strangely contrasted programme.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 64.
SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Startling Contrasts Given from Two Composers.

Haydn's "La Chasse" Appears on the Programme for the First Time—Chabrier's Bourree Fantasque Excites Admiration—Brahms' Work Well Interpreted.

The programme for the 17th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Symphony in D-major, "La Chasse"....Haydn
Bourree fantasque....................Chabrier
Scored for orchestra by F. Mottl.
Symphony No. 2, in D-major...........Brahms

The Haydn symphony appeared for the first time on the programmes of these concerts. The work is not in the composer's mature style, but it is delightful in its broad frankness, the spirit and straightforwardness with which it says what it has to say, and in its aspect as music pure and simple. The first movement has more of the greater Haydn in it than has any other portion of the symphony, but it is all refreshing in the hearing, even the naive andante, with its repetitions and its persistent clinging to the tonic.

The finale, with its suggestion of the chase in the horn fanfares, is as rollicking and as inspiriting as any of the composer's achievements in kind. Full of piquant charm is the treatment of the bassoon in the trio of the minuet. In fact the instrumentation throughout overflows with dainty and beautifully colored devices. When it is considered that the work is scored without clarinets, trumpets and a second flute, the solidity of effect and the volume of tone produced is rather astonishing.

These old masters obtained their noisier moments with remarkable skill. The art of producing a brilliant tone picture with few pigments seems to have been lost in these days of massive orchestration, and it is well, once in a while, to be carried back to the past, to be instructed how powerful contrasts may be obtained without calling in the aid of thunder.

The performance of the work was in every way admirable. Mr. Gericke showed characteristic reverence for Haydn by permitting him to speak in the fashion of his day, and in harmony with the underlying spirit of the music. The opening allegro was not too fast, nor the andante too slow. Even the adagio did not drag for want of the proper motion to keep its phrases sufficiently close together. It was a masterly reading and performance of a fascinating work.

In immeasurable contrast was the Chabrier bourree, with its passionate restlessness; its harmonies dragged from the deepest recesses of the bizarre; its laboriously-sought eccentricities of emphasis, and its impulsive wildness generally. It seems that originally it was not written for the orchestra.

Motte's instrumentation is almost oerwhelming in its virile brilliancy; in its superbly-rich variety of tone color, in the astonishing inventiveness with which the arranger has found the means to heap startling effect upon startling effect, novel combination upon novel combination.

It is stated that he was familiar with Chabrier's style of orchestration, and was thus enabled to reproduce it with a certain facility; but in none of the works of that composer hitherto given here has any such bewilderingly original instrumentation as this been heard. The resources of extreme modern orchestration have never been more fully exemplified, even in the Richard Strauss scores that have been played here.

It is all very ingenious, very novel and, to tell the truth, very interesting. It is perhaps of little lasting value, but it is a splendid tour de force, a recklessly dashing bit of bravado, and as such excites admiration that no one need be ashamed of bestowing.

The performance was one of remarkable effectiveness, even for this able and experienced body of players. The work made a great impression on the audience, and the applause it drew forth was very enthusiastic. However, it is but fair to add that the Haydn symphony met with quite as cordial appreciation.

To dwell on the presentation of the symphony would be only to repeat what has already been said so many times of it. Mr. Gericke is always felicitous in his Brahms' interpretations, and the orchestra plays this composer con amore.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven, and "A Faust Smphony," Liszt. Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen is to be the soloist, and will sing an aria and a group of songs. In the Liszt work a male chorus of members of the Cecilia and Mr. Herbert Johnson will assist.

[illegible]
SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1899.

"LA CHASSE."

Haydn's Symphony Given in Music Hall.

Other Features of the Seventeenth Concert.

The program of the 17th Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Symphony in D major, "La Chasse"..Haydn
(First time at these concerts.)
Bourrée fantasque........................Chabrier
(Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major..........Brahms

This is the story about Haydn's symphony "La Chasse."

It was written in 1781, the first of five symphonies that year. Haydn used as the finale—"La Chasse"—the introduction to the third act of his opera, "La fedeltà premiata," which was produced in the new theatre of Prince Nicholas Esterházy in October, 1780. The goddess Diana is introduced in this opera as one of the characters, and she slays the villain and unites the lovers. The symphony was performed, according to a tradition, at a concert given in honor of Esterhazy's safe return from Paris, where he had tarried longer than was his wont, and the surprise of hearing unexpectedly in this symphony a portion of the opera pleased the patron. Haydn made an arrangement of the whole work for the clavier, and the manuscript is still in existence.

The first three movements of this symphony are eminently moral and old-fashioned. They served last night chiefly to show the wealth of string-tone in the orchestra. The only other interest was historical, and there are histories that may be taken for granted. The finale is amusing in a mild and pleasant manner. Simple, lively, played with dash, it provoked hearty applause. There are undoubtedly hundreds of "music lovers" in all large towns that relish keenly such symphonies; for they are not disturbed or perplexed by them; and Haydn is a safe name to use in conversation. But these modern fellows—these wild Russians and singular Belgians and fantastic Frenchmen! "No, no," these admirable music lovers say; "give me the dear old music."

⁂

Treatises agree with the compiler of the program book in saying that the Bourrée is "in many respects similar to the Gavotte, but is to be distinguished from it by being in allabreve time, with two beats to the measure, whereas the Gavotte has distinctly four. Again, the Gavotte regularly begins on the third quarter of the measure, and the Bourrée invariably on the fourth (second half of the allabreve upbeat)."

Now the Bourrée was danced to singing which often took the place of instrumental music, and in Auvergne and other provinces today country people dance and sing this dance by the hour.

You may easily see some of these tunes. Look at Jérome Bujeaud's "Chants et Chansons de l'Oues." The author speaks of the dance itself as a three step dance, which begins with the foot raised. He gives three airs that are sung to this dance. All are in 3-8 time.

Look at "Chansons populaires recueilles dans le Vivarais et le Vercors" by Vincent d'Indy and Julien Tiersot. Tiersot claims that these Bourrée tunes in 3-8 are "Montagnardes." He admits however that they are known in those parts as Bourrées. He then gives an "authentic Bourrée" in 2-4; and, lo and behold, it begins on the first beat!

Look at that monumental work, "Histoire de la Chanson populaire en France," by Julien Tiersot. He is speaking of the Bourrée. "The Bourrée is popular in the whole mountainous region of Central France. It is danced nearly everywhere in three-time" (p. 120). He, too, notes the distinction between the Montagnarde and the Bourrée that is mentioned by the books, but in an example of the latter, known at Paris as well as in Auvergne—"Digua Dzanetta, voli tu dzaugna la dra"—you find the dance beginning on the first quarter in 2-4.

Chabrier was a man that hugely loved a joke. He was a loving disciple of Pantegruelism, a muiscian of Rabelaisian laugh as well as fine taste and fiery imagination. He was also a prodigious pianist—a pianist that did amazing, incredible things. I do not know when this Bourrée fantasque for the piano was written; it has been played in French concert halls certainly for the last five years. Mottl, intimate and affectionate friend of Chabrier, orchestrated it, and it was first performed at one of the symphony concerts in Carlsruhe and afterward in Paris, when Mottl was a visiting conductor. French dishes in a German travern are as a rule to be avoided, but Mottl scored this piece with more than ordinary ingenuity and with brilliant effect. Brilliantly played, although there might be question concerning the precise pace, it gave great pleasure, and there was hearty, genuine applause. They, if there were any, who feared that the dignity of these functions had been lowered for a few minutes, were consoled immediately by the second sermon of Johannes Brahms, who had marvelous patience and industry in the expression of little original musical thought.

HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1899.

Boston Symphony.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week were the best they have given this season in New York. Mr. Gericke, always admirable as conductor, outdid himself, and the orchestra members followed suit. The programme on Wednesday was made up of the "Carnival" overture, Dvorak; concerto for violin, Spohr; "Leonore" overture, No. 3, Beethoven; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. In every item both Gericke and his men were well-nigh perfect, and, as for the Beethoven overture, it was never more beautifully given, while the wonderful tone-color and local color of Berlioz's very Italian symphony was deliciously painted.

Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda), the foremost woman violinist of the world, was soloist. For years she has been a favorite—and justly so—of the British public. She is a player faultless in classic repose, and, except Joachim, the only violinist who carefully avoids the mere virtuosic effects so natural to the instrument. It is difficult to realize that Neruda is within a month of her sixtieth year. Nothing in her appearance or her playing suggests this. As a rule, it is memory that fails artists first, when they begin to age, but that of Neruda at both concerts was faultless. Madame Neruda played the Spohr concerto in an able and most finished fashion. She was enthusiastically applauded and recalled, and her first appearance in New York was a distinct triumph.

The second concert, which took place Thursday evening, was in every way the equal of its predecessor. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was magnificently given, as was also the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, by Tschaikowsky. The Vincent d'Indy symphonic variations were also well given, and Madame Neruda in every way confirmed the excellent impression made at the first concert. Her selection was Max Bruch's concerto, and now and again her playing perhaps was too classical. More nuance and caprice would have been an improvement in this work. But, with one or two exceptions, her intonation was faultless, and her reading was distinguished by superior musical taste and exquisite nicety in detail. Undoubtedly she is playing as well as she did ten years ago, when she was at the height of her career, and violin students who desire to hear truly great and classical violin playing should not lose a great chance now hardly likely to be repeated.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Haydn: Symphony in D major, "La Chasse" (Rieter—Biedermann, No. 5).
(First time at these concerts.)
Chabrier: Bourrée fantasque.
(Scored for Orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.

The Haydn symphony is no great addition to our repertory; the first movement is simply hopeless; it smacks of Haydn, the musician, but surely not of Haydn, the genius. The second movement is chiefly remarkable for showing how the composer could extract some beauty from an unpromisingly dull theme; the minuet is "quelconque!" The finale, however, from which the symphony takes its name, is bright and brilliant. But the whole symphony is not worth giving merely for the sake of the finale.

Mottl's transcription of Chabrier's pianoforte Bourrée fantasque is exceedingly cleverly and sympathetically done. One might almost fancy the orchestration to be Chabrier's own—which is saying a good deal. The piece itself is a capital musical joke, and pretends to be nothing more. It is full of humor, of queer fancies—the French "fantasque" is a little more than our "fantastic," just as the French "fantastique" is a little less—and, above all, full of Chabrier's inimitable life, go and champagne effervescence. No one but he could have written it; it is a good companion piece to his "Espana," which, by the way, ought soon to be given again. The performance was admirable in the extreme.

Brahms's D major symphony was grandly, wonderfully read and played: at once with due stability and with due flexibility of tempo and expression. Every change of tempo seemed there as if by divine right; one could not for the moment imagine it being otherwise. The symphony, thus played, and notably the finale, worked the audience up to a positive furor. It was a great experience!

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala" opus 13; ———, air; Beethoven, overture to "Coriolan," opus 62; ———, air; Liszt, a Faust-symphony (entire). Mme. Boyce-Jensen will be the singer; a male chorus of members of the Cecilia and Mr. Herbert Johnson (tenor) will also assist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 18

The Symphony Concert—Works of Haydn, Chabrier and Brahms.

The concert of Saturday was entirely orchestral and presented two symphonies. The banquet was not indigestible on this account for the Haydn symphony was as light as an omelette souffiee. This was the bright work in D major, the symphony known as "La Chasse," which ends with a hunting-scene so vivid that it may fairly be classed as programme-music.

The first three movements of this work had no message to convey to the latter-day concertgoer, for they were in that formal, extra-genteel style that imparts no greater thrill to the auditor than the beauty-patches and the hoops of a Bath belle of the time of Beau Nash could do.

This same decorous gentility caused Haydn to turn Adam and Eve (in "The Creation") into a very polite couple who bow and courtesy to each other, and pay mutual compliments in a manner that bears about the same relation to passion that Chesterfield's Letters do to enthusiasm.

Our orchestra played the symphony to perfection; and let no one imagine that Haydn is entirely free from difficulties; in a work of such simple and clear construction the slightest error stands forth like a smooch upon a white glove; concealment of faults is impossible; one may hide a dozen slips in the ultra-modern cacophony, but not one in Haydn! Of the first three movements about the only impression left upon the mind of the reviewer was the steadiness of the strings and the pretty work done by oboe and bassoon in the Minuet.

The last movement was quite another matter; here there was dash and fire, a certain swing, a suggestion of a species of "Ahunting-we-will-go" joviality, and the brass had plenty of fanfares to execute while the disappearance of the chase in the distance led to one of the finest of diminuendi. This movement won the most hearty applause, and, both for its performance and its subject matter, deserved it.

The Auvergnat is considered the most stupid type of Frenchman; if he dances such a Bourree as Chabrier has written (the dance is said to belong to Auvergn) he must also be subject to fits. The work, which Chabrier wrote for piano and his friend Mottl scored for orchestra, is a very disjointed one. It possesses some beautiful episodes, but with all its spasms of beauty and ugliness it gives nothing tangible to the hearer at a first audition. It might represent a peasant's carnival and its tender moments might portray a loving pair constantly interrupted by the merry-makers; but it is a dangerous task to supply meaning to the modern musical puzzle-pictures, and judged as pure music they become greater puzzles than ever.

With the Brahms's symphony (the second) which closed the concert, we "stood on the firm land" again, having like the ancient mariner, passed through some nightmare experiences. It was pleasant to note that there was no exodus until the last note of the work had been played, and the enthusiasm which followed the final climax (superbly played, too) was evidence that in Boston, at least, Brahms is not regarded as being the quintessence of ugliness.

We believe the second symphony to be one of Brahms's most poetic works. The wide difference between the first symphony of this master and his second may give the measure of his versatility, from pedantic to romantic. The second symphony of Brahms may even be called a popular work; the enthusiasm of its reception on Saturday is not an exceptional matter, for it was received with great applause on its first hearing in Vienna.

It was field night for the horn-players for not only had they done prominent work in the Haydn symphony but they were constantly in the foreground in Brahms's work as well, and it is not too much to say that their long-continued task was excellently done.

In the Brahms's symphony the horn-figure of the first measure becomes a large part of the subsequent development. The first movement is a long one, but it is clear, logical and beautiful, and its ending is a finely wrought-up climax.

The second movement is perhaps too intellectual for an ideal slow movement; one finds deliberation where one demands emotion, but it is not long and its thematic treatment makes it a good example of "musician's music."

The third movement is squarely in the domain of folk-music and is distinctly a popular composition. The rhythm of the Minuet, the spirit of the Scherzo, are in this dainty Allegretto, and its scoring is the perfection of daintiness. From its musette-like beginning to its capricious close it has not a dull moment. "Give a dog a bad name and hang him,"—says the old proverb; many have become so used to hearing the accusation that Brahms is abstruse, complicated and dull, that they will hardly believe the statement that this movement is simple, melodic and popular; if they will listen to this Allegretto without prejudice they will discern the last-named qualities easily enough.

The finale was played with glorious breadth and its climax brought forth a torrent of applause. It was a worthy end to a strongly and strangely contrasted programme.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 64.
SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Startling Contrasts Given from Two Composers.

Haydn's "La Chasse" Appears on the Programme for the First Time—Chabrier's Bourree Fantasque Excites Admiration—Brahms' Work Well Interpreted.

The programme for the 17th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Symphony in D-major, "La Chasse"....Haydn
Bourree fantasque....................Chabrier
Scored for orchestra by F. Mottl.
Symphony No. 2, in D-major...........Brahms

The Haydn symphony appeared for the first time on the programmes of these concerts. The work is not in the composer's mature style, but it is delightful in its broad frankness, the spirit and straightforwardness with which it says what it has to say, and in its aspect as music pure and simple. The first movement has more of the greater Haydn in it than has any other portion of the symphony, but it is all refreshing in the hearing, even the naive andante, with its repetitions and its persistent clinging to the tonic.

The finale, with its suggestion of the chase in the horn fanfares, is as rollicking and as inspiriting as any of the composer's achievements in kind. Full of piquant charm is the treatment of the bassoon in the trio of the minuet. In fact the instrumentation throughout overflows with dainty and beautifully colored devices. When it is considered that the work is scored without clarinets, trumpets and a second flute, the solidity of effect and the volume of tone produced is rather astonishing.

These old masters obtained their noisier moments with remarkable skill. The art of producing a brilliant tone picture with few pigments seems to have been lost in these days of massive orchestration, and it is well, once in a while, to be carried back to the past, to be instructed how powerful contrasts may be obtained without calling in the aid of thunder.

The performance of the work was in every way admirable. Mr. Gericke showed characteristic reverence for Haydn by permitting him to speak in the fashion of his day, and in harmony with the underlying spirit of the music. The opening allegro was not too fast, nor the andante too slow. Even the adagio did not drag for want of the proper motion to keep its phrases sufficiently close together. It was a masterly reading and performance of a fascinating work.

In immeasurable contrast was the Chabrier bourree, with its passionate restlessness; its harmonies dragged from the deepest recesses of the bizarre; its laboriously-sought eccentricities of emphasis, and its impulsive wildness generally. It seems that originally it was not written for the orchestra.

Motte's instrumentation is almost oerwhelming in its virile brilliancy; in its superbly-rich variety of tone color, in the astonishing inventiveness with which the arranger has found the means to heap startling effect upon startling effect, novel combination upon novel combination.

It is stated that he was familiar with Chabrier's style of orchestration, and was thus enabled to reproduce it with a certain facility; but in none of the works of that composer hitherto given here has any such bewilderingly original instrumentation as this been heard. The resources of extreme modern orchestration have never been more fully exemplified, even in the Richard Strauss scores that have been played here.

It is all very ingenious, very novel and, to tell the truth, very interesting. It is perhaps of little lasting value, but it is a splendid tour de force, a recklessly dashing bit of bravado, and as such excites admiration that no one need be ashamed of bestowing.

The performance was one of remarkable effectiveness, even for this able and experienced body of players. The work made a great impression on the audience, and the applause it drew forth was very enthusiastic. However, it is but fair to add that the Haydn symphony met with quite as cordial appreciation.

To dwell on the presentation of the symphony would be only to repeat what has already been said so many times of it. Mr. Gericke is always felicitous in his Brahms' interpretations, and the orchestra plays this composer con amore.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven, and "A Faust Smphony," Liszt. Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen is to be the soloist, and will sing an aria and a group of songs. In the Liszt work a male chorus of members of the Cecilia and Mr. Herbert Johnson will assist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1899.

"LA CHASSE."

Haydn's Symphony Given in Music Hall.

Other Features of the Seventeenth Concert.

The program of the 17th Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Symphony in D major, "La Chasse"..Haydn
(First time at these concerts.)
Bourrée fantasque.....................Chabrier
(Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major..........Brahms

This is the story about Haydn's symphony "La Chasse."

It was written in 1781, the first of five symphonies that year. Haydn used as the finale—"La Chasse"—the introduction to the third act of his opera, "La fedeltâ premiata," which was produced in the new theatre of Prince Nicholas Esterházy in October, 1780. The goddess Diana is introduced in this opera as one of the characters, and she slays the villain and unites the lovers. The symphony was performed, according to a tradition, at a concert given in honor of Esterhazy's safe return from Paris, where he had tarried longer than was his wont, and the surprise of hearing unexpectedly in this symphony a portion of the opera pleased the patron. Haydn made an arrangement of the whole work for the clavier, and the manuscript is still in existence.

The first three movements of this symphony are eminently moral and old-fashioned. They served last night chiefly to show the wealth of string-tone in the orchestra. The only other interest was historical, and there are histories that may be taken for granted. The finale is amusing in a mild and pleasant manner. Simple, lively, played with dash, it provoked hearty applause. There are undoubtedly hundreds of "music lovers" in all large towns that relish keenly such symphonies; for they are not disturbed or perplexed by them; and Haydn is a safe name to use in conversation. But these modern fellows—these wild Russians and singular Belgians and fantastic Frenchmen! "No, no," these admirable music lovers say; "give me the dear old music."

⁂

Treatises agree with the compiler of the program book in saying that the Bourrée is "in many respects similar to the Gavotte, but is to be distinguished from it by being in allabreve time, with two beats to the measure, whereas the Gavotte has distinctly four. Again, the Gavotte regularly begins on the third quarter of the measure, and the Bourrée invariably on the fourth (second half of the allabreve upbeat)."

Now the Bourrée was danced to singing which often took the place of instrumental music, and in Auvergne and other provinces today country people dance and sing this dance by the hour.

You may easily see some of these tunes. Look at Jérome Bujeaud's "Chants et Chansons de l'Oues." The author speaks of the dance itself as a three step dance, which begins with the foot raised. He gives three airs that are sung to this dance. All are in 3-8 time.

Look at "Chansons populaires recueilles dans le Vivarais et le Vercors" by Vincent d'Indy and Julien Tiersot. Tiersot claims that these Bourrée tunes in 3-8 are "Montagnardes." He admits however that they are known in those parts as Bourrées. He then gives an "authentic Bourrée" in 2-4; and, lo and behold, it begins on the first beat!

Look at that monumental work, "Histoire de la Chanson populaire en France," by Julien Tiersot. He is speaking of the Bourrée. "The Bourrée is popular in the whole mountainous region of Central France. It is danced nearly everywhere in three-time" (p. 120). He, too, notes the distinction between the Montagnarde and the Bourrée that is mentioned by the books, but in an example of the latter, known at Paris as well as in Auvergne—"Digua Dzanetta, voli tu dzaugna la dra"—you find the dance beginning on the first quarter in 2-4.

Chabrier was a man that hugely loved a joke. He was a loving disciple of Pantegruelism, a muiscian of Rabelaisian laugh as well as fine taste and fiery imagination. He was also a prodigious pianist—a pianist that did amazing, incredible things. I do not know when this Bourrée fantasque for the piano was written; it has been played in French concert halls certainly for the last five years. Mottl, intimate and affectionate friend of Chabrier, orchestrated it, and it was first performed at one of the symphony concerts in Carlsruhe and afterward in Paris, when Mottl was a visiting conductor. French dishes in a German travern are as a rule to be avoided, but Mottl scored this piece with more than ordinary ingenuity and with brilliant effect. Brilliantly played, although there might be question concerning the precise pace, it gave great pleasure, and there was hearty, genuine applause. They, if there were any, who feared that the dignity of these functions had been lowered for a few minutes, were consoled immediately by the second sermon of Johannes Brahms, who had marvelous patience and industry in the expression of little original musical thought.

HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1899.

Boston Symphony.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week were the best they have given this season in New York. Mr. Gericke, always admirable as conductor, outdid himself, and the orchestra members followed suit. The programme on Wednesday was made up of the "Carnival" overture, Dvorak; concerto for violin, Spohr; "Leonore" overture, No. 3, Beethoven; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. In every item both Gericke and his men were well-nigh perfect, and, as for the Beethoven overture, it was never more beautifully given, while the wonderful tone-color and local color of Berlioz's very Italian symphony was deliciously painted.

Lady Hallé (Norman Neruda), the foremost woman violinist of the world, was soloist. For years she has been a favorite—and justly so—of the British public. She is a player faultless in classic repose, and, except Joachim, the only violinist who carefully avoids the mere virtuosic effects so natural to the instrument. It is difficult to realize that Neruda is within a month of her sixtieth year. Nothing in her appearance or her playing suggests this. As a rule, it is memory that fails artists first, when they begin to age, but that of Neruda at both concerts was faultless. Madame Neruda played the Spohr concerto in an able and most finished fashion. She was enthusiastically applauded and recalled, and her first appearance in New York was a distinct triumph.

The second concert, which took place Thursday evening, was in every way the equal of its predecessor. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was magnificently given, as was also the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, by Tschaikowsky. The Vincent d'Indy symphonic variations were also well given, and Madame Neruda in every way confirmed the excellent impression made at the first concert. Her selection was Max Bruch's concerto, and now and again her playing perhaps was too classical. More nuance and caprice would have been an improvement in this work. But, with one or two exceptions, her intonation was faultless, and her reading was distinguished by superior musical taste and exquisite nicety in detail. Undoubtedly she is playing as well as she did ten years ago, when she was at the height of her career, and violin students who desire to hear truly great and classical violin playing should not lose a great chance now hardly likely to be repeated.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Mall on Saturday evening, was:

Haydn: Symphony in D major, "La Chasse" (Rieter—Biedermann, No. 5).
(First time at these concerts.)
Chabrier: Bourrée fantasque.
(Scored for Orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.

The Haydn symphony is no great addition to our repertory; the first movement is simply hopeless; it smacks of Haydn, the musician, but surely not of Haydn, the genius. The second movement is chiefly remarkable for showing how the composer could extract some beauty from an unpromisingly dull theme; the minuet is "quelconque!" The finale, however, from which the symphony takes its name, is bright and brilliant. But the whole symphony is not worth giving merely for the sake of the finale.

Mottl's transcription of Chabrier's pianoforte Bourrée fantasque is exceedingly cleverly and sympathetically done. One might almost fancy the orchestration to be Chabrier's own—which is saying a good deal. The piece itself is a capital musical joke, and pretends to be nothing more. It is full of humor, of queer fancies—the French "fantasque" is a little more than our "fantastic," just as the French "fantastique" is a little less—and, above all, full of Chabrier's inimitable life, go and champagne effervescence. No one but he could have written it; it is a good companion piece to his "Espana," which, by the way, ought soon to be given again. The performance was admirable in the extreme.

Brahms's D major symphony was grandly, wonderfully read and played: at once with due stability and with due flexibility of tempo and expression. Every change of tempo seemed there as if by divine right; one could not for the moment imagine it being otherwise. The symphony, thus played, and notably the finale, worked the audience up to a positive furor. It was a great experience!

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala" opus 13; ——, air; Beethoven, overture to "Coriolan," opus 62; ——, air; Liszt, a Faust-symphony (entire). Mme. Boyce-Jensen will be the singer; a male chorus of members of the Cecilia and Mr. Herbert Johnson (tenor) will also assist.

[112]

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

First Times of the Haydn Symphony "La Chasse" and the Chabrier "Bourree Fantasque"—The Brahms Symphony, No. 2.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventeenth concert. The programme:

Symphony in D major, "La Chasse"……Haydn
(First time at these concerts.)
Bourree fantasque……Chabrier
(Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major……Brahms

I suppose there are a great many Haydn symphonies that never have and never will be heard in Boston, but it is always a pleasure to get one of the rare old fellow's works for the first time. Nor was the one selected for this occasion by Mr. Gericke at all unworthy a place, spite of the flavor of genteel mediocrity that pervaded the first half of it. It was all very pure and lovely and a good example of how much the masters of the last century could accomplish with the somewhat limited instrumental means at their disposal. The last movement, representing a hunting scene in the country, was full of rollicking grace, beautiful tonal effects and the characteristic bonhomme of the composer. The whole piece was played with just the right touch of delicacy and simplicity.

Then there came a good, strong dose of modernism in the shape of Chabrier's curious and somewhat distorted "Bourree." To the rather peppery quality Mottl has undoubtedly contributed a great deal with his rich and powerful instrumentation, in which is employed every device known to the present day enthusiast for tone color. The spirit of the antique dance form is not always in evidence, but the piece as a whole is so stirring, virile and sumptuous that all is forgiven. The orchestra played it as if thoroughly in the mood, and the splendid effects of the work were heightened by the virtuosity of the playing.

The calm beauty of the Brahms symphony was a not unwelcome sedative. This particular work has its tiresome moments like all the rest, but it has places of wonderful loveliness. What could be more exquisite than the quiet close of the first movement or the deeply tender opening of the second? All through this work—which I think I like best of the composer's symphonies—are scattered passages of that introspective charm that—given the properly receptive mood—is irresistible. It is scarcely necessary to say that Mr. Gericke read the work as admirably as ever.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 12, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen was the soloist. The first number of the programme was Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," which was the work that brought universal fame to the composer. Nothing that Goldmark has since written is superior to this overture, which, after more than thirty years, is still a standard work for the best orchestral concerts. The performance was one of remarkable finish and brilliancy, Mr. Gericke receiving a great ovation after the performance.

Mme. Boye-Jensen sang an aria from Handel's opera, "Partenope," now but little known, also an aria from Saint-Saens's "Samson and Delilah." She has a fine contralto voice of great power and beautiful quality of tone. She sang both numbers excellently, especially the latter, and she was several times recalled.

The last number of the programme was Liszt's "Faust" symphony, in three parts. It was given entire as long ago as 1880 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann. It may have been given in its complete form since then, but certainly not for several years, if at all. The symphony is based upon Goethe's poem, and its three parts, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, are really not parts of a symphony, as the word is generally understood, but rather symphonic poems in so-called "free" style. It does not seem to be a work that one would care to hear often. There is always evidence enough of Liszt's brilliant scoring and elaborate devices, but everything is so vague—mere guess work—that the ideas, if there are such, are hardly those in which the average listeners would have much pleasure. The first movement may be considered the best. In the last movement there is a closing chorus for male voices, and tenor solo on the last lines of the second part of Goethe's tragedy.

Mr. Gericke conducted an able performance and brought out all the effects that were possible. The chorus made up from the Cecelia had but little to do, but that was well done, and the tenor solo was admirably sung by Mr. Herbert Johnson. Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

☞ The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment, rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1899.

RECENT CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's able leadership, is always sure of a warm welcome in the metropolis, a welcome which always has the genuine ring of gratitude and sincerity. The orchestral pieces given on Wednesday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, were the two overtures "Carnival" (Dvorak) and "Leonore" (Beethoven) and the "Harold" symphony of Berlioz. Mr. Kneisel played the viola obligato in the symphony with a firm, pleasing tone. In particular did the orchestra show its grand power of expression in the "Leonore." On the occasion of the second concert by Mr. Gericke's orchestra on Thursday evening of last week, the program consisted of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, fantasia from Max Bruch's G minor violin concerto, Vincent d'Indy's symphonic poem, "Istar," heard for the first time here, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Each of these orchestral pieces was rendered with admirable sureness and emphasis, and the treatment accorded the "Eroica" was eminently pure and classic. In each of these compositions, Mr. Gericke gave renewed assurance of that lofty ideality and broad, satisfactory grasp of the subject which delights all lovers of the true tone poem. But of the d'Indy composition, it may be said that it was too intricate and too full of constantly varying themes to make its way alone in a strange land and among strange people. It stood in need of a few explanatory notes to prepare the listener for the full effects of its message and meaning.

At both of these concerts there was a rich reward in store for the ever-faithful dilettanti, and that was the appearance of an entirely new and extremely interesting personality in our world of music bearing the picturesque name of

LADY HALLÉ.

When we tell our readers that those who claim to know say that this woman's age counts its sixty summers, the only response can be: Why has she tarried so long in her coming? Sixty is old for a man; but for a woman—well, we can only add that Lady Hallé is a very young looking person for her age. She ought to [illegible] the soft impeachment and stand [illegible]ty, not a year more. Anyway, she is a violinist of marked power, drawing an almost virile bow, with a technique that enables her to walk boldly in where performers of the angelic choir might fear to tread. Lady Hallé's playing delighted everybody and, barring the fact that in her zeal and pardonable flurry in acknowledging a recall on Thursday evening, she made a misstep and fell very heavily on the edge of the platform, her bearing, manner and carriage had about as little of the "eternal womanly" as one could well imagine. In the first concert, she was heard in a Spohr Concerto, well-known to lovers of violin music. It may be said that she rendered the piece with wonderful grace and virtuosity. Speaking of her performance of the Bruch Concerto on Thursday evening, a well-known critic remarks: "Her playing of the first two movements was beautiful, and could have been done only by a true artist, well equipped with technical skill and stage experience, and gifted with strong musical instincts. It was a performance conspicuous for its lofty serenity, its fine poise, its polished dignity."

Lady Hallé will not be many months older before she has become a favorite with our concert goers. To say that she is worth hearing only half expresses the truth of the matter.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $8.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum,
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.
THURSDAY, MARCH 9, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance by the Orchestra and Lady Halle, Soloist.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. Interest in these superb performances, which seemed to flag in the early part of the season, shows signs of reviving as the series draws to a close. The attendance last night, as at the previous concert, showed a marked increase over that of the first few concerts. Those who came were well rewarded for their trouble, for they heard one of the most interesting programmes of the season, and one of the finest solo violinists who has ever appeared in this city. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," ……Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky.
Concerto for violin, No. 8, in A-minor, "Scena Cantante," Op. 47……Louis Spohr.
I. Allegro molto (A-minor).
II. Adagio (F-major).
III. Allegro moderato (A-minor).
Symphony No. 3, in G-major, with violin obligato, "Harold in Italy," Op. 16……Hector Berlioz.
(Violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
I. Harold in the Mountains: Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy.
Adagio (G-major).
Allegro, (G-major).
II. March of Pilgrims, singing their Evening Hymn:
Allegretto (E-major).
III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress:
Allegro assai (C-major).
Allegretto (C-major).
IV. Orgy of Brigands: Allegro frenetico (G-minor).

The two orchestral numbers were somewhat similar in style, though the great composers, Tchaikovsky and Berlioz, had little in common save a certain daring freedom in the handling of instrumental combinations. The overture fantasy "Romeo and Juliet" is written with all the fanciful imagination and gorgeous exuberance of orchestral coloring that distinguish the work of the greatest of Russian composers, whose tragic death a few years since robbed the world of its foremost musical genius. Given the subject, there is little difficulty for the hearer to follow the course of the drama, as illustrated in the music. The brawls of the Montagus and Capulets, the love episodes of the hero and heroine, the tragic finale, are all clearly enough depicted. It is "programme music" sure enough, but a veritable musical poem withal, and has always been a welcome number upon the symphony programmes. The performance was unexceptionable on the score of vigor and delicacy of treatment and easy handling of great technical difficulties.

Berlioz's symphony in G, entitled "Harold in Italy," is a work cast upon similar imaginative lines, and equally stands for "programme music" of the best sort. The history of the composition of this work is an interesting one, and throws a curious side light upon the personal eccentricities of that most peculiar genius, Paganini, the wizard of the violin.

This symphony originated in Paganini's asking Berlioz to write a viola concerto for him, the great violinist having just purchased a fine old viola, and knowing of nothing in the concerto form for the instrument. Berlioz accepted the commission only after a good deal of hesitation, objecting that, to write a good concerto for viola, one must play the instrument himself, and he did not. But at last he consented to try, and the idea struck him of writing an orchestral composition in several movements, in which the solo viola should play a part of a quasi-dramatic character. When he had nearly finished the sketch for the first movement, Paganini asked to see it, and was frightened by the number of rests in the viola part. "That is not the thing at all," cried he. "I am silent too long in it; what I want is to be playing all the time!" Berlioz told him that he knew from the beginning that he would be disappointed, and urged him to write the wished-for concerto himself. But for this Paganini said he had no time. So Berlioz, abandoning the idea of writing anything, especially for Paganini, went on with his work in his own way. The result was the symphony with obligato viola in its present form. Paganini was present at the first performance; he expressed his delight with the work by sending Berlioz a check for 20,000 francs the next day, which sum the poor composer devoted to paying off some crying debts, but especially to buying leisure to write his "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, which he dedicated to Paganini.

Again the orchestra distinguished itself by the sustained vigor and charming nuance of its performance. The part for solo viola was played with exceeding skill and beautiful tone quality by that always reliable artist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The soloist of the evening was Lady Halle (Norman Neruda), who choose for her number Spohr's concerto No. 8. Lady Halle's reputation has been for many years of the highest upon the Continent and in England, where she has long made her home. It did not take long for last night's audience to discover that her's is a reputation well won and thoroughly deserved. In some respects the performance which she gave us last night has never been excelled, if it has, indeed, been equalled, by any player, and this not forgetting that Ysaye, Thompson, Marteau, and other world-famous violinists have appeared in Infantry Hall. Lady Halle's tone is not large, but it has great carrying power and is of the utmost purity and clearness. For delicacy of touch, fine shades of sentiment and ability to color the tone at will, Lady Halle's playing is unique and unapproachable. She makes the violin "sing" as no one else has done in our hearing of recent years. It is not difficult to see why her popularity in England should be something enormous. She makes music—real music, not noise—and that is what pleases John Bull, and, for that matter his cousin Jonathan, too. Lady Halle was stormily applauded and responded to several recalls.

Altogether, the concert was one of the most pleasing of the series. The seventh concert by the orchestra will be given Wednesday evening, March 29.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the eighteenth symphony concert was:

Overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13 Goldmark
Aria from "Penelope"……Handel
Air from "Samson and Dalila" Saint-Saens
A Faust—Symphony, C minor……Liszt
Soloist, Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen.
A male chorus of members of the Cecilia and tenor solo by Mr. Herbert Johnson.

A large audience gathered to hear this concert, which was somewhat trying to the nerves on account of its length, although the instrumental works were well worth the hearing. It is doubtful if the orchestra ever gave a better interpretation of the Goldmark overture than on this occasion, and surely no conductor every read it in a better or more sympathetic spirit than Mr. Gericke. The Faust-Symphony was read and played with equal care, spirit and brilliancy, and the result produced would have been more striking if the work were less long. Liszt seems to have feared that his meanings would not be clear, and he not only repeated and developed them for the sake of art, but then re-repeated them and turned them over again to make sure that he would not be misunderstood. The work is very interesting and contains many high thoughts and some trivial ones. It is interesting to note how very trivial some of the ideas are when they are presented in their primitive nakedness, but how regally imposing they are after they have been dressed up and the attention distracted from their soul worth to the value of their dress and ornaments. There is a suggestion of Wagner about the work, and the insistency with which the composer dwells on his themes and repeats them causes one to think of leit-motives. Wagner never labelled his characters with more utility, and the Faust motive and the Gretchen motive and the Mephistopheles motive return and return with a monotonous frequency that recalls the great master of musical dramas. The old is even more conspicuous than the new in the work, and suggests a time-worn and picturesque gothic castle with a modern extension added to it. It is a strong and a weak work at the same time, an example of Listz's lofty ideas, brilliancy and sincerity, and of his love for meretricious glitter. The chorus can hardly be considered a thrilling climax, however, for it is ineffective. Mr. Gericke read the work with rare spirit, and the chorus had no difficulty in reading the meaning of his baton.

The soloist, Mme. Boye-Jensen, has a pleasant, if somewhat weak voice for the concert stage, and her method sometimes brings her into trouble. She does not seem to have thoroughly mastered the art of sustained singing, and she has the bad habit of ending her phrases abruptly, suggesting abrupt fracture rather than soundness. She is an earnest if not a phenomenal singer, and she was heard to better advantage in the Saint Saens than in the Handel selection.

The program for the next concert is: Suite in D minor, Tscharkowski; Concerto for Pianoforte, D minor, No. 2, MacDowell; Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24, Richard Strauss. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno.

March 6

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

First Times of the Haydn Symphony "La Chasse" and the Chabrier "Bourree Fantasque"—The Brahms Symphony, No. 2.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventeenth concert. The programme:

Symphony in D major, "La Chasse".....Haydn
(First time at these concerts.)
Bourree fantasque..........................Chabrier
(Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major..........Brahms

I suppose there are a great many Haydn symphonies that never have and never will be heard in Boston, but it is always a pleasure to get one of the rare old fellow's works for the first time. Nor was the one selected for this occasion by Mr. Gericke at all unworthy a place, spite of the flavor of genteel mediocrity that pervaded the first half of it. It was all very pure and lovely and a good example of how much the masters of the last century could accomplish with the somewhat limited instrumental means at their disposal. The last movement, representing a hunting scene in the country, was full of rollicking grace, beautiful tonal effects and the characteristic bonhomme of the composer. The whole piece was played with just the right touch of delicacy and simplicity.

Then there came a good, strong dose of modernism in the shape of Chabrier's curious and somewhat distorted "Bourree." To the rather peppery quality Mottl has undoubtedly contributed a great deal with his rich and powerful instrumentation, in which is employed every device known to the present day enthusiast for tone color. The spirit of the antique dance form is not always in evidence, but the piece as a whole is so stirring, virile and sumptuous that all is forgiven. The orchestra played it as if thoroughly in the mood, and the splendid effects of the work were heightened by the virtuosity of the playing.

The calm beauty of the Brahms symphony was a not unwelcome sedative. This particular work has its tiresome moments like all the rest, but it has places of wonderful loveliness. What could be more exquisite than the quiet close of the first movement or the deeply tender opening of the second? All through this work—which I think I like best of the composer's symphonies—are scattered passages of that introspective charm that—given the properly receptive mood—is irresistible. It is scarcely necessary to say that Mr. Gericke read the work as admirably as ever.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 12, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen was the soloist. The first number of the programme was Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," which was the work that brought universal fame to the composer. Nothing that Goldmark has since written is superior to this overture, which, after more than thirty years, is still a standard work for the best orchestral concerts. The performance was one of remarkable finish and brilliancy, Mr. Gericke receiving a great ovation after the performance.

Mme. Boye-Jensen sang an aria from Handel's opera, "Partenope," now but little known, also an aria from Saint-Saens's "Samson and Delilah." She has a fine contralto voice of great power and beautiful quality of tone. She sang both numbers excellently, especially the latter, and she was several times recalled.

The last number of the programme was Liszt's "Faust" symphony, in three parts. It was given entire as long ago as 1880 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann. It may have been given in its complete form since then, but certainly not for several years, if at all. The symphony is based upon Goethe's poem, and its three parts, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, are really not parts of a symphony, as the word is generally understood, but rather symphonic poems in so-called "free" style. It does not seem to be a work that one would care to hear often. There is always evidence enough of Liszt's brilliant scoring and elaborate devices, but everything is so vague—mere guess work—that the ideas, if there are such, are hardly those in which the average listeners would have much pleasure. The first movement may be considered the best. In the last movement there is a closing chorus for male voices, and tenor solo on the last lines of the second part of Goethe's tragedy.

Mr. Gericke conducted an able performance and brought out all the effects that were possible. The chorus made up from the Cecelia had but little to do, but that was well done, and the tenor solo was admirably sung by Mr. Herbert Johnson. Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

☞ The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticize productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment, rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1899.

RECENT CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's able leadership, is always sure of a warm welcome in the metropolis, a welcome which always has the genuine ring of gratitude and sincerity. The orchestral pieces given on Wednesday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, were the two overtures "Carnival" (Dvorak) and "Leonore" (Beethoven) and the "Harold" symphony of Berlioz. Mr. Kneisel played the viola obligato in the symphony with a firm, pleasing tone. In particular did the orchestra show its grand power of expression in the "Leonore." On the occasion of the second concert by Mr. Gericke's orchestra on Thursday evening of last week, the program consisted of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, fantasia from Max Bruch's G minor violin concerto, Vincent d'Indy's symphonic poem, "Istar," heard for the first time here, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Each of these orchestral pieces was rendered with admirable sureness and emphasis, and the treatment accorded the "Eroica" was eminently pure and classic. In each of these compositions, Mr. Gericke gave renewed assurance of that lofty ideality and broad, satisfactory grasp of the subject which delights all lovers of the true tone poem. But of the d'Indy composition, it may be said that it was too intricate and too full of constantly varying themes to make its way alone in a strange land and among strange people. It stood in need of a few explanatory notes to prepare the listener for the full effects of its message and meaning.

At both of these concerts there was a rich reward in store for the ever-faithful dilettanti, and that was the appearance of an entirely new and extremely interesting personality in our world of music bearing the picturesque name of

Lady Hallé.

When we tell our readers that those who claim to know say that this woman's age counts its sixty summers, the only response can be: Why has she tarried so long in her coming? Sixty is old for a man; but for a woman—well, we can only add that Lady Hallé is a very young looking person for her age. She ought t[illegible]ly the soft impeachment and stand [illegible]ty, not a year more. Anyway, she is a violinist of marked power, drawing an almost virile bow, with a technique that enables her to walk boldly in where performers of the angelic choir might fear to tread. Lady Hallé's playing delighted everybody and, barring the fact that in her zeal and pardonable flurry in acknowledging a recall on Thursday evening, she made a misstep and fell very heavily on the edge of the platform, her bearing, manner and carriage had about as little of the "eternal womanly" as one could well imagine. In the first concert, she was heard in a Spohr Concerto, well-known to lovers of violin music. It may be said that she rendered the piece with wonderful grace and virtuosity. Speaking of her performance of the Bruch Concerto on Thursday evening, a well-known critic remarks: "Her playing of the first two movements was beautiful, and could have been done only by a true artist, well equipped with technical skill and stage experience, and gifted with strong musical instincts. It was a performance conspicuous for its lofty serenity, its fine poise, its polished dignity."

Lady Hallé will not be many months older before she has become a favorite with our concert goers. To say that she is worth hearing only half expresses the truth of the matter.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum,
☞Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, MARCH 9, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance by the Orchestra and Lady Halle, Soloist.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. Interest in these superb performances, which seemed to flag in the early part of the season, shows signs of reviving as the series draws to a close. The attendance last night, as at the previous concert, showed a marked increase over that of the first few concerts. Those who came were well rewarded for their trouble, for they heard one of the most interesting programmes of the season, and one of the finest solo violinists who has ever appeared in this city. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," ....Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky.
Concerto for violin, No. 8, in A-minor, "Scena Cantante," Op. 47..............Louis Spohr.
I. Allegro molto (A-minor).
II. Adagio (F-major).
III. Allegro moderato (A-minor).
Symphony No. 3, in G-major, with violin obligato, "Harold in Italy," Op. 16........ ....Hector Berlioz.
(Violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
I. Harold in the Mountains: Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy.
Adagio (G-major).
Allegro (G-major).
II. March of Pilgrims, singing their Evening Hymn:
Allegretto (E-major).
III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress:
Allegro assai (C-major).
Allegretto (C-major).
IV. Orgy of Brigands: Allegro Irenetico (G-minor).

The two orchestral numbers were somewhat similar in style, though the great composers, Tchaikovsky and Berlioz, had little in common save a certain daring freedom in the handling of instrumental combinations. The overture fantasy "Romeo and Juliet" is written with all the fanciful imagination and gorgeous exuberance of orchestral coloring that distinguish the work of the greatest of Russian composers, whose tragic death a few years since robbed the world of its foremost musical genius. Given the subject, there is little difficulty for the hearer to follow the course of the drama, as illustrated in the music. The brawls of the Montagus and Capulets, the love episodes of the hero and heroine, the tragic finale, are all clearly enough depicted. It is "programme music" sure enough, but a veritable musical poem withal, and has always been a welcome number upon the symphony programmes. The performance was unexceptionable on the score of vigor and delicacy of treatment and easy handling of great technical difficulties.

Berlioz's symphony in G, entitled "Harold in Italy," is a work cast upon similar imaginative lines, and equally stands for "programme music" of the best sort. The history of the composition of this work is an interesting one, and throws a curious side light upon the personal eccentricities of that most peculiar genius, Paganini, the wizard of the violin.

This symphony originated in Paganini's asking Berlioz to write a viola concerto for him, the great violinist having just purchased a fine old viola, and knowing of nothing in the concerto form for the instrument. Berlioz accepted the commission only after a good deal of hesitation, objecting that, to write a good concerto for viola, one must play the instrument himself, and he did not. But at last he consented to try, and the idea struck him of writing an orchestral composition in several movements, in which the solo viola should play a part of a quasi-dramatic character. When he had nearly finished the sketch for the first movement, Paganini asked to see it, and was frightened by the number of rests in the viola part. "That is not the thing at all," cried he. "I am silent too long in it; what I want is to be playing all the time!" Berlioz told him that he knew from the beginning that he would be disappointed, and urged him to write the wished-for concerto himself. But for this Paganini said he had no time. So Berlioz, abandoning the idea of writing anything, especially for Paganini, went on with his work in his own way. The result was the symphony with obligato viola in its present form. Paganini was present at the first performance; he expressed his delight with the work by sending Berlioz a check for 20,000 francs the next day, which sum the poor composer devoted to paying off some crying debts, but especially to buying leisure to write his "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, which he dedicated to Paganini

Again the orchestra distinguished itself by the sustained vigor and charming nuance of its performance. The part for solo viola was played with exceeding skill and beautiful tone quality by that always reliable artist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The soloist of the evening was Lady Halle (Norman Neruda), who choose for her number Spohr's concerto No. 8. Lady Halle's reputation has been for many years of the highest upon the Continent and in England, where she has long made her home. It did not take long for last night's audience to discover that her's is a reputation well won and thoroughly deserved. In some respects the performance which she gave us last night has never been excelled, if it has, indeed, been equalled, by any player, and this not forgetting that Ysaye, Thompson, Marteau, and other world-famous violinists have appeared in Infantry Hall. Lady Halle's tone is not large, but it has great carrying power and is of the utmost purity and clearness. For delicacy of touch, fine shades of sentiment and ability to color the tone at will, Lady Halle's playing is unique and unapproachable. She makes the violin "sing" as no one else has done in our hearing of recent years. It is not difficult to see why her popularity in England should be something enormous. She makes music—real music, not noise—and that is what pleases John Bull, and, for that matter his cousin Jonathan, too. Lady Halle was stormily applauded and responded to several recalls.

Altogether, the concert was one of the most pleasing of the series. The seventh concert by the orchestra will be given Wednesday evening, March 29.

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the eighteenth symphony concert was:

Overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13 Goldmark
Aria from "Penelope"...............Handel
Air from "Samson and Dalila" Saint-Saens
A Faust—Symphony, C minor.........Liszt
Soloist, Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen.
A male chorus of members of the Cecilia and tenor solo by Mr. Herbert Johnson.

A large audience gathered to hear this concert, which was somewhat trying to the nerves on account of its length, although the instrumental works were well worth the hearing. It is doubtful if the orchestra ever gave a better interpretation of the Goldmark overture than on this occasion, and surely no conductor every read it in a better or more sympathetic spirit than Mr. Gericke. The Faust-Symphony was read and played with equal care, spirit and brilliancy, and the result produced would have been more striking if the work were less long. Liszt seems to have feared that his meanings would not be clear, and he not only repeated and developed them for the sake of art, but then re-repeated them and turned them over again to make sure that he would not be misunderstood. The work is very interesting and contains many high thoughts and some trivial ones. It is interesting to note how very trivial some of the ideas are when they are presented in their primitive nakedness, but how regally imposing they are after they have been dressed up and the attention distracted from their soul worth to the value of their dress and ornaments. There is a suggestion of Wagner about the work, and the insistency with which the composer dwells on his themes and repeats them causes one to think of leit-motives. Wagner never labelled his characters with more utility, and the Faust motive and the Gretchen motive and the Mephistopheles motive return and return with a monotonous frequency that recalls the great master of musical dramas. The old is even more conspicuous than the new in the work, and suggests a time-worn and picturesque gothic castle with a modern extension added to it. It is a strong and a weak work at the same time, an example of Listz's lofty ideas, brilliancy and sincerity, and of his love for meretricious glitter. The chorus can hardly be considered a thrilling climax, however, for it is ineffective. Mr. Gericke read the work with rare spirit, and the chorus had no difficulty in reading the meaning of his baton.

The soloist, Mme. Boye-Jensen, has a pleasant, if somewhat weak voice for the concert stage, and her method sometimes brings her into trouble. She does not seem to have thoroughly mastered the art of sustained singing, and she has the bad habit of ending her phrases abruptly, suggesting abrupt fracture rather than soundness. She is an earnest if not a phenomenal singer, and she was heard to better advantage in the Saint Saens than in the Handel selection.

The program for the next concert is: Suite in D minor, Tscharkowski; Concerto for Pianoforte, D minor, No. 2, MacDowell; Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24, Richard Strauss. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno.

...ston ...nal

...DAY ... 12, 1899.

LISZT'S "FAUST."

Symphony Concert-Goers Listen to It

Other Features of the Eighteenth Evening

The program of the 18th Symphony concert, Mr. Garicke conductor, last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala"..........Goldmark
Aria, "Furibondo Spira," from "Parthenope"..........Handel
Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila"......Saint-Saëns
A Faust Symphony in C minor.........Liszt

The feature of the concert was the performance of the Sakuntala overture. Mr. Gericke gave a broad, spirited; yes, passionate reading, and while every detail received loving attention, the general effect was thereby enhanced, not frittered away. The orchestra responded gloriously. It is not too much to say that the performance was remarkable in all respects, one that gave the keenest enjoyment, one that will linger long in the memory. Especially striking was Mr. Gericke's treatment of the coda, which, as read and played, was for once overpowering in its effect, and not merely a conventional, perfunctory apotheosis.

And with this overture genuine interest ceased.

* * *

I hardly know how to speak of Mrs. Margaret Boye-Jensen, for with the best intention in the world I can say nothing pleasant about her singing. It is better, then, to say nothing. A kindly, or undiscriminating, audience, paid her the compliment of applause.

* * *

Last night, in Chicago, as well as in Boston, Liszt's "Faust" symphony was performed, as a whole. In Chicago the orchestra was assisted by Mr. George Hamlin and the Mendelssohn Club; in Boston the orchestra was assisted by Mr. Herbert Johnson and a male chorus of members of the Cecilia.

The whole of the Chicago programbook was given up to the consideration of this colossal bore. Allow me to quote one sentence:

"In the 'Faust' symphony Liszt apparently has sought to portray, not the physical situations of Goethe's wonderful life-drama but the metaphysical; the psychological, mysterious undercurrent of sense and consciousness which surges within the great bosom of humanity, tossing it hither and thither from the topmost pinnacle of ecstasy to the deepest abyss of despair, until it is finally engulfed in the boundless ocean of oblivion."

You see that "oratory" is not dead in the West, nor is it even asleep.

Now Liszt may have sought to do this, he may have done it; but he forgot for the most part to write music.

In the Gretchen movement there are musical and poetical ideas, although the Margaret theme, the one first given out by the oboe with an alto accompaniment, is without marked beauty or characterization. The second theme is more expressive. But a few portions of one movement do not make a work in three movements great or endurable. I care not for the chronological interest of the work; nor could I keep awake last night merely by the thought that the modern Russians have built on Lisbt and Berlioz; nor did the reflection that Wagner was influenced mightily by Liszt give me any comfort, for even in the dreariest moments of Wotan's garrulousness there is no such settling into the slough of despond.

The first movement is a case of false pretensions. I have read much about the esoteric meaning of the "Inquiry" theme, the questioning of Faust? But where is this theme used in any truly effective way? The movement is stuffed with platitudes. The bombast is like the cry of the Oriental hawker—"In the name of the Prophet—figs!" Everywhere is the suspicion of deliberate insincerity. Nowhere is there a spontaneously beautiful or authoritatively imposing musical moment.

And this Mephistopheles of the third movement is about as dangerous in his mockery as the established cynic at a second rate but genteel boarding house. Take the label away from the music and would you have any idea of satanic characterization? If this music be the expression of Satan's sharpest shafts of irony, his home must be exceeding dull. And everywhere you see the composer straining, and hammering, and lighting damp fire-works, and then coming in front of his work and bowing the knee, and wondering why you do not appreciate him?

How ineffective the chorus-music at the end! What weak, pointless stuff was Mr. Johnson of the beautiful voice obliged to sing!

It is possibly a good thing to perform the "Faust" symphony once in forty years. We have served our term.

The symphony is a masterpiece of hollow pretension; it is a miracle of dullness.

Philip Hale.

Among the many people at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday afternoon were Mrs. Bryce J. Allan, who had Mrs. William A. Hooper with her, Mrs. Oliver Ames, 2d, Mrs. George Sanger, Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. Charles W. Whitcomb, Mrs. B. M. Field, Mrs. Frank S. Chick, Mrs. William Goodwin, Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Dixey, Mr. Bayard Thayer, Mr. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. W. G. C. Salisbury, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. Judson, Mr. Poor, Mrs. S. B. Field, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 71.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Splendid Work Done by the Famous Orchestra.

Goldmark's Overture, "Sakuntala," Given with Magnificent Effect—Prolonged Applause Rewards Conductor Gericke—Mme. Boye-Jensen the Soloist.

The 18th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with this programme:

Overture to "Sakuntala"............Goldmark
Aria, "Faribondo spira il vento"........Handel
Aria, Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix"......Saint-Saens
A Faust Symphony........................Liszt

Mme. Margaret Boye-Jenson was the soloist. In the Liszt work Mr. Herbert Johnson and a male chorus of members of The Cecilia assisted.

The orchestra acquitted itself through the whole concert in splendid style. Mr. Gericke's reading of the Goldmark overture was the most gorgeously brilliant that it has ever had here. The coloring throughout was magnificent. The immense fire and joyousness that were imparted to the final climax gave an entirely new and tremendously impressive aspect to this portion of the work, and, after having heard it thus interpreted, it seems singular that it should never before have been so treated here, for this forces itself on the mind at once as indisputably the real intention of the composer. The effect was glorious. The audience recognized the beauty of the reading immediately by the fervor of its prolonged applause and its persistent recalls of Mr. Gericke.

The Liszt symphony is desperately wearisome. The first movement, entitled "Faust," is fearfully long-drawn-out, and though its second theme is called the "love theme," it is very unlovely. The orchestration is ingenious; in fact, this feature of the work is interesting from beginning to end. It is true that there is much in it of Berlioz, and much of Wagner; but there is also more that is characteristically Liszt's own, and distinctly original. It is worthy of observation that in this composition Liszt appears to have anticipated the peculiarities that mark the modern Russian school, ugliness included.

The best and most lucid moments of the work are to be found in the second or "Gretchen" movement, which, however, as a whole is depressingly vague and long. The finale, "Mephistopheles," is chiefly distinguished by its cacophony and its strikingly eccentric orchestral effects. Here Liszt has resorted to vulgarizing the themes of the preceding movements, a device invented by Berlioz in his Fantastic Symphony, but the latter made his parodies clearer and more decisive, and did not work them over and over again until he wore them threadbare. The reason for the closing chorus is not wholly plain, nor is it of special interest.

In fine, the symphony indicates great labor, much thought and not a little of fancy and imagination, but, on the whole, it is unattractive, and, despite its prevailing energy, dull. Mr. Gericke read it with masterful skill, and the performance was one that displayed the powers of the orchestra at their very best; but it is doubtful if the work gave any large degree of pleasure to the audience. The chorus singing was everything that could be wished, and Mr. Johnson sang his brief solos in a manner that may be praised heartily.

Of Mme. Boye-Jensen there is little to be said that would not be painful in the saying. She may possibly have great talent, a fine voice and an admirable vocal method, but she did not make her possession of them convincingly clear on this occasion, nor did she justify her appearance at these concerts. It is to be added, however, that she was vigorously applauded after the Saint-Saens aria, and recalled; but it must have been by that portion of the audience that was unaware of the essentials that go toward making fully commendable singing.

The programme for the next concert is: Suite in D minor, Tschaikowsky, first time; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, MacDowell; tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24, Richard Strauss. The solist is to be Mme. Teresa Carreno.

SUN..., MARCH 12, 18...

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The soloists at last week's symphony concerts were Mme Margaret Boye-Jensen and Mr Herbert Johnson, the former singing an aria from Handel's "Parthenope" and a contralto air from "Samson and Dalila." The orchestral numbers were the overture from Goldmark's "Sakuntala" and Liszt's "Faust" symphony, Mr Johnson and a male chorus from the Cecilia singing the tenor and choral music in the finale of the Mephistopheles or third movement. Mme Jensen is a contralto new to Boston, and it is greatly to the artist's credit that she made her debut modestly and without the advance eulogisms and press notices usual with most musicians. She has an excellent voice, more of a deep mezzo-soprano than a true contralto, and the lower register is particularly pleasing and flexible. The latter quality was admirably displayed in the Handel aria, the runs and florid phrases being voiced very smoothly and generally correct in pitch. Mme Jensen's tones in the higher parts of the score appeared clouded at times by reason of a faulty emission, the mouth not being opened enough. The Saint-Saens air was sung with more freedom and ease than was the Handel excerpt, the singer apparently gaining in confidence after the first selection. Mme Jensen is evidently an artist of high rank, for she phrases well and gives a careful interpretation of her music. She produces her upper tones with some effort, but her contralto register is used with but little apparent labor and despite the defects before mentioned her work is enjoyable. She was very cordially received.

The Goldmark overture was splendidly performed by the orchestra, the beauties of the elaborate score receiving a thoroughly sympathetic and vivid interpretation. The so-called love melody of the first part was charmingly sung by the cellos and clarinet, and the modulation into the hunting theme showed the brasses to advantage. The complex finale, in which the first and second theme are "juggled" by the different contingents was a striking example of precision in team work, each part of the band doing its work with a promptness which produced a clarity of tone that was entirely devoid of the blurring interpretation sometimes heard in this movement.

The "Faust" symphony, which Liszt called character pictures of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles was notably good in the individuality suggested by each of the movements. The delicacy of the string work in the first part is deserving of special commendation, and the intricate melodic figurations in the second movement were deftly surmounted. The solo in the finale of the Mephistopheles movement was admirably sung by Mr Johnson. His voice was in splendid condition, and it is to be regretted that there is so little to the aria, for the tenor sang with a purity of tone and tenderness of expression that denoted the true artist. His performance gave great pleasure to his many friends and admirers in the audience, and he was the recipient of much applause. The chorus did its work well and the burlesque in orchestration was cleverly brought out by the symphony men.

Mme Teresa Carrens will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will be as follows: Tschaikowski's suite in D minor, first time at these concerts, MacDowell's D minor concerto for piano and "Death and Transfiguration," a true poem by Richard Strauss.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 12, 1899.

There were only two instrumental numbers on the eighteenth Symphony programme—Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, which is by turns [illegible] bland or stirring and brilliant, and Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which is none too easy to characterize, because it is rather a tone-poem in three volumes than anything else. These sections are prolix, often vague, extravagant, and ad captandum in figure and in fashion of coloring. They afford a vast field for the disporting of imaginative fancy, if one chooses to exercise himself in that way, and at the same time they suggest about as many contradictions as correspondences when confronted with the usual ideal standards of the three personages whose names they bear—Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. Mr. Gericke had taken pains to prepare this work according to the author's plan, providing for the last movement the chorus of male voices and the tenor leading voice which are usually omitted, drawing a steady and sonorous body of singers from the Cecilia and appointing to the solo lines Mr. Herbert Johnson, who delivered them altogether admirably. The orchestra did not attain quite to perfection, in spite of unusually assiduous rehearsing; and we doubt whether it would be worth while to guarantee against a few slips and hesitancies by the amount of toil which would be required to master completely so difficult, complicated and fantastic a composition. The overture was charmingly performed.

Mrs. Margaret Boye-Jensen,—a recently arrived stranger, we believe, sang after the overture an air from Handel's "Partenope,"—composed almost entirely of rushing salades, having now no dramatic meaning and no particular interest or value unless as matter for scale practice,—and the familiar air of Delilah from the "Samson and Delilah" of Saint Saens. The orchestra accompanied both. The singer showed a good and pleasant contralto voice, some free facility in execution, and an acceptable style somewhat blemished by uneven attack in upward phrases. But—certainly at the rehearsal—neither her voice nor her manner made any great impression or warranted her preference over scores of other singers for a place in a Symphony concert.

At the next concert Mme. Teresa Carreno will play MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto, the place of the Symphony will be occupied by Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and there will actually be a piece of new music, Tschaikowski's suite in D minor.

...shed 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1899.

Symphony and Recital by Lady Halle and Mme. Szumowska.

The chief orchestral feature of the symphony concert, last Saturday evening, was the Sakuntala overture—chief, that is, in point of merit. In point of length the Faust "symphony" overshadowed all else on the programme, and almost all in the audience, in addition. The Sakuntala overture has come to be an old friend to symphony audiences. Although Mr. Gericke was not the first to introduce that composition in this city, it must be nearly 15 years, or perhaps more, since he first led at its presentation here, and it has been heard often, as well as early. The Liszt number was not entirely unfamiliar, either. Its presentation must have called up to many hearers an earlier attempt of a rather unfortunate character; but that is rather ancient history, now. Let the dead past bury its dead, especially when the dead are of the Faust-symphony variety.

The Goldmark "overture" is in all its essentials about the same thing as that favorite of the composers of the latest school—the symphonic poem. That form of composition is being done to death—or at least, to excruciating torture—by modern musicians. It is a barren and sombre season, indeed, when we have not a glut in the market for symphonic poems. "Sakuntala" is not nearly so viciously complex or as painfully grotesque as the really modern symphonic poem, nor, on the other hand, does it attain to the wonderful heights and passionate depths of the Coriolanus overture which had also been announced for Saturday night; but that assertion merely amounts to the conclusion that Goldmark was not as great as Beethoven.

The Goldmark overture, however, is not without nobility. Its chief fault is its undue insistence upon special phrases, amounting at times to an unpleasant iteration. It has won its recognized place upon the symphony programme because of its virility and its powerful climaxes. It is to be regretted that it was not rewritten in a more condensed form by the composer. It was given with wonderful beauty and sympathy Saturday night, however, and this latest rendering served to emphasize the reasons for the self-evident popularity which this composition has had for so many years in this city. It has a charm and a direct appeal to all classes of music lovers. It was clearly the most attractive number of the evening.

The Faust symphony is a rather fragmentary composition and, taken as a whole, is by no means the best of the Liszt productions in that line, of which there is quite a group. The opening movement is rather weak. The adagio and the allegro are neither touching nor impressive. The "Gretchen" andante has a melody that is sweet and poetical. It depends for much of its beauty upon the oboe passages which express the idea of sweet simplicity and innocence. The Mephisto scherzo is a ribald mimicry and mockery of the two preceding movements, and then there comes the finale, which in this case was taken by a male chorus of the Cecilia, Mr. Herbert Johnson singing the tenor solo.

In attempting to be impressive in this "symphony" which is not a symphony, Liszt made himself rather tiresome. There is too much padding to too little real music. The effect of the chorus was indistinct and Mr. Johnson was often almost inaudible beneath the tone of the orchestra. The chorus and solo were given with English words; but only a part of those words were to be understood. If this symphony should be given again some years hence (there is certainly no need of a prompt repetition) it would be an improvement to have the chorus nearer the audience.

The two solos given by Mme. Boye-Jensen were both suggestive of classic oratorio. They were the aria "Wuethend brausen Wetterstuerme" from Handel's "Partenope," and "Mon cour s'ouvre a ta voix" from Saint-Saens "Samson et Dalila." They were well chosen for displaying Mme. Jensen's voice in florid and difficult runs after the manner of the usual Italian school of vocal exercise. Unfortunately the voice, while sweet and well cultivated, did not possess enough strength in the lower contralto register to show a fair balance with the orchestra, although Mr. Gericke did his best to keep the instruments down to almost pianissimo tone. Dalila's solo made the better impression of the two, but it was clear from the outset that Mme. Jensen's voice would have been heard to far better advantage in chamber music. It was as much out of place with the great orchestra as Liszt was in attempting to write symphonies.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C. FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

New York, March 11, 1899.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra embraced Haydn's symphony in D major, "La Chasse;" Bourrée fantastique by Chabrier, and Brahms' second symphony. The Haydn and Chabrier numbers were heard for the first time in these concerts. The latter piece, written for piano, was scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl. It was brilliantly played by the orchestra, and as a divertissement created great enthusiasm.

There is nothing more to be said of the work, generally, of the orchestra than has been repeated of late in these columns. The playing is never slovenly, as under Nikisch, but the effect is that same monotone of uncontrasted readings that now mark Gericke's efforts.

The orchestral garment is of coarse homespun material. There was not one touch of delicacy and grace in the playing of the Haydn symphony. Refinement in Gericke's readings is now but a tradition.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1899.

LISZT'S "FAUST."

Symphony Concert-Goers Listen to It.

Other Features of the Eighteenth Evening.

The program of the 18th Symphony concert, Mr. Garicke conductor, last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala"............Goldmark
Aria, "Furibondo Spira," from "Parthenope"...............................Handel
Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saëns
A Faust-Symphony in C minor..........Liszt

The feature of the concert was the performance of the Sakuntala overture. Mr. Gericke gave a broad, spirited, yes, passionate reading, and while every detail received loving attention, the general effect was thereby enhanced, not frittered away. The orchestra responded gloriously. It is not too much to say that the performance was remarkable in all respects, one that gave the keenest enjoyment, one that will linger long in the memory. Especially striking was Mr. Gericke's treatment of the coda, which, as read and played, was for once overpowering in its effect, and not merely a conventional, perfunctory apotheosis.

And with this overture genuine interest ceased.

⁂

I hardly know how to speak of Mrs. Margaret Boye-Jensen, for with the best intention in the world I can say nothing pleasant about her singing. It is better, then, to say nothing. A kindly, or undiscriminating, audience, paid her the compliment of applause.

⁂

Last night, in Chicago, as well as in Boston, Liszt's "Faust" symphony was performed, as a whole. In Chicago the orchestra was assisted by Mr. George Hamlin and the Mendelssohn Club; in Boston the orchestra was assisted by Mr. Herbert Johnson and a male chorus of members of the Cicilia.

The whole of the Chicago program-book was given up to the consideration of this colossal bore. Allow me to quote one sentence:

"In the 'Faust' symphony Liszt apparently has sought to portray, not the physical situations of Goethe's wonderful life-drama but the metaphysical; the psychological, mysterious undercurrent of sense and consciousness which surges within the great bosom of humanity, tossing it hither and thither from the topmost pinnacle of ecstasy to the deepest abyss of despair, until it is finally engulfed in the boundless ocean of oblivion."

You see that "oratory" is not dead in the West, nor is it even asleep.

Now Liszt may have sought to do this, he may have done it; but he forgot for the most part to write music.

In the Gretchen movement there are musical and poetical ideas, although the Margaret theme, the one first given out by the oboe with an alto accompaniment, is without marked beauty or characterization. The second theme is more expressive. But a few portions of one movement do not make a work in three movements great or endurable. I care not for the chronological interest of the work; nor could I keep awake last night merely by the thought that the modern Russians have built on Lisbt and Berlioz; nor did the reflection that Wagner was influenced mightily by Liszt give me any comfort, for even in the dreariest moments of Wotan's garrulousness there is no such settling into the slough of despond.

The first movement is a case of false pretensions. I have read much about the esoteric meaning of the "Inquiry" theme, the questioning of Faust? But where is this theme used in any truly effective way? The movement is stuffed with platitudes. The bombast is like the cry of the Oriental hawker—"In the name of the Prophet—figs!" Everywhere is the suspicion of deliberate insincerity. Nowhere is there a spontaneously beautiful or authoritatively imposing musical moment.

And this Mephistopheles of the third movement is abut as dangerous in his mockery as the established cynic at a second rate but genteel boarding house. Take the label away from the music and would you have any idea of satanic characterization? If this music be the expression of Satan's sharpest shafts of irony, his home must be exceeding dull. And everywhere you see the composer straining, and hammering, and lighting damp fire-works, and then coming in front of his work and bowing the knee, and wondering why you do not appreciate him?

How ineffective the chorus-music at the end! What weak, pointless stuff was Mr. Johnson of the beautiful voice obliged to sing!

It is possibly a good thing to perform the "Faust" symphony once in forty years. We have served our term.

The symphony is a masterpiece of hollow pretension; it is a miracle of dullness.

Philip Hale.

Among the many people at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday afternoon were Mrs. Eryce J. Allan, who had Mrs. William A. Hooper with her, Mrs. Oliver Ames, 2d, Mrs. George Sanger, Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. Charles W. Whitcomb, Mrs. R. M. Field, Mrs. Frank S. Chick, Mrs. William Goodwin, Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Dixey, Mr. Bayard Thayer, Mr. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. W. G. C. Salisbury, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. Judson, Mr. Poor, Mrs. S. B. Field, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 71.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Splendid Work Done by the Famous Orchestra.

Goldmark's Overture, "Sakuntala," Given with Magnificent Effect—Prolonged Applause Rewards Conductor Gericke—Mme. Boye-Jensen the Soloist.

The 18th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with this programme:

Overture to "Sakuntala"...........Goldmark
Aria, "Faribondo spira il vento"......Handel
Aria, Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix"......Saint-Saens
A Faust Symphony.....................Liszt

Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen was the soloist. In the Liszt work Mr. Herbert Johnson and a male chorus of members of The Cecilia assisted.

The orchestra acquitted itself through the whole concert in splendid style. Mr. Gericke's reading of the Goldmark overture was the most gorgeously brilliant that it has ever had here. The coloring throughout was magnificent. The immense fire and joyousness that were imparted to the final climax gave an entirely new and tremendously impressive aspect to this portion of the work, and, after having heard it thus interpreted, it seems singular that it should never before have been so treated here, for this forces itself on the mind at once as indisputably the real intention of the composer. The effect was glorious. The audience recognized the beauty of the reading immediately by the fervor of its prolonged applause and its persistent recalls of Mr. Gericke.

The Liszt symphony is desperately wearisome. The first movement, entitled "Faust," is fearfully long-drawn-out, and though its second theme is called the "love theme," it is very unlovely. The orchestration is ingenious; in fact, this feature of the work is interesting from beginning to end. It is true that there is much in it of Berlioz, and much of Wagner; but there is also more that is characteristically Liszt's own, and distinctly original. It is worthy of observation that in this composition Liszt appears to have anticipated the peculiarities that mark the modern Russian school, ugliness included.

The best and most lucid moments of the work are to be found in the second or "Gretchen" movement, which, however, as a whole is depressingly vague and long. The finale, "Mephistopheles," is chiefly distinguished by its cacophony and its strikingly eccentric orchestral effects. Here Liszt has resorted to vulgarizing the themes of the preceding movements, a device invented by Berlioz in his Fantastic Symphony, but the latter made his parodies clearer and more decisive, and did not work them over and over again until he wore them threadbare. The reason for the closing chorus is not wholly plain, nor is it of special interest.

In fine, the symphony indicates great labor, much thought and not a little of fancy and imagination, but, on the whole, it is unattractive, and, despite its prevailing energy, dull. Mr. Gericke read it with masterful skill, and the performance was one that displayed the powers of the orchestra at their very best; but it is doubtful if the work gave any large degree of pleasure to the audience. The chorus singing was everything that could be wished, and Mr. Johnson sang his brief solos in a manner that may be praised heartily.

Of Mme. Boye-Jensen there is little to be said that would not be painful in the saying. She may possibly have great talent, a fine voice and an admirable vocal method, but she did not make her possession of them convincingly clear on this occasion, nor did she justify her appearance at these concerts. It is to be added, however, that she was vigorously applauded after the Saint-Saens aria, and recalled; but it must have been by that portion of the audience that was unaware of the essentials that go toward making fully commendable singing.

The programme for the next concert is: Suite in D minor, Tschaikowsky, first time; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, MacDowell; tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24, Richard Strauss. The solist is to be Mme. Teresa Carreno.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1899.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The soloists at last week's symphony concerts were Mme Margaret Boye-Jensen and Mr Herbert Johnson, the former singing an aria from Handel's "Parthenope" and a contralto air from "Samson and Dalila." The orchestral numbers were the overture from Goldmark's "Sakuntala" and Liszt's "Faust" symphony, Mr Johnson and a male chorus from the Cecilia singing the tenor and choral music in the finale of the Mephistopheles or third movement. Mme Jensen is a contralto new to Boston, and it is greatly to the artist's credit that she made her debut modestly and without the advance eulogisms and press notices usual with most musicians. She has an excellent voice, more of a deep mezzo-soprano than a true contralto, and the lower register is particularly pleasing and flexible. The latter quality was admirably displayed in the Handel aria, the runs and florid phrases being voiced very smoothly and generally correct in pitch. Mme Jensen's tones in the higher parts of the score appeared clouded at times by reason of a faulty emission, the mouth not being opened enough. The Saint-Saens air was sung with more freedom and ease than was the Handel excerpt, the singer apparently gaining in confidence after the first selection. Mme Jensen is evidently an artist of high rank, for she phrases well and gives a careful interpretation of her music. She produces her upper tones with some effort, but her contralto register is used with but little apparent labor and despite the defects before mentioned her work is enjoyable. She was very cordially received.

The Goldmark overture was splendidly performed by the orchestra, the beauties of the elaborate score receiving a thoroughly sympathetic and vivid interpretation. The so-called love melody of the first part was charmingly sung by the cellos and clarinet, and the modulation into the hunting theme showed the brasses to advantage. The complex finale, in which the first and second theme are "juggled" by the different contingents was a striking example of precision in team work, each part of the band doing its work with a promptness which produced a clarity of tone that was entirely devoid of the blurring interpretation sometimes heard in this movement.

The "Faust" symphony, which Liszt called character pictures of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles was notably good in the individuality, suggested by each of the movements. The delicacy of the string work in the first part is deserving of special commendation, and the intricate melodic figurations in the second movement were deftly surmounted. The solo in the finale of the Mephistopheles movement was admirably sung by Mr Johnson. His voice was in splendid condition, and it is to be regretted that there is so little to the aria, for the tenor sang with a purity of tone and tenderness of expression that denoted the true artist. His performance gave great pleasure to his many friends and admirers in the audience, and he was the recipient of much applause. The chorus did its work well and the burlesque in orchestration was cleverly brought out by the symphony men.

Mme Teresa Carrens will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will be as follows: Tschaikowski's suite in D minor, first time at these concerts, MacDowell's D minor concerto for piano and "Death and Transfiguration," a true poem by Richard Strauss.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 12, 1899.

There were only two instrumental numbers on the eighteenth Symphony programme—Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, which is by turns soft and bland or stirring and brilliant, and Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which is none too easy to characterize, because it is rather a tone-poem in three volumes than anything else. These sections are prolix, often vague, extravagant, and ad captandum in figure and in fashion of coloring. They afford a vast field for the disporting of imaginative fancy, if one chooses to exercise himself in that way, and at the same time they suggest about as many contradictions as correspondences when confronted with the usual ideal standards of the three personages whose names they bear—Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. Mr. Gericke had taken pains to prepare this work according to the author's plan, providing for the last movement the chorus of male voices and the tenor leading voice which are usually omitted, drawing a steady and sonorous body of singers from the Cecilia and appointing to the solo lines Mr. Herbert Johnson, who delivered them altogether admirably. The orchestra did not attain quite to perfection, in spite of unusually assiduous rehearsing; and we doubt whether it would be worth while to guarantee against a few slips and hesitancies by the amount of toil which would be required to master completely so difficult, complicated and fantastic a composition. The overture was charmingly performed.

Mrs. Margaret Boye-Jensen,—a recently arrived stranger, we believe, sang after the overture an air from Handel's "Partenope,"—composed almost entirely of rushing salades, having now no dramatic meaning and no particular interest or value unless as matter for scale practice,—and the familiar air of Delilah from the "Samson and Delilah" of Saint Saens. The orchestra accompanied both. The singer showed a good and pleasant contralto voice, some free facility in execution, and an acceptable style somewhat blemished by uneven attack in upward phrases. But—certainly at the rehearsal—neither her voice nor her manner made any great impression or warranted her preference over scores of other singers for a place in a Symphony concert.

At the next concert Mme. Teresa Carreno will play MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto, the place of the Symphony will be occupied by Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and there will actually be a piece of new music, Tschaikowski's suite in D minor.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1899.

Symphony and Recital by Lady Halle and Mme. Szumowska.

The chief orchestral feature of the symphony concert, last Saturday evening, was the Sakuntala overture—chief, that is, in point of merit. In point of length the Faust "symphony" overshadowed all else on the programme, and almost all in the audience, in addition. The Sakuntala overture has come to be an old friend to symphony audiences. Although Mr. Gericke was not the first to introduce that composition in this city, it must be nearly 15 years, or perhaps more, since he first led at its presentation here, and it has been heard often, as well as early. The Liszt number was not entirely unfamiliar, either. Its presentation must have called up to many hearers an earlier attempt of a rather unfortunate character; but that is rather ancient history, now. Let the dead past bury its dead, especially when the dead are of the Faust-symphony variety.

The Goldmark "overture" is in all its essentials about the same thing as that favorite of the composers of the latest school—the symphonic poem. That form of composition is being done to death—or at least, to excruciating torture—by modern musicians. It is a barren and sombre season, indeed, when we have not a glut in the market for symphonic poems. "Sakuntala" is not nearly so viciously complex or as painfully grotesque as the really modern symphonic poem, nor, on the other hand, does it attain to the wonderful heights and passionate depths of the Coriolanus overture which had also been announced for Saturday night; but that assertion merely amounts to the conclusion that Goldmark was not as great as Beethoven.

The Goldmark overture, however, is not without nobility. Its chief fault is its undue insistence upon special phrases, amounting at times to an unpleasant iteration. It has won its recognized place upon the symphony programme because of its virility and its powerful climaxes. It is to be regretted that it was not rewritten in a more condensed form by the composer. It was given with wonderful beauty and sympathy Saturday night, however, and this latest rendering served to emphasize the reasons for the self-evident popularity which this composition has had for so many years in this city. It has a charm and a direct appeal to all classes of music lovers. It was clearly the most attractive number of the evening.

The Faust symphony is a rather fragmentary composition and, taken as a whole, is by no means the best of the Liszt productions in that line, of which there is quite a group. The opening movement is rather weak. The adagio and the allegro are neither touching nor impressive. The "Gretchen" andante has a melody that is sweet and poetical. It depends for much of its beauty upon the oboe passages which express the idea of sweet simplicity and innocence. The Mephisto scherzo is a ribald mimicry and mockery of the two preceding movements; and then there comes the finale, which in this case was taken by a male chorus of the Cecilia, Mr. Herbert Johnson singing the tenor solo.

In attempting to be impressive in this "symphony" which is not a symphony, Liszt made himself rather tiresome. There is too much padding to too little real music. The effect of the chorus was indistinct and Mr. Johnson was often almost inaudible beneath the tone of the orchestra. The chorus and solo were given with English words; but only a part of those words were to be understood. If this symphony should be given again some years hence (there is certainly no need of a prompt repetition) it would be an improvement to have the chorus nearer the audience.

The two solos given by Mme. Boye-Jensen were both suggestive of classic oratorio. They were the aria "Wuethend brausen Wetterstuerme" from Handel's "Partenope," and "Mon cour s'ouvre a ta voix" from Saint-Saens "Samson et Dalila." They were well chosen for displaying Mme. Jensen's voice in florid and difficult runs after the manner of the usual Italian school of vocal exercise. Unfortunately the voice, while sweet and well cultivated, did not possess enough strength in the lower contralto register to show a fair balance with the orchestra, although Mr. Gericke did his best to keep the instruments down to almost pianissimo tone. Dalila's solo made the better impression of the two, but it was clear from the outset that Mme. Jensen's voice would have been heard to far better advantage in chamber music. It was as much out of place with the great orchestra as Liszt was in attempting to write symphonies.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE

New York, March 11, 1899.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra embraced Haydn's symphony in D major, "La Chasse;" Bourrée fantastique by Chabrier, and Brahms' second symphony. The Haydn and Chabrier numbers were heard for the first time in these concerts. The latter piece, written for piano, was scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl. It was brilliantly played by the orchestra, and as a divertissement created great enthusiasm.

There is nothing more to be said of the work, generally, of the orchestra than has been repeated of late in these columns. The playing is never slovenly, as under Nikisch, but the effect is that same monotone of uncontrasted readings that now mark Gericke's efforts.

The orchestral garment is of coarse homespun material. There was not one touch of delicacy and grace in the playing of the Haydn symphony. Refinement in Gericke's readings is now but a tradition.

[114]

[illegible]script

MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala," opus 13.
Handel: Aria, "Furioso spira il vento," from "Partenope."
Saint-Saëns: Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
Liszt: Eine Faust-Symphonie, in C minor.

Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen was the singer, and a male chorus from the Cecilia and Mr. Herbert Johnson, tenor, assisted.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" has surely never been more superbly played here. We heard some people say that Mr. Gericke had made some changes in his reading of the work; but, unless our memory plays us very false, he read it exactly as he did years ago, when he was first here. His reading is certainly different from that of any other conductor we know; but we believe that he is ready to swear to its authenticity. His tempo is decidedly faster than that of other conductors, almost throughout; he makes what we had become used to consider the rather swooning sensuousness of the music all aglow with passion. We like his reading best; it seems to put the music upon a higher plane.

Liszt's "Faust" symphony is, to us, his most interesting work. It has its faults, the worst of which is its inordinate length; but it is a wonderful work, for all that. What struck us especially last Saturday was its remarkable up-to-dateness; it was written about forty years ago, but nothing we now hear by Tchaikovsky or Rimsky-Korsakoff sounds more completely modern in style. Whatever one may think of the calibre of Liszt's genius as a composer, he plainly had the genius of foreseeing coming artistic tendencies and points of view; he was a good quarter of a century in advance of his age. No doubt this symphony shows the direct influence of Berlioz, to whom the score is dedicated. Perhaps Liszt put himself under this influence a little too zealously; he makes a habit of certain things which Berlioz did only semi-occasionally, and with greater effectiveness; for, with Liszt, they degenerate into mannerisms. But, if Berlioz was really the Sebastian Bach of the whole modern musical movement, Liszt was surely the man to play Philipp Emmanuel to his Sebastian; he is the connecting link between Berlioz and all the modern men who do not emanate from Wagner. It is, upon the whole, surprising—considering the intimate relations between the two men, and Wagner's undeniably superior force—how exceedingly little of Wagner there is in Liszt.

To us, the "Faust" symphony is Liszt's most coherent work on a large scale; also the one into which he put the most of himself with the most inspiration. Fully to appreciate this series of "three tone-pictures," one must make due allowance for the tone-painter's extremely subjective mental attitude toward his subject. The three movements are not so much character sketches of Faust, Gretchen and Mephisto as Goethe drew them, as expressions of Liszt's own feeling about these three characters. If we forget this, we may well kick a little at Liszt's tone-painting, especially in the "Gretchen" movement. Surely, if Goethe's Gretchen was anything, she was the embodiment of health; and this music seems, from the start, to show us somebody in sore need of medical attendance. It seems less like Gretchen than like, say, Madame de Genlis, showing Gretchen how a lady of really fine feelings would do it. But, if it is abhorrent, as a musical picture of Gretchen herself, it is a wonderful expression of the feelings with which Gretchen inspired Franz Liszt; which feelings have a strong touch of self-conscious morbidezza. As music, it is exceedingy beautiful. It is a touch of genius, in the "Mephistopheles" movement, that the evil spirit, after laughing nearly every theme in the two other movements to scorn, notably the love-theme, finds himself unable to parodize the Gretchen-motive; Gretchen is beyond his power! The concluding Chorus mysticus is, to us, wonderfully beautiful and impressive. Here Liszt rises to genuine grandeur of conception.

The performance was superb in the extreme; both reading and execution were admirable. The male chorus sang extremely well, and Mr. Johnson gave his solo-passages with great beauty of expression. Mme. Boye-Jensen showed, in the Handel air, a certain facility of vocalization; but she sang too false almost throughout to call for serious criticism.

The next programme is: Tchaikovsky, suite No. 1, in D minor, opus 43 (first time); MacDowell, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor; Richard Strauss, tone-poem, "Tod und Verklärung," opus 24. Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the pianist.

NEW MUSIC HALL PLANS

They Arrived in This City Sunday

And Are Exhibited in the Tremont Building

General Style of Building Is to Be Classic

It Is Longer, Narrower and Lower Than Old Hall

Plans for the New Music Hall, to be located at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues, arrived in this city Sunday morning from the New York office of the architects, McKim, Mead & White, and at present they may be seen in room 314 of the Tremont Building. The building committee of the New Music Hall corporation is to consider these plans before their acceptance, and it is possible that a number of alterations will be suggested; therefore as they are drawn at present they are not deemed to be final plans, but rather [illegible] eight plans in all: one is colored and represents the exterior of the building, while the others show longitudinal and transverse sections, the elevations on Massachusetts and Huntington avenues, and plans of the basement, the floor and the first and second balconies. It is understood that the material to be used will be brick, probably red, and stone. The main entrance, on Huntington avenue, has an Ionic portico, with eight stone pillars; the main hall, or what better might be called the hall proper, rises higher than the rest of the building, with a pediment at the top; what seems to be a harp is the crowning glory of the roof front. At either corner of the front section is a pavilion which runs into a wing extending the length of the building; overlooking these wings in the main hall are clere-windows. On the Massachusetts side is a vestibule which if followed up makes a straight line through and across the hall interior; protecting this vestibule is a marquise, on the lines of that at the Thirty-fourth-street entrance to the Astoria in New York. The building will completely fill the lot purchased for it, and consequently will have a frontage of 150 feet on Huntington avenue and will extend 210 feet on Massachusetts avenue. It is notable that the plan measurements give no figure for the height of the building, but it would seem to be between seventy-six and eighty feet.

No estimate of the cost of the building, of the material to be used, or of the quality or degree of interior embellishment, has been made by the architects. They took into consideration solely general arrangements, such as seating capacity, offices, and incidentally acoustic properties. No one concert hall, either at home or abroad, has been taken as a model or as a basis for these plans; they stand as the results of original ideas, intended to meet the rather peculiar requirements of the builders. It is true that some conception of the ultimate exterior appearance can be had from the colored plan; at the front, on either side of the portico, stands a niched statue, while on the Massachusetts-avenue side a similar statue stands at each corner. Over the portico is a space reserved for appropriate inscription, while a smaller space is left, in the form of a square, at either end, about on a line with the larger space. As to the interior, the present plan allows for several statues along the walls; the windows, now drawn as full windows, may be cut down, giving an upper curved half only. The distinguishing features of the new building are that it is longer, narrower and lower than the old Music Hall.

